The claimants *have no equity to cancel this part of their own executed contract for several reasons.

The bonds were lost or destroyed, and there was some difficulty in making the necessary proof to establish them. The parties owning the lost bonds made a proposition to settle the matter. Distinct terms of settlement were offered and accepted by them. We regard the arrangement then made as the compromise of a doubtful right, with full knowledge of all the facts, and as belonging to that class of agreements to which the doctrine as to mistakes does not ordinarily apply. The word "compromise" involves the idea of a surrender of rights. "If the parties intended the settlement as a composition or compromise of a doubtful or disputed right, the court will not, on the sole ground of mistake, set it aside. Durham v. Wadlington, 2 Strob. Eq. 258; Keitt v. Andrews, 4 Rich. Eq. 349. For it is obvious that in that case, inasmuch as the parties did not seek to conform their settlement to the exact facts of the case, the truth of no one fact could be regarded as vital to the consideration by which they were moved. For the same reason, if, for the want of information, the parties mutually assumed the existence of certain facts and understandingly dispensed with further inquiry as to their actual truth, the court will not interfere if this assumption turns out to be erroneous." McDow v. Brown, 2 S. C. 109; Pratt v. Weyman, 1 McC. Eq. 156.

There is another reason why these claimants have no equity to set up the ten lost mortgage bonds. That would be, in effect, to set aside the compromise agreement in part, and sustain it as to the other part. The arrangement not only embraced the ten lost mortgage bonds, but also thirty-seven non-mortgage bonds, which have turned out to be utterly worthless, but for which the parties received in the arrangement bonds of the company guaranteed by the state, which, after the priorities of the creditors of the company were ascertained, turned out to be worth par and interest. The parties have received the money on these, and, quoad hoc, do not propose to rescind the agreement. The settlement was a unity and cannot be maintained as to the part which was advantageous, and set aside as to the part which turned out to be disadvantageous. "Generally, no contract can be rescinded *by one of the parties unless both can be restored to the condition in which they were before the contract was made. If, therefore, one of the parties has derived an advantage from the partial performance, he cannot hold this and consider the contract as rescinded because of the non-performance of the residue." Pars. on Cont. 679; Hunt v. Silk, 5 East 449; Taylor v. Hare, 1 Bos. & Pull. 260; Fripp v. Fripp, Rice's Eq. 84.

But it is urged that so much of the compromise agreement as relates to the ten mortgage bonds should be vacated for the reason that the funded interest bonds received in exchange for them in the arrangement were void and of no legal value, for the reasons that the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was in the hands of a receiver at the time they were issued, and the president and directors of that company had no authority or power to issue such bonds; and, also, because the guaranty of the South Carolina Railroad Company, endorsed on these bonds, was void and of no legal value. It has not been shown either that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company had no authority to issue such bonds as the funded interest bonds, or that the South Carolina Railroad Company had no right, legally, to guarantee said bonds. But we do not think these questions necessarily involved in this case. The proposition as to what terms the company would give to make the settlement was distinctly stated in writing, and as certainly accepted by the parties through their attorney. There is no allegation of misrepresentation, imposition or fraud. All the parties understood it or had the means of understanding it. The settlement was made and the bonds issued accordingly. The parties made their own contract with as full knowledge as they now possess in relation to the powers which could be legally exercised under the public acts incorporating the South Carolina Railroad Company and the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company. They received the bonds thus issued and guaranteed; enjoyed the advantages for which they bargained; collected the interest on them; held them without complaint for years, and now, when the makers and the guarantors of the bonds have become insolvent, ask that they may be restored to their former condition as to so much of the compromise agreement as relates *to the ten mortgage bonds. This they ask on the ground that they thought, when they contracted, that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company had the right to issue said bonds, and that the guaranty by them would bind the South Carolina Railroad Company, whereas they now discover that this was a mistake of law. It was ingeniously and strongly argued at the bar that in South Carolina, according to the decided cases, relief will be granted for a mistake of law in a certain class of cases, and that this case falls under that class. The general rule certainly is, that a contract will not be vacated on the ground of ignorance or a simple mistake of law. But we do not think it necessary to enter upon the discussion of this vexed question here. We regard this as an effort to set aside a part of an agreement, which was the compromise of a doubtful right, and we do not think that the parties have any equity to vacate part of their own executed agreement for mistake—if there was mistake—whether that mistake was one of law or of fact. "Where a compromise of a doubtful right is fairly made between the parties, whether the uncertainty rests upon a doubt of fact, or a doubt in point of law, if both parties are in the same ignorance, the compromise is equally binding, and cannot be affected by any subsequent investigation and result." Durham v. Wadlington, 2 Strob. Eq. 258.

The judgment of the court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

One convicted of petit larceny is an incompetent witness. State v. Dodson, (3), 14 S. C. 628, affirmed.

*Before Pressley, J., Marion, March, 1881.

Indictment against Richard James, Ben James and Louis James for murder. Louis was acquitted, and Richard and Ben were convicted.

During the progress of the trial Jack Johnson and Kelly McRimmon were offered as witnesses for the state against Richard James. The counsel for Richard objected to their being sworn or their statement taken as testimony against him, on the ground that they had been convicted of infamous crimes, and therefore disqualified from testifying. The records of their conviction were produced in court, showing that Jack Johnson had been convicted of petit larceny in Court of General Sessions, 1875, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the state penitentiary at hard labor: and that Kelly McRimmon had been convicted of the same offence in the Court of Trial Justice, 1877, and sentenced to thirty days' imprisonment in the county jail or pay a fine of $12 and costs. There was no evidence of a pardon having been granted in either case.

The presiding judge overruled the objection and allowed the witnesses to be sworn and testify. To this ruling the counsel for Richard James excepted, and in his behalf appealed to this court.

Messrs. C. A. Woods and W. J. Montgomery, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor G. W. Dargan, contra.

May 23d, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. In this case the appellant, with his two brothers, was indicted for murder. Upon the trial, which resulted in the conviction of the appellant and one of his brothers, two witnesses, who had been convicted of petit larceny, were permitted, notwithstanding the objection of the appellant, to testify. Their testimony, it is stated, affected the appellant only, and he only has appealed.

The sole question presented by the appeal is, whether a person who has been convicted of petit larceny is a competent witness.

*This question has been practically decided in the recent case of State v. Dodson et al., 14 S. C. 628. Further examination and reflection only serves to confirm us in the correctness of the conclusion reached in that case.

There can be no doubt that, at common law, a conviction of petit larceny rendered a witness incompetent to testify, (Pendock v. Mackinder, Willes 665; Commonwealth v. Keith, 8 Metc. 531; State v. Gardner, 1 Root [Conn.] 485; Lyford v. Farrar, 31 N. H. 314,) and we do not see how the fact that the legislature has declared the offence of petit larceny a misdemeanor and reduced the punishment, can affect the question under consideration. In a note to 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 372, it is said: "It was formerly thought that an infamous punishment, for whatever crime, rendered the person incompetent as a witness by reason of infamy. But this notion is exploded, and it is settled that it is the crime and not the punishment that renders the man infamous." To the same effect see 2 Russ. on Crimes 974; 1 Whart. Am. Cr. Law, § 760; 1 Archb. Cr. Pl. & Pr. 504. In 1 Greenl. on Ev. § 372, in speaking of the incompetency of witnesses upon the ground of infamy, it is said: "The basis of the rule seems to be that such a person is morally too corrupt to be trusted to testify," or, as is said in Starkie on Ev. (Sharswood's ed.) 118: "If a person had been convicted of an offence which is inconsistent with the common principles of honesty and humanity, the law considered his oath to be of no weight and excluded his testimony as of too doubtful and suspicious a nature to be admitted in a court of justice to affect the property or liberty of others." The fact that the legislature has seen fit to alter the amount and character of the punishment for this offence does not change the nature of the offence, the moral qualities of which remain the same as before. This, therefore, cannot restore the competency of a person convicted of this offence, for, as we have seen, "it is the crime, and not the punishment, that renders the man infamous."

In some of the states of the Union statutes have been passed altering the law in this respect, and declaring that a person convicted of petit larceny shall not thereby be rendered incompetent to testify as a witness.

But we have no such statute in this *state, and must, therefore, adhere to the rule of the common law.

We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in permitting witnesses who had been convicted of petit larceny to testify in this case, and that the appellant, against whom alone these witnesses testified, is entitled to a new trial.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed as to the appellant, Richard James, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial as to the said Richard James.

CALDWELL v. LITTLE.

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐86.]

A, B and C were executors of an estate X, which was alleged to be indebted to an estate Y, of which A and B became administrators. Action was brought in the Court of Probate by a distributee of the estate Y against A and B, as administrators, calling upon them to account for their administration of that estate. There being no allegation or proof that A and B, as executors, had received any portion of the estate X, and they having denied any receipts of the estate Y—Held, that constructive payment by operation of law had not been established.

Before Kershaw, J., Laurens, September, 1880.

Hon. T. B. FRASER, judge of the Third Circuit, sat in this court on the hearing of this cause, in the place of Chief Justice SIMPSON, who had been of counsel in the court below.

W. Little and L. R. *Brooks, as administrators of David Williams, deceased. For a full understanding of the points decided by this court, the case is clearly stated in the opinion. The plaintiff appealed.

Mr. John W. Ferguson, for appellant.

May 23d, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

T. B. FRASER, A. A. J. This action was commenced in the Court of Probate for Laurens county, January 15th, 1879, was carried by appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, and comes to this court by appeal from the judgment rendered in that court.

About the year 1825 John Williams died intestate, and administration on his estate was granted to two of his sons, Charles Williams and Lemuel G. Williams. David Williams, Letty Williams and Clarissa Williams were also children of John Williams, deceased.

In May, 1826, Charles and Lemuel G., the administrators, filed their first return in the office of the Ordinary, in which, among other things, they charged themselves with the sum of $802.05, with interest from April 13th, 1825, as the share of David Williams, and on April 13th, 1827, the return filed by them on that day showed that the sum due David Williams was $845.50, with interest from April 13th, 1825. These returns showed also the amounts due Letty and Clarissa, and the latter showed certain payments made for Letty and Clarissa, but none for David.

Similar returns were made annually until April 14th, 1839, when a memorandum was made on the return that "the different amounts charged to administrators is the whole of the capital, although it is charged on every return." After this the administrators returned only money paid out, and continued to make returns until April 14th, 1863, but no return shows any money paid out for David Williams. It appears that Charles Williams is dead, but the date of his death does not appear.

estate, giving bond in the penal *sum of $1700, and, so far as is known, doing no other act as administrator of David Williams. He died in a few weeks after this, leaving a will, which was admitted to probate. The defendants, John W. Little and L. R. Brooks, were appointed executors of the will of Lemuel G. Williams, and qualified. George F. Moseley was also appointed executor, and qualified as such.

After the death of Lemuel G. Williams, the defendants, John W. Little and L. R. Brooks, were appointed administrators de bonis non of David Williams.

The plaintiff in this case is an heir and distributee of David Williams. L. R. Brooks, one of the defendants, speaks of David as his uncle, and, besides this, there is nothing in the case to show how many other distributees there are, Letty and Clarissa Williams, if alive, being the only other two who are mentioned in the testimony.

There is nothing in the case before the court to show that David Williams had any estate except what appears to have been due to him as shown by the returns above referred to, or what estate, if any, Lemuel G. Williams left at his death, and there is no admission of assets by the defendants of either estate.

This action is brought by the plaintiff, Nancy A. Caldwell, one of the heirs and distributees of David Williams, against the defendants as administrators of David Williams, and the defendants are called on to show cause why that estate should not be settled up.

The petition charged that there was a small personal estate of David Williams, besides a considerable estate in the hands of Lemuel G. Williams, deceased. L. R. Brooks, one of the defendants, denies that they received any estate of David Williams, and denies that David Williams had any estate in his lifetime in the hands of Lemuel G. Williams; and John W. Little only denies that he has received assets of David Williams, and says nothing of Lemuel G.

The testimony shows that David Williams lived during his whole lifetime with Lemuel G. Williams, his brother, who was unmarried; that David was of weak mind, but that he was able to do many things which were of service, and that, in fact, he *did do many kinds of service which were valuable. The testimony is conflicting as to the value of his services, and as to the proper compensation for the care and support of one in his condition. It seems that Letty and Clarissa, who are in a similar condition, are now supported at an annual expense of $125 each.

The judge of probate held "that this action is affected neither by the statute of limitations nor by the presumption of payment arising from lapse of time, and that the administrators have in their hands $845.50, with interest from April 13th, 1825, due the estate of David Williams, for which they must account."

On the hearing on the Circuit the presiding judge held that, "in order to reach this conclusion, it is necessary first to fix the liability for said sum upon the estate of Lemuel G. Williams; next, it must appear that in due course of administration it was the duty of the executors of Lemuel G. to pay the said sum to the administrators de bonis non of David Williams. These are questions which cannot be determined unless the executors of Lemuel G. Williams were parties, and were called upon to defend in that capacity. There were two administrators of John Williams. The admission on which the claim rests was the admission of both. Both are equally liable. Yet there is no representative of Charles Williams before the court. In the present state of the proceedings I do not see how it is possible to sustain the decree." "Shall the case be remanded in order that additional parties be made? I do not think so. It is a stale claim." The decree of the Probate Court was reversed and the action dismissed, each party to pay his own costs.

The grounds of appeal bring up all the questions on which the rights of the plaintiff depend.

The plaintiff's case is founded upon the constructive payment by the defendants as executors of Lemuel G. Williams to themselves as administrators of David Williams. If it had been established satisfactorily that Lemuel G. Williams at his death was indebted to David Williams or to his estate, and the defendants were the only representatives of both estates, we think that the claim would be well founded, and that it would be good law to hold that they had received in one capacity what they were bound to pay in another. This doctrine is founded on the *very necessity of the case. But the defendants deny as a matter of fact that they have received any estate of David Williams, and there is no proof that they have received any estate of Lemuel G. Williams, and, both in theory and in fact, the whole estate of Lemuel G. Williams may be in money and under the sole control of the co-executor, George F. Moseley, who is not a party to these proceedings. An administrator is chargeable with what came into the hands of his co-administrator only in consequence of his suretyship on the administration bond, and co-executors are chargeable only each with what comes into his own hands or what he contributes to put into the others' hands. See Wms. on Ex'rs 1293; O'Neall v. Herbert, McM. Eq. 497; Gayden v. Gayden, Id. 436. The fund in this case, if any, has not been traced to the hands of the defendants, and the basis for the constructive payment has not been laid. If there had been any charge of collusion or misappropriation of the funds of an estate, a creditor or distributee may bring suit against the person into whose hands the assets have improperly come, joining the administrator or executor as a party defendant. 1 Story's Eq., §§ 424, 581, note; Story's Eq. Pl., §§ 178, 514. This, however, is a distinct ground of equity jurisdiction, and we do not see how the general grant to the Probate Court of jurisdiction in "matters testamentary and of administration" can confer on that court a right to exercise jurisdiction in such a case as this would be if George F. Moseley had been made a party in the original case in that court. There is no special ground stated in the case before us to make it proper to call in George F. Moseley as executor of Lemuel G. Williams. If he comes in at all, he must come in on the simple allegation that he is one of the executors, and, if on that ground, we do not see why in any case a creditor or distributee of an estate may not call in the debtors of another estate before the Probate Court and proceed to judgment, however complicated might be the proceedings. Cases of collusion with debtors of an estate, misappropriation of the assets, and, perhaps, others are proper subjects of equity jurisdiction, but are not properly cases of "matters testamentary or of administration," in which there is privity between the distributees, legatees or creditors and the personal representatives who are trustees for *them. If this view is correct, then an amendment in the Probate Court by calling in George F. Moseley as executor of Lemuel G. Williams would oust its jurisdiction. This court can hear and determine on appeal only such cases originating in the Probate Court as that court had jurisdiction of. Poole v. Brown, 12 S. C. 556.

In this view of the case it would not be proper to consider and determine the other questions involving the merits. The proper parties are not before the court, and cannot be brought here in this proceeding. Nothing is concluded by this judgment except that this action cannot be maintained in its present shape.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, and that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

Before Pressley, J., Anderson, September, 1879.

In these cases, which were heard together, the Hon. THOMAS B. FRASER, judge of the Third Judicial Circuit, sat in the place of Associate Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the court below.

They were three actions commenced June 29th, 1874, in the name of the State of South Carolina, ex relatione Lydia A. M. Van Wyck, Mary Maverick and eight others, against Isabella H. Norris and thirty-four other defendants. They were actions upon three official bonds of A. O. Norris, as commissioner in equity for Anderson district, bearing date December, 1853, December, 1857, and December, 1861, respectively. The plaintiffs were heirs-at-law of the estate of Samuel Maverick, deceased, and the defendants were the administrator of A. O. Norris, his distributees, and the administrators, heirs, devisees, &c., of the sureties on the three several bonds. All other creditors of A. O. Norris were called in and made parties by publication.

The case is fully stated in the opinion. There is no fact omitted which affects the points decided, except, perhaps, the statement that under the order for the sale of the property of the estate of P. S. Johnston, purchasers were allowed to anticipate payments on their bonds for so much as would be necessary to pay debts.

Exceptions to the referee's report are so full that they clearly indicate the points made by the parties to the cause. No exceptions having been taken to the Circuit decree (only notices of appeal), these exceptions cover the grounds argued in this court. They are as follows:

*The plaintiff, in behalf of herself and the said other heirs-at-law of Samuel Maverick, deceased, excepts to the following conclusions of law found by the said William H. Parker, referee:

1. Because the referee erred in holding that the late Andrew O. Norris, commissioner in equity, had deposited the moneys received by him on account of the Maverick estate, in bank, according to law.

2. Because he erred in sustaining the defence of deposit, when he reports as a fact that said deposit was not sufficient to cover the balances in the hands of the said commissioner on account of all the estates, by the amount of $14,362.02, and it is no defence to say that the said deposit was sufficient to pay all the demands presented, or that the failure to deposit according to law occasioned no injury to any one.

3. Because the referee erred in holding that the statute of limitations was well pleaded in the answers of the several defendants, or in any of them, the plea in all the answers being hypothetical and insufficient.

4. Because the referee erred in holding that the statute of limitations is a bar to the recovery sought by the complainants of the moneys received by the said Andrew O. Norris, commissioner.

5. Because the commissioner is the ministerial officer or financial agent of the court, and not a technical trustee, whose liabilities are governed by rules inapplicable to such ministerial officer, and the referee erred in treating him as such trustee, and holding that his report on estates for 1866 was such act done in a public office by which he divested himself of his trust, with notice to the parties, as gave currency to the statute of limitations from that time.

6. Because such holding, in effect, makes the commissioner a technical trustee, and the referee has erred in applying to him the rules governing the liability of such trustees and contrary to the nature of the relation he sustains to moneys in his hands, as declared by law.

7. Because as to the $2512.50, claimed to have been paid to two of the Maverick heirs, and evidenced by receipts unsigned, the referee erred in holding that the said report on estates was such notice to the parties that the said commissioner held himself *not responsible for the same, as gave currency to the statute of limitations.

8. Because as to the sum of $1683.75, with which the said commissioner failed to charge himself, the referee erred in holding that the said report on estates was such notice to the parties that he claimed not to be charged therewith, as gave currency to the statute of limitations.

9. Because the referee erred in holding that the annual reports and accounts of the commissioner were conclusive of the rights of the parties whose estates or funds were accounted for.

10. Because the referee has erred in holding the commissioner to be a trustee in possession of money received for his cestuis que trust, and that the statute of limitations commenced to run from its receipt and the failure to pay over, and not from the time of the demand.

11. Because the referee erred in holding that a demand on the sheriff was necessary to constitute a breach of his bond and give currency to the statute, while the statute in the case of the commissioner runs from the time of the breaches, for if his holding that the commissioner is the agent of the court and parties be correct, then the statute cannot run in his favor as such agent, except from the time of the demand, notwithstanding there may have been previous breaches.

12. Because as to so much of plaintiffs' money as the late Andrew O. Norris failed to turn over to his successor, the referee erred in not holding that he held the same as the sheriff does, for the benefit of the parties entitled to it.

13. Because the statute of limitations can only run from the time of the demand of the parties in interest, and entitled to the money, and the referee therefore erred in holding that if a demand was necessary, it was made by act and operation of law, and by W. W. Humphreys, as successor of the said Andrew O. Norris, so as to give currency to the statute of limitations.

14. Because the referee erred in holding that the receipts of William Van Wyck, for himself and the other heirs, in March, 1861, were prima facie evidence of a demand of all moneys previously received and on hand at that time (which would, of course, include the balance of $10,212.49 reported at June Term, 1861, *as still on hand after such payments were made,) so as to give currency to the statute of limitations from that time.

15. Because the referee erred in holding, on the authority of Vaughan v. Evans, 1 Hill's Ch. 414, that the order to pay out was prima facie evidence of a demand, so as to give currency to the statute of limitations, that statute not being in question, and such holding being an application of the principle decided by it, never intended by the court, and for which it is not an authority.

16. Because the referee erred in not holding the minority of some of the Maverick heirs, a protection against the plea of the statute.

17. Because the referee erred in reference to the Strickland estate, in holding that the bond required of the administrator by the order of court to pay over to him the proceeds of the real estate, had been given when the proof was that no such bond was turned over by the said Andrew O. Norris to his successor, and no trace of it could be found in the offices of the Ordinary or commissioner, where it should have been recorded if it ever existed.

The defendants, Jesse W. Norris and others, except as to so much of the report of W. H. Parker, special referee herein, as finds in favor of the legatees of the estate of P. S. Johnston, deceased, (styled in said report heirs-at-law), viz., Mrs. Johnston, (now Cureton), Calhoun Johnston, W. C. Johnston, Mary Humphreys and Sallie L. Johnston, and G. W. Anderson, assignee of Calhoun Johnston, on the following grounds, to wit:

1. Because the several sums found in favor of the said legatees, and for the value of which, in United States currency, the defendants are required to account, were received by the late commissioner in equity in Confederate States treasury notes, in 1863 and 1864; were proceeds of sales made with reference to values in Confederate currency, in December, 1862, and March, 1863, respectively; by virtue of orders of sales, dated in November, 1862, and February, 1863; and were secured by bonds payable in installments, December 18th, 1863, 1864, 1865, as found by the referee; and from these facts he should have found *that these sums were lost to the estate of P. S. Johnston, by the subsequent loss of all value of the money in which they were paid, and not because they were paid before due, and it was error in him to find otherwise.

2. Because one of the said sums so found by the referee, to wit, $208.25, is part of a sum of $508.35, received by the commissioner on March 3d, 1863, on a purchase of $1320, was among the earliest of his receipts, was received by him under order of sale authorizing anticipation of payments for the payment of debts, and was so applied by the commissioner to the benefit and advantage of the estate, as shown by the account of the commissioner with said estate in evidence and not contradicted: and the referee should have so found.

3. Because, if not so applied, the said sum of $538.25 was received on a purchase of $1320, one-third of which and interest ($470.80) would have been due December 18th, 1863, and one-third and interest ($501.60) on December 18th, 1864; and the same loss would have resulted to the estate (in the loss of the currency) if this sum had been received when due, making this a case of damnum absque injuria, and the referee should have so decided.

4. Because, if not applied to the payment of debts and expenses, the said sum of $208.25, so found by the referee, having been received by the commissioner prior to his deposit in bank, was a part of such deposit and should have been included by the referee in the sum reported by him as deposited for this estate, there being no evidence to the contrary.

5. Because the $628.40, another sum allowed by the referee, was paid to the commissioner (as evidenced by his account) by Mrs. Georgia Ann Johnston, one of the legatees of this estate, (now Mrs. Cureton), who also received from the commissioner, on the same day, May 30th, 1864, as legatee, the sum of $1230.08; she owed the commissioner for purchase at sale on December 18th, 1862, $569.75, which, with interest to May 30th, 1864, amounts to the sum with which she is credited, $628.46; the natural presumption is that she did not pay this sum, but received credit for it, and only received the difference in money, $691.54, and therefore that the $1230 covers the $628.46.

*The disbursements of the commissioner were not questioned or gainsayed on the trial, and were not, therefore, involved. It was error in the referee not to find the facts as above stated, and to discharge the defendants from all liability to account for the same.

6. Because, as to the remaining sum of $544.26, received by the commissioner on August 6th, 1864, and adjudged to the said legatees by the referee, it was received in the exercise of a reasonable discretion reposed in the commissioner by the order of the court in a currency contemplated by the order, and there being no allegation or proof of waste, misappropriation or bad faith, the mere fact of receiving the sum before due subjects him and his sureties, at most, to liability to account only for the interest on the sum accruing up to the time of maturity of the bond, such being the measure of loss to the estate, and the referee should have so found.

7. Because it was error in the referee to decide that the legatees, Mrs. Cureton and her son, Calhoun Johnston, who came of age in 1870, more than four years before the commencement of this action, were not barred by the statute of limitations.

8. Because it was error in the referee to award interest on the sums allowed prior to the commencement of this action.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case involves so many parties in interest, and so many facts and points of law, that I have found it impossible to make any satisfactory condensation of the very full and able report herein, by William H. Parker, special referee.

After careful examination of said report and of the arguments and authorities by the attorneys in the case, I concur almost entirely in the result reached by the said referee. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that his said report be confirmed and made the judgment of this court, except so much thereof as concerns the estate of P. S. Johnston. As to that estate, it is my judgment that the statute of limitations bars the share of the widow by reason of her action not having been commenced within four years after settlement by A. Norris with his successor in office; further, that such of the minors are also barred as *came of age four years before the commencement of this suit, the burden of proof being upon them to show how long their disability continued. Such of said minors as are not so barred, have leave to apply in this case for such order as may be necessary to enforce the payment of their claims out of the estate of A. O. Norris, or any of the sureties to his last bond.

It is further ordered that the plaintiffs in this case do pay the costs of the referee and of the officers of the court: that all other parties pay their own costs, except such of the minor heirs of P. S. Johnston as may recover under this judgment; they are to have the amounts due them, with costs.

Plaintiffs and defendants appealed.

Messrs. Burt & Broyles, for estates of Maverick and Strickland.

Messrs. B. F. Whitner, J. N. Brown and E. B. Murray, for defendants.

May 26th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

FRASER, A. A. J. These cases were heard together on the Circuit and in this court. The facts will be found in the report of the referee, as modified by a statement of "facts additional" thereto, as agreed on by counsel and forming a part of the "case" before the court, and the testimony of W. W. Humphries, J. N. Brown, B. F. Crayton and Andrew O. Norris also in the "case."

It will not be necessary to re-state the facts, except so far as they explain the judgment of this court.

Andrew O. Norris, now deceased, was commissioner in equity for Anderson District for three successive terms of four years each, and entered into bond, with sureties for each term, for the faithful discharge of his duties.

1. The first bond was dated December 3d, 1853, with sureties James W. Harrison, Elijah Webb, J. E. Norris, Jesse W. Norris and E. S. Norris.

2. The second bond was dated December 3d, 1857, with sureties J. W. Harrison, Jesse W. Norris, J. E. Norris, Benjamin F. Sloan and Charles L. Gaillard.

*3. The third bond was dated December 2d, 1861, with sureties Jesse W. Norris, E. S. Norris, Charles L. Gaillard, B. F. Sloan and James C. Keys.

The third and last term ended about January 3d, 1866, when Andrew O. Norris was succeeded in office by W. W. Humphries.

Andrew O. Norris, the commissioner, and all the sureties on these bonds died before the commencement of these actions, except J. W. Harrison and James C. Keys, who are insolvent, and have not been served with process.

The personal representatives, as well as the devisees, legatees, heirs and distributees of Andrew O. Norris and his sureties, who have died, have all been made parties to these proceedings.

These actions have been brought on these bonds in the name of the State of South Carolina, ex relatione Lydia A. Van Wyck and others, heirs-at-law of Samuel Maverick, deceased, on behalf of themselves and others, creditors of Andrew O. Norris, deceased, individually, and as commissioner in equity. The actions, in effect, are proceedings to marshal the assets of the estates of Andrew O. Norris and his deceased sureties on his official bonds, and for general relief.

Ida L. Featherstone, who had commenced an action on her own account on these bonds, was enjoined, but was afterwards permitted to proceed with an independent action.

All the issues of law and fact were referred to W. H. Parker, as special referee, and he was directed to call in, by publication, all the creditors of Andrew O. Norris, and to take an account of the administration of his estate, and, also, of the administration of the estates of the deceased sureties. The referee was also directed to take an account of the money received by Andrew O. Norris, as commissioner in equity, from sales made by him of the real estates of Samuel Maverick, and also of all moneys received by him as commissioner for others, and not accounted for.

The referee published the notice calling in creditors. Various claims against Andrew O. Norris, as commissioner, were presented, and some claims against him individually. The referee submitted his report, which, with some slight modifications, was confirmed by the Circuit judge.

As to several claims presented there has been no appeal. Only *three have been brought before this court by the appeal from the judgment of the Circuit Court.

1. The claim of the representatives of Samuel Maverick, deceased.

2. The claim of the representatives of Noel E. Strickland, deceased.

3. The claim of the representatives of P. S. Johnston, deceased.

There are claims against Andrew O. Norris, as commissioner in equity, for moneys received by him and not paid out, and for other defaults, as will hereafter appear.

The aggregate of the commissioner's balances for all estates in the office, as appears from his report in 1866, was the sum of.....	$90,695 65
Deducting investments.....	12,420 63
		$78,275 02
Deposited in bank, as appears by bank-book		63,913 00
Leaving unaccounted for.....		$14,362 02

The report to June Term, 1866, states that the above sum of $12,420 was invested for several estates named in Confederate bonds, Confederate money and individual notes, and that the above sum of $63,913 was deposited in the branch of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, at Columbia, and was in full of all the balances on all other estates.

It does not appear from the report of the referee what items made up the $14,362.02, the amount unaccounted for.

The total amount of claims against the commissioner is stated in the report of the referee to be $34,980.35. It does not appear exactly how this sum is made up, but it is conceded that the total amount of the claims presented is far less than the amount deposited in bank. The deposit in bank does not profess to cover items of cash received and not charged against the commissioner in his account, or items claimed to have been paid out, and for which no proper receipt has been shown; or money collected after the date of the deposit in bank, or bonds not collected and not turned over to his successor by the commissioner.

These deposits in bank were made between

October, 1863, and *February, 1864. No Court of Equity was held for Anderson District in 1862, 1863 or 1865. The court was held in June, 1864, and again in June 1866. The reports to June Term, 1864 and 1866, showed the same balances, and that the sums admitted to be on hand had been deposited in bank.

The deposit was made by Andrew O. Norris in his official capacity as "A. O. Norris, Commissioner in Equity, Anderson District," in a genuine "bank-book of the Branch Bank of the state," and in the handwriting of the proper officer of the bank. This bank-book was turned over by Andrew O. Norris on or about January 3d, 1866, to W. W. Humphries, his successor in office, with an order for the payment of the money.

The fact that there is a large amount, $14,362.02, which has been received by the commissioner and not now accounted for, and the fact that there has been deposited in bank a much larger sum than is claimed by the parties now before the court, amounting to $28,932.02, cannot affect the rights of the parties now before the court. It will be time enough to consider these facts when other parties come forward who can show an interest in these amounts.

The claims now under consideration and above referred to, are:

I. The Maverick estate, consisting of—

1. Money collected and included in bank deposit, $25,760.30.

2. Money received on bonds and not charged in the account, $1683.75.

3. Amounts claimed by the commissioner in his account to have been paid out and the receipt not signed, $2512.50.

4. Balances due on bonds of J. C. Kennedy and Thomas M. Howard, not turned over to successor.

The bond of J. C. Kennedy has not been turned over, but the mortgage remains unsatisfied. The bond of Thomas M. Howard, in some way not explained, appears to have been assigned by the commissioner in equity for Greenville District, to Samuel M. Green and Laura R. H. Green, his wife, in part payment of the share of the latter in the estate of William Turpin, and to have been finally satisfied in April, 1867.

*II. Estate of Noel F. Strickland, reported as on hand annually, from 1856 to 1866, $515.75.

At the June Term, 1853, there was an order to pay over this whole fund to Noel F. Strickland, and before payment he died. Administration on his estate was granted by the Ordinary to A. T. Broyles, but as the fund in court was the proceeds of the sale of real estate, an order was made June 26th, 1854, to pay over the whole fund to A. T. Broyles for the payment of debts on his entering into bond to the commissioner, with good security, in double the amount of the fund.

There is no record of such a bond in the commissioner's office, and if such bond has ever been given it cannot be found, and there is no evidence to show that, in fact, such a bond was given.

On February 16th, 1855, the commissioner paid to A. T. Broyles, out of this fund, which was originally $700, the sum of $184.25, leaving in his hands the above balance of $515.75, which has been reported as on hand annually from 1856 to 1866. This sum is reported in 1864 and 1866 as included in the deposit in bank.

This claim is presented by a petition filed by A. T. Broyles who had been appointed administrator of Noel F. Strickland, on behalf of the widow and children. There is no evidence that they or any of them are living, and, if living, they are non-residents. They were parties to the petition to pay over the fund to A. T. Broyles for the payment of debts of Noel F. Strickland. The children were all under twelve years of age March 25th, 1854, when that petition was filed.

III. Estate of P. S. Johnston.

The appeal in this case is on behalf of the representatives of Andrew O. Norris and his sureties.

This claim is as follows: Amount reported as on hand at the June Term, 1864, and at June Term, 1866, as deposited in bank, $7-103.47.

Among the property sold by the commissioner and belonging to this estate was a slave, who was bid off by J. W. Harrison for $1320 on March 3d, 1863, and for which amount he gave his bond in three installments, payable December 18th, 1863, *1864 and 1865. This slave was bought by J. W. Harrison for the commissioner, and went into his possession, and he himself made the payments on the bond.

On March 3d, 1863, he credited the bond and charged himself with $538.25.

On December 18th, 1863, he credited the bond and charged himself with $304.05.

On August 6th, 1864, he credited the bond and charged himself with $544.26.

The report of the referee charges the estates of the commissioner and his sureties with the sum of $208.25 as the excess of the credit over what was due December 18th, 1863, with interest, and also with the sum of $544.26, the amount of last installment, credited before it was due, with the interest, and not deposited in bank—the first amount to be scaled at $1.90 to $1, and the second at $8.05 to $1.

The referee also charges the estates of the commissioner and his sureties with the sum of $628.46, received May 30th, 1864, on the bond of Mrs. Johnston, the widow, and paid out to her on the same day with other money, and her receipt taken therefor. Interest is also charged on this sum, and it is scaled at the rate of $9.47 to $1. The order under which the sale to J. W. Harrison was made, was dated February 13th, 1863, and the sale was made on March 2d, 1863.

These claims come under one or more of the following classes:

1. Money collected by the commissioner at various times during his three terms of office, and from time to time deposited in bank, and finally included in the deposit in the branch of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, at Columbia, as shown by the bank-book above referred to.

2. Money collected by the commissioner at various times during his three terms of office, and omitted in his account and unaccounted for.

3. Money collected on bonds charged in the commissioner's accounts as received and paid out, but the receipts for which have not been signed by the parties, and as to which payments there is no other evidence.

*4. Certain bonds held by the commissioner and not turned over to the parties interested or to his successor.

5. Bonds collected in confederate money before due and deposited in bank.

6. Bonds collected in Confederate money before due and not deposited in bank.

The defences set up are—

I. The deposit in bank.

II. The statute of limitations.

To the plea of the statute it is replied that, if allowed at all, it cannot be applied to the claims of some of the parties who are under disability of minority. The facts in reference to the minority of some of the parties will be stated hereafter, in referring to the different estates involved.

I. As to the first defence—the deposit in bank—it is unnecessary to do more than to say that this court has held that a bank-book of the branch of the Bank of the State of South Carolina, regular in form, in the handwriting of the proper officer of the bank, containing an account with "A. O. Norris, Commissioner in Equity, Anderson District," showing a sum of money on deposit more than sufficient to cover the balance against the commissioner, must be assumed to show a due discharge of official duty until the contrary appears. Featherston v. Norris, 7 S. C. 484; Same case, 14 S. C. 624. The estates under consideration were specially named in the reports of 1864 and 1866, and the latter report claims that all the balances are covered by this deposit. The fact that there is a large balance unaccounted for cannot affect this case, because it must be assumed, for the purposes of this case, that those who have not brought forward their claims have been satisfied, and that there is, in fact, no such outstanding unpaid balance against the commissioner.

The amount deposited is $63,913, and the total of claims presented is $34,980.35, showing a balance "more than sufficient" to cover the claims of these estates, and all others brought into this case.

Neither does it impair the value of this deposit if it be admitted, as contended in the argument of these cases, that Confed*erate money was deposited in bank. It was received on deposit as gold or bank bills would have been, and the same common catastrophe would have caused the same loss to the parties interested in either case.

It is true that this money was not deposited within one month after the time for the adjournment of the Court of Equity for 1862 and 1863. Under some circumstances it might be important to inquire whether the commissioner was bound to deposit the money until the court had been actually held and had adjourned, so as to have the funds in his hands subject at once to the order of the court. The money was, however, deposited before the June Term, 1864, and was reported as being in bank. The commissioner might have made himself liable for a premature deposit if the bank had failed in the meantime. No good reason, however, appears why a deposit previously made and permitted to remain when the proper time arrived, is not, in all respects, just as good as if then made. All that would have been necessary would have been to make a new entry in the bank-book with a new date. So far as appears to the court the bank was then a safe depository of public and private funds, and only went down in the ruin which subsequently overtook public and private fortunes at the south.

II. As to the plea of the statute of limitations. A preliminary question has been made that the statute is pleaded "hypothetically," and cannot, therefore, avail. It is in this form: "If any cause of action existed, it did not accrue within," &c.

A hypothetical denial is allowable only when the facts are not presumptively within the knowledge of the defendant, (2 Wait's Pr. 422), as in this case, where all the original parties are dead. A defence, however, may be thus pleaded "when a plain and direct statement cannot be given, and when this form is used from necessity and in good faith." An answer may deny that "a ditch was dug," and then say that if dug, it was sufficiently guarded, &c. 2 Wait's Pr. 309.

But if the mode of pleading is objectionable, the proper remedy is "a motion to strike out as irrelevant," &c. Id. There is no *good reason why the plea of the statute should not be governed by the same rules.

We will then proceed to consider the plea of the statute of limitations as applicable to these claims. "A statute of limitations," says Mr. Justice Story, "instead of being viewed in an unfavorable light as an unjust or discreditable defence, should have received such support from courts of justice as would have made it what it was intended emphatically to be—a statute of repose." It supplies the defects of human memory, the loss of papers, and of witnesses who have removed beyond the jurisdiction of the court or who have died, and promotes promptness and punctuality in all business transactions.

The law is too well settled to make any reference to authority necessary, that when a trustee does an act which purports to be a termination of his trust, it gives currency to the statute from the time of such an act. This act may be simply an act done in a public office, in which, by law, he must render an account of his trust. When the act purports to be a complete termination of the trust he henceforth holds adversely; and, at the end of the statutory period, all further account is barred.

Trustees are not the only persons who are entitled to the benefit of the statute, and, therefore, it is not important to determine whether the commissioner in equity was or was not a trustee. He was, however, a public officer, to whom was entrusted, by law, the collection and custody of the money of others, and the care and custody of their bonds and other property.

In Houseal v. Gibbes, Bail. Eq. 484 [23 Am. Dec. 186], the court uses this language: "The office of master of the Court of Equity is, in some respects, perfectly analogous to that of sheriff of the court of law. Both are receiving officers of their respective courts. The commissioner in equity was the receiving officer of the Court of Equity."

In Wright v. Hamilton, 2 Bail. 51 [21 Am. Dec. 513], the doctrine is recognized that the statute will commence to run in favor of a sheriff from the demand; and it is expressly held in Williams & Clinton v. Sims, 1 Rich. Eq. 53, that a claim against the sheriff will be barred after four years from demand.

The sheriff was not *required to turn over money to his successor, and demand only could give currency to the statute.

The plea of the statute was not allowed to prevail in Houseal v. Gibbes, because the master held the fund under an order of the court requiring him to "improve on interest," or "invest in public securities." The court says: "Of course he cannot, in that point of view, plead the statute of limitations until he had previously divested himself of that trust by discharging it, or by denying all liability to discharge it further."

This is the same rule which is applied in the case of trustees. The general rule is that the statute begins to run from the accrual of the cause of action, and in cases of trustees and receiving officers the right of action commences from the demand and refusal, or from the act, which is a disavowal of the trust and the assumption of an adverse position.

If there should be a demand on the commissioner for the payment of money which he should pay out, and he refuses, the right of action accrues, and the sureties for the term are liable for the breach of the bond.

In Vaughn v. Evans, 1 Hill's Eq. 430, it is held that "an application for an order" to pay out or invest is such a demand. If it is such a demand as to make the sureties liable it is because it is a breach of the bond to neglect or refuse to do the duty, and the right of action accrues. From this time the statute ought to run if, as we hold, the commissioner in equity was such an officer as to be entitled to plead it.

The twenty-sixth section of the act of 1840 (11 Stat. 119), provides for a complete termination of the office of a commissioner in equity on the election and qualification of his successor, and the transfer to him of "moneys, bonds, notes, certificates of stock, and all other choses in action or property held by" him "by virtue of his office." He is authorized and required to demand from his successor a receipt for the property turned over, and he is declared to be liable for what he fails to turn over. The successor is required to give a receipt for the property turned over, if one is demanded of him, and if not required of him, it is his duty to make an "inventory" of such books, *bonds, &c., as have come into his possession, and file the same in the records of the court.

The outgoing and incoming commissioners are, by this section, both made liable for a neglect of the duty prescribed in it—to a rule for a contempt, to an action on the case, and to an action on the official bond. It is difficult to conceive any more sweeping or stringent provisions for the complete transfer to a successor of all property in charge of a commissioner at the termination of his term of office. After this he cannot answer to any one except his successor, and he cannot pass over his successor and pay or turn over to parties in interest. He must turn over to his successor. Under Section 16 "all moneys deposited in bank * * * or invested by him under any order or decree of the court in bonds, notes, stocks, or any property whatsoever, shall be transmissible to such successor in trust for parties interested."

This court concludes, from the testimony of W. W. Humphries, Norris' successor, that when Norris turned over his office on January 3d, with the bank-book above described, with an order for the payment of the money, he claimed to have turned over everything for which he was liable, as "Norris made no complaint that any of the papers were lost or that he was unable to turn them over."

If an order of the court can operate as a demand, certainly the provisions of Sections 16 and 26 must have that effect; and if the statute commences to run from the demand, it should commence to run from this statutory termination of the office and its duties. Parties under no disabilities had four years to investigate their rights, and there is no more reason for indulging them in long delay than others who have business relations with individuals or receiving officers of the courts.

Under the view taken by this court of these defences, we hold—

As to the Maverick estate:

The sum of $25,760.17 is sufficiently accounted for by the deposit in bank, and the sum of $2512.50, for which the receipt has not been signed, and the $1683.75, omitted items, and the bonds of *J. C. Kennedy and Thomas M. Howard, not turned over, are barred by the statute of limitations.

Samuel Thompson and Josephine Bryan having had guardians-in-chief, their claims are also barred by the statute. Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60; Massey v. Massey, 2 Hill's Ch. 496. And they attained majority more than four years before the commencement of these actions. The rule is that when an act is done, during minority, which would give currency to the statute in case of an adult, the statute commences to run as soon as the minor comes of age.

S. A. Maverick and Joseph B. Weyman were two heirs-at-law of Samuel Maverick. The former died in 1866 or 1867, and the latter some time before. Each left a will. The former appointed his wife, Mary, executrix, and his son, S. A. Maverick, executor, of his will. Joseph B. Weyman bequeathed his estate to his wife, Emala.

The interests of S. A. Maverick and Joseph B. Weyman passed under their wills to their personal representatives. There is no express authority in this state, so far as we can ascertain, that holds that the proceeds of land sold for partition is converted into personalty. It is certainly no longer subject to all the rules which govern real estate. The right of dower does not attach to it. There was no necessity that a married woman should convey it by a renunciation of her inheritance, as in case of land, before an officer. In Hood v. Archer, 2 N. & McC. 149, the court uses these words in reference to such money: "By legal operation converted into money." Where a will directs executors to sell the real estate and distribute the proceeds the land will be treated as personal property. The same rule applies to agreements for a sale for the purpose of division, and to a legislative direction for a sale. Adams' Eq. *136, note, and the authorities there cited.

The court holds that as to the shares of S. A. Maverick and Joseph B. Weyman, in the estate of Samuel Maverick, those who claim through them or under their wills are barred, by the operation of the statute, against their personal representatives.

As to the estate of Noel T. Strickland:

The whole fund was deposited in bank, and is sufficiently *accounted for, it is not important, therefore, to consider whether A. T. Broyles could not have received the fund under the appointment as administrator by the Ordinary, or whether he ever executed the bond to the commissioner as required by the order of the court.

As to the estate of P. S. Johnston, in which the appeal to this court is on behalf of the commissioner and his sureties:

The sum of $208.25, which the referee finds to have been received in excess of the first installment of the bond of J. W. Harrison, [we take the referee's statement, though it seems too small, as it has not been appealed from by the representatives of the Johnston estate], was received before it was due, and seems not to have been necessary, as an amount equal to the debts reported to be due, had already been paid in. It was, therefore, received without authority of law. The same is true as to the $544.26, the third installment received before it was due, and not deposited in bank. The amount of $628.46, received on the bond of Mrs. Johnston, May 30th, 1864, was in a transaction in which a receipt was given by her for $1230. If the large sum in bank was, as we hold, properly there, no fault could have been found with this transaction if there had been an order to pay out the money. But there was no such order to pay out, and it was a breach of duty in the commissioner to pay the money to her, even by way of discount. As to all three of these sums we find no fault with the scale adopted by the referee and applied to them. The claims of Mrs. Johnston and of Calhoun Johnston, who came of age in 1870, are barred by the statute of limitations.

The only default which is established by the judgment in these cases is as to a small portion of the estate of P. S. Johnston.

This estate was sold by the commissioner under orders of November 11th, 1860, July 8th, 1861, November 26th, 1862. The first sale was made December, 1862, and one sale was made in 1863.

John E. Norris was not a surety on the bond of 1861, and his estate is in no way liable for any default as to this estate. Benjamin F. Sloan and J. W. Norris were sureties on bond of 1861. Benjamin F. Sloan died February, 1867, and administration on his estate was granted in 1867, in March.

*J. W. Norris died April, 1869, and administration on his estate was granted in June, 1869. As to any action against these administrators the statute is a bar. This is sufficient to protect the distributees. Any other rule would give creditors of any estate two periods of limitation—one against the personal representatives and one against the heirs, devisees, distributees and legatees. When the statutory period runs out the remedy is extinguished, and this should be an end of all litigation in reference to it. The minors, however, who are not barred as against the personal representatives, cannot, for the same reason, be barred of their rights as against the heirs, devisees, distributees and legatees of Benjamin F. Sloan and J. W. Norris.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is, therefore, affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

In an action brought for the recovery of real property claimed by plaintiffs as devisees of G., the complaint did not charge that the defendant claimed under G. Defendant's answer denied title in plaintiffs, and claimed the property under a contract to purchase made by the executor of G. under a power in the will, and the payment of the purchase money. Held, that this admission was the narrative of a single transaction, and if used by plaintiffs to show that both parties claimed under G., a common source, it must be taken as a whole.

Action by Caroline J. Geiger, Isabella C. Geiger, Juriah E. Geiger, John A. Geiger and Frederick Ann Geiger against George Kaigler.

It does not appear when the action was commenced; the brief says "it was begun by summons and complaint." The complaint states that Henry J. Geiger, the son of testator, died under age and unmarried, and that Alexander Geiger, the executor, died in 1868. The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. D. Pope for appellants.

The fee rests in the appellants as heirs-at-law, or as devisees under their father's will, and not in the executor, who is given neither an estate nor any beneficial interest in the realty. The fee passed to the children, whether they be devisees or heirs-at-law, subject to the exercise of a power given to the executor. Couple the fourth clause of the will with the third, and we have the true relation of Alexander Geiger to the children—that of testamentary or statutory guardian of their persons and estate. 3 Stat. 707; 2 Kent 225; Bac. Ab., tit. "A," 3; McPher. on Inf. 91. Alexander took no fee in the lands. 4 Kent 320, notes; 2 Dev. & Bat. 439; 1 Tread. Const. R. 106; 1 Wms. on Ex'rs 579; 1 Sugd. on Pow., ch. III., 129, et seq. He took a naked power and could sell, strictly because of the appointment to sell. Plaintiffs proved the will and established their title, identified living parties and the locus in quo, proved the death of others, and rested. Defendant sets up a simple defence, equitable in its *nature, that the executor exercised the power in the will, received bond for titles, and paid the price. Of all this there was no proof, and yet a non-suit. The answer pleads the statute of limitations. We could prove the infancy of some of the co-tenants. From the complaint and answer, it appears that plaintiffs and defendant claim from the same source; defendant thereby admits the title of Henry Geiger to be good. 4 Rich. 558; 1 Strob. 1. If defendant proves title from Henry Geiger, plaintiffs are estopped, or, he might, in the Court of Equity, set up equities, which, if proved, would cause the court to enjoin. These equities may now be set up by answer, as a defence to plaintiffs' action at law, but defendant must prove them. 5 Rich. Eq. 15; Adams' Eq. 363, notes; 11 How. 131; 3 Greenl. on Ev., § 281; Dyer 108; 12 Pet. 178. The case of McCaw. v. Blewit, 2 McC. Ch. 90, is to the contrary, but has long since been declared not to be law. The avoidance must be proved. 2 Johns. Ch. 88. Carrier v. Hague, 9 S. C. 455, is not in point. The answer was construed to be a general denial, and if taken in any other sense must be used as evidence. The non-suit was erroneous.

Mr. Louis Le Conte, contra.

June 10, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action for the possession of a tract of land (Chappell) in Richland county. The complaint states that Henry J. Geiger, the elder, died in October, 1858, seized and possessed of the land, and that he left a will, of which Alexander Geiger was appointed executor, and in which the plaintiffs, his only children, were named as the beneficiaries. That the defendant, George Kaigler, acquired possession of the land sued for some time in the year 1863, and held in some way under Alexander Geiger, who died in 1868.

The defendant answered, making three defences.

1. He denied the alleged seizin of the father, Henry J. Geiger, at the time of his death—admitted death of Henry J. Geiger—that he left a will, of which Alexander Geiger was appointed executor, but he denied that the plaintiffs are entitled to *any legal estate in the lands of said testator, and submits it to the decision of the court upon reading of said will; admits that he acquired the possession during the year 1863, but denies that he held "in any manner under the said Alexander Geiger or any one whomsoever."

2. That the premises were devised to the said Alexander Geiger, as executor, with full power to sell and convey the same; that the said Alexander, on October 22d, 1863, bargained and sold the said premises to the defendant, (receiving from defendant a full and ample price therefor), and executed to this defendant a bond for title, and delivered to him a plat of survey of said land; that the defendant entered upon said lands under color of the aforesaid bond and plat as a purchaser of the land, claiming the same in his own right exclusively in fee simple, and that he has ever since held possession of the same under such exclusive claim.

3. The statute of limitations.

The will of Henry J. Geiger was read in evidence, which is as follows:

State of South Carolina, Lexington District.

In the name of God, Amen! I, Henry J. Geiger, of the state and district aforesaid, being sick and weak of body, but of sound and disposing mind, memory and understanding—praise be to God for the same—do make and declare this my last will and testament, in manner and form following, that is to say: I do hereby nominate and appoint my only brother, Alexander Geiger, now living in the State of Alabama, the sole executor of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking and making void all former wills and testaments at any time heretofore by me made, and do declare this to be my last will and testament. I appoint that my aforesaid executor shall make the following disposal of my property:

First. That he shall pay all my just and lawful debts.

Secondly. That he shall take charge of all my effects and make such disposition of them as he, in his judgment, shall deem proper.

Thirdly. I do declare that my only concern being for the wel*fare of my children, I therefore request him to take my three eldest daughters, Caroline Juriah, Isabella Charlotte, and Juriah Elizabeth, to some retired mountainous part of the country where they may be educated and reared in industrious habits—that by no means they be educated in a city or town—my object being to keep them out of circles of fashionable society. And I request him to take my two sons, John A. Geiger and Henry J. Geiger, and my youngest daughter, Frederick Ann Geiger, to live with him wherever he may reside until they are ten years of age, and, after that age, to place them at school in some retired part of the country.

Fourthly. I appoint that he dispose of as much of my real estate as may be necessary to carry into effect the above-mentioned requests, and that the remainder be retained in his possession until any one of the above-named heirs may be disposed to settle, and that he then make an equal division of the said estate among them.

Fifthly. I request him that when the estate of my father-in-law, John Kaigler, deceased, is settled up, that he take charge of so much of the said estate as will fall to me in right of my wife, Charlotte, John Kaigley's daughter, and that he make such disposition of it as shall be, in his judgment, beneficial to the interest of my children.

Sixthly. Inasmuch as I was appointed by my mother executor of her estate, in behalf of my children, and she gave a portion of her effects to my children, I request him to take charge of the same and manage it for their benefit.

Seventhly. I request that whatever (besides the above-named property) there may be belonging to me, and not mentioned in this will, that he take charge of the same and manage it in the same manner in which he is directed in regard to the other property.

Given under my hand and seal, signed and sealed this the 2d October, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-eight, and in the eighty-second year of the Independence of the United States of America. Henry J. Geiger. [L. S.]

*There was very little oral testimony. Nothing was proved concerning the land in question but the following:

John A. Arthur said: "Not acquainted with the land in question. * * * To the best of my recollection, at the time of Geiger's death, Davis was in * * * Knew that Mr. Davis' overseer, Loomis, came to pay Geiger, and renewed lease of land in question to Davis."

John A. Geiger said: "Reasonable rent of land in question, per annum, is about twenty bales of cotton, or $600 or $800."

Westley Horsey: "Knew land in question; land certainly worth two years' rent to clear it," &c.

The case turned mostly on the will and the pleadings. At the close of plaintiff's testimony the defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the following grounds:

"1. That there was not sufficient evidence of plaintiff's title to go to the jury unless defendant's answer be taken as part thereof, which showed purchase and payment by defendant from the executor in pursuance of the power conferred by the will of the testator.

"2. The plaintiffs derived no legal estate in the premises under the will of the testator, but that the same vested the legal estate in fee in the executor.

"3. That under the statute of limitations the action was barred."

Judge Wallace granted the nonsuit upon the ground "that the will of the testator, Henry J. Geiger, conferred upon his executor, Alexander Geiger, a power coupled with a trust, and the executor having made the sale of the premises thereunder and received the purchase money, whereby a complete equitable title appeared in defendant."

The plaintiffs excepted to the order, and appeal to this court to set aside the nonsuit and for a new trial.

In order to have a clear view of the questions it is necessary to determine at the outset what force and effect the answer of the defendant should have as evidence.

Defendant's attorney says that "by common consent that part of the answer which set up the affirmative defence of purchase *from Alexander Geiger was considered to be before the court, although not otherwise put in evidence."

Plaintiff's attorney says: "The complaint and the answer show that plaintiffs and defendant derive title from the same source." but denies that the answer is evidence of any other statement in it. The answer is simply a pleading. "The allegations of new matter in an answer (not relating to a counterclaim) is to be deemed controverted by the adverse party as upon direct denial or avoidance, as the case may be." Code, § 191.

The statement of the second defence in this answer was new matter, which was not proved aliunde, and the plaintiffs propose to use one part, stated as an admission, viz., that the defendant claimed from the executor of Henry J. Geiger, but deny to all its other statements the force of evidence.

The answer of defendant in the second defence did make such a statement, but, at the same time and in the same connection it further stated that he paid in full for the land and had the executor's bond for title under his power in the will to sell. This was but a narrative of one transaction, of which the plaintiffs propose to use only a part. The statement was a unity, and could not be divided. If the answer was used as evidence, it was subject to the ordinary rules of documentary evidence.

"The pleadings leave upon the plaintiff the onus probandi, and the allegations of the answer are but a proffer of the points upon which defendant relies. Prior to the opening of the defence the plaintiff resorts to the answer, and produces it as evidence in his behalf. He must take it as it stands, and cannot be permitted to carve out a part and reject the residue which qualifies, explains or pertains to the portions selected. The whole answer should have been admitted as evidence so far as it explains or qualifies, or is properly connected with the portions relied on by plaintiff." Carrier v. Hague, 9 S. C. 459; Cohen v. Robert, 2 Strob. 415.

How stands the matter, then, in the view that the answer was not in evidence? In that case the second defence must be considered as stricken out, as outside of the answer there was no proof of the facts on which it rests. The action being for the recovery of the land, upon the ground that the plaintiffs have the legal title, and the *defendant having denied plaintiffs' title, it was necessary that they should recover upon the strength of their own title—that is to say, it was incumbent upon them to prove title in their father, Henry J. Geiger, through whom they claimed. This doctrine was firmly established in South Carolina by an unbroken current of decisions running certainly down to the adoption of the code of procedure, from the case of Drayton v. Marshall, 1 Mill Const. R. 184 (1817), in which Judge Cheves said: "It was necessary for the plaintiff to prove a perfect title, unless the defendant held under him or under those from whom the plaintiff derives his title." As we understand it, this is the generally received doctrine in actions for the recovery of the possession of lands when the plaintiff rests his right to recover upon his title. Mr. Tyler says: "The party claiming the right to lands must recover, if at all, on the strength of his own title, and not on the defects in that of his adversary. This is an elementary principle in the action of ejectment, and it has been reiterated over and over again by the courts. The claimant in the action will not be assisted by the weakness of the defendant's claim, because the possession of the latter gives him a right against every person who cannot establish a title. This is the general rule, in respect to which there is no exception, and it has been established by a world of authorities, both in this country and in England. The party who would change the possession must make out a title, upon the strength of which he must recover, if at all." Tyler on Eject. 72, and many authorities.

To this rule there are several well-established exceptions, in which, from the operation of familiar principles, it is considered unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove a perfect chain of title: as, for example, when the plaintiff can bring the defendant into privity with his title, by showing that the parties claim from a common source. Martin v. Ranlett, 5 Rich. 541 [57 Am. Dec. 770]; Hill v. Robertson, 1 Strob. 1. Or when it can be shown that the defendant's possession was acquired in such manner as to estop him from denying plaintiff's title, as in case of landlord and tenant. Beyond these exceptions we know of no others in actions for the recovery of land upon the ground of title.

Of course we do not *speak of actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, which are brought simply for damages to the possession.

It is urged for the plaintiffs that they claim title under their father, Henry J. Geiger, and should not have been required to prove title, for the reason that the defendant also claims under Henry J. Geiger, and, consequently, are within the exception as to tracing title to a common source. The point was well taken if sustained by the proof. What is the evidence upon this subject?

The complaint does not charge that the defendant went into possession under Henry J. Geiger, but states that "the said George Kaigler acquired possession of the land some time in the year 1863, and held in some way under Alexander Geiger." It is true that Alexander Geiger was the executor of the will of Henry J. Geiger, but the above does not charge that the defendant went in under his as executor. The defendant made no admission in his answer. Omitting in this connection his statement in the second defence, (which, according to our present view, is not in evidence,) he denied "that he held under Alexander Geiger or any one whomsoever." Outside of the pleadings there was no proof whatever as to how the defendant went into possession, and therefore the claim that the parties trace title to the same source, as a matter of fact, was not made out.

But it is insisted that to the rule that the plaintiff can recover only upon the strength of his own title, there is another exception, viz., that without regard to title the party showing the prior possession should be held to have the better right and allowed to recover; that prior possession as against the defendant, should be held to stand in the place of title. The modification here contended for is thus stated by Mr. Tyler: "When the owner of the true title neither objects nor consents to the possession of either party, the court regards the better right as between the parties to be vested in the first possessor and grantees claiming through him." Tyler on Eject. 72; Smith v. Lorillard, 10 Johns. 339, and other authorities.

These authorities seem to indicate that there may be some such rule where the old action of ejectment, pure and simple, is still retained as the means of recovering lands.

*The action of ejectment was a possessory proceeding—possession being the gist of the action—and did not necessarily decide the question of title. Originally there were several actions in relation to land. The object of the old writ of right was to try the title; that of ejectment, writ of entry and of assize, originally, was to recover the possession, and the action of the mesne profits was for rents and profits for its detention. The writ of right went to the root of the matter, and after issue once joined, the judgment was absolutely final, so that a recovery had could be pleaded in bar of any other claim or demand. Not so as to an action of ejectment. In that action, even after it became a mixed action, and was used to try title, the unsuccessful party might re-try the same question as often as he pleased without leave of the court, for, by making a fresh demise to another nominal character, it became the action of a new plaintiff upon another right, and the courts of law could not any further prevent this repetition of the action than by ordering the proceedings in ejectment to be stayed until the costs of a former ejectment were discharged. 3 Bla. Com. 305, note. By our act of 1744 the parties were limited to a second action, provided it was brought within two years. 3 Stat. 612. Our action of trespass to try title under the act of 1791, which was of force down to the time of the adoption of the code (1870), was not identical in all respects with an action of ejectment. The act of 1791 provided as follows: "Whereas, since the disuse of real actions, the common method of trying the title to lands has been by action of ejectment, which, depending upon a variety of legal fictions, is rarely understood but by professors of the law; in order to render more plain the mode of trying the title to lands in this state: Be it enacted, &c., That the method of trying the title to lands or tenements within this state, shall, henceforth, be by action of trespass, wherein the real name of the plaintiff and defendant shall be used, and not fictitious names; and if the jury shall find for the plaintiff, they are also hereby empowered, in the same verdict, to accord damages for mesne profits, and the judgment shall be entered on such verdict, as well for the damages as for the recovery of the land; and the plaintiff on such verdict shall be entitled to a writ of possession for the land and *to an execution for his damages." 5 Stat. 170. It is also provided that in actions of trespass brought to try the title to land the plaintiff or his attorney shall always endorse on the original and copy writ that "the action is brought to try titles as well as for damages." 7 Stat. 276.

This statutory action combined in itself the action for mesne profits in the form of damages, with as much of the old writ of right as put the title in issue. This is apparent from the endorsement required to be placed on the writ, "that this action is brought to try the title as well as for damages," also from the force given to the judgment, which, like a judgment in the writ of right, could be pleaded in bar to another action. Thomas v. Geiger, 2 N. & McC. 528; Tyler on Eject. 807. And, also, because a defendant in possession could defend himself by showing title in a third person. Faysoux v. Prather, 1 N. & McC. 296 [9 Am. Dec. 691]. From this essential difference in the action of ejectment and our action of trespass to try title, it would seem to be a strained conclusion that, because in ejectment presumption from possession was allowed in certain cases to stand for title, the same should be allowed in an action of trespass to try titles, the very object of which was to try the title, and in which the judgment was conclusive. We think the cases in our reports, considered together, sustain the view that the two actions were not in all respects the same.

It is true that Judge Nott, in Kennedy v. Campbell, 3 Brev. 553 (1816), said: "Our act of assembly substituting the action of trespass for the old action of ejectment, merely adopts a new mode of proceeding, but does not alter any of the principles of law relating to the subject. It would be productive of the most mischievous consequences if a contrary construction should be given to the act." The only question in that case was, whether a landlord had the right to come in and defend an action of trespass to try titles brought against his tenant. Considered in reference to the subject matter, the statement of the judge was perfectly correct, but, as a general proposition, it was unnecessarily broad.

In the case of Young v. Watson, 1 McM. 449 (1839), relied upon by the plaintiffs,

Judge Earle says: "The plaintiff, it is *admitted, made out no title; and the defendant is not proved to be a disseizor. The endorsement which the plaintiff is required to make on his writ gives character to this action, which is to try the titles. I have not heard it doubted that in such case the plaintiff, when there has been no tortious eviction, could only recover on proof of good title. A plaintiff can only make out a perfect title by producing a grant, or by proving such a possession as will give title in himself or in some one from whom he derives title." What Judge O'Neall says in the same case most probably had reference to an action of quare clausum fregit. "When the plaintiff's possession, actual or constructive, is entered upon, I think that such possession is evidence of title to put the defendant to prove his title."

In the case of Watson v. Hill, 1 Strob. 79 (1846), it was held that trespass to try titles would lie by one in possession against one who enters upon land and commits a trespass. Judge O'Neall says: "In such case I have always supposed that the plaintiff had his choice to bring trespass quare clausum fregit or trespass to try title. In the former he would have the advantage of standing on his possession and throwing upon the defendant the burden of showing a paramount title; in the other, he waives this advantage and takes upon himself the burden of showing title. * * * The action of trespass proceeds upon the notion that defendant had entered upon the possession of the plaintiff. When the plaintiff shows actual possession, it may be, perhaps, in trespass to try the title, prima facie enough to entitle him to recover."

The cases of McColman v. Wilkes, 3 Strob. 465 [51 Am. Dec. 637], and of Cleveland v. Jones, Id. 479, in note, were actions of trespass quare clausum fregit, which action is founded on the plaintiff's possession, and will always lie when there has been a disseizin.

We conclude that in the action of trespass to try title under our statute, mere prior possession would not dispense with the necessity that the plaintiff should prove title to enable him to recover.

The act of 1791, so far as it prescribed the form of proceeding, was superseded by the code, which abolished all the different forms of action and substituted one form for all causes *of action. And it may be that in the general form of action of the code the means are given to enable a person to recover the possession of land seized by a mere trespasser as well as to try the title itself. But it is unnecessary to consider that question in this case.

This action was brought, as stated, expressly to recover the land in dispute, upon the ground that the plaintiffs had title to the same; and even if the old rule as to the necessity of proving title should now be held to be modified so as to allow a person deprived of the possession of land, under proper allegations, to recover that possession without proof of title, it can have no application to this case. Here prior possession cannot stand for title, although it is an action in the form prescribed by the code and not technically trespass to try title under the statute. The plaintiffs staked themselves upon their title, and they must recover, if at all, upon the strength of this title.

It cannot alter the case that the plaintiffs claim to have possession under their father by descent cast, according to the old doctrine that the "law presumes the possession transmitted from the ancestor to the heir to be a rightful possession until the contrary is shown, and, therefore, the mere entry of him who has the right will not be allowed to evict the heir." This has been changed by Section 110 of the code of procedure, which declares that "the right of a person to the possession of any real property shall not be impaired or affected by a descent being cast in consequence of the death of a person in possession of such property."

The plaintiffs having failed to bring themselves within the exception as to a common source of title, it was incumbent on them to make proof of the title of their ancestor, which they failed to do. The proof even of the possession of Henry J. Geiger was meagre, and, therefore, as to the first legal defence, considered as separate and distinct from the second, they failed to make the proof necessary to recover the land.

Upon the view that the answer was in evidence, the admissions of the defendant did establish the fact that he entered under a purchase from Alexander Geiger, as executor of Henry J. Geiger, the ancestor of plaintiffs, and therefore traced title to a com*mon source with the plaintiffs. That relieved the difficulty which existed as to the first defence; but the allegation of new matter, which came in along with the admission, viz., that the defendant purchased the land from Alexander Geiger, as executor of Henry J. Geiger, under the power of sale in the will of the latter, paid full price for the same and received from him possession, bond for titles, and plat of the premises, raises new questions.

1. What interest in the land did the will give to Alexander Geiger? A power coupled with an interest or a mere naked power to sell?

2. Was the sale by Alexander Geiger, under the circumstances stated, an execution of the power so as to vest in the defendant a good, equitable title?

The question as to what interest the will gave Alexander Geiger is one of intention, to be ascertained from its construction. 2 Washb. on Real Prop. 605. "A reference to the terms of the will is the only course by which to determine whether a naked power only is intended to be given, for even if the terms made use of in creating the power, detached from other portions of the will, confer merely a naked power to sell, yet if the other provisions of the will evince a design that, at all events, the lands are to be sold in order to satisfy the whole intent of the will, it is not a naked power, but is coupled with a trust and interest." Franklin v. Osgood, 14 Johns. 527. "A power to sell for the payment of debts would be such a power." Sugd. on Powers 111, note. "One test that is given in some of the cases for distinguishing a naked power from one coupled with an interest, is whether the donee of the power is to have possession of that to which the power relates. If he is, he is considered to have an interest, otherwise a mere naked power." 2 Washb. on Real Prop. 606.

Although this testator did not use the technical terms usually employed in disposing of property in trust, yet, taking the whole will together, we think that he intended to give at least the possession of the whole of his estate, real and personal, to his brother, Alexander Geiger, in trust for the performance of the various duties imposed upon him in relation both to his property and *his children. He gave nothing directly to his children, but, on the contrary, placed them under the exclusive control of his brother Alexander, with very peculiar and confidential instructions to take the sons and youngest daughter to his own home, and educate the other daughters in some retired mountainous part of the country out of the circles of fashionable society. He did not intend to die intestate as to any of his property. The residuary clause of the will is not only evidence that such was not his intention, but provides against such a result. Every direction of the will proceeds on the assumption that the property was in the possession of his executor and at his disposal. "The executor shall make the following 'disposal of my property,' 'pay my debts,' 'take charge of my effects,' 'dispose of so much of my real estate as may be necessary, and the remainder to be retained in his possession until any of the above-named heirs may be disposed to settle, and that he then make an equal division of the said estate among them," &c., and then the residuary clause giving "the property not mentioned in the will." We cannot resist the conclusion that it was the intention of the testator to give at least the possession of the whole estate to the executor in trust for the uses and purposes therein declared. Whether the provision in regard to the division among his children of so much of his real estate as was not required to be sold in order to carry out the injunctions placed upon his executor, was, in effect, a devise to them or not, there is no doubt that he intended to give at least the possession of all the land to his executor, Alexander Geiger. If the plaintiffs, as contended, have the legal title, it is clear that they never had either the actual possession or the right to possession of the land sued for, and that alone would be conclusive that they have not the right to maintain an action at law to recover the same. A plaintiff in an action for possession of real property cannot recover unless he has not only the title but the right to immediate possession. "In an action of ejectment the question to be tried is the plaintiff's right to possession of the premises sued for, and, upon the trial of the general issue, the defendant may avail himself of a defence that the plaintiff had not the present right of possession." Tyler on Eject. 738; Carter v. Scaggs, 38 Mo. 302.

This leads to the conclusion that *the plaintiffs have not the legal right as the heirs or devisees of Henry J. Geiger to maintain now an action at law for the recovery of the land. Any rights which they have are equitable in their character and must be set up through the forms appropriate to equitable proceedings.

The second defence, if true, makes out a good, equitable defence. Mr. Tyler (p. 738) states that "law and equity being now blended, an equitable title arising out of a contract for the sale of land, is a defence to an action of ejectment instituted to recover possession of the land. Possession of land under a contract of sale and payment of the purchase money, is held to be a good defence to an action brought by the alienor for the possession."

But the court having taken the view that the plaintiffs have not the right to immediate possession so as to enable them to maintain an action at law for the land, it is unnecessary to consider the question whether the alleged sale of the land to the defendant, Alexander Geiger, was a valid contract, in execution of the powers of the will. There was no evidence upon the subject except the answer of defendant, and to make any ruling upon his ex parte statement might do injustice to the plaintiffs.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

(Case No. 1043.)

BRATTON v. MASSEY.

[1. Trusts ⇐140.]

A deed of indenture, executed in 1866, by A, his wife, and B, by which A and his wife agreed to separate and live apart, in its preamble recited an agreement that A should convey certain described property to B, to be held and managed by B as trustee for the sole and separate use of the wife, and to be at all times fully and absolutely at her disposal, under directions of the trustee during her life, and by will at her death, as if she were sole. By this deed A conveyed to B, his heirs and assigns forever, *a certain lot of land, in trust for the wife of the grantor, to allow her to "occupy, use and enjoy all of said property and estate, in the same manner as if she were unmarried," or to collect the rents and profits, and apply the same to her support and maintenance; that the trustee should sell, at the written request of the wife, and re-invest the proceeds or dispose of them for her support and maintenance, and what remained at her death she might devise by her last will as if a feme sole—the wife accepting this provision in full satisfaction of support, maintenance and alimony. The husband died, and afterwards the wife, without a will, the property remaining unsold. Held, that the wife took an absolute estate in fee simple in the land, which, at her death, descended to her heir-at-law. [This case is also cited and followed in Fuller v. Missroon, 35 S. C. 315, 14 S. E. 714.]

Before Kershaw, J., Chester, June, 1880.

This was an action commenced August 11th, 1879, by John S. Bratton against Benjamin H. Massey, the heirs-at-law of W. T. Gilmore and certain creditors, who, together with the plaintiff, had established demands against the estate of W. T. Gilmore, under proceedings had in the Circuit Court for Chester county, in 1869. B. H. Massey was also sole heir-at-law of Mary E. Gilmore. The case is stated in the opinion. The Circuit decree, after stating the facts, continued as follows:

This was a deed made by the husband to provide for the separate maintenance and support of the wife, and for a separation. It was voluntary, there being no covenant on the part of the trustee to save the husband harmless in respect of the debts of the wife. Such a deed would be voidable by the creditors under the statute 13 Elizabeth. Smith's L. Cas. *12; Fitzer v. Fitzer, 2 Atk. 513.

But that ground is not taken here, and, if it had been, it might have been answered that the claim was barred by the statute of limitations, after four years from the execution of the deed, as in Lott v. De Graffenreid, 10 Rich. Eq. 346.

I proceed, therefore, to the question as presented. There is no doubt that the conveyance to Massey was in fee. The words employed were those usual and proper for that purpose. This, *however, settles nothing as to the resulting trust. The deed authorized the trustee to sell and convey and re-invest during the life of Mrs. Gilmore, and she was authorized to dispose of the property by will. It was, therefore, necessary for the purposes of the deed that the fee should be in Massey.

The real question is, what was the interest of Mrs. Gilmore? Was it a life estate, or a fee? If it was a life estate, then all the trusts declared in the deed terminated at her death, she having failed to dispose of it by will under the power conferred upon her by the deed. In that case the trust resulted to the heirs of the grantor. 2 Story's Eq. 1196a; Hill. on Trust. 114; 4 Kent 307; 2 Washb. on Real Prop. 472; Lloyd v. Spillet, 2 Atk. 150.

It is contended by defendant that, a consideration being expressed in the deed ($1), there can be no resulting trust according to the proposition laid down by Mr. Washburne, (Book 2, ch. II., § 2, ¶ 43,) as applicable to uses. But in regard to trusts, it is different, as may be seen from the same author, (Book 2, ch. I., § 2, ¶ 12,) where it is said that "if the consideration were not something substantial, equity would interpose and hold the bargainee, though the owner of the legal estate, as the trustee of the bargainor." Here the consideration was merely nominal which passed from the grantee, who is an express trustee, without any beneficial interest whatever, and, so far as the cestui que trust is concerned, there was no legal consideration whatever.

It appears to me plain that the estate of Mrs. M. E. Gilmore was limited to her life. A conveyance by deed of lands generally, without the word "heir," carries no more than the life estate. 4 Kent 5. Washb., Book 2, § 2, ¶ 28: "In interpreting the words in which a trust is declared, courts adopt the same rules as in granting the legal estate. Thus, a trust in favor of A, with no words of inheritance, would be for life only." Id., § 3, ¶ 4.

The deed plainly declares the object of the trust to be to provide for the maintenance and support of Mrs. Gilmore. It is true, the whole might have been expended for that purpose by the trustee, if necessary, yet the words import no more than a life estate. No further expenditure could be made by the *trustee for her support and maintenance after her death. What then remained the deed gave her the power of disposing of by will, "notwithstanding her coverture, as if she were sole and unmarried." These words convey a naked power. Sugd. on Pow. 125. This power having failed of execution, the trusts of the deed are exhausted, and result to the grantor.

If these trusts had been created by will, a greater latitude of construction might have been admissible, and, under our statute, the gift would have been considered a fee simple, unless such construction would have been inconsistent with the intention of the testator. Rev. Stat. 443.

The defendant contends that this was a gift generally, and not for life, and, being coupled with a general power to dispose of the estate, that it should be construed a fee simple. Had that been the character of this gift, and it had arisen under a will or devise, there could have been no doubt of the proposition. Pulliam v. Byrd, 2 Strob. Eq. 142. Very good authority is cited in the margin of that case for the proposition that in a devise the same effect would follow, where the estate was limited for life, with a general power of appointment, though the law is there declared to be otherwise. But I do not find any authority for extending the principle to the case of trusts created by deed, in violation of the rule of common law requiring words of inheritance to create a fee, though there may be found some countenance for this view in certain decisions respecting marriage articles and executory trusts. Fonb. Eq., Book 2, § 2, and note.

It will be observed that the deed under consideration does not convey an estate "to the sole and separate use" of Mrs. Gilmore, but in trust for her maintenance and support. She had, therefore, no estate at all in the property conveyed. It is like the case of Hyde v. Price, 3 Ves. 445, where Lord Alvanley says: "I am of opinion that this is not property she is entitled to, to her sole and separate use. There is a special trust upon it. She has no dominion over it." See the observations of Mr. Roper upon deeds of this character in his learned treatise on Husband and Wife vol. II., p. 304.

For these reasons I conclude that at the death of Mrs. M. E. Gilmore the trust in the property conveyed by the said deed *resulted to the heirs of W. T. Gilmore, and the same became liable for the payment of the debts established against his estate.

Defendant appealed.

Messrs. R. E. Allison and W. B. Wilson, for appellant.

Mr. G. J. Patterson, contra.

June 28th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. On December 22d, 1866, W. T. Gilmore and wife, M. E. Gilmore, with the defendant, B. H. Massey, executed a deed of indenture in substance and to the effect following: After reciting that some unhappy differences had arisen between the husband and wife which had induced them to agree "to live separate and apart from each other, and, previous to such separation he, the said W. Taylor Gilmore, has consented thereto, and has agreed to transfer, release, convey, surrender and deliver certain real and personal property, hereinafter mentioned, for the support and maintenance of said M. E. Gilmore, to be held and managed by the said Benjamin H. Massey as trustee, in trust from henceforth to the sole and separate use of said M. E. Gilmore, and to be at all times as fully and absolutely at her disposal, under directions to her said trustee in her lifetime, or by will at her death, as if she were sole and unmarried," the deed proceeds as follows: "Now this indenture witnesseth that the said W. Taylor Gilmore, in pursuance of said proposal, promises and agrees with the party of the second part that the said M. E. Gilmore shall and may live separate and apart from him and reside in places and families of relations or friends or other persons, and follow such business and pursuits as she, at her will and pleasure, may think fit and desirable; and further, that, as well for the consideration aforesaid as for and in consideration of the sum of $1 to the said W. Taylor Gilmore by the said Benjamin H. Massey paid, the said W. Taylor Gilmore has granted, bargained, sold, &c., * * * all that lot of land, &c. * * * To have and to hold all and singular the *premises * * * unto the said Benjamin H. Massey, his heirs and assigns forever, in trust, however, and upon the confidence that he, the said Benjamin H. Massey, shall allow the said M. E. Gilmore to occupy, use and enjoy all of said property and estate, or that he shall collect and receive the rents, issues and profits thereof and apply the same to the support and maintenance of said M. E. Gilmore in same manner as if she were sole and unmarried. And, further, the said W. Taylor Gilmore covenants and agrees that it shall and may be lawful for the said Benjamin H. Massey, by deed or other sufficient writing, by and with the written directions and approval of said M. E. Gilmore, to sell, transfer, deliver and convey the whole or any part of the property and estate herein and hereby conveyed and released, to such person or persons, and for such sum or sums of money or other valuable consideration as to him shall seem wise and prudent, and to sign and deliver good and sufficient title therefor to the purchaser, and by and with the written direction and approval of the said M. E. Gilmore, to re-invest the proceeds of said sale in other property better adapted to the wants, conveniences or wishes of said M. E. Gilmore, but subject to the same trust as the property so sold and delivered or otherwise disposed of as will best contribute to the decent and comfortable support and maintenance of said M. E. Gilmore. And the said W. Taylor Gilmore further covenants and agrees that it shall and may be lawful for the said M. E. Gilmore, by her last will and testament, to give, devise and bequeath the whole or any portion of the estate and property hereby conveyed and transferred, or other estate and property substituted in its place as hereinbefore authorized, that may remain unexpended at her death, to such person or persons, and in such proportions as she may direct and appoint; and said will, so executed, shall be as good and available at law, notwithstanding her coverture, as if she were sole and unmarried. In consideration of the estate and property herein and hereby conveyed, released, assigned and delivered by the said W. Taylor Gilmore in trust for said M. E. Gilmore, in manner as aforesaid, the said M. E. Gilmore, in the presence of and by and with the advice and consent of her friend, kinsman and trustee, said Benjamin H. Massey, does *hereby agree to accept and take the same in full satisfaction for her support and maintenance, and all alimony whatever during her coverture." The deed also contains a covenant on the part of Massey that he will accept the trusts conferred and carry out the same, but it contains no covenant that Massey will save W. T. Gilmore harmless against the debts of his wife.

W. T. Gilmore died intestate, in 1867, and his estate has proved to be insolvent. Mrs. Gilmore died in 1878 without having executed the powers conferred by the deed, and thereupon this action was commenced by the plaintiff, who had established a claim against the estate of W. T. Gilmore, under proceedings to marshal the assets of his estate, for the purpose of subjecting the real estate conveyed to Massey as trustee, by the above-mentioned deed, to the payment of the debts of W. T. Gilmore, upon the ground that the property conveyed by that deed was to be held by the trustee only for the life of Mrs. Gilmore, and that upon her death, without having disposed of the same by will, it reverted to the estate of W. T. Gilmore, and became liable for his debts.

The appellant, B. H. Massey, contends that, under a proper construction of the terms of this deed, Mrs. Gilmore took an absolute estate, which, at her death, descended to him as her sole heir-at-law, while the respondent contends that the estate was conveyed to the trustee for the sole purpose of securing to Mrs. Gilmore a support and maintenance during her life, with power in her to dispose of the same by will, and that she having died without executing the power, the whole of the trusts created by the deed were exhausted, and the estate reverted to the heirs of the grantor, and became liable for his debts. The Circuit judge sustained the view insisted upon by the respondent, and the real question raised by this appeal is whether, under a proper construction of the terms of the deed, the estate reverted to the heirs of the grantor or descended to the heir of Mrs. Gilmore.

If there was any trust resulting to the grantor or his heirs under the terms of this deed, it must be by implication, as it is not, and cannot be pretended that there is any express provision to that effect in the deed. It is contended, however, that inasmuch as the trusts declared by the deed do not exhaust the *whole estate, what remains after satisfying those trusts must necessarily revert to the grantor. This, of course, rests upon the theory that the whole estate was not exhausted by the trusts declared, and to this theory we are unable to assent, for we think that, by a proper construction of the deed, the whole estate was intended to be, and was, in fact, conveyed, and there was nothing left to revert to the grantor.

It is quite true that the estate is not conveyed in trust for Mrs. Gilmore and her heirs, and it is equally true that in a conveyance of the legal estate the word "heirs" is necessary to create a fee simple. It is likewise true, as a general proposition, as is said by Washburne in his work on Real Property, Book 2, ch. III., § 2, ¶ 28, that "in construing limitations of trusts courts of equity adopt the rules of law applicable to the legal estate," or that "declarations of trust are construed in the same manner as common law conveyances, where the estate is finally limited by deed," yet as the same writer says, in ¶ 40 of the same section, there are some exceptions to this rule, one of which he states, in ¶ 43, in the following language: "Another exception is that the word 'heirs' is not always necessary in order to give an equitable estate the character of inheritability, if it requires that such an effect should be given in order to carry out the clear intention of the party creating it. Thus it is said, if land be given to a man without the word 'heirs' and a trust be declared of that estate, and it can be satisfied in no other way but by the cestui que trust taking an inheritance, it has been construed that a fee passes to him even without the word 'heirs.'" Among the cases cited to sustain this doctrine are Villiers v. Villiers, 2 Atk. 71, and Fisher v. Fields, 10 Johns. 505, in both of which the question arose upon the construction of deeds, not wills, and the last sentence just quoted from Washburne is a quotation from the opinion of Lord Hardwicke in Villiers v. Villiers. In Fisher v. Fields, one B. Griffin, a discharged soldier in the Revolutionary war, having received his discharge entitling him to bounty land, sold his right to one Birch and delivered to him his discharge, upon which was the following certificate under his hand and seal: "This is to certify that the bearer hereof, J. B., is entitled to all the land that I (B. G.) am entitled to, either *from the state or continent, for my services as a soldier, certified in my discharge." The assignees of Birch sued out a patent for the land to which Griffin was entitled, which, under the statute, was issued in the name of Griffin. Subsequently Fields, with notice of this transfer to Birch, bought the land from Griffin and took a regular conveyance from him. In a contest for the land between the assignees of Birch and Fields, it was contended by the latter that the endorsement on the discharge not containing the word "heirs" could not operate as a transfer of anything more than the life estate. But the court held otherwise, and that although the patent was made out in the name of Griffin, he must, in equity, be regarded as a trustee for Birch and his assignees, and although the transfer contained no words of inheritance, yet, as the intention was manifest to sell the whole interest, the court would so construe it. Kent, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, used these words: "There never was a greater mistake, as I apprehend, than the supposition that this transfer of the soldier's right to Birch is to be tested by the strict technical rules of a conveyance of land at common law, and that Birch did not take the whole interest of the soldier, because the word 'heirs' was not inserted in the assignment." Again, he says: "A trustee or cestui que trust will take a fee without the word 'heirs' where a less estate will not be sufficient to satisfy the purposes of the trust." And again: "But what puts this point beyond all doubt, is the doctrine of the common law on the subject of uses and trusts. Before the statute of uses, if a man bargained and sold his land for a valuable consideration, without inserting the word 'heirs,' the Court of Chancery would have decreed an execution of the use in fee, because the use was merely in trust and confidence, and because this was according to the conscience and intent of the parties.

But after the statute of 27 Henry VIII., as the uses were transferred and made the legal estate, a different rule took place. A trust is merely what a use was before the statute of uses, and the same rules apply to trusts in chancery now which were formerly applied to uses. And in exercising its jurisdiction over executory trusts the Court of Chancery is not bound by the technical rules of law, but takes a wider range in favor of the intent of the party."

*It seems to us, therefore, that in seeking to ascertain the nature and extent of the trust estate of Mrs. Gilmore, as created by this deed, we are not bound by the strict technical rules which would govern in the construction of a conveyance creating a legal estate, but that we must look to the intent of the parties, as evinced by the terms of the deed. Looking at this deed in this light, it is clear that the grantor intended to create in his wife an absolute estate in fee simple. It is very certain that he does not, in terms, limit the duration of the estate to the life of his wife, but, on the contrary, he invests her with powers which pre-suppose a larger estate than a simple life estate. The rights and powers given to her by this deed are precisely those of an absolute owner, and it is difficult to conceive how he could have conferred such absolute rights and powers, in the broad terms which he has used, without the intention of conferring upon her the absolute dominion over the estate, as far as it was practicable, under the law, as it then stood, for a married woman to hold and enjoy such an estate. For, as the law then stood, it was necessary for her protection that she, being a married woman, should have a trustee, but otherwise the deed gives her every right and every power which an absolute owner could have. She had the sole and exclusive right to the use, occupation and enjoyment of the land, and the rents, issues and profits were at her absolute disposal. She had the right to sell or dispose of, or what amounted to the same thing, require her trustee to sell or dispose of the whole or any part of the property, and either expend the proceeds for her own use, or re-invest the same in other property for her sole and exclusive benefit. And, finally, she had the right to dispose by will of any of the property which she had not consumed during her lifetime. What greater rights could the owner of the fee have? It is an entire mistake to suppose that the powers conferred upon Mrs. Gilmore were limited as to the manner of exercise—by will—and as to the subject upon which such power could be exercised—such portion of the estate as may remain unexpended at her death—for the deed gives her unlimited power of disposition during her life, and, in addition thereto, gives her the right to dispose, by will, of whatever remained *undisposed of during her lifetime, and this is all the power of disposition which the absolute owner of property has.

It is conceded that the deed conveys an estate in fee simple to the trustee, and one of the trusts is declared in the following words: "In trust, however, and upon the confidence that he, the said Benjamin H. Massey, shall allow the said M. E. Gilmore to occupy, use and enjoy all of said property and estate * * * in same manner as if she were sole and unmarried." Now, what estate is she thus to occupy, use and enjoy? The terms of the deed answer, "all of said * * * estate," that is, all of the estate conveyed to the trustee, which is admitted to be the fee. It seems to us, therefor, that it is a mistake to say, as has been said, that no estate is conveyed to the sole and separate use of Mrs. Gilmore, and that the property is conveyed to the trustee only for the purpose of securing to her a maintenance and support during her life, for the deed, in express terms, conveys the fee simple to the trustee in trust that he shall allow Mrs. Gilmore to occupy, use and enjoy not only the property conveyed, but also the estate, which was, undoubtedly, a fee simple.

We think, also, that there was a valuable consideration for this deed proceeding from Mrs. Gilmore in the release by her of all claim against her husband for alimony. The deed declares that "in consideration of the estate and property herein and hereby conveyed * * * the said M. E. Gilmore * * * does hereby agree to accept and take the same in full satisfaction for her support and maintenance and all alimony whatever during her coverture." This amounted to a release of any claim she might otherwise have upon her husband for alimony, and such release was certainly a valuable consideration proceeding from her, and she may be regarded as in fact a purchaser of the estate conveyed to her trustee to be held by him for her sole and exclusive benefit, with the same powers of disposition as would belong to the owner of the fee.

We are therefore unable to perceive any ground upon which a resulting trust can be implied in the grantor, and, on the contrary, are of opinion that the terms used manifest an intent to create an absolute estate in fee simple in Mrs. Gilmore, which, *upon her death, descended to the appellant as her heir-at-law, and that a Court of Equity is bound to carry into effect such intent.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the complaint be dismissed.

McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

SIMPSON, C. J., dissenting. W. T. Gilmore, and his wife, M. E. Gilmore, having determined to separate and live apart from each other, entered into an agreement by which the said W. T. Gilmore was to convey certain real estate, together with other property mentioned in the complaint, for the support and maintenance of his said wife, to B. H. Massey, the appellant, as trustee.

Accordingly, a deed of indenture was executed by W. T. Gilmore, B. H. Massey and the said M. E. Gilmore, by which said property, real and personal, was conveyed "to the said Massey, to him and his heirs forever, in trust, that he should allow M. E. Gilmore to occupy, use and enjoy the same, or that he should collect and receive the rents and profits thereof and apply the same to the support of the said M. E. Gilmore in the same manner as if she were sole and unmarried." And, further, "that it shall be lawful for the said B. H. Massey, by deed or other sufficient writing, by and with the written direction and approval of the said M. E. Gilmore, to sell, transfer, deliver and convey the whole or any part of the property and estate herein conveyed and released, to such person or persons, and for such sum or sums of money or other valuable consideration as to him shall seem wise and prudent; and to sign and deliver good and sufficient title thereof to the purchaser; and by and with the written direction and approval of the said M. E. Gilmore, to re-invest the proceeds of said sale in other property better adapted to the wants of the said M. E. Gilmore, but subject to the same trusts," &c. And, further, "that M. E. Gilmore may, by her last will and testament, give, devise and bequeath the whole property hereby conveyed, or that which may be substituted in its place, or may remain unexpended at her death, to such person or persons, and in such proportions as she may *direct and appoint." The said M. E. Gilmore consenting "to accept the same in full satisfaction for her support and maintenance and all alimony whatever during coverture."

The property mentioned in the deed went into the possession of the trustee and was enjoyed by Mrs. Gilmore during her life. Mrs. Gilmore died in 1878, without making any disposition of the property either by appointment or in writing, by will or otherwise. In the meantime W. T. Gilmore had also died, largely in debt, and his other property proving insufficient to pay his debts, his creditors instituted this proceeding to make the property, conveyed in this deed to the use of his wife, liable for his debts, claiming that a life estate only was given to her, and that, upon her death, the property reverted to the estate of the said W. T. Gilmore. Judge Kershaw, who heard the case, sustained the claim of the plaintiff, and decreed the property liable to W. T. Gilmore's creditors.

Numerous exceptions were taken to this decree, but, upon examination, these exceptions will be found each to raise the same question, which is: Did Mrs. Gilmore take a life, or a fee simple estate under the deed referred to?

If I felt at liberty to construe this deed without regard to the legal effect of the terms employed, and untrammeled by previous decisions in analogous cases, I might reach a different conclusion from that which a legal construction and the decided cases may demand.

The powers granted to the wife are almost unlimited. She was authorized to take possession and to occupy the property; to consume in its enjoyment all or any portion of it; to dispose of it during her life upon such consideration as she saw proper; and, finally, "if any remained unexpended at her death, to give, bequeath, and devise it to such person or persons as she might direct or appoint, as fully as if she were sole and unmarried."

These are the powers which usually belong to an absolute estate, and if we were to confine our attention to the consideration of these, as alone bearing upon the question under discussion, it would be difficult to shut out the conclusion that it was the intention of the parties here to create an absolute estate. *But many cases, very similar in their facts to this case, have been passed upon and decided in our own courts.

We must look at these cases, and, extracting the principle upon which they have turned, apply it to this case and decide it as this principle shall require.

It is a familiar principle, found in all the elementary books on the subject of estates, that the term "heirs" is the apt and legal term uniformly to be used in the creation of estates of inheritance. At one time no other term would answer the purpose, and no estate of inheritance could be created without its use. This rule, however, has been relaxed somewhat, and especially in the case of wills and devises. It has been relaxed in these, because it has been thought that such instruments were entitled to a more liberal construction than others, on account of the emergency which sometimes surrounds the parties executing them—different from that which usually attends the preparation of other papers. In accordance with this relaxed rule, it has been held in many cases that no words of limitation are necessary in a devise to convey a fee simple estate. McAllister v. Tate, 11 Rich. 509 [73 Am. Dec. 119]. And in the general statutes of this state it has been enacted "that a gift of land by devise shall be considered as a gift in fee simple, unless such a construction be inconsistent with the will of the testator, expressed or implied." Gen. Stat., ch. LXXXVI., § 9. If, then, the contest here was over the construction of a devise, with the enlarged powers given to the devisee, as are found in this deed, there would not be much difficulty under the principle referred to above in determining the question at issue. The amplitude of the powers conveyed, accompanied with the indefinite character of the estate created, would sufficiently indicate the intention of the parties, and would so clearly mark the estate as an estate in fee simple, that there could be but little doubt on the subject. Pulliam v. Byrd, 2 Strob. Eq. 142.

But the instrument in this case is not a devise—it is a deed. We have found no authority for extending the principle which, as we have seen, applies to devises, to estates created by deed. On the contrary, as far as we have been able to discover, the common law rule requiring the use of words of inheritance to *create a fee remains unchanged as to deeds, and the term heirs must still be employed in such instruments when it is desired to create such an estate. Knotts v. Hydrick, 12 Rich. 318; 4 Kent 5.

No such term is found in this deed qualifying the estate conveyed to Mrs. Gilmore; and if the estate here was a legal estate, and conveyed directly to her without the intervention of a trustee, there would be no room for the position that a fee simple had been created and given to her. The principles referred to above would settle the question at once. In such case, in the absence of words of inheritance and all other words limiting or defining the duration of the estate, under the principle that the deed must be construed most strongly against the grantor, and, therefore, that the largest estate that the language employed would carry, must have been intended, the court, no doubt, would conclude that Mrs. Gilmore took a life estate, with full power of disposition and appointment, according to the terms and provisions of the deed; and the case would end at this point.

But the estate conveyed here is not a legal estate; it is a trust estate. Will that fact modify, change or enlarge this principle, is the question which now opens for consideration.

It has been decided in this state, first as far back as 1811, and frequently since, that the character of trust estates, both of real and personal property, must be determined in equity upon the same rules of construction as are applied to legal estates. Cudworth v. Thompson, 3 Desaus. 256. They have generally the same incidents and qualities, and in endeavoring to ascertain the quantity of a given trust estate, equity follows the same rules, and applies the same principles, which, in a like purpose, the law courts apply to estates. 2 Washb., Book 2, ch. III., §§ 2, 3; 4 Kent 6.

It would follow, then, that this being an estate in equity, or a trust estate, would make no difference as to the questions involved.

These general principles are not contested by the appellant, as we understand. But it is contended that, although an absolute estate is not given in terms to the cestui que trust, Mrs. Gilmore herself, yet that such an estate is given to her trustee—the conveyance to *him being in terms "to him and his heirs forever." That by these words the fee passed out of the grantor upon the execution of the deed; and this fact, lifting the case from under the principles referred to above, operates to enlarge the estate in the cestui que trust into an absolute estate, and without possibility of return to the grantor. Now we have seen that the estate which was given to Mrs. Gilmore, when considered by itself and judged by the rules applicable to the construction of a deed like that under which she held, was a life estate, nothing more. Can the fact be, that because, in the same instrument a fee was given to her trustee, who was to hold for her use and benefit, that that will enlarge her life estate into a fee simple? As to the question of intention, it may be asked if such was not the purpose of passing the entire estate out of the grantor into the trustee, what was the purpose? It certainly could not have been for the benefit of the trustee, and it is contended, therefore, that it must have been for the benefit of the wife.

It will be remembered that Mrs. Gilmore was invested with the power to sell and convey during her life, or rather that the trustee was authorized to do so upon her written directions. She was also empowered to dispose of the entire estate by will. Was it not necessary, for the purpose of meeting the exercise of these powers on the part of Mrs. Gilmore that some one should be clothed with the fee so as to be able to convey to her vendee or appointee, as the case might be, that full estate which she could create or appoint under the provisions of the deed, and yet, having but a life estate herself, had no power to convey it to such vendee or appointee? This may have been the reason for investing the trustee with the fee.

"Where an estate is given to trustees in fee upon trusts that do not exhaust the whole estate, and a power is superadded which can only be exercised by the trustees conveying in fee simple, the trustees will take the fee, and the estate conveyed by them will be sustained by the fee in them, and not by the mere power." Perry on Trusts, § 316, p. 293. It is true that by this author, (Section 312), it is stated that the statute can only execute in the cestui que trust the estate which the trustee himself takes, that is, the statute executes or transfers the exact *estate given to the trustee. But we have nowhere found the doctrine suggested that the quantity of the estate conferred upon the cestui que trust is to be measured by that which may be conferred on the trustee instead of by the language which is used as to the cestui que trust herself.

It is often important to know the exact legal interest of the trustee in the estate, not so much, however, to ascertain the quantity of interest conveyed to the cestui que trust, but to measure the powers of the trustee. On this principle "two rules of construction have been adopted by courts: First. Wherever a trust is created, a legal estate sufficient for the purposes of the trust shall, if possible, be implied in the trustee, whatever may be the limitations in the instrument, whether to him and his heirs or not. And, second, although a legal estate may be limited to a trustee to the fullest extent as to him and his heirs, yet it shall not be carried further than the complete execution of the trust necessarily required." Perry on Trusts, § 312. See, also, §§ 318, 319, 320.

We do not think that in this case the life estate of Mrs. Gilmore was enlarged to a fee on account of the fact that the trustee, for the purposes of his trust, was invested with such an estate.

It may be that upon the death of the husband, there being then no longer any necessity for a trustee, that the use became executed in the wife. If this be so it could not help the appellant, because the statute could execute in her no greater legal estate than she previously had in equity, which, as we have seen, was a life estate.

Lastly, upon the termination of the life estate of Mrs. Gilmore did the fee result to the debtor or his heirs, or did it pass to the heirs of Mrs. Gilmore?

The general rule on this subject seems to be that where the use as to a part is only declared, the residue would result to the grantor or his heirs, if he be dead. As where a conveyance is made by a man to the use of his heirs, and no use is declared of the same during his life, an estate for life arises in his own favor by implication. So, besides the use to his heirs, if he had declared an immediate use to one for years, so much of the use as *would be left between the expiration of the term for years and the grantor's death, when the use to his heirs would be executed, would result to him.

So, too, and what is more in point: "If the limitation be by A for a valuable consideration to B in fee, to the use of B for life, without any other declaration, the use in fee, after the death of B, would result to the grantor." Washb., vol. II., 397.

"As a general rule, it is true that where the owner, for a pecuniary consideration, conveys lands to uses, especially declaring a part of the use, but making no disposition of the residue, so much of the use as the owner does not dispose of remains in him." Id. 397, quoting from a New York case.

Under these principles I think there was a resulting trust in this case to the grantor or his heirs, and I concur with Judge Kershaw in so holding. This is so, because a use in part only of the estate was declared in the deed, i. e., a life estate in Mrs. Gilmore, leaving the residue undisposed of. It is true, as is contended by appellant, that where the deed is based upon a valuable consideration, however small, even if it be a pepper-corn, as stated in some of the cases, this fact will sometimes be laid hold of by the courts as an evidence of the intention of the parties to carry the whole estate, and it will usually be held to prevent a resulting trust.

But this doctrine does not apply to a case of this sort. There is a qualification to that class of cases where a resulting trust is claimed between the original parties, upon the execution of a deed to one party, where the purchase money is paid by another, or where a voluntary deed is executed by one to another, without any declaration of trust, and the question arises to whom does the property belong, the grantor or the grantee? In such case the fact of consideration will determine the question. But, as we have said, this doctrine has no application here. And even if it had, we do not see that any valuable consideration was present in this case. There is no evidence that the nominal consideration mentioned in the deed was ever paid by the trustee, or ever expected to be paid, and the husband was certainly under both legal and moral obligation to support and maintain his wife.

Whether the property which he allowed her the use of during *life was more than sufficient for this purpose, we do not know nor is that material. Was it not his duty to furnish this, independent of any covenant that she might make? But I do not see that any such covenant was made by her, or any other legal consideration furnished by her, as a foundation of his deed, such as, in contemplation of the law, would prevent a resulting trust.

For the reasons given herein, I have been unable to concur in the opinion of the majority of the court. That opinion, while admitting the general rule as to the necessity of the use of the word "heirs" to convey a fee in a deed, holds that there are exceptions to this rule, and that this case falls under one of these exceptions, and Mr. Washburn, Book 2, ch. III., ¶¶ 40, 43, is referred to.

I do not understand Mr. Washburn as sustaining the views of the majority. In my judgment the paragraphs cited refer to the estate of the trustee and not to that of the cestui que trust. The idea suggested is that whatever may be the quantity of the estate, in terms, given to the trustee, yet, if the interest conveyed to the cestui que trust requires that the trustee shall have a fee, then the law will confer it upon him, although the word "heirs" is not used in the deed to him. In other words, whenever a fee is created for the use of the cestui que trust—a fee being necessary in the trustee to protect the interest of the cestui que trust—he shall have a fee also. Mr. Washburn does not enlarge the rules by which it is to be determined whether or not a fee has been created for the cestui que trust. Nor do I think the cases referred to in the opinion of the majority fully sustain the position taken. In Villiers v. Villiers, 2 Atk. 71, Lord Hardwicke did say: "That if land be given to a man without the word 'heirs,' and a trust be declared of that estate, and it can be satisfied in no other way but by the cestui que trust taking an inheritance, it has been construed that a fee passes to him even without the word 'heirs.'" This is in exact accordance with the construction given above to the doctrine laid down by Mr. Washburn. The question being, what estate did the trustee take? "the man to whom the land was given"—but not the estate of the cestui que trust—Lord Hardwicke said that where the estate of the cestui que trust could be satisfied in no other way but by his taking an *inheritance—that is, where an estate of inheritance was given to the cestui que trust—"the man to whom the land was given," that is, the trustee should also have a fee, although the word "heirs" was not used in the conveyance to him. The case of Fisher v. Fields, in which Chancellor Kent delivered the opinion of the court, arose upon an assignment of a soldier's patent for land. The question was, whether the assignee was entitled to a fee when the word "heirs" was not used in the assignment. Chancellor Kent very properly said "that the transfer of a soldier's patent was not to be tested by the strict technical rules of the conveyances of land at common law." And so would we say here on such a paper; but the paper here is a conveyance of land, and not a mere soldier's patent.

Failing to agree with the majority, this is filed as my dissenting opinion.

Appeal sustained.

UNION BANK OF SOUTH CAROLINA v. HEYWARD.

[1. Master and Servant ⇐38.]

A bank-teller being dismissed from his office in March, retained of the funds in his hands $1500, claimed by him as his salary for the whole year. In April, the bank, claiming that his salary had been reduced to $1000 per annum, brought suit upon the teller's official bond, alleging refusal to turn over $1250 of the funds of the bank, and the only issue raised by the answer was, that defendant was entitled to retain the said sum of $1250 for his salary as teller. Held, that defendant had treated the contract as entire, and could not, therefore, assert his claim until the time when it became payable.

*Before Pressley, J., Charleston, February, 1880.

Associate Justice McIver declined to sit at the hearing of this appeal, because of his being a stockholder in the plaintiff corporation. By consent of counsel, the case was heard by the two remaining justices.

This action was commenced April 28th, 1877, by the Union Bank of South Carolina against W. H. Heyward, Jr., teller, and James B. Heyward, a surety on the official bond of the teller, for moneys alleged to be in the hands of W. H. Heyward and not turned over to the bank when demanded. Heyward ceased to be teller on or about March 10th, 1877, under the following resolution:

"Whereas, by resolution of the board of 15th March last, the salary of William H. Heyward, Esq., teller and book-keeper, was reduced from $1500 to $1000 per annum, to take effect from and after the 1st of June, 1876; and whereas, the date when such reduction should take effect was afterwards extended to January 1st, 1877, in consequence of Mr. Heyward's claim that he had been employed for one year from 1st January, 1876, at a salary of $1500 per annum, and that the salary could not legally be reduced before the expiration of the year, of which extension of time due notice was given to Mr. Heyward; and whereas, Mr. Heyward refuses to accept the reduced salary, to wit, $1000 per annum, from 1st January, 1877—

"Resolved, That Mr. William H. Heyward, Jr., be and he is hereby removed and relieved from the office of teller and book-keeper, and that he be and is hereby required to surrender and account for the assets and property of the bank which now are or have been in or under his care, custody and control."

The following receipt was then given:

Charleston, S. C., March 10th, 1877.

Received of Mr. Wm. H. Heyward, Jr., teller and book-keeper of the Union Bank of South Carolina, the following notes, to wit, * * * all unpaid, and all the books left in his charge by said bank.

Also, received of Mr. Heyward the sum of six thousand one *hundred and four dollars and ninety-nine cents, which, according to the balance sheet upon Mr. Heyward's books, appears to be the amount due by him to the bank.

Mr. Heyward states, however, that he has retained and charged upon said books the sum of fifteen hundred dollars as salary, from 1st January, 1877, to 1st January, 1878, as appears from the entries in said books.

The bank denies Mr. Heyward's right to retain said sum, and alleges that Mr. Heyward is only entitled to charge and retain compensation for his services from 1st January, 1877, to 1st April, 1877, at the rate of one thousand dollars per annum. And this receipt is given and intended to be without prejudice to the rights of either party in respect to the rate of Mr. Heyward's compensation, or his right to retain the amount hereinbefore mentioned as claimed and retained by him.

(Signed) H. D. Alexander.

Cashier Union Bank of South Carolina.

Other facts are stated in the opinion. Under the charge of the presiding judge the jury found a verdict for plaintiff of $1250, with interest. Defendants appealed.

Messrs. J. L. Buist and A. G. Magrath, for appellants.

Mr. Isaac Hayne, contra.

June 28th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. The defendant (appellant) was in the employment of the respondent plaintiff during the year 1876, as teller, at a salary of $1500 per annum. At the beginning of this engagement appellant gave bond with surety, conditioned generally "for the faithful discharge of the duties of the office, and, especially, that whenever required he would deliver up to the bank all goods, moneys and choses in action belonging to said bank, &c., which shall have come into his hands or care." Some controversy arose between the appellant and respondent during the year 1876, as to the reduction of appellant's salary for that year down to $1000. This, however, was arranged, and *appellant continued at the sum of $1500. After January 1st, 1877, appellant still continued in the bank discharging the duties of the office, until some time in February, when the controversy as to the salary again started, respondent contending that the board of directors had decided, by resolution the previous year, that the salary of the teller, as well as of the other officers, should be reduced for the year 1877, of which the appellant had notice, and the appellant denying that he had received such notice, and claiming that having entered on his duties in January, without notice, that he was entitled to the salary of the previous year, viz., $1500.

The parties failing to agree as to this matter, appellant was dismissed March 10th, 1877. Thereupon appellant delivered to the bank all the property in his hands belonging to the bank, except the sum of $1500, which he claimed that he had the right to hold in payment of his salary for the year, and he refused to turn this amount over.

This action was then brought upon the bond of appellant, alleging as a breach that appellant had refused and still refuses to account for and pay and deliver to the bank the money so received by him. The defendant (appellant) in his answer admits the execution of the bond; insists that he performed all the duties of his office, and claims that he is entitled to retain the amount in his hands, viz., $1250, for the salary due him as teller for the year 1877, which sum is the amount for the year, at the rate of $1500 per annum, less $250, conceded by plaintiff.

Upon these pleadings, after testimony, the parties went to the jury. The principal question of fact which the jury was called upon to decide was, what was the salary of the defendant for the year 1877? Was it $1500 or $1000? This depended upon the further fact, which the jury had to solve, did the appellant, before he entered upon his duties in January, 1877, have notice of the resolution of the board of directors reducing his salary for that year? This fact the jury seems to have found against the appellant, and, so finding, their verdict was for the plaintiff (respondent) $1250.

The appellant requested the judge to charge four legal propositions, one of which, the first, the judge charged, the other three *he declined, and the appeal assigns as error the refusal of the judge thus to charge, with two other exceptions to the charge as made, which will be noticed at the proper place.

The first error assigned is that the judge refused to charge the jury as requested, "that if the jury believed that the defendant was discharged by the plaintiff without cause, and simply because he refused to accede to the reduction of salary at the caprice of the plaintiff, then at law, he would be entitled to be reimbursed for his damages for the plaintiff's breach of said contract, and it is the duty of the jury to assess the damages."

The rule on the subject of damages, in cases of entire contracts, is this: If a party be dismissed without cause he becomes entitled to the full amount of the wages agreed upon; but in such case he should treat the contract as subsisting to the end of the year and he could not recover upon it until the expiration of the term for which he was employed. He has the right, however, to regard the contract as rescinded and put an end to, but in such case he will be held to have waived his claim to damages for the whole period, and will be restricted to compensation on a quantum meruit up to the time of dismissal. Watts v. Todd, 1 McMull. 26.

Now apply this principle to this case. Here the appellant claims to have been dismissed without cause. If this was true, which was a question of fact for the jury, the appellant had the right to wait until the end of the year, or the end of each month, if his salary was payable monthly, and then sue for it, or he could have treated the contract as rescinded at once, and have sued for the amount then due. And, if sued himself by his employer, he would be entitled to set up, by way of counter-claim or by discount, under the old practice, provided his right of action had accrued, such amount as then might be due him.

In this case the action of the respondent was commenced before the end of the year, or the month, and the appellant, would have been precluded from setting up a counter-claim for the whole amount, or even the amount for the month, had he attempted to do so, for the reason that there was nothing then due him under the contract. He had no right of action, and he *cannot set up a demand by way of counter-claim, upon which no right of action has accrued to himself.

Has he treated the contract as rescinded and claimed damages up to the time of dismissal?

Upon looking into his answer it will be found that no such defence is set up. He claims in his answer "that he is entitled to retain the said sum of $1250 for the salary due him as teller for the year commencing in January, 1877." This is the only issue which he raises. Under these circumstances there was no error on the part of the judge in declining to charge as requested on this proposition.

2. Appellant requested the judge to charge "that if the jury believed from the evidence that the plaintiff called upon the defendant to deliver up the assets—which were properly in his control—not in pursuance of any regular duty imposed on him in the ordinary course of business, but simply for the purpose of compelling him to acquiesce in his discharge by the plaintiff, then there was no breach of his contract in his refusal to deliver said assets, if they find that he was then willing, and always had been willing to account for the same."

The judge refused thus to charge, and we can find no error in this. The appellant was an employee of the respondent. He had given bond to the respondent "to deliver up to respondent all goods, moneys and choses in action belonging to said respondent." We conceive that the respondent had the right at any time to demand possession of such of the assets of the bank as might be in the hands of the teller or any other employee, either with or without dismissal. The property entrusted to the employee was not his property, but the property of the bank, and the bank had the right to control, and a refusal on the part of the employee to turn it over upon demand at any time would be a breach of duty, and where bond had been given, as in this instance, would be a breach of the bond.

So that the Circuit judge could not have legally charged the proposition as requested. In addition to this the judge says, there was no evidence pertinent to this subject, and that the case put was a hypothetical case, having no application to the case in hand.

*3. Appellant excepted, because the judge declined to charge "that if the jury believed from the evidence that there was a controversy between the plaintiff and the defendant as to the amount which was to be paid to the defendant by the plaintiff; and if they agreed that the defendant should retain the sum of $1250, subject to the adjudication of the said claim, the plaintiff cannot recover, unless the jury believe that the defendant was not justly entitled to retain that amount; and if they believe that the defendant's claim was correct and just, then the verdict should be in his favor."

The propriety of this charge depends upon the fact whether the respondent had agreed that appellant should retain the sum of $1250, acknowledged to be in his hands, subject to adjudication. This, again, depended upon the construction to be placed on the receipt which had been given by respondent when the other property was turned over. The construction of this receipt, being a matter of law, was for the court, and not for the jury. And the court holding that there was nothing in the receipt intimating that plaintiff assented to the defendant retaining that money, he could not have charged as requested.

4. Appellant excepted to the charge, "because his Honor charged the jury that the defendant having been discharged by the plaintiff during the year for which he was employed, without cause for such discharge, could not retain of the moneys of the plaintiff which were in his hands, an amount equal to the salary for the year for which he had been employed, and during which he had been discharged without cause."

We have looked into the charge of the judge as furnished in the "case," and we do not find any language which admits of the construction as presented in this ground. The judge nowhere charged, as we understand from the printed copy of his charge in the brief, that the defendant had been dismissed without cause. The question of fact which he submitted to the jury was, whether the appellant had sufficient notice that his salary had been reduced; and he charged them as matter of law, that if he did have this notice then his discharge was lawful; but we do not see that he stated that appellant had been dismissed without cause.

*5. The appellant excepts further "because his Honor charged that defendant could not set off against demand of plaintiff for money in his hands, the demand of the defendant against the plaintiff for money agreed by the plaintiff to be paid to the defendant for his services, and from the performance of which services the plaintiff had, without cause, prevented the defendant."

This embraces the same statement as the ground above, viz., that his Honor charged "that appellant had been prevented from discharging his duties without cause." The judge did charge that appellant could not set off against the respondent anything more than was due him at the time the action was brought. There was no error in this.

A counter-claim is a cross' action, and it must contain all the elements of a cause of action, and must be governed and judged by the same rules which apply to the complaint. And to entitle a defendant to set it up, one of the first necessities is that a right of action must have accrued; in other words, the claim must be due. Pom. on Rem., § 738.

There was no counter-claim technically and formally set up in this case, such as is required where the defendant intends to rely upon it as such. And even had this been attempted it would have been totally defective, because the claim for services was not due, and might never have become due. The death of the defendant during the year would certainly have defeated a portion of the claim.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

In re FIFTY-FOUR FIRST MORTGAGE BONDS. GIBBES v. GREENVILLE AND COLUMBIA RAILROAD COMPANY. STATE, ex relatione ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. SAME.

[1. Railroads ⇐206; Receivers ⇐49.]

Under action pending in the name of the state for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the property of a railroad corporation, and the appointment of a receiver, and on the motion of the attorney-general for such appointment, an order was passed by the court in the words following: "As the state cannot be required to give security as other plaintiffs, it is ordered, that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, under the order of and subject to this court, continue in the possession and management of the property of all kinds of the said company; and in like manner continue to conduct and carry on the business of the said company; that they make report to this court, at such times as this court may require, of the condition of the property of all kinds of the said company, of its earnings and profits and expenditures, to the end that such orders may, from time to time, be moved for, as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the property of the said company, and the interests of all parties concerned, pending litigation." Held, that this order constituted the president and directors of the corporation receivers, and that they continued in the management of the road and its business, as officers of the court and not of the company. [2. Corporations ⇐473.]

A referee in the cause reported $241,000 of this company's past-due bonds, secured by the lien of a first mortgage, as still outstanding, to which finding no exceptions were taken, and the report was approved by the Circuit Court. After the appointment of the receivers, fifty-four of these first mortgage bonds were purchased by these officers—some before the report of the referee, and some afterwards, but all before the approval of the report—and entered upon the books of the corporation as investments, and not as paid, and for several years reported to the company as still outstanding, and they were then reissued for value. Held, that these fifty-four bonds had not been paid, and in the hands of their purchasers, were secured by the lien of the first mortgage. *Before Hudson, J., Richland, July, 1880.

Hon. A. P. ALDRICH, judge of the Second Judicial Circuit, sat at the hearing of this appeal in the place of Associate Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel.

This case involves a contest between creditors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company. It is therefore a branch of the parent-case reported 13 S. C. 228, but raises points not there considered.

On May 6th, 1872, James S. Gibbes and other creditors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, filed their complaint against this corporation and other defendants, praying that the rank and lien of the several mortgages on the property of the company be declared, and the order fixed in which they should be paid, and so forth. On June 11th, 1872, the attorney-general of South Carolina filed his complaint in the name of "The State of South Carolina by the attorney-general," against this same corporation, and others, its creditors, praying that the rights of the state under an act of the general assembly be declared and its interests protected, a mortgage held by the state be foreclosed, a receiver appointed, and suing and judgment creditors be enjoined, &c.

On June 18th, 1872, Judge Melton, on motion of the attorney-general for the appointment of a receiver, and by consent of other counsel, filed his order wherein he restrained creditors from suing, or enforcing their judgments, appointed John S. Green referee to call in creditors "to make proof before him of their several and respective claims," and to "take testimony as to the liens set up against the said company, their order of priority, and the amounts respectively secured by such liens," and to make report to the court. The order further provided: "As the state cannot be required to give security as other plaintiffs, it is ordered that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, under the order of, and subject to this court, continue in the possession and management of the property of all kinds of the said company, and in like manner continue to conduct and carry on the business of the said company; that they make report to this court, at such times as this *court may require, of the condition of the property of all kinds, of the said company, of its earnings, and profits, and expenditures, to the end that such orders may, from time to time, be moved for, as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the property of the said company, and the interests of all parties concerned, pending litigation."

On November 15th, 1872, Mr. Green, the referee, reported, inter alia: "1st. First mortgage bonds—Furman, trustee. Outstanding, $241,000." To this part of the referee's report there was no exception taken by parties then before the court, or afterwards brought in by amended pleadings.

On May 13th, 1878, Judge Shaw passed an order directing that the substituted trustees of the first and second mortgages, be made parties, with leave to them "to file exceptions to the reports of the referees in the above-entitled cases." Amended complaints were filed in both cases in August, 1878, and they both alleged that there were still outstanding "$241,000 of first mortgage bonds." W. A. Clark, substituted trustee of the second mortgage, answered the amended complaint of Gibbes and others, but did not deny this allegation. He also excepted to the report of Referee Green, but not to the number of outstanding first mortgage bonds. This was in August, 1878.

The order of Judge Pressley, of November 23d, 1878, appointing a receiver, is substantially stated in the opinion. He considered that the order of Judge Melton made the president and directors of the company "officers of this court and responsible to it in the character of receivers." Judge Pressley's decree bears date September 6th, 1879. He says: "The report of the referee shows that holders of $241,000 of first mortgage bonds did not exchange them for those authorized by this act." He finds as a conclusion of fact: "4. After payment of said debts, the first mortgage bonds outstanding, and those held by the state, with all unpaid interest thereon, are the first lien on said property." He directs further inquiry as to the amount of several classes of bonds, but none as to the amount of outstanding first mortgage bonds. (The full decree may be read, if desired, in 13 S. C. at page 229.) This decree was affirmed on appeal, but the points involved here were not embraced in the exceptions there taken.

*On November 29th, 1879, Judge Mackey passed an order directing the sale of the road on April 15th, 1880; and one other order referring it to N. B. Barnwell, the master of the court, to call upon the bondholders of this company, including those secured by the first mortgage, to produce their bonds and "make proof of the same, and of the amount of principal and interest due on the same," and that the master classify the bonds so proved in the following classes: 1. First mortgage bonds "not exchanged for bonds guaranteed by the state and now outstanding in the hands of persons holding the same."

In the matter of a claim for counsel fees, Judge Mackey passed a third order in this cause, in which, inter alia, "1. It is adjudged that the order passed by Judge Melton, in the case of State, ex rel. the Attorney-General, against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, on the 18th day of June, 1872, did constitute the officers of the company the receivers of this court for the operation of the road and the protection of the defendant's property."

At a reference held before Mr. Barnwell, master, under Judge Mackey's order, the National Bank of Greenville, William Knobeloch, T. J. Robertson and others, produced first mortgage bonds, fifty-four in number, which, it was conceded, were included in Referee Green's "$241,000 first mortgage bonds outstanding;" but they were objected to by other creditors, holding securities of an inferior lien, upon the ground that they were paid. The facts were, that these bonds all fell due July 1st, 1863, and March 1st, 1864, were purchased with funds of the company by its treasurer, under directions of the president, between March 7th, 1872, and January 6th, 1874, and re-issued in October, 1875, and in January, 1877, as collateral security for loans made to operate the road, or sold for the same purpose. "These bonds were purchased just as other securities were purchased, and were entered upon the books of the company as investments; we were not prepared to retire any bonds," is the testimony of the treasurer. From April, 1874, to May 1878, inclusive, these bonds were reported in the treasurer's annual report as outstanding.

The master, by his report of May 10th, 1880, (upon the matters involved, fully stated in the opinion,) found that these fifty-*four bonds were not entitled to the lien of the first mortgage. Upon exceptions by the holders of these bonds to this report, Judge Hudson filed his decree in open court July 27th, 1880, by which the master's report was confirmed, except in a particular not considered by this court.

The holders of these bonds served the following exceptions:

1. For that his Honor held that the status of the fifty-four bonds was not res judicata.

2. For that his Honor held that the action of the railroad company, in taking up and reissuing said bonds, extinguished their lien, notwithstanding the provisions of the act of January 28th, 1861.

3. For that his Honor held that the said bonds were not entitled equitably to rank with the guaranteed bonds.

4. For that his Honor held that neither the status of the president and directors of the railroad company, resulting from the order of June 18th, 1872, nor their intention in taking up said bonds pendente lite, prevented the usual effect of such bonds being taken up by an obligor and mortgagor.

5. For that his Honor overruled the exceptions made by these exceptants to the report of the master, submitted on May 10th, 1880, in relation to the fifty-four bonds, of which those proven by exceptants formed a part.

6. For that his Honor did not hold that, under all the circumstances of the case, the holders of the fifty-four bonds were, in the marshaling of securities for the purpose of distribution of the assets of the railroad company, equitably entitled to the position of bona fide holders for value, without notice of defects.

Notices of appeal and these exceptions were duly served and furnished. Mr. Fisher, receiver, also appealed upon a ground which it was unnecessary for this court to consider under the conclusions reached by them, but he failed to serve the presiding judge with copies of his notice and exceptions within ten days after the rising of the court.

June 29th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by ALDRICH, A. A. J. Other branches of these causes have been before this court. I have not had the benefit of the argument therein, but proceed to present the questions submitted as they appear to me at the present hearing.

June 18th, 1872, Judge Melton made an order on a motion to appoint a receiver.

1. Restraining creditors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company from instituting writs, and judgment creditors from enforcing their judgments.

2. That the president and directors of the company, "under the order and subject to this court," continue in possession and conduct and carry on the business of the company, and "make report to this court at such times as the court may require of the condition of the property of all kinds of the said company, of its earnings and profits and expenditures, to the end that such orders may, from time to time, be moved for as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the property of the said company and the interest of all parties concerned pending litigation."

3. That Mr. Green be appointed referee, to call in, by advertisements in the newspapers, the creditors of the company, "to take testimony as to the liens set up against the said company, and the amounts respectively secured by such liens."

Under this order Mr. Green held references and submitted his report, dated November 15th, 1872. In this report he classifies the priority of liens as follows:

1. First mortgage bonds outstanding, $241,000.

2. Guaranteed bonds outstanding, $1,419,071.55.

3. Second mortgage bonds outstanding, $1,200,000.

June 11th, 1872, Mr. Attorney-General Chamberlain filed a complaint on the part of the state, in which he prays "that a receiver be appointed of all the property, assets and effects of the defendants, to hold and keep the same subject to the further order of this court."

May 13th, 1878, Judge Shaw filed an order to amend the *complaint by making H. H. De Leon, trustee, a party, which was done August, 1878.

November 23d, 1878, Judge Pressley, after hearing argument in the cases, as amended, filed a judgment, in which he says: "I consider that the said order of Judge Melton," (June 18th, 1872,) "did make the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company officers of this court and responsible to it in the character of receivers, but they have not executed the proper bond, nor have they filed their accounts or performed the other duties required by that order. It is therefore, incumbent upon me to put an end to that condition of the property, and to place it more substantially in the hands and under the custody and order of this court." He appoints Mr. Conner receiver.

September 6th, 1879, Judge Pressley filed his decree, holding "that the statutory liens, under the acts of 1861, 1866 and 1869, were securities for the payment of the bonds therein authorized, not mere indemnities to the state, and, therefore, it had no right to waive them in favor of the second mortgage." From this decree there was an appeal by De Leon, trustee, and Clark, trustee, but no exception was taken to that portion of the order of November 23d, 1878, which adjudged that the order of Judge Melton, June 18th, 1872, "did make the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company officers of this court, and responsible to it in the character of receivers."

March 24th, 1880, this court, Mr. Justice McGowan delivering the opinion, dismissed the appeal and affirmed the Circuit decree.

November 29th, 1879, Judge Mackey made an order for the sale of the road; and, on the same day, filed another order directing holders of bonds to make proof of the same before the master, who is directed to "classify the bonds guaranteed by the state."

December 19th, 1879, Judge Mackey filed his decree, in which he decides: "It is adjudged that the order of Judge Melton, June 18th, 1872, did constitute the officers of the company the receivers of this court for the operation of the road and the protection of the defendant's property," &c.

intention of Mr. *Magrath to pay these bonds; we were not prepared to retire any bonds; these bonds were entered as an actual investment in company's books, and were purchased as any other securities were purchased by the company as an investment of company funds; these bonds were used for the purpose of raising money to operate the road by pledging them as collaterals for loans."

He also proves that from 1874 to 1878, the $241,000 of first mortgage bonds were reported to the company as "first mortgage bonds then outstanding."

The note to Knobeloch for $9000, and the two notes to the National Bank of Greenville for $5000 each, are secured by "first mortgage bonds past due."

Mr. Barnwell, master, reports upon the testimony: "These fifty-four bonds are not entitled to the security of the mortgage to C. M. Furman, and they are not, in the hands of the present holder, first mortgage bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company." He also reports: "These bonds having been proven before John S. Green in 1872, a referee in one of these cases, their validity cannot now be questioned. As to this view, it only applies as a matter of fact to a portion of them; as a matter of law, I feel called upon by the order of this court to treat all bonds as unproved until they are submitted to me and are proved before me, to my satisfaction, to be what they purport to be. I have, therefore, passed on these bonds as I have done on all others, without regard to whether or not they had been passed upon by Referee J. S. Green. It is also claimed for them that in fact a great many of these bonds were not re-issued by the company, but by a receiver of this court. As I am fully of the opinion that there was no receiver of this road until the appointment of James Conner as receiver," &c.

To this report exceptions were filed on the part of Knobeloch, Palmer, Robertson and National Bank of Greenville.

July 27th, 1880, Judge Hudson filed his decree, in which he overrules the exceptions, except those of the National Bank of Greenville. From this decree the cause now comes to this court on appeal.

The railroad interest, although in its infancy, has attained such vast proportions, commercial, financial and, I may add, political, *that it becomes us to proceed with great caution in prescribing the rules of law by which these corporations are to be governed. The questions constantly arising are of such novel aspect that it can hardly be said any fixed rules of construction have yet been established. By combinations and skillful management they have acquired an influence that seriously affects the interest of society in all its relations. This court cannot legislate, but in giving construction to the acts of the legislature granting charters and privileges, it will be careful to adopt such rules as will most effectually guard the public from imposition, while it preserves the chartered rights of the corporations. In the interest of society a vast power has been concentrated in these enterprises; the right of eminent domain has been invoked in their behalf, and it becomes us to see, that while all their just and chartered rights are preserved, the public shall not be damaged.

Two questions arise here:

First. The proper construction of the order of Judge Melton of June 18th, 1872.

Second. When these fifty-four bonds were taken up by President Magrath, was it with the intent to retire them, or was it for the purpose of an investment, to afford him negotiable securities by which he could hold in hand the current earnings of the road to meet its current expenses?

Judge Melton's order was passed on a motion for a receiver. It provides that the president and directors, "under the order and subject to this court," shall continue in possession of the road; conduct and carry on its business; make a report to the court of its condition, earnings, profits and expenditures. It appoints a referee to report the order and priority of the liens against the company, and restrains judgment and suing creditors. Now if this order did not make the president and directors receivers, for what purpose was it made?

It will be remembered that on June 11th, 1872, Mr. Chamberlain, then attorney-general, filed his complaint praying: "That a receiver be appointed of all the property, assets and effects of the defendants, to hold and keep the same subject to the further order of this court." Seven days after, Judge Melton filed his order of June 18th, 1872. Was not that in response to *the prayer of the complaint filed by the attorney-general on the part of the state? Did it not invest the president and directors with all the attributes of a receiver? We need be at no loss to determine who is a receiver since Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 210. Mr. Justice McGowan, after reviewing all the authorities, happily defines him as "an executive officer of the court, to administer the assets of the estate under the direction of the court, which may, for the purpose of preserving the property, restrain the executor from intermeddling with the management of the estate and compel him to give up the control of it to the receiver; but such appointment and administration do not remove the executor or administrator or destroy his character as the legal representative of the estate. The authority of a receiver rests only in the orders of the court by which he is appointed. By virtue of any general authority as receiver he has no right to sue or be sued or defend." Now here were the president and directors of this road, on a prayer to appoint a receiver, directed to take charge of the property, manage it, report its earnings and expenditures, a referee appointed to call in creditors and report the priority of liens, and creditors, suing and judgment, restrained. From this order there was no appeal: it stood as the judgment of the court from 1872 to 1878. On November 23d, 1878, Judge Pressley filed a judgment, in which he said: "I consider that the order of Judge Melton made the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company officers of the court and responsible thereto in the character of receivers." From this there was no appeal. Then Judge Mackey, December 19th, 1879, filed his decree, in which he said: "It is adjudged that the order of Judge Melton did constitute the officers of the company the receivers of this court for the operation of the road and the protection of the defendant's property." From this there was no appeal. Nor do we hear their character as receivers questioned until the coming in of the report, May 10th, 1880, in which Mr. Barnwell, the master, reports there was no receiver until the appointment of Mr. Conner. Judge Hudson does not pass on this question, as he holds that whether receivers or officers of the company, the purchasers of past-due obligations can only rank as holders of unsecured bonds. I have not drawn on the *wealth of authority contained in the arguments of the distinguished counsel who have presented these cases; that would extend this opinion unnecessarily, and the references will be found in the report. We conclude, therefore, and so adjudge, that the order of Judge Melton, June 18th, 1872, appointed the president and directors of the company receivers of the court.

Which brings us to the second inquiry. When these fifty-four bonds were "taken up," was it payment, and when re-issued were they deprived of the protection of the original security? This is a question of right and intent. It may well be questioned, if, under the order of the court appointing the president and directors receivers, they had authority to pay and retire the bonds secured by the first mortgage. They were required to carry on the business of the company—make report of its condition, earnings, profits and expenditures—for what purpose? That the court may make such orders as may be moved for, to protect the property and the interest of all parties concerned. The court was as anxious to preserve the liens and securities of the bondholders and other creditors as it was to preserve the property of the company which protected them. It was not to create dispute and litigation, for, to prevent this, creditors of all classes were enjoined. The receiver is the officer of the court, as Mr. Justice McGowan emphatically says, "its hand," to manage the property under the direction of the court for the best interest of all concerned. No preferences are to be shown, no practices tolerated that will give advantage to one class of creditors to the detriment of another class, but the whole business is to be managed on the basis of the broadest equity. Hence large discretion is allowed him in the financial manipulation of the assets; he may call in or put out the securities of the company as, in his judgment, will best enable him to secure the property to the stockholders and pay off its creditors, subject always to the check of the court. If, in doing this, he takes up bonds one month and re-issues them the next, to save interest and enable him to meet the current expenses on the most economical scale, I do not see that he thereby destroys the lien of the bond taken up, which made it a secure investment when originally issued and which is supposed to retain its lien as it passes from hand to hand around the financial *circle. To assume this would not only create distrust but destroy the credit of the road, for it cannot be supposed that capitalists will lend money on collaterals, the validity of which involved constant legal investigation. If he is "the hand of the court," where does he derive his authority to pay a bond, cancel and then re-issue it deprived of the protection of the original mortgage by which it was made valuable and negotiable? I see nothing in the order to confer such a power. It appears to me to be a most extraordinary proposition that where a receiver is appointed to protect creditors and property he will be permitted to destroy liens and make new debts on the faith of those very liens which he knows he has extinguished!

Now let us consider the condition of things when the receiver took charge of the property under the order of Judge Melton in 1872. The referee, Mr. Green, reports $241,000 (of which these fifty-four bonds were a part) as "first mortgage bonds outstanding." This report is not excepted to and becomes a part of the record. These bonds are annually described, for a series of years, in the reports of the company as bonds thus renewed. Mr. Manson, the auditor, says: "It was not the intention of Mr. Magrath to pay these bonds; we were not prepared to retire any bonds; these bonds were entered as an actual investment in company's books, and were purchased as any other securities were purchased by the company as an investment of company funds; these bonds were used for the purpose of raising money to operate the road by pledging them as collaterals for loans." How, then, can it be said this was payment, and debtor and creditor uniting in the same person, the lien of the mortgage was lost? That is not all. Mr. Magrath was not examined, but his acts speak with great emphasis. He not only published the bonds in his annual reports, which were distributed, "as first mortgage bonds then outstanding," but he actually incorporated in his notes to Knobeloch and the National Bank of Greenville a description of them as "first mortgage bonds past due." After this there was no use to examine Mr. Magrath to say with what intent he took up and re-issued the bonds. If he did not intend to give them the character of first mortgage bonds, he was practicing a hideous fraud on the men who advanced their money on the faith of that *security. And it is equally extravagant to suppose, that any man of ordinary business sagacity would advance his money to a corporation threatened with bankruptcy, in the hands of a receiver, unless he supposed he was protected by the first mortgage. Further yet: Judge Pressley, in September, 1879, held "that the statutory liens were securities, not mere indemnities to the state, and, therefore, it had no right to waive them in favor of the second mortgage." From this judgment there was an appeal, which was dismissed. Judge Mackey held that the order of Judge Melton did appoint the president and directors receivers, from which there was no appeal. He ordered the master, Mr. Barnwell, to classify the bonds guaranteed by the state. What bonds? The bonds reported as "first mortgage bonds" by Referee Green—the bonds decided to be first mortgage by himself and Judge Pressley. Is not the question res judicata? And yet, when the master comes to classify the bonds, what does he do? He overrules Judges Mackey and Pressley, treats Referee Green's report with indifference, and actually holds, in face of the adjudications of Judges Pressley and Mackey, that there was no receiver of the road until the appointment of Mr. Conner. Instead, therefore, of classifying the bonds in accordance with the decisions of the court by whom he was instructed, he rules them out as not entitled to the protection of the first mortgage. The act of 1861 provides that "the bonds thus taken up shall stand as security to the state, and thereby give the state the lien under the first mortgage, until all the bonds thus secured by mortgage shall be retired." As I have said, Mr. Magrath never intended to retire these bonds and deprive them of the protection of the first lien. If, then, he took them up, not to retire them, not to pay them, but as an investment to save interest and meet the current expenses of the road, when he re-issued them, they went into the hands of the purchasers clothed with all the protection given them in their original and first issue.

After all the learning, instructive and interesting, that has been displayed, it does seem to me, from a careful consideration of the several reports, orders, declarations and judgments made herein, that this discussion is more of an intellectual gladiatorial contest on questions of law, arising since the commence*ment of the suit, than on the law applicable to the facts at the time of the transaction. But at last the real question is, did President Magrath, who issued these bonds, and the capitalists who advanced their money on the security, regard them as first mortgage bonds? On this question we have no doubt they were so issued, so regarded, and are entitled to the protection which gave them value when put in the market. And it is adjudged that they are secured by the first mortgage. Let the decree be reformed in conformity to the principles herein announced.

Here is a motion also to dismiss the appeal of Mr. Fisher, receiver, because a copy of the exceptions was not served on the presiding judge within ten days. The points involved in the appeal having been fully argued by counsel, and the case decided, it is a matter of little consequence to the appellant, Fisher, what becomes of this motion. We have no doubt that Mr. Corbin, attorney for Mr. Fisher, agreeing to pay, and actually paying his proportion of the expenses in preparing the brief, and the cause being fully settled for argument, supposed he had done all that was necessary. But the rule is finally established in Ex parte Clyde, and cannot be departed from.

The appeal of Fisher, receiver, is dismissed.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

SIMPSON, C. J., dissenting. The majority of the court has reached the conclusion, in this case, that the bonds in question, upon their re-issue, retained the security of the mortgage by which they were secured in their first issue, and, this being the first mortgage, that therefore these bonds should rank as first mortgage bonds in the distribution of the assets of the company.

Being unable to concur in this opinion, I have dissented, and now propose to state briefly the reasons of my dissent.

The argument of the majority is, that the president and directors of the road became receivers under the order of Judge Melton, of June, 1872; that, as such receivers, they had the legal right to invest their receipts from the income of the road, in such securities as they saw proper; that these bonds were taken in by them as such investment; and being investments, *the receivers had the right to re-issue them afterward without disturbing the security of the first mortgage. This conclusion is based upon the position that these officers were receivers. Even if this was so, I do not see that it follows, necessarily, that they had the power to re-issue these bonds, with all their original incidents and surroundings, after once called in. But I am not satisfied that Judge Melton's order constituted these officers receivers in the strict sense of that term.

It is true that Judge Pressley thus construed this order upon the Circuit, and so has Judge Mackey; and now a majority of the court has so construed it. In the face of the concurring opinion of so many eminent jurists, of course I differ with great hesitation and doubt; but still I do differ, and I must follow my own judgment.

The question at issue is as to the intent of the order. Did Judge Melton intend to make these officers receivers?

The term "receiver" is a technical term, and has a well-defined legal meaning, and, when used in an order, carries with it a plain and well-understood signification. Besides this, the duties belonging to the office, which the term imports, are also well understood, so much so that the mere appointment of a party as receiver, when the term itself is used in the appointment, at once defines his duties without more. Such being the fact, it seems probable that had Judge Melton intended to divest the president and directors of this company of their powers as officials of the road and invest them with the new power of a receiver, he would have so ordered, in plain and unambiguous terms; he would not have left the matter to construction, but would have used the precise and apt words to that end. This seems so reasonable that his failure to do so can hardly be accounted for on the ground that it was accidental, or that it occurred from inadvertence. It is more reasonable to suppose that it was intentional.

I venture the assertion that no order can be found in the history of judicial proceedings in which a receiver has been appointed where this term has been omitted. No such term is used in this order, nor has there been employed any term equivalent to this. And, although the prominent prayer of the complaint was for the appointment of a receiver, this term seems to have *been carefully avoided in the order. Besides, the order is defective in other particulars as an order constituting a receiver in a large and extensive insolvent corporation with millions of assets. No bond is demanded; no inventory of the property and assets required, and no assignment by the company of this property to these receivers is directed.

The order was a consent order, and my construction of it is that the parties agreed that the property, as a temporary arrangement, should be left under the control and management of the present officers of the company until the further hearing of the cause. In the meantime the creditors to be restrained from interfering with the running of the road—the appointing of a receiver to be left to some future stage of the proceedings. And this order was intended to carry out this assent and understanding of the parties.

This construction is sustained by the further fact that it is very unusual for the president and directors, as president and directors of an insolvent company, to be appointed receivers of the property and assets of the company pending the litigation. In fact, I doubt whether a case can be found where such officers, as individuals and by name, much less as company officials, have been appointed. Mr. High is emphatic in his condemnation of such a practice. The president and directors of a company are officers of the company, elected or appointed by the company, and under its control. The appointment of such officials, in their official character, would be the same as appointing the defendant company itself. And I do not suppose that there ever has been an instance, unless this be one, where the defendant has been appointed the receiver of the property in litigation. High on Receivers, § 72.

But, admitting that this order of Judge Melton did constitute these company officials in their official capacity receivers, does it follow that they have the power to buy up the bonds of the company with company funds, and subsequently put them out again subject to the protection and security of such mortgage, if any, by which they were secured in their first issue?

It will be admitted, I suppose, without question, that no *debtor could do this, whether he be an individual or a corporation, where the rights of other creditors are involved.

The application by a debtor of his own funds to his own debts, whether evidenced by notes or bonds, will inevitably extinguish the debt. There can be no such thing as a debtor being the assignee of his own indebtedness in such way as to keep his debt alive to himself against himself. In every contract there must be, at least, two parties.

True, either an individual or a corporation might re-issue his negotiable notes or his bonds, although once taken up and extinguished, but this would be done, not by virtue of any life still existing in such instruments, but by virtue of a new vitality imparted by the new contract of re-issue, and the paper would go forth the second time not as the old paper, but as an original instrument, discharged from all of its former incidents and accompanied with such only as the new contract might attach to it. No authority is needed to support this proposition; it springs from well-known elementary principles.

Now, apply this doctrine to the case at bar.

It is not claimed that the receivers used any other funds in the purchase of these bonds except company funds. Here, then, is the application of the debtor's money to the debtor's debts, not by the debtor's own act in person, it is true, but by the hands of another. This, however, can make no difference, as it is not the medium through which the application of the funds of the debtor is made which extinguishes the debt, but it is the fact that his money has been used.

Besides, could these receivers, had they kept possession of these bonds until final settlement, have presented them against this insolvent company as subsisting obligations and claimed the amount which their assignees are now doing, the full amount due thereon? Could they have instituted action against themselves to enforce payment? They might have held them and obtained, on final settlement of their accounts, credit for the sum paid out by them, but no more. The bonds, while in their hands, were certainly extinct as against the company.

If this was so, even for a moment, was not the mortgage dis*charged to that extent? and, if discharged, who had the power of re-opening this mortgage and of reinstating these bonds at their full value to the prejudice of other creditors?

My opinion is that when these bonds were taken up by the funds of the debtor they were extinguished, and the mortgage was discharged to that extent.

And this, whether the order of 1872, constituted the president and directors receivers or not.

Decree reserved.

(Case No. 1046.)

Ex parte MACKEY.

[1. Mandamus ⇐187.]

An order of the Circuit Court refusing to grant a writ of mandamus, is appealable.

[2. Mandamus ⇐16.]

The Circuit judge refused to grant a writ of mandamus to compel a county board of election canvassers, then in session, to count the votes in a certain box; the board, which, by law, could not remain in existence for more than ten days, ceased to exist before petitioners brought their case by appeal to this court. Held, that no order made in the case by this court could accomplish the purpose desired, and, therefore, no writ of mandamus should be ordered to issue.

Under the election laws of this state the duties of the board of county canvassers are so far ministerial that they may be enforced by writ of mandamus when no other remedy exists, but where, as in case of county officers, appeal lies to the state board of canvassers, whose powers are revisory and judicial, such other remedy does exist, and mandamus cannot issue.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in State ex rel. Myers v. Appleby, 25 S. C. 102; State ex rel. v. Charleston Light & Water Co., 68 S. C. 552, 47 S. E. 979.

[4. Mandamus ⇐3.]

In cases of election for member of congress, the state board of canvassers acts ministerially and are excluded by the terms of the statute from revisory and judicial powers, and the power of congress to judge of the election returns of its members, does not constitute another remedy within the meaning of the rule. Therefore, in such case, mandamus to the county board is a proper remedy.

*These were petitions by E. W. M. Mackey, and the other parties mentioned in the opinion of this court, presented to Judge Wallace, then holding the Circuit Court in Charleston, for writs of mandamus to compel E. L. Roche, T. W. Carwile and H. J. McCormack to count the votes at "Brick Church" and "Ten Mile Mill" precincts. Judge Wallace granted an order in each case, on November 10th, 1880, requiring the defendants to show cause before him, at chambers, on the next day, why a writ of mandamus should not issue. Upon hearing the return the rule was discharged. The relators gave notice of appeal on November 16th. The opinion states the case.

Mr. D. T. Corbin, for appellant.

The petitioners were entitled to the writ of mandamus as a remedy for the wrongs complained of. Under the statute, the duty of the election commissioners was to count the votes and make a statement of the result of such count. Gen. Stat., ch. VIII., §§ 16, 18. There is no discretion given to them. McCrary on Elect., §§ 81–85; 1 S. C. 46. The parties complaining of such result have their remedy elsewhere. 4 S. C. 504. The board of canvassers are not to make a statement of the election, but a statement, or record, of the count. Here is a plain legal duty, and no discretion. Mandamus is, therefore, the proper remedy. Moses on Mand. 14, 90; Wood on Mand. 76, 77; McCrary on Elect., §§ 320, 331; Bright. Elect. Cas. 300, and note; 1 S. C. 40; 4 S. C. 232, 472, 506; 5 S. C. 264; 6 S. C. 128; 7 S. C. 258, 282, 376; 8 S. C. 377. The writ should not be refused because there is another remedy, unless it is as effectual, plain and speedy. 1 Cranch 169; Wood on Mand. 84, 89, 109. The true test seems to be, would the party, by the use of the other remedy, be in as good a position? Id. 68, 77, 114. If petitioners go to the state board of canvassers they go as defeated candidates and as actors. The state board can change the report only when there is a protest, and not then, if the power to decide resides in some other body. The petitioner, Mackey, has no remedy by appeal to the state board. 8 S. C. 377.

The state board, in its ten days of existence, cannot properly *hear and determine, therefore the necessity of this writ to compel the county board to do their duty.

Mr. C. R. Miles, contra.

The appeal should be dismissed, because the writ now would be nugatory, vain and useless, as the county board have, since the decision of Judge Wallace, adjourned sine die, so far, at least, as the general election of 1880 is concerned. Tapping on Mand. 15, 402; Moses on Mand. 88; Wood on Mand. 18, 89; 72 E. C. L. 199, 874; 6 E. L. & E. 228; 7 Rich. 234; 4 S. C. 185; Cooley on Const. Lim. 785. The state board have also decided, and adjourned sine die. The only object of appeal, then, must be to get an opinion here for use elsewhere, which should not be. Tapping on Mand. 16.

But the order was right. If the duties of the county board are not purely ministerial, but are, to any extent, judicial or quasi judicial, then it is clear that the writ of mandamus should not have been issued to compel them to do what, "upon consideration" and in the exercise of that discretion, they had "determined" they could not lawfully do. Tapping on Mand. 12; Moses on Mand. 36; McCrary on Elect., § 86. Cases cited by appellant are based upon the construction given to statutes, which, unlike the law here, limit the powers of election boards to mere ministerial duties. The powers of county boards, under our statute, have been considered by our Supreme Court. 4 S. C. 485; 5 S. C. 263; 7 S. C. 241. These cases decide that the county boards have the right and power to scrutinize, examine, determine and declare. These functions imply the exercise of discretion, are judicial, and cannot be controlled by mandamus.

Mr. J. P. K. Bryan, same side.

The remedy by mandamus is inapplicable, because petitioners had another plain and adequate remedy. High on Ex. Leg. Rem. 15, 18; 29 Wis. 79. These petitioners had another adequate remedy by appeal to the state board of canvassers, and this remedy they invoked and succeeded to the extent of gaining twenty-five hundred votes. This is plain as to the county officers. As to member of congress, he has the same plain and ade*quate remedy by protest and contest to the United States house of representatives. This matter being regulated by statute law of the United States, the state could not give relief. Besides the official returns of supervisors, United States officials, are sent to the congress. Rev. Stat. U. S., §§ 2018-2020.

July 1st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. At the general state election, November 2d, 1880, the petitioners were candidates for office, viz., E. W. M. Mackey for congress in the second congressional district in the state, of which Charleston county is a part, and the others for the county offices of Charleston county, that is to say, John H. Ostendorff for the office of clerk of the Court of Common Pleas and General Sessions, Lewis Dunneman for that of sheriff, Warren R. Marshall for that of judge of probate, William H. Thompson for coroner, and Garrett Byrns, Renty K. Washington and A. E. Philippy for the offices of county commissioners of Charleston county. These parties on November 10th, 1880, jointly filed in the Court of Common Pleas the two petitions stated in the caption for writs of mandamus against the defendants as commissioners of election for the county of Charleston; the first to require the commissioners to canvass and count the votes cast at what was known as the "Ten Mile Hill" precinct of St. James, Goose Creek, and the other to canvass and count the votes cast at the "Brick Church" precinct, St. Andrews.

The allegations of the petitioners and the defence of the commissioners are the same in both cases, and we will therefore consider them together. The petitioners, among other things, state that "your petitioners, on information and belief, say that said commissioners of election, Edward L. Roche, Thomas W. Carwile and H. J. McCormack, disregarding their plain legal duty therein, have refused, though requested so to do, to canvass and count the votes cast and canvassed at said precinct, and duly returned to them, and have excluded and intend unlawfully to exclude from the aggregate vote of said county the said votes cast, canvassed and returned at said precinct. That irreparable injury is done your petitioners by said election commissioners by their said refusal to canvass and make proper statement of the *votes cast at said precinct, and your petitioners are remediless in the premises unless granted to them through the writ of mandamus. And your petitioners therefore pray that a writ of mandamus do issue, directed to said Edward L. Roche, Thomas W. Carwile and H. J. McCormack, commissioners of election for Charleston county, ordering and directing them, said commissioners of election, to proceed to count the votes cast at said precinct, and to include them in the count of votes for said county, cast at said general election, and to make such statement thereof in connection with the other votes cast in the said county as the nature of the election requires."

The defendants made return that "in pursuance of law they have duly organized themselves into a board of county canvassers, and as such board are now engaged in the performance of their legal functions, and as such board they have made a statement of the election held at the said precinct, such as the nature of the election requires. That upon consideration of the returns from the said precinct, and upon consideration of the sworn statements of the managers of the said precinct and others, that the said election at the said precinct was held by the said managers under duress and intimidation, and that violence and threats of violence and intimidation and overawing and terrorizing of voters at said polls and precinct, prevailed to such an extent as to prevent a full, free and fair exercise of the right to vote thereat, and these respondents sitting as a board of county canvassers, upon due consideration of the same, have determined that the said election at the said precinct was illegal and unlawful and void, and that they cannot lawfully include said votes cast at said precinct in the legally cast votes of the said county, and they have not so included them. But these respondents, in pursuance of law, have made a full and complete statement of the said circumstances as required by law, and intend to send and are about to send the statement, together with the statements of the managers at said precinct as aforesaid, and all papers relating to the said election at said precinct, and all protests thereof, to the governor and secretary of state and others, as required by law. And they further submit that the writ of mandamus, as prayed, is not issuable to them in the premises," &c.

*The petitioners replied, denying that violence and threats of violence and intimidation existed at said precincts "to such extent as to prevent a full, free and fair exercise of the right to vote thereat," &c.

The application for the writ was made to Judge Wallace, sitting for Charleston, who refused it. The board of county canvassers, as indicated in their return, transmitted to the board of state canvassers the ballot boxes and papers connected with the election at the several precincts where the votes had not been counted by them, accompanied by the protests of the petitioners, and a special statement of the facts in relation to the several precincts, and the affidavits and papers filed, together with their reasons for not counting the same. It seems that the petitioners appeared before the state canvassers and urged their protests, which board took action on the matter as shown by the following result:

"Resolved, That this board overrules the action of the county board of canvassers as to the 'Haut Gap' box, and accepts and acts upon the secondary evidence as to its contents as adduced before this board; and that it accepts and will act upon the messenger's statements as to the 'Black Oak' box; and that there has been nothing adduced before this board to cause it to change the action of the board of county canvassers as to the following boxes, to wit: Calamus Pond, Ten Mile Hill, Strawberry precinct, Biggin Church, Brick Church, St. Andrews, and Enterprize, Wadmalaw."

After this action of the state board of canvassers as to counting the votes the petitioners prosecuted this appeal as to so much of Judge Wallace's order as refused the motion for mandamus in relation to the boxes at "the Ten Mile Hill" and "Brick Church," upon the following exceptions:

"First. That it was error to refuse said writ of mandamus; that the same should have been granted as prayed.

"Second. That the sixteenth section of Chapter VIII. of the General Statutes defines the duty of the commissioners of election of said county when acting as a board of county canvassers.

"Third. It was error to hold that if said commissioners, acting as a board of county canvassers, decided not to count said box, the court could not compel them to proceed and count it.

*"Fourth. It was error not to have compelled said commissioners of election in this return to the rule to show cause to specifically state the facts constituting the 'duress and intimidation' of the managers at said election, and its real effect upon them, by compelling a departure from their duty as managers and the effect thereof upon the election, and also the facts constituting 'violence and threats of violence and intimidation and overawing and terrorizing of voters at said poll and precinct,' and who and how many voters were prevented from voting thereby, to the end that the court might pass upon the propriety and legality of the decision of said commissioners of election in rejecting the votes cast at said precinct."

The last exception has not been pressed here. Whether the board of county canvassers were correct in their decision as to the alleged intimidation, violence and duress at the precincts in question, was a question of fact, as to which the evidence may have been and we suppose was considered by the board of state canvassers, but it was not considered by Judge Wallace, and is not before this court.

The other three exceptions make the point that it was error in Judge Wallace to refuse the mandamus. It is sometimes said that mandamus is not a writ of right, but lies in the discretion of the court, and in granting or refusing it the court should be governed by what seems to be necessary and proper to be done in the premises for the purposes of justice. If this means that it is in the absolute discretion of the judge to grant or refuse it there could be no appealable error in the order of a judge refusing it; for to say that a matter is within the discretion of a judge is but another mode of saying that it is beyond control. But we understand the discretion here spoken of to be that defined by Lord Mansfield in Rex v. Wilkes:

"Discretion, when applied to a court of justice, means sound discretion guided by law. It must be governed by rule, not by humor; it must not be arbitrary, vague and fanciful, but legal and regular."

The object of the writ prayed for in this case was to compel the board of county canvassers for Charleston county to canvass and count the votes cast at the "Ten Mile Hill" and "Brick *Church" precincts of Charleston county in the election of 1880. That board, under the law, could not remain in existence longer than ten days, and long before the appeal from the order of the Circuit judge reached this court it had ceased to exist as an organized body, certainly so far as the election of 1880 was concerned. When that board became "functus officio" it was no longer possible to accomplish the purposes of petitioners by mandamus, whether issued by the Circuit judge sua sponte or in compliance with the judgment of this court upon appeal.

One of the fundamental rules in reference to issuing writs of mandamus is that the writ will not be issued when it would be unavailing. "Thus it is held that a mandamus should not be granted when it would be unavailing from a want of power in the defendants, for the court would refuse the writ if it was manifest that it would be void and fruitless. Thus, a mandamus to compel a board of canvassers to do certain acts after they have ceased to exist as a board, would be futile. The Supreme Court may interfere to control the actions of a board of canvassers while they exist as a board, but it can be done only while such board has a legal existence. And, when a mandamus is asked, it should appear that the defendants have it yet in their power to perform the duty required of them. Thus, a mandamus should not be issued to direct commissioners of excise to entertain the application of the petitioner after the board had met and completed the ten days prescribed in the act." Wood on Mand. 18; Tapping on Mand. 16; State v. Lehre, 7 Rich. 234; State, ex rel. Shiver, v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 185. "The court will see that the object of the mandamus is for some proper and definite purpose, and not for the gratification of mere curiosity; nor will the court grant it when sought merely to obtain the opinion of the court upon a point of law." Tapping on Mand. 16.

As there is now in existence no board of county canvassers for Charleston county to canvass and count the votes cast in the election of 1880, no decision that this court can make will have the effect of accomplishing the purpose of petitioners. If this were an application in the original jurisdiction of this court it would undoubtedly be proper to refuse it. But as the application was *made in the court below, whilst the board of county canvassers were in organized existence, it may not be improper for us to consider whether the Circuit judge erred, as alleged, in refusing to issue the writ. The question is important in its relation to the electoral franchise and the purity of the ballot-box, so necessary in a republican government, which must take its character from that of the electors as certainly as the stream is affected by its source.

The question, then, is whether the Circuit judge erred in refusing to issue the mandamus to compel the county board of canvassers for Charleston to count the votes in the two boxes, notwithstanding the board had declined to do so for the reasons stated. A writ of mandamus is the highest judicial writ known to the constitution and laws, and, according to the long-approved and well-established authorities, only issues in cases where there is a specific legal right to be enforced, or where there is a positive duty to be performed, which can be performed, and where there is no other specific remedy; "where the legal right is doubtful, or where the performance of the duty rests in discretion, or where there is other adequate remedy, a writ of mandamus cannot rightfully issue. High on Ex. Leg. Rem., § 9; Wood on Mand. 68, and many authorities.

Without stopping to inquire whether the first prerequisite exists, and the petitioners have a clear and undoubted right, we will consider—

1. Whether the duties of canvassing boards in this state are discretionary, so as to place them beyond the reach of mandamus, or merely ministerial.

This question must be determined by the statute law upon the subject. It is said in McCrary on Elections 106, 107: "That the doctrine that canvassing boards and return judges are ministerial officers, possessing no discretionary or judicial powers, is settled in nearly or quite all the states. * * * There are statutes in some of the states which expressly confer upon a board of canvassing officers the power to revise the returns of an election, to take proof, and in their discretion to reject such votes as they deem illegal. Such a statute exists in Texas, (Gidding v. Clark, 42d Congress), and in Alabama, (Norris v. Handly, Id.), and in Louisiana and Florida. Although this is an extraordinary and *a dangerous power when placed in the hands of a board of this character with such inadequate facilities for obtaining legal evidence and deciding upon questions of fraud, yet it seems such statutes are not unconstitutional," &c.

The learned author does not undertake to construe the statute of South Carolina.

The laws of force in this state down to 1868 undoubtedly gave the board of managers of elections quasi-judicial powers in the words "to hear and determine the validity of the election." But in 1868 a new system was adopted, of which the following are important provisions relating to "the manner of conducting elections and returning votes." Gen. Stat. 31:

"Section 14. The commissioners of election shall meet at the county seat, as prescribed in the last preceding section, and shall proceed to organize, and shall form the county board of canvassers.

"Section 16. They shall then proceed to count the votes of the county, and shall make such statements thereof as the nature of the election shall require, within ten days of the time of their first meeting as a board of county canvassers, and shall transmit to the board of state canvassers any protest and all papers relating to the election, &c.

"Section 18. They shall make separate statements of the whole number of votes given in such county for representatives in congress, and separate statements of all other votes given for other officers, &c.

"Section 20. After the final adjournment of the board of county canvassers, and within the time prescribed by Section 15 of this chapter, the chairman of the board shall deposit in the nearest post-office, directed to the governor, secretary of state, [and formerly the comptroller-general], each, one of the certified copies of the statement and certificate of votes prepared as provided in the last preceding section.

"Section 26. Upon such statements they [the board of state canvassers] shall then proceed to determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices or either of them. They shall have power, and it is made their duty, to decide all cases under protest or contest that may *arise, when the power to do so does not, by the constitution, reside in some other body," &c.

It thus appears that the existing law establishes a system for ascertaining and declaring the result of elections, in which there are two boards, each with its proper functions—the county board to count the votes returned by the managers at the different precincts; make such statements thereof as the nature of the election shall require, and transmit to the state board any protest and all papers relating to the election; and then the state board of canvassers, who are required to meet, under the call of the secretary of state, for the purpose of canvassing the votes for all officers voted for at such election, make a statement of the whole number of votes given at such election, &c., and upon such statements shall then "proceed to determine and declare what persons have been, by the greatest number of votes, duly elected to such offices," &c. It seems that in this system the state board of canvassers is the tribunal of last resort, and that as to all matters pertaining to elections its decision is final, from which there is no appeal. The use of the word "canvassers" as to both boards seems to indicate something more than ministerial powers. In the case of State v. Nerland, 7 S. C. 246, Chief Justice Moses said: "The term [canvassers] employed to designate the duty to be performed by the commissioners would seem to impose an obligation beyond that of merely counting the ballots and comparing the statement of managers. 'Canvassing' implies 'search,' 'scrutiny,' 'investigation,' 'examination,'" &c.

It seems to us, however, that the duties of the county board to count the votes, make statements and transmit the papers, protests, &c., are so far ministerial in their character as to be liable, if they stood alone and had no reference to the state board, to be enforced by the writ of mandamus. But that board is only a part of the machinery provided to declare the result of elections, and is required to transmit all papers and protests concerning the elections to the state board of canvassers. State v. Chairman County Canvassers, 4 S. C. 485. On the contrary, the duties of the board of state canvassers, in all cases of contest and protest, are clearly revisory and judicial, and beyond the reach *of mandamus. The words are, "shall then proceed to determine and declare what persons have been duly elected, &c. They shall have power, and it is made their duty, to decide all cases under protest or contest that may arise," &c.

"Where boards of canvassers are empowered with the exercise of judicial functions, and the whole question of the election, being authorized not only to perform the ordinary duties of canvassers, but also to hear and determine all contested elections, and no appeal lies from their decision, the courts will refuse to interfere by mandamus with the exercise of their discretion or judgment, and will regard their decision as final and conclusive." High on Ex. Leg. Rem. §§ 18, 57; Grier v. Shackelford, 2 Tread. 650; State v. Bruce, 1 Tread. 165; Mayor of Vicksburg v. Rainwater, 47 Miss. 547; Cooley on Const. Lim. 623.

The restriction in our law upon the powers of the board of state canvassers, expressed in the words "when the power to do so does not, by the constitution, reside in some other body," makes the election for congress an exception. State, ex rel. Wallace, v. Mackey and Hayne, 8 S. C. 377. As to that election, the duty of the state board of canvassers is merely ministerial. They have no right to decide a protest or contest as to the election of a member of congress; that power resides in "another body," viz., the house of representatives of congress, under Section 5, Article I., of the Constitution of the United States, which declares that "each house [congress] shall be the judge of the election returns and qualification of its own members."

2. If we assume that the duties of the county board of canvassers, considered apart from their relation to the state board, are merely ministerial in character, the next question is, whether the petitioners, at the time they made their application for mandamus, directed to that board, had other legal remedy for the grievance complained of. The purpose of a writ of mandamus is to prevent a failure of justice, and if there is other adequate remedy for the wrong complained of, it will not be granted. "From the origin, nature and purposes of the writ, it has been shown to be an extraordinary remedy, applicable only to cases where the usual and accustomed modes of procedure and forms of remedy are powerless to afford relief. It follows, therefore, *from the principles already established, as well as from the very nature and essence of the remedy itself, that the writ never lies where the party aggrieved has another adequate remedy at law by action or otherwise. And the rule will be found to be firmly established as one of the fundamental principles underlying the entire jurisdiction, that the existence of another specific legal remedy fully adequate to afford redress to the party aggrieved, presents a complete bar to relief by the extraordinary aid of a mandamus. * * * That while the above is of very ancient origin, it is not confined in its application to cases where the existing remedy relied on in bar of the jurisdiction by mandamus, is a common law remedy, but applies with equal force to cases where a particular or special remedy is provided by statute. Whenever, therefore, an express remedy is afforded by statute, plain and specific in its nature, and fully adequate to redress the grievance complained of, mandamus will not lie." High on Ex. Leg. Rem. 16, 18.

Had the petitioners such a remedy?

So far as the candidates for county officers are concerned, we think they had, and should have exhausted that remedy before applying for mandamus. The county board had no right to declare the election, and that distinguishes this case from that of State v. Acting Board of Aldermen, 1 S. C. 30, which was a special municipal election, in which the acting board of aldermen had the right to declare the election—their decision to be binding upon all parties. Here the county board had certain duties to perform, one of which was to transmit all the papers and protests to the state board, which alone had authority to decide and declare the election. This right to be heard before the state board upon all questions was not only a remedy, but the ordinary and appropriate remedy, more "plain and specific" than would have been a right to appeal from one jurisdiction to another, which has been held to be within the principle. State v. Supervisors of Sheboygan, 29 Wis. 79. In this case no formal appeal was necessary, but the papers went up, as matter of course, to the state board—the business was incomplete until that board had acted, which was to be the finishing act under the system provided for declaring the result of elections, and to obtain *which was "the usual and accustomed procedure." The legislature has expressly provided a tribunal by which the rights of petitioners could be decided. The remedy was "speedy," for it was required to be done within ten days; it was "specific," as it related to the same identical subject matter; and that it might be effectual was shown by the results in this case.

The court, in the case of State v. Walker, 5 S. C. 265, say: "Under our laws there are two bodies entrusted with power to ascertain and fix the fact of an election for state and county purposes—the one acting as a primary tribunal and the other as a revisory body. The board of county commissioners is the primary body, and the board of state canvassers is the revisory body. To say that the election fails unless a proper declaration is made by the board of state canvassers, is to destroy entirely the functions of the county board. On the other hand, to allow the board of county canvassers power to make a determination and declaration valid and conclusive, unless reviewed or modified by the revisory body, is to give to each body a distinct, important and entirely consistent function, in harmony with the methods by which we are accustomed to fix the existence of facts, on which legal rights depend."

This appellate court—the state board of canvassers—being open to redress grievances suffered in all state and county elections, the petitioners availed themselves of the remedy—appeared, contested and protested in that tribunal the matter now complained of in court. That tribunal heard the protests, and in the exercise of its discretionary powers changed the result of the election in the precincts of "Haut Gap" and "Black Oak," and, as stated at the bar, altered the returns of the county canvassers in favor of the petitioners to the amount of twenty-five hundred votes. That board has now adjourned sine die, but, during its organized existence, it was not subject to mandamus. There was no appeal and the matter is ended. It is our duty simply to declare the law, and not to consider whether it is satisfactory or wise—that belongs exclusively to the legislature.

In this connection, also, an exception must be made in regard to the election for congress. As to that election the state, as we have seen, has not given the state board of canvassers revisory *discretionary powers, but has left the matter as provided for by the constitution of the United States. Does the provision of that instrument, before cited, that "each house shall be the judge of the election returns and qualifications of its own members," constitute another remedy within the meaning of the rule? That is to say, an adequate, specific remedy, as speedy and as effectual as the writ of mandamus. We have not been referred to any case precisely in point, but, considering that the state law has not provided the alleged remedy, which is given by the constitution and laws of the United States, regarding its remoteness and the delays incident to that proceeding, and, judging from analogy, we are inclined to think that it does not afford another remedy in the sense necessary to exclude the right to mandamus. "In order to entitle a person to the writ two things must concur. First. A clear legal right to have the thing done, to compel the doing of which the writ is sought; and, second, that there is no other adequate legal remedy by which the specific performance of the duty can be enforced." Wood on Mand. 68, 84, 89, 110; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch 169 [2 L. Ed. 60].

Some confusion in the case has arisen from the fact that the petitioners—one, a candidate for congress, and all the others for county offices—filed a joint petition. As appears from what has been already said, we conceive that neither the tribunal to judge nor the manner of finally declaring the election, is the same in the two cases. If E. W. M. Mackey, candidate for congress, had filed his petition separately, praying that the mandamus might issue requiring the board of county canvassers to count the votes found in the boxes for him as a candidate for congress, we do not see in the case any conclusive reason why the writ should not have been issued as to him. He did not file a separate petition, but made common cause with the candidates for county offices, and the difference between the offices as to the manner of counting the votes and finally declaring the election, was not called to the attention of the Circuit judge. The petition was presented jointly, and, as presented, was refused. Possibly the application might, even now, be divided, but that seems unnecessary, as the result must be theoretical merely, and can now have no practical effect upon the election.

*Subject to the expression of opinion and modification herein made as to the election for congress, the judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

(Case No. 1047.)

SCAIFE v. THOMSON.

[1. Wills ⇐194.]

The doctrine of implied revocation arising from an alteration of the estate of the testator considered.

[2. Wills ⇐194.]

Revocations by reason of actual alteration of estate resulted from the principle that a will of realty was in the nature of a conveyance and could pass only the lands owned at the time of its execution; but this principle does not require such revocation where the testator died after the act of 1858 (12 Stat. 700,) which directed that after-acquired lands might pass as personal estate does.

[3. Wills ⇐194.]

A testator, seized under his father's will of a one-eighth undivided interest in certain lands and also in a mill-tract, made his will in 1845, whereby, in the ninth clause, he devised to his sister M. "my interest or legatee's part" in the certain lands, "or my part" of the mill-tract, and "$100 in property or money just as may suit my executor best;" and he declared that this property was to be M.'s "during her natural life and no longer, and at her death to be and belong to my executor and sons, this being all I desire she shall ever have of my estate." The tenth clause read: "I give, will and devise to H. and his children all the balance of my lands and all of my negroes and all the rest and residue of my estate of all kinds whatsoever, both personal and real, which I now have, or which I may hereafter own, or which I may own at the time of my death." And H. was nominated sole executor. In 1852, under proceedings in partition to which testator was a party, these lands and the mill-tract were sold at judicial sale and purchased by testator, who took deed from the officer of court. He died in 1868. Held, that the sale in 1852 did not imply an intention to revoke the devise contained in ninth clause, and that there had been no revocation of that devise.

[4. Wills ⇐578.]

Both M. and H. died before testator, and after his death the sons of H. elected that the mill-tract should pass to them under the ninth clause. Held further, that the sons of H. took between them only a one-eighth in*terest in the mill-tract, and that the remaining seven-eighths passed under the tenth clause to both sons and daughters of H.

[5. Wills ⇐441, 470, 487.]

The intent of a testator must be ascertained from the words of his will, and the circumstances by which he was surrounded at the time of its execution, and these circumstances may be proved by parol evidence. And the will must be construed as a whole.

Soon after testator's death, the four sons of H. took possession of the mill-tract, claiming it exclusively under the ninth clause of the will; proceedings were instituted the same year for the partition between the children of H. of all the lands of their father and of testator, except this mill-tract, which was in terms excluded from the prayer for partition; the eldest son sold his interest as one-fourth, to the second son, R., in 1868; the husband of one of the daughters rented this property from the sons for two or three years; the third son sold his interest as one-fourth to F., a stranger, in 1874; afterwards the fourth son died intestate, and his sisters and surviving brothers by their deed conveyed his interest, alleged to be one-fourth, to S., a stranger: R. then conveyed a one-twelfth interest each, to F. and S.; R., F. and S. erected valuable improvements. Held, that there being nothing in this case in the nature of a family arrangement, none of these acts, done while the daughters were silent but ignorant of their rights, estopped them from asserting their claim to a share in the mill-tract, except to the one-fourth which they had sold to S.

[7. Limitation of Actions ⟸102.]

R. being guardian of one of his sisters could assert no adverse claim to this mill-tract as against her, until this relationship terminated; and there could be no adverse claim against any of the co-tenants unless the claim was adverse to all.

[8. Partition ⟸86.]

The Court of Equity has the right to decree rents and profits in partition, independently of the statute of 4 and 5 Anne, c. 16, § 27, (2 Stat. 438,) nor does the repeal of this statute, which authorized a particular form of action, prevent an action under the forms of the code of procedure, for enforcing a claim for rent. But all parties here having acted under a common mistake, the accounting was restricted to the commencement of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 247–249, 252; Dec. Dig. ⟸86.]

[9. Improvements ⟸1.]

Improvements having been put upon this property by R., F. and S. under the honest conviction of exclusive ownership, they are not liable for such rents and profits as are due to the improvements; and in making the partition, the portion improved should be assigned to R., F. and S. without any estimate of the value of the improvements, or, if sold, they should be allowed out of the proceeds of sale, in addition to their shares, the enhancement in price caused by the improvements.

Before Wallace, J., Union, April, 1880.

Action by M. F. Scaife, M. E. Nowell and E. E. Mills against J. S. R. Thomson, Wade

Fowler, J. C. Spears, and H. H. *Thomson, administrator with the will annexed of J. Waddy Thomson, deceased, begun September 1st, 1879. To the full statement contained in the opinion it will be proper to add only the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

I regret that for want of time I will not be able to give the reasons fully that have governed my conclusions in this case. I desire to say at the outset that I am entirely satisfied from the evidence that throughout the entire transactions involved in this proceeding, there has been no intentional wrong-doing. That the parties have acted throughout upon an honest, though perhaps an erroneous conviction of their legal right. That there has been no intentional misrepresentation, concealment, imposition, or abuse of confidence.

The leading questions in the case arise upon the construction of the ninth and tenth clauses of the will of J. Waddy Thomson. The will was executed in 1845. At that time the testator was entitled under his father's will to one-eighth of the mill-tract.

In disposing of a large estate by his will, and in the ninth clause thereof, he devises to his sister, M. Caroline Thomson, for life, with remainder to his brother, H. H. Thomson, and his sons, in fee, his part of the mill-tract, and $100, with the right to take another piece of property in lieu of the mill-tract, if his sister should so elect, and then proceeds to say that this was all of his estate he desired his sister to have. The tenth clause of the will gives and devises all of his property that he might afterwards acquire and hold at his death, and that had not been disposed of in the preceding clauses of his will, to his brother, H. H. Thomson, and his children. After the execution of his will, testator acquired the whole of the mill-tract upon a sale for partition among the legatees of his father's will. I am of the opinion that the sale in partition and purchase by the testator of the entire property known as the Mill-Tract, did not operate to revoke the ninth clause of the will. I have not time to state the reasons and authority for this opinion. M. Caroline Thomson died before the testator, as did his brother, H. H. Thomson. Whatever interest, therefore, they took under the ninth clause of the will, devolved upon the sons of H. H. Thomson. The testator died in 1868. What do the sons take *under the ninth clause? They exercised the right of election given by the will to M. Caroline Thomson, and elected to take the interest conveyed by the will in the mill-tract. Now what interest in that tract did the will convey? Since the A. A. in 1858, the will speaks as if executed at the death of testator, and property acquired after the time at which the will was actually executed, passes under the will, if there are words in the will that cover it, and a contrary intention does not appear. In the first place the testator uses the words, "my part," which, of course, mean less than the whole, and at that time he had a vested interest in one-eighth of the whole. But if the words, "my part," could be construed to mean the whole at death of testator, do not the words added to the bequest of testator to his sister—"this being all I desire she shall have of my estate"—prevent such construction and limit the device to one-eighth of the whole? I am of the opinion, therefore, that the sons took under the ninth clause one-eighth of the mill-tract, and that the remaining seven-eighths passed under the tenth clause to the children of H. H. Thomson. Upon the death of the testator, H. H. Thomson (the younger) administered upon testator's estate, with the will annexed, and took legal advice as to the rights of the legatees under the will. He was advised that the sons took under the will the whole of the mill-tract. There being other lands devised by the will to the children of H. H. Thomson, and some of these being minors, proceedings were filed in the Probate Court for the partition. In the petition for partition, it is set out that the mill-tract is devised to the sons, and no partition of that tract is asked for. This was in December, 1868. The partition was ordered and made of the other lands of testator, and no order made as to the mill-tract. There were four brothers and three sisters. Each brother supposed, and such was the legal advice, that he was entitled to one-fourth of the mill-tract. In December, 1868, H. H. Thomson sold and conveyed to J. S. R. Thomson, one-fourth, his supposed interest in the mill-tract. J. S. R. Thomson in his own right, and as guardian of his infant brothers, Lewis and Waddy Thomson, leased the mill-tract to H. F. Scaife, husband of Mrs. Mary Scaife, who is one of the children of H. H. Thomson, deceased, with the knowledge of all the children of H. H.

*Thomson, deceased. At this time, Mrs. Nowell and Mrs. Mills, plaintiffs herein, were minors. J. S. R. Thomson was guardian of Mrs. Nowell, and Henry H. Thomson was guardian of Mrs. Mills. Mrs. Scaife was of full age. Mrs. Nowell attained her majority in February, 1870; Mrs. Mills attained her majority in April, 1872. Mrs. Scaife took possession of the mill-tract under the lease, and resided there several years. In the meantime W. Waddy Thomson sold and conveyed one-fourth of the mill-tract to Dr. Wade Fowler. Lewis, before arriving at full age, died, and his estate was partitioned among his brothers and sisters. His interest in the mill-tract, supposed to be one-fourth, was sold and conveyed by all the children to J. C. Spears. J. S. R. Thomson, supposing he held one-fourth under the will and one-fourth under the deed of his brother, H. H. Thomson, conveyed one-twelfth to Dr. Wade Fowler, and one-twelfth to J. C. Spears; the object being that J. S. R. Thomson, J. C. Spears and Dr. Wade Fowler should each own one-third of the property. Upon this state of facts, J. S. R. Thomson pleads the statute of limitations as a bar to the recovery from him of that part conveyed to him by his brother, H. H. Thomson. I am of the opinion that the facts make out a case of adverse possession by J. S. R. Thomson, and that the same facts make out a case of ouster against his cotenants, the plaintiffs in the case. But he could not acquire a title to the interest of his ward, Mrs. Nowell, in the fourth he bought from H. H. Thomson under the statute of limitations. The statute did not run against her on account of the fiduciary relation between her and J. S. R. Thomson. This, however, will not, as in cases of minorities, protect the other sisters, to whom he sustained no such relation. Mrs. Scaife was of full age, with the power to sue, when the possession began, and the statute is a bar to her claim as against the one-fourth under consideration unless prevented by the minority of Mrs. Mills. The adverse possession began in January, 1868. Mrs. Mills attained her majority in April, 1872. The full ten years had run out before the commencement of this action—for more than five years of which Mrs. Mills was not under disability that prevented her from suing. I am of the opinion, therefore, as to the one-fourth conveyed to J. S. R. Thomson by H. H.

Thom*son, the claims of Mrs. Scaife and Mrs. Mills are barred, and that Mrs. Nowell is not, and that J. S. R. Thomson must account to Mrs. Nowell for her interest in that fourth. As to the fourth held by J. S. R. Thomson under a supposed devise, he waives all benefit from the statute of limitations, and must therefore account to the other parties in interest in proportion to their interest as ascertained by the principles of this decree. All the children of H. H. Thomson, deceased, having conveyed one-fourth to J. C. Spears, he of course has a good title to that extent. He also purchased one-twelfth from J. S. R. Thomson. At the time of this conveyance J. S. R. Thomson held a devise of one-fourth of one-eighth and one-seventh of seven-eighths. He held at the same time his brother Henry's deed for what his brother had the right to convey, which was precisely the same interest that J. S. R. Thomson held under the will of J. W. Thomson. To this extent Spears is protected in the purchase of the one-twelfth from J. S. R. Thomson. Dr. Wade Fowler holds a conveyance of one-fourth from W. Waddy Thomson, and a conveyance of one-twelfth from J. S. R. Thomson. The statute of limitations at the time of the conveyance had not matured W. Waddy Thomson's right to convey, nor have the ten years run out since Fowler bought. He nor Spears pleads the statute. He, also, as Spears, bought one-twelfth from J. S. R. Thomson. His deed from Waddy Thomson only conveyed to him Waddy's share as one of the brothers, and for the balance he must account to the legatees under the will according to the principles of this decree. As to the one-twelfth conveyed to him by J. S. R. Thomson, he is protected as Spears is and according to the dates of his deed from J. S. R. Thomson, whether prior or subsequent to Spears, deed from J. S. R. Thomson.

I am of the opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to an account of the rents and profits in proportion to their interests in the property, for a period beginning four years before the commencement of this action. It is true that under the common law a co-tenant had no right of action against his co-tenants for rents and profits. The English statute 4 and 5 Anne, c. 15, 16, gave this right of action. That statute, once of force in this state, was repealed in the revised statutes. But our Court of Equity, in

*Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 326, says: "It seems to be just that while we afford relief to tenants in common beyond the operation of the statute of Anne," &c. The amount of the rents and profits, however, must be ascertained with reference to the state of the property at the time defendants went into possession. The defendants have expended large sums in improvements. The plaintiffs are not required to account for any part of this expense, and, of course, are not entitled to share in the increased profits therefrom before the partition of the property. Thompson v. Bostick, McM. Eq. 75; Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 314. I have not been able to see anything in the testimony that would operate to estop the plaintiffs.

It is ordered and decreed that a writ of partition be issued to divide the mill-tract among the parties according to the principles of this decree.

It is also ordered that it be referred to D. A. Townsend, Esq., to take an account of the rents and profits, according to the opinions herein expressed.

Thereupon the defendants, H. H. Thomson and J. S. R. Thomson, duly served and filed the following notice and grounds of appeal, to wit:

1. For that his Honor has held that under the tenth clause of the will of the testator, the interest of the testator in the mill-tract, acquired subsequently to the date of the will, passed to the children of H. H. Thomson, deceased. Whereas his Honor should have held that said mill-tract went, under the ninth clause of the will, to the sons of said H. H. Thomson.

2. For that his Honor has erred in not holding that the statute of limitations was a bar, so far as the same was pleaded, as well to the claim of the plaintiff, Mrs. Nowell, as of the other plaintiffs.

3. For that his Honor should have held that the defendant, J. S. R. Thomson, was protected by the bar of the statute of limitations as to one-fourth part of the mill-tract.

4. For that his Honor has decided that the defendants are not entitled in the partition and accounting to the value of improve*ments put upon the property by them. Whereas his Honor should have held the reverse.

5. For that his Honor has erred in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to any account for rents and profits of the mill-tract, whereas he should have held the contrary.

6. For that his Honor erred in holding that Mrs. Scaife and Mrs. Mills are entitled each to an undivided two-thirty-seconds part, and Mrs. Nowell to an undivided three-thirty-seconds part in said mill-tract.

7. For that his Honor should have dismissed the complaint as to each and all of the defendants.

8. Because his Honor did not hold that the defendants now in possession of the land, should be allowed credit in the partition for the improvements made upon the property by them, or those under whom they claim, to the extent of the enhanced value of the property by reason of the improvements.

9. Because his Honor, by the decree, debarred said defendants and each of them in this or any other proceeding from obtaining any compensation whatever, for the improvements upon said lands put there by them, or those under whom they claim.

The defendants, Wade Fowler and J. C. Spears, duly served and filed the following notice and grounds of appeal, to wit:

1. For that his Honor, Judge Wallace, held that under the ninth clause of the will of Waddy Thomson, the sons of H. H. Thomson took only the one-eighth interest in the mill-tract of land which testator owned at the time he executed his will.

2. For that his Honor did not hold that the plaintiffs were estopped, as far as their claims against these defendants are concerned—

First. By the proceedings in partition in 1868; or, second, by their long acquiescence in the right claimed by their brothers to the whole of the mill-tract; or, third, by the implication of the deed to Joshua C. Spears, that the brothers owned the entire interest in the whole of the mill-tract; or, fourth, by all the transactions and circumstances taken together amounting to a family settlement or agreement.

3. For that his Honor did not hold that the defendants having *paid a full price for the land, expended much money in improvements thereon, relying upon the acquiescence, acts, and assumptions and acknowledgments of rights of the plaintiffs, that their brothers took the entire interest in the mill-tract under the will, whatever might be the plaintiffs' rights as to their brothers, these defendants could not be made to suffer from the mistake of the plaintiffs, or their over-confidence in their brothers.

4. For that his Honor held that the plaintiffs were entitled to an accounting for rents and profits in the land.

5. For that his Honor did not decree that the defendants should be allowed a rebate or set-off to the extent of the value of the improvements or betterments made by them upon the land.

The plaintiffs also duly served and filed their notice of appeal and exceptions, alleging that his Honor erred:

1. In holding that the sale of the land in dispute in 1852 for partition between the heirs of Richard Thomson, deceased, did not operate as a revocation of the ninth clause of the will of Joseph W. Thomson, deceased.

2. In holding that the facts of the case make out a case of adverse possession by J. S. R. Thomson, and that the same facts make out a case of ouster against his cotenants, the plaintiffs in this case.

3. In holding that the interests of the plaintiffs, Mary F. Scaife and Eugenia E. Mills, in the one-fourth of the said land purchased by J. S. R. Thomson from H. H. Thomson, was barred by the statute of limitations.

4. In holding that the plaintiffs were not entitled to an account of the rents and profits for a longer period than four years before the commencement of this action.

5. In holding that the rights of any of the plaintiffs are in any manner barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. E. H. Bobo, for plaintiffs.

It is conceded that under the act of 1858, the after-acquired lands of testator pass under the will. Does the land in dispute pass under the ninth or tenth clause? The intention, as inter*preted by the state of affairs at the date of the will, must govern. 14 How. 399; 2 Strob. Eq. 272; Rich. Eq. Cas. 294. And the will must be construed as a whole. 2 S. C. 517; 5 Rich. Eq. 322; 8 Cranch 66; 1 Jarm. on Wills (5th Am. ed.) 604, note 4, 605, 606. The ninth clause here is restrictive, and the tenth clause requires the after-acquired part to pass to the children. 10 S. C. 414; 2 Strob. Eq. 272; Rich. Eq. Cas. 294; 33 N. Y. 558; 1 Redf. on Wills 390.

The sale under the partition proceedings in 1852 operated as a revocation of the ninth clause. 4 Kent 528–531; 7 Johns. Ch. 258; 14 How. 396; 14 Ves. 584; 9 Dana 25; 5 Ves. 654; 1 Roll. Abr. 615; 3 Lev. 108.

H. H. Thomson was administrator cum testamento annexo, and also guardian of Mrs. Mills until 1872, and being thus trustee his conveyance of more than his real share operated as a fraud, and the statute of limitations does not bar this action. 1 S. C. 337; 6 Wheat. 498; 2 Sch. & Lef. 607; 2 Desaus. 53, 233; Kerr on Fraud & M. 150, 178, 183. J. S. R. An adverse possession by a tenant of an undivided part of the whole premises, cannot confer a title to any part thereof, so long as the co-tenant has a clear title and right of possession to an undivided part of the same. In this case the plaintiffs had a clear right to their share of the part now owned by Fowler, and also to the part sold by J. S. R. T. 14 S. C. 180; 2 B. C. 181; 1 Washb. on Real Prop. 417; 1 Hill on Real Prop. 804, 807. There can be no adverse possession of an undivided part. 6 Rich. 67; Tyler on Eject. & Ad. Messrs. Duncan & Cleveland, for defendants Thomson.

The partition sale in 1852 did not operate as a revocation of the ninth clause. 4 Rich. Eq. 304; Freem. on Judg., § 304; 1 Wms. on Ex'rs. 204, note; 1 Jarm. on Wills (5th Am. ed.) *151 and note; 4 Kent *530. And the act of 1858 confines these revocations to cases where the property is alienated at the time of the death. J. S. R. Thomson holds, by adverse possession, the part purchased by him in 1868. The saving of the statute in favor of Mrs. Nowell should not protect the others. Tyler on Eject. & Ad. Enj. 933; 1 Bail. 192. But it does not apply as to personalty. 1 Hill's Ch. 375; 2 Hill 334. Nor as to rents and profits. 4 Strob. Eq. 170. In the cases cited there was actual minority at time of action brought. But the statute cannot avail Mrs. Nowell. 4 Rich. 619. The sons of H. H. Thomson were exclusively entitled to the land in dispute, under the ninth clause of the will. Look at that clause alone. A will of real estate was in the nature of a conveyance, (2 Bl. Com. 378; 16 How. 275; 9 Rich. Eq. 133), but ambulatory, (1 Jarm. on Wills 26; 4 Kent 520); and the legal phrases will be construed as in a deed, (O'Hara on Wills 24; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 287); and words are taken strongly against testator. The ninth clause, written in 1868, would have carried the whole interest, for his part was then the whole. The act of 1858 put real property on the same footing as personal, and this ninth clause would have carried personalty. 5 Rich. 468; 1 Ves., Sr., 141; 7 Ves., 398; 2 Strob. Eq. 283. It follows that since 1858 this clause would carry the real estate there mentioned as owned at the death. Whether less or more, it was still his part. The testator knowing the act of 1858, did not republish his will. The whole will shows such intention, and it must be effectuated. 2 Redf. on Wills 486; 1 Wms. on Ex'rs 219; 1 Roper on Leg. *249. Nor is parol evidence permissible to show the interest owned at the date, for the purpose of affecting the intention. Wigram on Wills 29, 31, 53, 99; 8 Mass. 3; 5 Pick. 510; 47 Barb. 263; 1 Rich. Eq. 396. It was only the act of 1858 which permitted the after-acquired interest to pass. 9 Rich. Eq. 133. Like the codicil in 4 Rich. Eq. 260, the act of 1858 was as a republication of the will, which carried the part—the whole—then owned by testator. The following authorities sustain this view: Note to 14 Rich. Eq. 257; 1 Jarm. on Wills *327–335, and cases cited. Other tracts may have been *acquired, which would pass under the tenth clause. The quantity of interest intended cannot be affected by extrinsic evidence. Wigram on Wills 127, 170, 171; 2 Black 418; 1 Jarm. on Wills (ed. 1880) *199. Even if admissible, the general must give way to the specific devise; and now, a residuary devise of land is not specific. O'Hara on Wills 355; 1 Cush. 107; 14 Rich. Eq. 256; 2 Wms. on Ex'rs 1696; Dud. Eq. 161. Special attention is asked to Garrison v. Garrison, 29 N. J. 153, which is strikingly similar to our case.

Mr. R. Munro, on same side.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for defendants Fowler and Spears, in addition to other points discussed by other counsel, contended that the partition of 1868, the payment of rent by the husband of one of the daughters, the recitals in the assignment to Fowler and the deed to Spears, the erection of improvements, and the insolvency of Fowler's vendor, make it a case which equity will not permit to be disturbed; and that all the circumstances of the case make virtually a family agreement that the sons should take the mill-tract exclusively. Such an agreement, equity will not permit to be disturbed. 1 Ves. & B. 30; 1 Keen 683; 1 Story's Eq., §§ 113, 137, 138.

July 2d, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. J. Waddy Thomson departed this life July 5th, 1868, leaving a will bearing date September 30th, 1845. The questions raised by this appeal depend for their solution upon the proper construction of the ninth and tenth clauses of the will, which are in the following words:

"Ninthly. I give, will and devise to M. Caroline Thomson my interest or legatee's part of the Walker and Tuck bottoms, joining her lands, or my part of the mill-tract of land and mills in Union district on Thickety creek, and one hundred dollars worth in property or money, just as may suit my executor best. Now I give this property, land, &c., to my sister during her natural life and no longer, and at her death to be and belong to my ex*ecutor and sons. This being all I desire she shall ever have of my estate.

"Tenthly, I give, will and devise to Henry Hopson Thomson and his children all the balance of my lands, and all of my negroes, and all the rest and residue of my estate of all kinds whatsoever, both personal and real, which I now have, or which I may hereafter own, or which I may own at the time of my death. It is my wish and desire that he shall keep all I have here willed him, and not sell it off, but he can give or divide it as he may think best. I also request him to take special care of my old, faithful, favorite negroes, and not separate them, hereafter named."

By the last clause Henry H. Thomson was appointed executor. The life tenant, M. C. Thomson, and the executor Henry H. Thomson, both predeceased the testator. At the date of his will the testator owned an undivided one-eighth of the mill-tract—the land which is the subject matter of the present controversy—as one of the devisees under the will of his father; but subsequently, to wit, in 1852, under proceedings for partition, the mill-tract was sold and J. Waddy Thomson became the purchaser, thus acquiring a right to the remaining seven-eighths of that tract. Henry H. Thomson, the executor, at the time of his death left four sons—H. H. Thomson, J. S. R. Thomson, W. W. Thomson and R. L. Thomson—and three daughters, the plaintiffs in this action. After the death of J. Waddy Thomson the four sons went into possession of the mill-tract under a claim that it passed to them, to the exclusion of their sisters, under the ninth clause of the will, and shortly afterwards J. S. R. Thomson bought the interest of H. H. Thomson in the mill-tract and took a deed from him, dated December 5th, 1868, for an undivided one-fourth of the same. About the same time proceedings were instituted for the partition of the real estate of J. Waddy Thomson, consisting of many tracts, amongst the plaintiffs and their brothers, but the mill-tract was not only not mentioned among the tracts subject to such partition, but it was declared in the bill for partition to be the property of the brothers, and was expressly excepted in the prayer for partition. To these proceedings the plaintiffs were made parties—Mrs. Nowell and Mrs. Mills being minors at that time, by guardian ad litem, and Mrs. *Scaife and her husband consenting in writing to the partition. On May 12th, 1874, R. L. Thomson, being a minor, died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law his brothers above named, and his sisters, the plaintiffs.

On September 22d, 1874, W. W. Thomson conveyed to the defendant Fowler an undivided one-fourth interest in the mill-tract, who soon afterwards entered into negotiations with the heirs of R. L. Thomson for the purchase of his interest, which resulted in his taking an assignment from the plaintiffs and H. H. Thomson of the amount "arising from the sale of the one-fourth interest in the mill-tract belonging to the estate of R. Lewis Thomson." In this assignment it was stipulated that it was to be void in case Fowler failed to bid off the property. For some reason this assignment never took effect, and when the interest of R. L. Thomson was subsequently offered for sale at public outcry it was bid off by the defendant Spears, and on December 7th, 1874, the heirs of R. L. Thomson conveyed to him the interest of their intestate in the mill-tract, describing it as a one-fourth undivided interest. Subsequently, but at what particular time is not stated, J. S. R. Thomson, under the belief that he owned a one-half interest in the mill-tract, (one-fourth as devisee under the ninth clause of the will, and one-fourth as purchaser of the share, of his brother, H. H. Thomson,) conveyed to Fowler and Spears each a one-twelfth interest, so that J. S. R. Thomson, Fowler and Spears now claim to be the exclusive owners of the mill-tract, the share of each being one-third. These parties claim to have expended large sums of money in repairs and improvements, made, as they allege, under the belief that they were the sole owners. As has been stated the plaintiffs, Mrs. Nowell and Mrs. Mills, were minors at the time of the partition in 1868, the former not having attained the age of twenty-one years until February 14th, 1870, and the latter on April 6th, 1872. J. S. R. Thomson was the guardian of Mrs. Nowell and had a full and satisfactory settlement of his guardianship accounts with her a few days after she attained her majority.

The plaintiffs contend that by reason of the alteration of the estate, by the sale for partition in 1852 and the purchase under it by the testator, the devise in the ninth clause of the will was *revoked, and that the entire tract passed under the tenth clause, and that they are therefore each entitled to an undivided one-seventh of the mill-tract, and by this action they demand partition of the same with an account for rents and profits. The defendants, denying in toto the claim of the plaintiffs, insist that, by a proper construction of the will the entire interest in the mill-tract passed to the sons of Henry H. Thomson, to the exclusion of the daughters; and, as a further defence J. S. R. Thomson pleads the statute of limitations as a bar to the claim of the plaintiffs to the one-fourth interest bought by him from H. H. Thomson, but expressly waives the benefit of any such plea as to that portion now owned by him under the will, to wit, the one-sixth of the mill-tract. The defendants also insist that the plaintiffs are estopped by their conduct from claiming any interest in the land or the rents and profits thereof.

The Circuit judge held that the purchase by the testator at the sale for partition in 1852 did not operate as a revocation of the ninth clause of the will; that under that clause the "sons" took only one-eighth of the mill-tract, and that the remaining seven-eighths must be equally divided among all of the children of Henry H. Thomson; that J. S. R. Thomson's plea of the statute of limitations should be sustained, except as to the claim of Mrs. Nowell; that the plaintiffs can make no claim against the defendant Spears as to the one-fourth conveyed to him by the deed in which the plaintiffs joined; that the plaintiffs are entitled to an account of the rents and profits for a period beginning four years before the commencement of the action; that the defendants are not entitled to any compensation for the improvements, and that there is nothing in the testimony to estop the plaintiffs.

From this decree both parties have appealed upon various grounds, which raise the following questions: 1st. Did the purchase by the testator at the sale for partition in 1852 operate as a revocation of the ninth clause of the will? 2d. What interest did the "sons" take, under the will, in the mill-tract—the whole or only an undivided one-eighth? 3d. Is there anything in the case which will estop the plaintiffs from making any claim to the mill-tract? 4th. Should J. S. R. Thomson's plea of the statute of limitations be sustained as to all or any of the plaintiffs?

5th. *Are the defendants liable at all for rents and profits? If so, from what time? 6th. Are the defendants entitled to any compensation for improvements?

1. In considering the first question—that of revocation—we shall not attempt to follow the counsel in a detailed consideration of the numerous authorities cited, but will content ourselves with extracting from these authorities what we regard the fundamental principles established by them, and then apply these principles to the case in hand. The doctrine of implied revocation arising from an alteration of the estate of the testator, rests upon two principles. First. That where there has been such an alteration in the estate of the testator after the making of the will, as would naturally imply an intention to revoke the whole or any part of the will, such an intention will be respected and the alteration will effect a revocation either in whole or in part, as the case may be. If the testator, while being possessed of a certain estate in a particular piece of property, makes a disposition of it by will, and afterwards either parts with that estate or converts it into an estate of a different nature or quality, this, of itself, may imply an intention to revoke the devise; for the fact that he has indicated an intention to give an estate of a particular nature or quality to a particular object of bounty, does not warrant the belief that he intended an estate of a different nature for the same object of bounty. Therefore, where there has been a change made by the testator in the subject of the gift, and no change made in the will, either by codicil or simple republication, an intention to revoke may be implied by such alteration in the subject of the gift. But, secondly, the authorities cited show that even where the testator, after the making of his will, parts with the estate devised "and then takes it back by the same instrument, or by a declaration of uses, it is a revocation, because he once parted with the estate." Hence, not only where the alteration of the estate was such as to indicate an intention to revoke, but even where the alteration was such as would not imply any such intention, the rule applied, and a revocation would be implied from the simple fact of the alteration. This rested upon a second principle, that a devise was in the nature of a conveyance, and, therefore, an estate acquired after the making of the will could *not pass under it. So that if a person possessed of an estate in certain real property devised it to A, and subsequently conveyed it away, the devise would be revoked, even though he might, by the same instrument, have again acquired precisely the same kind of estate in the property which he had conveyed away; and this was because the estate which the testator held at the time of his death, though of precisely the same nature and quality as that which he had at the time his will was made, was acquired subsequently, and, therefore, could not pass under the will. These two principles seem to have been well settled and fully recognized in England prior to the statute of 1 Vict., c. 26, and would doubtless have been fully recognized in this state (Cogdell v. Cogdell, 3 Desaus. 346,) prior to our act of 1858. 12 Stat. 700. Since that act, however, subsequently-acquired real estate may pass under a will, provided there are words sufficient to cover it, and, therefore, it seems to us that there is now no room for the application of the second of the two principles upon which, as we have seen, the doctrine of implied revocation from an alteration of the estate rests. If this be so, then the only inquiry in this case is, whether the addition to the interest of the testator in the "Mill Tract," which he acquired at the sale for partition in 1852, affords any indication of an intention to revoke the devise contained in the ninth clause of the will. Under the view which we take of the second question in this case, as will presently be seen, the "sons" of Henry H. Thomson only took under the ninth clause one-eighth of the "Mill Tract," and there was therefore, practically, no alteration whatever in the estate or quantity of interest devised to the "sons" by that clause, and no evidence whatever of any intention to revoke. The estate and the quantity of interest devised to the sons by that clause remained precisely the same, at the death of the testator, that it was when the will was made, and it is impossible to discover any intention to revoke by the purchase of an additional interest in 1852. If it were possible for us to hold that, by a proper construction of the will, such additional interest would pass to the "sons" under the ninth clause, then it would be necessary to pursue this inquiry.

find that the doc*trine of implied revocation from alteration of the estate did not apply in cases of partition. As is said in 1 Jarm. on Wills *134: "The rule that a conveyance in fee of freehold lands, executed for a partial purpose, revokes a will made before 1838, admits of two exceptions. The first is in the case of a partition between tenants in common or coparceners, which, by whatever kind of assurance effected, does not, in equity at least, revoke a prior devise, provided the conveyance be confined to the object of the partition, merely assuring to the testator in the lands allotted to him in severalty an estate precisely correspondent to that which he previously had in his undivided share." It is true, as has been argued, that in England, where this exception has been established, down to a comparatively recent period there was no sale for partition, but there must have been an actual partition, yet we do not see why this should affect the principle upon which the exception rests, which seems to be that partition is a special case, that it is not the free and voluntary act of the party, but that he may be compelled to make partition. Attorney-General v. Vigor, 8 Ves. 281. Hence, where partition is the sole object the rule will not apply. Rawlins v. Burgis, 2 Ves. & B. 386; Luther v. Kidby, stated in note to 3 P. Wms. 170. For, as is said in a note to 1 Jarm. supra: "The act of partition therefore furnishes no evidence of an intention to revoke." But where partition is not the sole object, and in making it other purposes are accomplished, then an intention to revoke may be implied. Tickner v. Tickner, mentioned in Parsons v. Freeman, 3 Atk. 742, 750; Brydges v. Chandos, 2 Ves. 429. So that it seems to us, when the sole object is partition, no matter how it may be effected, whether by sale or otherwise, the rule does not apply, for the reason that no intention to revoke can be implied. And even if it could be said that the estate which the testator originally had in the one-eighth of the "Mill Tract" had been parted with and acquired again subsequent to the making of the will, by virtue of his purchase at the sale for partition, that, of itself, since the act of 1858, would furnish no ground for implying a revocation, in the absence of any indication of an intent to revoke.

We are not, however, prepared to assent to the proposition that the testator ever did part with his original interest in the *one-eighth of the "Mill Tract," or that he subsequently acquired the same interest by the purchase at the sale for partition. On the contrary, we think there is great force in the view thrown out by Dargan, Ch., in Ex parte Geddes, 4 Rich. Eq. 304 [57 Am. Dec. 730], (though it is not the point decided in the case,) that where one of two tenants in common buys land at a sale for partition, the title of the purchaser to his own moiety would be referred to its original source, and would not be considered as derived from the sale for partition. This view is based upon the idea that at a sale for partition the master sells as the agent of the parties—that is, of the tenants in common—and if one of them buys, as he cannot become a purchaser from himself, either directly or through the medium of his agent, his title to his original share is not derived from the sale; that he held before the sale, and the sale could give him no more. There would be no change of title, so far as his share was concerned, and the result would be the same as if the other tenants in common had, without a sale, conveyed their interest to him. We therefore concur with the Circuit judge that there was no revocation of the ninth clause of the will.

2. The next question is, what interest did the "sons" take under the ninth clause of the will, in the "Mill Tract"—the whole or only one-eighth? The determination of this question involves a consideration of the proper construction of the will. We must first endeavor, if practicable, to ascertain the real intention of the testator, and, unless it is in conflict with some rule of law, give it full effect. To ascertain the intention we must resort, not to conjecture as to what was likely to be the wishes of the testator, but to the words in his will, and the circumstances by which he was surrounded at the time, and from these sources deduce his intent. We are to examine the will as a whole, and, from its terms, as applied to the surrounding circumstances, determine what was in the mind of the testator at the time he executed his will. For while it is true that in a certain sense a will speaks at the death of the testator, yet, as it was well put in the argument of one of the counsel, it speaks then what was in the mind of the testator when his will was signed. We cannot conceive how it can be otherwise. If it be *true, as it undoubtedly is, that we must resort to the words used by the testator to ascertain his intention, we cannot understand how certain words, used with a certain intent in 1845, can be said to have been used with a different intent, simply because the testator lived for twenty-three years after he had used them, during which time many changes in his property may have occurred, when he has not seen fit to make any change in the words used by him to express his intention. In this case it is very clear that the testator intended to dispose of his whole estate, not only that which he had at the time of making his will, but also that which he might thereafter acquire. Now, if the act of 1858 had never been passed it would have been impossible to carry this manifest intent of the testator into effect, at least so far as any after-acquired real estate was concerned, because such intent, being in conflict with a well-settled rule of law, could not be allowed to prevail, but since the passage of that act there is no difficulty in the way of carrying out such intention.

Another well-settled rule of construction is, "that all the parts of the will are to be construed in relation to each other, so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole," (2 Jarm. on Wills 741): and if there is an apparent conflict or inconsistency between the different parts, such a construction must be given, if practicable, as will reconcile such conflict and give effect to each part.

It is also well established that, while as a general rule parol evidence is not admissible in the construction of a will, yet, as said by Wardlaw, Ch., in McCall v. McCall, 4 Rich. Eq. 455 [57 Am. Dec. 733]: "In ascertaining the subject of a testator's disposition, the court may inquire into the situation of his estate, and into every material fact which is auxiliary to the just interpretation of his words, for the purpose of identifying the thing intended by the words employed." And again, at page 456, "any evidence is admissible which merely tends to explain and apply what the testator has written, and no evidence can be admitted which merely shows what he intended to write."

We must also bear in mind the fact that the language of the act of 1858, (12 Stat. 700,) which was the law in force at the time this will took effect, differs somewhat from the language *used when this act was subsequently incorporated into the General Statutes, p. 440, and also from the English statute of wills. 1 Vict., c. 26. The language of the act of 1858 is: "Real estate purchased or otherwise acquired after the making and publishing of last wills and testaments shall pass by and under the same, in the same manner and to the same extent as personal estate now does." So that to determine the proper construction of this act it is necessary to inquire what was the rule as to subsequently-acquired personal property. When the act of 1791, (5 Stat. 163,) which declared "that no lands or personal estate which shall be acquired by any person after the making of his or her will shall pass thereby unless the said will be republished," was repealed in so far as personal estate was concerned, by the act of 1808, (5 Stat. 573,) it left the rule, as to that class of property, the same as it was at common law. By that law the rule was, that subsequently-acquired personal property would pass under a will, provided there were any words in the will indicating an intention of the testator so to dispose of it. But where no such intention could be discovered from the words of the will, then subsequently-acquired personal property would not pass thereby. As is said by Johnston, Ch., in Garrett v. Garrett, 2 Strob. Eq. 283, decided prior to 1858, "wills of personal property, like wills of real estate, are actually nothing more than the declaration of the testator's intention as it exists at their date, and as it arises from a contemplation of the state and condition of his property at that time. But there is a material difference between the two, in this, that wills of realty are essentially conveyances, (though revocable), and therefore can operate on no lands not then belonging to the testator; whereas, wills of personalty are not only revocable but, as a general rule, ambulatory, and will operate upon after-acquired property answering to the terms of the instrument, provided it be in the testator's hands at his death. The general rule then is, that testaments take effect, or, as it is sometimes expressed, speak at the death of the testator, and are to be applied to his personal estate as it exists at that time. And this should be the construction in all doubtful cases. Where we can pronounce with confidence that the testator meant to announce an intention confined to the state of affairs existing at the *date of his will, either in reference to the specific subjects which he wished to pass under it, or the persons to enjoy them, or truly intended in any other way to abridge the ambulatory capacity of the instrument, the construction must be such as to conform to the special intention thus indicated or expressed."

Guided by these principles, let us consider whether the interest which the testator acquired in the mill-tract, subsequent to the execution of his will, passed under the ninth or the tenth clause of his will. What intention do the words used by him, read in the light of the surrounding circumstances, indicate? It appears, from the testimony, that at the time he made his will he only owned one-eighth of the mill-tract, and that he subsequently acquired the remaining seven-eighths. We think it absolutely certain that the testator intended to give, by the ninth clause, to the remaindermen, (the "sons," as the event has proved), precisely the same portion that he intended for the life-tenant. He gives to her "my interest or legatee's part of the Walker and Tuck bottoms, joining her lands, or my part of the mill-tract, * * * just as may suit my executor best." Now, the first inquiry which presents itself upon reading this language is, did the testator design to give the life-tenant a different proportion of the Walker and Tuck bottoms, in case the executor should prefer for her to take that, from that which he intended her to take in the mill-tract, if that should be the one selected by the executor as the subject of the gift, or was the change of phraseology from "my interest or legatee's part" to "my part," merely accidental, or such as persons are apt to make when referring a second time to the same thing for the purpose of avoiding sameness of expression? We confess that we are unable to discover anything in the will which would indicate an intention to give different proportions of the two tracts of land referred to in this clause to the objects of bounty there named, and the most natural inference is, that the testator knowing that he only owned an undivided interest in these lands, and having in the first instance, specified what that interest was—his "legatee's part"—he afterwards simply referred to such undivided interest as "my part," without again explaining what that part was. This view is in accordance with "the situation of his estate" at the time *which, as we are told by Wardlaw, Ch., in McCall v. McCall, supra, we may inquire into with a view of ascertaining "the just interpretation of his words, for the purpose of identifying the thing intended by the words employed." At the time the testator's "part" of the mill-tract was the part he was entitled to as devisee (inartistically called legatee) of his father, and as things then stood, "my interest or legatee's part" "and my part" were convertible terms meaning exactly the same thing, and we are not at liberty at attribute different meanings to them. The words of the ninth clause, therefore, do not indicate an intention to give more than the interest to which the testator was entitled as devisee of his father. They may therefore be read as if the testator had, by the ninth clause, given to M. C. Thomson for life, and after her death, to the executor and his sons, one undivided one-eighth of the mill-tract, as that was his part under the will of his father; and if so read, there can be no doubt that there was no intention disclosed to give more than that proportion to the objects of bounty therein named.

But, in addition to this, the testator in the same clause uses this language: "This being all I desire she shall ever have of my estate." Now, to give to the ninth clause the construction contended for by the defendants would be, in contravention of one of the settled rules of construction, to deprive the language just quoted of any force or effect whatever. At the time that the testator used these words it is very clear that he did not intend that the life-tenant should have any more of his estate than the proportion which he then specified, which, as we have seen, was only one-eighth of the mill-tract, and any construction which would give her more would be not only not in accordance with the intention of the testator, but absolutely subversive of it. Practically the testator declares that all she shall ever have of his estate, that is, all which, under any circumstances, she can have, is his "legatee's part," or one-eighth of the mill tract, and to give her the remaining seven-eighths would be to make a new will for the testator.

But again, while it must be conceded that there are no words in the ninth clause referring, in express terms, to any estate which the testator might acquire after making his will, it is per*fectly certain that there are such words in the tenth clause. In that clause the testator, in express terms, makes a different disposition of property that may be subsequently acquired, for there he gives to Henry Hopson Thomson and his "children" —not "sons"—not merely all the rest and residue of his estate, but "all the rest and residue of my estate of all kinds whatsoever, both personal and real, which I now have, or which I may hereafter own, or which I may own at the time of my death." So that the question is, practically, narrowed down to this—shall the subsequently-acquired property pass under the ninth clause which, at most, can only cover it by implication or construction, or shall it pass under the tenth clause, which, in express terms, not only covers it, but gives it a different direction from that which it would take if we were to substitute our inferences as to the intention of the testator, for his intentions as expressly declared in his will? To the question so stated there cannot be a doubt as to the answer.

But this is not all. So far as the testimony discloses, the only property acquired by the testator subsequent to the making of his will was the seven-eighths of the mill-tract, bought by him in 1852, and if the construction contended for by the defendants should be adopted, the result would be to entirely defeat that portion of the tenth clause by which the testator undertook to dispose of any property which he might acquire after making his will. But under the view which we take, that clause is given its full effect, and at the same time the objects of bounty named in the ninth clause are deprived of nothing which, in our opinion, the testator intended them to have.

The difference between this case and that of Garrison v. Garrison, 29 N. J. 153, the authority principally relied upon by the defendants, is, that here there is a clause in the will—the tenth—which, in express terms, disposed of all after-acquired property, while in Garrison v. Garrison there was no such clause. There the residuary devisee claimed the subsequently-acquired property under a general residuary clause, which did not, in terms, refer to subsequently-acquired property, while here the plaintiffs claim under a clause which does, in express terms, not only refer to all subsequently-acquired property, but makes a *specific disposition of it, different from that which would be made of it if it could be brought under the ninth clause. Again, the New Jersey statute seems to be different from our act of 1858, and to follow the language of the English statute, by which subsequently-acquired property passes, "unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will," while, under our act of 1858, such property can only pass where there are words in the will indicating an intention to that effect.

3. The next inquiry is as to the estoppel. In Bigelow on Estoppel, 434, it is said that: "It is now a well-established principle that where the true owner of property holds out another, or allows him to appear as the owner of, or as having full power of disposition over, the property, and innocent third parties are thus led into dealing with such apparent owner, they will be protected. Their rights in such cases do not depend upon the actual title or authority of the party with whom they have directly dealt, but they are derived from the act of the real owner, which precludes him from disputing, as against them, the existence of the title or power which he caused or allowed to appear to be vested in the party making the sale." In Hand v. S. & C. R. R. Co., 12 S. C. 354, this doctrine, in reference to equitable estoppel, is laid down: "When one seeks to overthrow the state of things which he has actually brought about, to the prejudice of another, a clear wrong is perpetrated, and it is no excuse that he was ignorant of his title, for that ignorance should prejudice him alone as the result of his fault or misfortune; but its consequences should not be cast off from himself upon another, for each one should bear the consequences of his own fault or misfortune. But if silence only is alleged, knowledge of his right must be made to appear, for the possession of such knowledge is an essential element of the question of the wrongful character of such silence."

Applying these principles to the case in hand, we take it the inquiry is, did the plaintiffs, by any positive acts or declarations, induce the defendants, or any of them, to purchase the land in question or shares therein, under the supposition that the persons from whom they purchased had good right to sell what they purported to sell. The mere silence or non-action of the plain*tiffs will not be sufficient, inasmuch as it not only does not appear that they were aware of their rights at the time of such purchases, but it does appear that they were ignorant of them, and there is not the slightest evidence warranting the belief that their silence or non-action was induced by an intention to deceive or mislead. As to the defendant Spears, we understood that it was conceded, in the argument here, that the plaintiffs were estopped, and it will not, therefore, be necessary for us to consider the question as to him.

Then as to the defendant Fowler. At the time he purchased from W. W. Thomson a one-fourth interest in the mill-tract it does not appear that the plaintiffs, or either of them, made any representations whatever to him in regard to the ownership of that property, for it was not until after that purchase that he took from them the assignment of their interest in R. L. Thomson's share, which in the assignment was stated to be an undivided one-fourth—the deed from W. W. Thomson having been made on September 22d, 1874, and the assignment on December 5th following. There can be, therefore, no pretence that the plaintiffs, by any positive act on their part, induced Fowler to become a purchaser of an interest in the mill-tract, by holding out to him the idea that they had no interest therein; and their mere silence, at the time he became such purchaser will not, as we have seen, be sufficient to estop them, when it appears they were at the time ignorant of their rights and had no intention to deceive or mislead him, especially when, to say the least, it was doubtful whether they knew of the purchase until after it was made, and when they stood in no such fiduciary relation toward Fowler as made it their duty to speak. The case as to J. S. R. Thomson is even stronger, for his purchase of a one-fourth interest from H. H. Thomson was made as far back as December, 1868, and there is no shadow of pretence that he was induced to purchase by anything said or done by the plaintiffs.

The fact that the mill-tract was excepted from the partition made in 1868 can have no effect. No question as to the ownership of that tract was put in issue by the pleadings in that case, and, of course, no such question could have been there decided. Two of the plaintiffs were then under the disability of infancy and the *other under the disability of coverture, and their rights cannot be prejudiced by the failure to raise the question then. They can only be held bound by what was adjudged in that case, and nothing was there adjudged as to the ownership of the mill-tract.

So, too, we are unable to understand how the fact that the mill-tract was rented to Scaife as the property of the "sons" can affect the rights of the plaintiffs. Nothing that Scaife did could operate as an estoppel against Mrs. Scaife, and certainly not as to the other two plaintiffs.

Nor are we able to perceive how the fact that the plaintiffs stood by and saw the defendants making improvements on the property can operate as an estoppel. According to our view of the rights of the parties the plaintiffs and defendants were tenants in common of the mill-tract, and surely it cannot be contended that the mere fact that one of several tenants in common stands by and sees one or more of his co-tenants enter into possession of the common property and make improvements thereon, will estop him from asserting his right to partition.

So, too, we do not think there is anything in the case to warrant the position that there was a family arrangement by which it was understood that the brothers were to take the mill-tract to the exclusion of their sisters. There is, certainly, an utter lack of any direct evidence of anything like such an agreement, and the facts and circumstances relied upon for the purpose are not, in our judgment, sufficient to establish any such agreement. We concur, therefore, in the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge that there is nothing in the case to estop the plaintiffs, except as to any claim they may have had against the defendant Spears, as to whom the estoppel is admitted.

4. The next inquiry is as to the plea of the statute of limitations interposed by the defendant J. S. R. Thomson. We think it clear that the fiduciary relation existing between him and Mrs. Nowell prevented the running of the statute against her until such relationship was terminated, for, until that time, it was his duty to hold for her, and he could not, therefore, be regarded as holding adversely to her. The remaining inquiry on this branch of the case is whether this will protect the other two plaintiffs.

There can be no doubt but that the rule is well established in *this state that the minority of one of several tenants in common of land will protect the title of the others against the operation of the statute of limitations. (Thomson v. Gaillard, 3 Rich. 418 [45 Am. Dec. 778]; Lahiffe v. Smart, 1 Bail. 192,) and the question now presented is whether the principle upon which this rule rests requires that it should be extended to other cases than that of infancy. The principle upon which this rule is founded is stated by O'Neall, J., in Thomson v. Gaillard, supra, as follows: "The individual interests of co-heirs or distributees in land is co-extensive with the whole of it. * * * Each is entitled to the possession of the whole, and as against a trespasser * * * would be entitled to the writ of habere facias possessionem of the whole tract. * * * The right of entry cannot be confined to any part, but extends to all and every part. * * * As against an infant the bar of the statute could not be effectual until this disability was removed. * * * At any time during his minority, and until five years after full age, he has the legal right of entry on the land. If the right of entry of any one of the co-heirs remains, the legal title of the land is not defeated; and it follows that if it may operate to evict a trespasser from the whole of the land no title can be acquired by possession. * * * The seizin of the co-heirs is in the whole tract and their title is one, and if the statute cannot defeat it as against all, it cannot against none." (Sic.) So the same judge in Henry v. Means, 2 Hill 333, 334, says: "Notwithstanding any one of several tenants in common or distributees might sue in trespass to try titles and recover his or her share of the land, that yet his or her recovery would entitle him or her to the writ of habere facias possessionem for, and an execution of it by delivery of, the possession of the whole land. When any one of the co-tenants obtains possession his possession is that of all, and hence, if any one was entitled to recover possession, all would be of necessity so entitled."

This being the principle upon which the rule is founded by which the minority of one of several co-tenants protects those of full age from the plea of the statute, it is difficult to conceive how we can escape the conclusion that, upon the same principle, the inability of J. S. R. Thomson to plead the statute against *Mrs. Nowell should not likewise enure to the benefit of her co-tenants—the other two plaintiffs. To make his plea of the statute available he must show an adverse possession for the requisite period to the whole of the land, and this he cannot do, because his possession could not be adverse to Mrs. Nowell as to any particular foot of the land. Before partition she was not entitled to any particular acre, but was seized of the whole, and there was therefore no particular acre of which J. S. R. Thomson could properly be said to have adverse possession, for to constitute such possession it must be open, notorious, distinct and hostile to all the world. So soon as it appears that the possession is subservient to, or by the permission of another, or that it is held under an acknowledgement of another's right, it at once loses its character of adverse possession. As is said in Angell on Limitations, § 434: "As one co-tenant cannot be disseized of any particular part of the land unless all are disseized, so the relinquishment and yielding up to one of several tenants in common by the disseizor, after a disseizin for five years, of all the right, seizin, possession and betterments which the disseizor had in and to the proportion of that tenant in common in the premises, has the effect to put all the tenants in common in the seizin and possession of their shares respectively, and to prevent the operation of the statute of limitations against any of them prior to that time. Where there were several tenants in common of the tract of land, some of whom were infants, and the attorney in fact of the guardian of the infants made known their claim to the settler, who agreed to pay the taxes and keep possession for the infants without committing waste, it was held that this agreement enured for the benefit of the other tenants in common so as to prevent the statute from running against them." We think, therefore, that the protection afforded Mrs. Nowell from the plea of the statute of limitations must necessarily enure to the benefit of her co-tenants, the other two plaintiffs, not only in analogy to the well-settled rule in case of minority, but also in accordance with, and as a logical result of, the principle upon which such rule rests.

5. The next inquiry is as to the liability of the defendants for rents and profits. The defendants contend that inasmuch as the statute 4 and 5 Anne has been repealed by the General Statutes, *one tenant in common cannot now have any remedy against his co-tenants for rents of the common property received by him. That statute, however, simply declared "that from and after the said first day of Trinity Term, actions of account shall and may be brought and maintained * * * by one joint tenant and tenant in common * * * against the other as bailiff, for receiving more than comes to his just share or proportion," &c., (2 Stat. 438); and when it was repealed it simply destroyed the remedy given by it—an action of account—but it did not affect the remedy administered by the Court of Equity by virtue of its own inherent powers, which were not derived from that statute. For when the Court of Equity took jurisdiction for the purpose of partition it would proceed to decree complete relief by requiring an account for rents and profits from such of the co-tenants as may have had possession of more of the common property than their just share. Freem. on Co. Ten. & Part., § 425; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., § 655, et seq.; Backler v. Farrow, 2 Hill's Eq. 111. As said by Dunkin, Ch., in Woodward v. Clarke, 4 Strob. Eq. 170: "The practice of the court in giving an account of rents and profits of real estate depends on general principles of equity."

Again: since the adoption of the code of procedure all the previously recognized forms of action have been abolished, and there is now but one form of action for the enforcement or protection of a right or the redress or prevention of a wrong, and hence the repeal of a statute giving a right to bring a particular form of action in a specified case, cannot prevent a party from seeking any relief he may show himself entitled to, either upon legal or equitable principles, by an action under the code. We think, therefore, that the defendants may be required to account for rents and profits of so much of the common property as they may have used in excess of their shares. Volentine v. Johnson, 1 Hill's Eq. 49; Lyles v. Lyles, 1 Hill's Eq. 86; Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 292. But we agree with the Circuit judge that in taking this account reference must be had to the condition of the property before the improvements were put upon it by the defendants, as they are not to be held liable for such rents and profits as may be due to the improvements put upon the prop*erty by them. Thompson v. Bostick, McM. Eq. 75; Hancock v. Day, Id. 69 [36 Am. Dec. 293]; Holt & Kerr v. Robertson, McM. Eq. 475. In taking this account the defendants must be allowed credit for the taxes paid by them and for such repairs as were necessary to preserve the property. This accounting, however, must be limited to the time of the commencement of this action. In Rowland v. Best, 2 McC. Eq. 317, the court said: "It is not an uncommon case for a party who lies by and permits another to occupy and enjoy property or funds of his own, under an apparent good title which he might and ought to have brought into discussion much earlier, to be restricted in his demand for an account of rents and profits or interest to the filing of the bill or four years before." This doctrine was fully recognized in Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill's Eq. 381; Woodward v. Clarke, 4 Strob. Eq. 170; Boyce v. Boyce, 5 Rich. Eq. 268. Here it is manifest that all parties acted under an honest mistake, and we think it a very proper case for restricting the account to the commencement of the action.

6. The only remaining inquiry is, whether the defendants should be allowed anything for the improvements made by them. It is undoubtedly true, as said by Wardlaw, Ch., in Corbett v. Laurens, 5 Rich. Eq. 315, (citing the cases,) "that our cases have settled the question against the right of an improving tenant in common to the exclusive benefit of his improvements," and with this rule we are entirely satisfied, where the tenant who makes the improvements is aware, at the time, that other persons are entitled to interests in the property so improved. But where one has expended his money in the improvement of property, under the honest conviction of exclusive ownership in himself, it seems to us that there is manifest equity in allowing him the benefit of such improvements, as far as the same can be done without injury to the other co-tenants. As is said by Dargan, Ch., in a note to Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 476: "The high equity to be allowed compensation for permanent and valuable improvements should prevail wherever it can be done consistently with the rights of the other parties." Accordingly, in that case it was ordered that the partition should be so made as to give to the party who had made the improvements that portion of the common property *which he had improved, without accounting for the increased value imparted to such portion by the improvements, the improved part not being greater than his rightful share, and it being shown to the court that such partition could be made without injury to the other parties in interest. But even if such partition cannot be made, and a sale should become necessary, we see no reason why, upon the same principle, the improving tenant should not be allowed, out of the proceeds of the sale, not the cost of such improvements, but the amount which such improvements can be shown to have enhanced the value of the property. If two persons are tenants in common of a tract of land, worth, in its unimproved condition, $2000, and one of them, under an honest conviction of exclusive ownership, has made valuable improvements on the property, by reason of which its value is enhanced one hundred per cent., so that when the property is sold for partition it brings $4000, it seems strictly in accordance with the principles of equity and natural justice that the improving tenant should be allowed, out of the proceeds of the sale, the amount which his improvements have added to the value of the property, in addition to his one-half of the value of the property in its original condition; and this would work no injustice to the other tenant who would still receive what alone he was, in justice and equity, entitled to have—the one-half of the value of the property in its unimproved condition. We think, therefore, that in this case the commissioners in partition should be directed to make the partition in such way, if practicable without injury to the rights of others, as to assign to the parties who have made improvements on the common property, the portions so improved, without estimating the additional value imparted to such portions by the improvements. And if this is impracticable and a sale should become necessary, then that the parties who have made the improvements shall, in addition to their shares, be allowed out of the proceeds of the sale such a proportion thereof, as such proceeds have been increased by the improvements.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to carry into effect the principles herein *announced, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, February, 1881.

These cases were an indictment against Mack Gathers for assaulting and resisting an officer, and on indictment against James Smalls for a like offence. It does not appear when the indictments were found, nor when the offence of Gathers was alleged to have been committed. The assault was made by Smalls, according to the indictment, on June 20th, 1880.

Under the charge of the presiding judge the defendants in both cases were acquitted. The state appealed.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, for appellant, contended that the state could appeal, although the defendants could not be tried again; and cited 15 Rich. 274; 1 Bailey 651; Dudley 295, 296. With him was associated the attorney-general.

Mr. S. J. Lee, contra, cited Const., Art. I., § 18; 2 N. & McC. 16; 19 Mo. 683

*July 5th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. We will consider these cases together. The indictment in each was for "resisting an officer" in the discharge of his duty. In the first case named in the caption the officer was "a special constable who had not given official bond," and in the case second stated he was "a police officer in the city of Charleston acting without process." The law bearing upon the two cases is not the same, and much might be said as to the rulings of the Circuit judge in both cases; but in the view which the court takes as to their right to entertain the appeals, they involve identically the same point. Under the charge of the judge the defendants were acquitted and discharged. The solicitor in behalf of the state, alleging error on the part of the judge in each case, appealed to this court and now moves for a new trial in both cases.

Whether or not the Circuit judge erred in his rulings of the law, the defendants were acquitted and discharged and are now out of court. We cannot grant a new trial at the instance of the state. In one of the amendments to the constitution of the United States this declaration appears: "Nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb." In the case Ex parte Lange, 18 Wall. 163 [21 L. Ed. 872], it was held that "if there is anything settled in the jurisprudence of England and America it is that no man shall be twice punished by judicial judgments for the same offence." Mr. Justice Miller in delivering the judgment says: "The common law not only prohibited a second punishment for the same offence, but it went further and forbid a second trial for the same offence, whether the accused had suffered punishment or not, and whether in the former trial he had been acquitted or convicted. Hence to every indictment or information charging a party with a crime or misdemeanor, whether at the common law or by statute, a plea of autrefois acquit is a good defence."

In one of the earliest cases in our reports, (State v. Wright, 2 Treadway 517,) it was held that there "can be no new trial in a criminal case where the defendant is acquitted."

In the case of State v. Bowen, 4 McC. 254, Judge Nott says: "It has not been usual in any case of a criminal prosecu*tion to grant a new trial for any cause where the party has been acquitted. In the case of State v. Wright et al., 2 Treadway 517, the court were unanimously of opinion that a new trial ought not to be granted even in a case of misdemeanor where the defendant had been acquitted, and that case appears to have been well considered and a great many authorities are adduced in support of the opinion. "I will not say that a case may not be so circumstanced as to authorize the court to grant a new trial where the defendant has been acquitted, but I do not think the right to do so is established by the case of the King v. Mawbey, 6 Durnf. & East 619, which was relied on for that purpose." &c.

The case of State v. Edwards, 2 N. & McC. 15 [10 Am. Dec. 557], was an indictment for fighting a duel. The witnesses refused to testify and the defendant was acquitted. The state moved for a new trial and Judge Colcock said: "On the question whether such an appeal can be sustained I entertain no doubt. I think I can venture to say that no case can be found where a new trial has been granted, unless where it has been affected by the fraud or artifice of the accused. * * * Where a criminal case is put to a jury it cannot be withdrawn except by the consent of the accused or by some unavoidable accident to one of the jury or the court," &c.

If it was the duty of courts not to grant new trials in such cases upon motion of the solicitor for the state before our new constitution of 1868, that duty is now very much more plain under that instrument, which expressly and in terms declares in Section 18, Article 1., that "no person, after having been once acquitted by a jury, shall again, for the same offence, be put in jeopardy of his life or liberty."

This court cannot consider merely speculative questions and give opinions upon disputed points of law. Our duty is to pronounce practical judgments, to settle and determine the rights of parties. There must be an actual existing case to call into exercise the judgment of the court. Even in a controversy submitted without action it must appear by affidavit that the controversy is real and the proceeding in good faith.

It is said that it would be useful to settle the law involved in these cases. A mere theoretical opinion, in a supposed case, *would not accomplish that purpose and would be a bad precedent.

The judgment of this court is that these appeals on the part of the state, after acquittal, cannot be entertained and are dismissed.

Before Wallace, J., Charleston, November, 1880.

This was an indictment for the murder of Peter Broughton, by stabbing, charged to have been committed by the defendant, Cæsar Collins. The wound was given June 7th, 1880, in Charleston county, and the deceased died in the city hospital in the city of Charleston on July 20th, 1880.

The exceptions allege errors of the Circuit judge in certain rulings upon testimony. So much of the testimony as is affected by these exceptions is thus stated in the brief.

Thomas E. Newton.—Am superintendent of city hospital, and my duty to receive patients; I don't recollect that I received Peter Broughton, but, on referring to the records, believe that I did, but am ready to swear that he was admitted on June 14th, 1880; he was cut in chest; he remained there some time *and died July 20th; Dr. King was house physician in charge of the surgical department in which that patient was; I have refreshed my memory from a book in the hospital called the general register, and from the surgical register and my copy-press letter-book; one of these books is in the handwriting of the house physician; the entry in my book is in my handwriting, and the copy in the copy-press book is a copy of my handwriting; I keep the general hospital register; it is the first regular record; the entries are not always in my handwriting, but they are in this case; this record refreshed my memory as to details; I wish it to be understood that I can know a thing without remembering it; after looking at the book then I remember it; his death is recorded in the general register, which I keep, and in the medical and surgical register, which is kept by the house physician and the house surgeon; I know of the man's death of my own knowledge; I cannot be so sure about the dates without referring to those books; I know positively about his being admitted and treated in the hospital; I remember having to attend to his treatment; I remember his dying, and I know I had to attend to his funeral after the coroner got through; I remember those facts independent of these records. [Mr. Lee, the counsel for the defendant, objected to so much of the testimony of Mr. Newton as was given by means of refreshing his memory from the hospital records, one of which was in his own handwriting. The court overruled the objection and Mr. Lee excepted.]

Dr. Walter King.—Am house surgeon to the city hospital, and was in June and July last; I remember a patient named Peter Broughton; I did not remember this morning when he was admitted, but on looking at my record I saw that he was admitted June 14th. [Counsel for defence objected to this question and answer. Objection overruled and exception taken.]

Friday Watson.—I saw Peter to his house the morning after he was cut. Question by solicitor. What did he say? A. He said Collins cut me. [Mr. Lee objected to this question and answer. The solicitor stated that he would withdraw the question.] Q. Did he show you anything? A. He showed me his wound and said: "Look how Collins cut me." Q. What be*came of Broughton? A. That is all I know of him. [Mr. Lee stated that he objected to the testimony given by Friday Watson relating to the conversation had with Broughton at his house.]

These were all state witnesses.

The defendant was convicted. He appealed to this court upon the three exceptions stated in the opinion.

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

July 12th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an indictment for murder, in which the appellant was charged with having inflicted a mortal wound on one Peter Broughton on June 7th, 1880, from which death ensued on July 20th following. The wound was inflicted near a country store in the county of Charleston, and the deceased was removed, a few days afterwards, to the city hospital in Charleston, where, it was alleged, he died from the effects of the wound on the day above mentioned. All the testimony taken at the trial is set out in the "case," but we propose to refer to only so much of it as will be necessary for a proper understanding of the grounds of appeal. The appellant having been convicted, moved for a new trial on the ground set forth in his notice of appeal, and, upon the refusal of this motion, gave due notice of appeal upon the following grounds:

"1. Because the court erred in admitting the testimony of T. E. Newton, a witness for the state, about matters of which he had no knowledge, except by means of refreshing his memory from the records of the city hospital, which said records were not produced in court, and no opportunity afforded defendant's counsel to examine them.

"2. Because the court erred in admitting the testimony of Dr. King, a witness for the state, to facts of which he had no knowledge, except that which appeared in the records of the city hospital, which records were not proved to be in the said witness' handwriting, and said records were not produced in court, and no opportunity afforded defendant's counsel to examine them.

*"3. Because the court erred in admitting as evidence the declarations of Peter Broughton, the alleged deceased, made to Friday Watson, a witness for the state, on the day after the altercation when said Peter Broughton was not in a dying condition, and said declarations were not made in the presence of the defendant."

The fourth ground of appeal having been very properly abandoned, need not be set out here.

tion of the rule as to a witness being allowed to refresh his memory by reference to written documents. In this respect the rules of evidence are the same in criminal as in civil cases. State v. Rawls, 2 N. & McC. 331. The rule is thus stated in 1 Stark. on Ev. 128: "If a witness has made a memorandum of facts, he may refresh his memory by referring to it; and if, by that means, he obtains a recollection of the facts themselves, as distinct from the memorandum, his statement is evidence; but if he has no knowledge or recollection of the fact except that he perused it in a book or paper, the original book or paper must be produced, and he cannot give evidence of the facts. It is not essential that the memorandum should have been cotemporary with the fact. It seems to be sufficient if it has been made by the witness, or by another with his privity, at a time when the facts were fresh in the recollection of the witness, and that the reading such memorandum restores the recollection of the fact which had faded in the memory."

In 2 Russ. on Crimes 622, the rule is laid down as follows: "A witness, to assist his memory, may use a written entry, if it were made by himself shortly after the occurrence of the fact to which it relates; but if he cannot speak to the fact from recollection any further than as finding it entered in a book or paper, such book or paper ought to be produced, and if not evidence, the testimony of the witness amounts to nothing."

In 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 436, in speaking of the rule upon this subject, it is said that a witness "is permitted to refresh and assist his memory by the use of a written instrument, memorandum or entry in a book. It does not seem to be necessary that the writing should have been made by the witness himself, nor that it should be an original writing, provided, after inspecting *it, he can speak to the facts from his own recollection." And, again, in Section 437, this author divides the cases in which writings may be referred to by witnesses to refresh or assist their memories, into three classes: "First. Where the writing is used only for the purpose of assisting the memory of the witness. In this case it does not seem necessary that the writing should be produced in court, though its absence may afford matter of observation to the jury, for the witness at last testifies from his own recollection. Second. Where the witness recollects having seen the writing before, and though he has now no independent recollection of the facts mentioned in it, yet he remembers that, at the time he saw it, he knew the contents to be correct. In this case the writing itself must be produced in court in order that the other party may cross-examine. * * * Third. Where the writing in question neither is recognized by the witness, as one which he remembers to have before seen, nor awakens his memory to the recollection of anything contained in it; but, nevertheless, knowing the writing to be genuine, his mind is so convinced that he is on that ground enabled to swear positively to the fact," one of the illustrations given being where a witness called to prove the execution of a deed is unable to recall any recollection whatever of the fact, and yet from the fact of seeing his genuine signature as an attesting witness, he is permitted to prove the execution of the deed. In Section 438, it is said that no precise rule has been established as to the time when the writing thus resorted to should be made, but that it ought at least to have been made before such a period of time has elapsed as to render it probable that the memory of the witness might have become deficient. The cases upon the subject from our own state which have been referred to in the argument, will next be considered.

In State v. Rawls, supra, the rule was laid down in the following language: "Where a person who was a witness to a particular transaction had made a memorandum at the time of certain facts for the purpose of perpetuating the memory of them, and could at any subsequent period swear that he made the entry at the time for that purpose, and that he knew from that memorandum that the facts did exist, it would be good evidence, although *he might not retain a distinct recollection of the facts themselves." In this case it does not distinctly appear that the memorandum was produced in court, though it is a fair inference from what is stated that it was read from by the witness while on the stand. In O'Neale v. Walton, 1 Rich. 234, an unsuccessful effort was made to extend the rule thus laid down so as to permit a memorandum made two weeks after the occurrence to which it related, not by the witnesses themselves, though signed by them, but by an interested party, to be read in evidence. No objection was made to the use of the paper merely for the purpose of refreshing the memory of the witness, but when they stated that, independently of the paper itself, they had no distinct recollection of the facts which it contained, objection was made and sustained by the Court of Appeals, principally, as it seems, upon the ground that the paper in question was prepared by one of the parties in interest, and not by the witnesses themselves; and also, that it was prepared as long as two weeks after the occurrence which it purported to record. It is a mistake to say, as was urged in the argument here, that this case practically overruled the case of State v. Rawls. On the contrary, the authority of that case is distinctly recognized, and the court only says that the principle there laid down is not to be extended so as to cover a case like that of O'Neale v. Walton, where the memorandum relied upon is not made by the witness, but by an interested party weeks after the event.

In Ballard v. Ballard, 5 Rich. 495, a witness was offered to prove a demand and refusal in an action of trover, and being unable to say what reply the defendant made when the demand was made, without reading from a written memorandum, which, he said, "he believed stated the truth—he at first thought it was made on the day of the demand—but after he went home he afterwards said he did not think it was made on that day, but that it was made on the next day, or not long after," the plaintiff offered the memorandum in evidence, but it was not admitted. One of the questions before the Court of Appeals was as to the propriety of excluding this memorandum. The court, while recognizing the rule as laid down in State v. Rawls, and approving the declaration made in O'Neale v. Walton, that this rule should *not be extended as there proposed, held that the memorandum was properly excluded, and seemed to lay stress upon the fact that the memorandum "was not prepared at least until the next day, if then, after a conference." It will be observed that there was no question raised in this case as to whether the witness could, after refreshing his memory by reference to the memorandum, testify to the facts therein contained, but the question was, whether the memorandum itself could be used as evidence.

In Berry v. Jourdan, 11 Rich. 67, the rule is recognized that a witness may be allowed to refresh and assist his memory by referring to a written instrument, memorandum or entry in a book, even though such writing may not have been made by himself, provided that after reading it he can speak to the facts from his own recollection.

The case of Furman & Smith v. Peay, 2 Bail. 394, cited by appellant's counsel to show the necessity for producing in court the hospital records, was a case in which an attempt was made to prove an account for goods sold by book entries, and not a case in which a written memorandum was resorted to for the purpose of refreshing the memory of a witness, and does not, therefore, apply to this case. State v. Cardoza, 11 S. C. 239. In such a case the entries themselves constitute the evidence of the sale and delivery of the goods, and hence the necessity for the production in court of the books containing such entries. And see, too, the recent case of Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 444 [37 Am. Rep. 733].

Applying the principles deducible from the foregoing authorities to the case in hand, we do not see how the first and second grounds of appeal can be sustained. It appears that the hospital records were only resorted to by the witnesses for the purpose of refreshing their memories as to certain details, dates, &c., and there was no offer or attempt to use these records as testimony, and there was no necessity for the production in court of these records. Where a memorandum or other writing is referred to by a witness simply to refresh his memory, and it is not proposed to use such memorandum or writing as testimony, but to rely entirely upon the recollection of the witness as refreshed by such memorandum or writing, there can be no necessity for producing the same in court, for it may be, as in the case of *State v. Cardoza, supra, that the writing resorted to for that purpose is of such a character as to be altogether unintelligible to any one but the witness himself; and yet, upon the principle of the association of ideas, it may be quite sufficient to restore the recollection of a fact which had faded from the memory of the witness.

Nor do we think there is any foundation for the objection that the records used to refresh the memories of these witnesses were not made by them. As matter of act, it seems that one of the books referred to—the general register—was kept by the witness Newton, while the other book—the surgical register—was kept by the other witness, Dr. King, and in both of the books the entries were made contemporaneously with the occurrence of the facts recorded, or at least so near the time of the occurrence of such facts as to render them practically contemporaneous. These books, as their names import, seem to contain the daily record of what occurred in the hospital, and we see no error in allowing the officers of the hospital, whose duty it was to keep these records, to refer to them for the purpose of refreshing their memories as to the facts there recorded.

As to the third ground of appeal, there seems to be some misapprehension on the part of the appellant's counsel. According to the report of the Circuit judge, as well as from what appears in the "case" as agreed upon by the parties, the testimony of Friday Watson as to the declarations of Peter Broughton, made the day after he was wounded, was not admitted, but, on the contrary, as soon as that witness stated what the deceased said, the appellant's counsel objected; whereupon the testimony was immediately withdrawn by the solicitor, and, as the Circuit judge says: "No ruling was made by the court, because there was no issue and nothing to decide." The Circuit judge also says that at the close of the examination of this same witness, Mr. Lee stated that he objected to the conversation at the house [that is, the conversation between the witness and deceased, in which the witness had stated what the deceased said to him.] No ruling was made, because the examination was closed. No motion to strike out was made. And we may add that there was no occasion *for such a motion, inasmuch as the objectionable testimony had already been withdrawn by the solicitor.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Aldrich, J., Colleton, March, 1880.

The defendant, Gabriel White, was indicted for the murder of Frederick Bellinger in January, 1880. At the trial, the original panel having been exhausted, the names of talesmen including some who resided more than five miles from the court house, were placed in the hat. During the drawing, the sheriff stepped aside to speak to some one, at which moment the name of a juror was drawn, the sheriff not seeing it. These matters were excepted to at the time, and for these causes the array, when completed, was challenged. The names of the jurors were drawn from the hat by a boy eleven years of age, but supposed by all parties at the time to be under ten. The mistake was discovered before any evidence was given, and was at once objected to by the defendant's counsel.

The only point arising out of rulings upon testimony, relates to the contradiction of the defendant, White, and is fully stated in the opinion.

The defendant was found guilty. He submitted several grounds in arrest of judgment and on motion for new trial, all of which were overruled, and the defendant was sentenced to be hung. He appealed to this court.

The report of the presiding judge upon the points decided, was as follows:

Judge's Report.

In looking over my notes of trial, I find that parts of my charge were written out and I give the language used. I commenced by instructing the jury that the misnomer in the indictment was not fatal, as it is not a material allegation and might have been left out altogether without affecting the indictment. That no doubt a cruel, brutal and savage homicide had been committed. The question is, did the prisoner at the bar kill the *deceased with malice aforethought? If he did, it is murder. Murder was then clearly and distinctly defined. I did tell the jury that "so cowardly is this kind of assassination considered by the appointed law-makers of the country, that they have gone so far in order to prevent it, to enact that" and read the clause at page 709 of General Statutes. The jury was dismissed to their room with the admonition that the law makes them the sole judges of the evidence and that the judge can express no opinion on the facts, or if he does they are not bound by it.

As to the talesman, I held that was a question for the jury commissioners and the court could not be delayed to try the issue of distance from the court-house, which might involve a survey.

As to the boy who drew the jury, his father informed the sheriff that he was under ten years of age; he drew the names from the hat without objection and I ruled that the objection came too late. The drawing was perfectly fair in the presence of the court.

I am not aware that the sheriff was absent from the hat while the names were being drawn, but am certain that he did not leave the court room or go outside of the bar.

As to the spelling of the word razor, I held it was the same sound and overruled the objection. No one was misled.

I made no direction under the statute of James—it was simply used as an illustration.

The appeal was taken upon the same grounds submitted to the court below for new trial and in arrest of judgment, and are substantially stated in the opinion of this court. The first seven were relied upon on the motion for arrest of judgment, and the remaining two were the grounds for a new trial.

Messrs. Tracy & Tracy and Rice & Rice, for appellants.

Mr. Solicitor Gantt, contra.

July 14th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by cutting him with a razor, and, upon *his conviction, submitted motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment upon numerous grounds set out in the "case." The Circuit judge refused the motions, whereupon this appeal is brought, based upon the same grounds. We propose to consider only those which were relied upon in the argument here, and which are as follows:

1. Because three of the talesman drawn to supply deficiencies in the jury resided more than five miles from the court-house, and one of them was placed upon the jury which tried the case.

2. Because the sheriff was not actually present and did not see the drawing of all of the talesmen.

3. Because the names of the jurors were drawn from the hat by a boy over the age of ten years.

4. Because the indictment charged that Frederick Bellinger died from wounds inflicted on Gabriel Bellinger.

5. Because the indictment charged that the fatal wounds were inflicted with a "raysor" and not with a razor.

6. Because the indictment was an ordinary indictment for murder at common law, and would not support a conviction under the statute of 1 Jac. 1, for stabbing and thrusting, "as was directed in the judge's charge."

7. Because the proof of "cutting" would not support a conviction for "stabbing and thrusting" under that statute, "as charged by his Honor."

8. Because the testimony of James Campbell, introduced for the purpose of contradicting Gabriel White, as a witness, was improperly admitted, inasmuch as White was not warned before the question was put, that the purpose was to contradict him, and was not advertised of the place at which it was alleged he had made a different statement.

9. Because the Circuit judge, in his charge to the jury, expressed his opinion, in very decided terms, as to the character of the homicide, in violation of the provisions of the constitution.

As to the first ground we do not think it necessary to make any observations, inasmuch as we are compelled to grant a new trial upon another ground, and, as the law in this respect has been changed, the same question cannot very well arise upon another trial.

*2. The second ground cannot be sustained, for it appears that the sheriff was within the court-room, and the Circuit judge says, "did not go outside the bar" while the drawing was going on. This, we think, was sufficient, and that it is not necessary that each of the three officers named in the statute should, at every moment of time during the progress of the drawing, have his eyes fixed on the hat or other receptacle from which the names of the jurors are drawn. The sheriff was within reach and where he could see what was going on; and probably one reason for the requirement that three officers should attend at the drawing was to provide against the very thing here complained of—the momentary inattention of one of them—inasmuch as that was likely, if not almost certain, to occur in every instance.

Again, the statute (December 24th, 1878, 16 Stat. 803), does not require that each of the officers there mentioned shall personally inspect each name as it is drawn; it simply requires the jury commissioner "to attend in open court, together with the clerk of the court and the sheriff," and under the direction of the court to draw such number of jurors as may be needed. All this was complied with in this case. These officers did "attend in open court" and "under the direction of the court" did draw the names of the jurors, and the mere fact that the sheriff, who also had other public duties to perform, stepped aside for a moment to speak to some one, cannot vitiate the drawing. In fact, if the sheriff had been absent from the court-room we do not see how the drawing would have been illegal, for the statute above cited declares that these officers shall proceed to supply the deficiency "in the same manner as the board of jury commissioners are now authorized by law to do," and by the law as it then stood the drawing was to be made by the board of jury commissioners or a majority of them. So that the absence of the sheriff only would leave a majority of the officers designated for that purpose, and we see no reason why a drawing by such majority would not be legal.

3. The next inquiry is, whether the fact that the boy by whom the names of the jurors were drawn from the hat was over ten years of age, is necessarily fatal. There is no statutory requirement upon this subject, but the twenty-fifth rule of the Circuit *court does require that the drawing shall be by "a child under ten years of age." This, however, is merely directory, for the purpose of securing an impartial drawing, and when the object is effected we do not see how the failure to comply with the mode prescribed by a mere rule of court for effecting that object, can be allowed to vitiate the whole proceeding. If this requirement were in the form of a statutory enactment, then, of course, no court would have the power to dispense with it. But rules of court are designed simply to secure the orderly and proper conduct of business, and it is not so essentially necessary that they should be observed as statutes, for the court may, upon proper occasions, suspend them or dispense with their strict observance. By Rule 25, it is required that "upon the trial of any person charged with an offence for which the law requires that he should be arraigned, the prisoner shall be placed in the dock." Now, surely it would not be contended that the failure to comply with this requirement would vitiate the whole proceedings.

It is not suggested, even, that any injury resulted to the prisoner from the accidental and unintentional failure to comply with this rule, and, on the contrary, the Circuit judge reports that the drawing was perfectly fair and impartial. Indeed, all parties supposed at the time that the rule was being complied with strictly. Even the father of the boy who drew the jury believed he was under ten years of age, and it was not until afterwards that he discovered his mistake by an inspection of the record, which showed that the boy was, in fact, eleven years of age. This ground cannot be sustained.

4. The next question is, as to the variance in the indictment, caused by a clerical error, doubtless, in substituting "Gabriel" for "Frederick," in one part of the indictment. The portion of the indictment in which the variance occurs, reads as follows: "That Gabriel White, * * * in and upon one Frederick Bellinger, * * * did make an assault, and that the said Gabriel White, with a certain raysor, of the value of one dollar, which the said Gabriel White, in his right hand, then and there, had and held, the said Frederick Bellinger, in and upon the left side of the neck, and in and upon the right arm, (of him, the *said Gabriel Bellinger,) then and there feloniously, willfully, and of his malice aforethought, did strike, thrust and cut, giving to the said Frederick Bellinger, then and there, with the raysor aforesaid, in and upon the left side of the neck, and in and upon the right arm of him, the said Frederick Bellinger, two mortal wounds," &c.

It is very manifest that the error, to which exception is here taken, is purely clerical, but still this would be fatal if it occurred in a material part of the indictment and in any way obscured the sense of the passage in which it occurred, or even tended to mislead the accused as to the precise nature or character of the charge which he was called upon to answer. Here, however, that portion of the indictment in which the error occurs might very well have been left out as surplusage, for, without it, all the facts material to the charge brought against the accused are well and sufficiently stated, and it is impossible that the accused could have been misled as to the nature or character of the charge which he was called upon to answer, or as to any of the details respecting it. Omit the words in parenthesis, in the foregoing extract from the indictment, and there remains enough to show clearly that the accused was called upon to answer a 'charge of murder committed on the person of Frederick Bellinger, by cutting him on the neck and on the arm with a razor, and the insertion of these words could not tend, in the least degree, to obscure the sense of the passage in which they occur, or to leave any doubt upon the mind of the accused, either as to the nature of the crime with which he was charged or of the particular details attending its commission. We think, therefore, that there is nothing in this ground. 1 Chitty on Cr. L. 173, 295, 296; 1 Leach 109; Rex v. Dowlin, 5 T. R. 311; State v. Wimberly, 3 McC. 190.

5. The next question is of a kindred character, and depends upon the same general principle. The misspelling of the word "razor"—the instrument with which the wound was inflicted—cannot vitiate the indictment. The rule laid down in 1 Bish. on Cr. Pro., § 357 (2d ed.), is that a clerical error, if not of such a character as would mislead a person of common understanding, will not vitiate an indictment. It seems to be well established *that mere false spelling which does not alter the meaning of the term, and does not make another word different from that intended, will not vitiate an indictment. As, for instance, in 1 Leach 134, 145, where "undertood" was used for "understood," "receivd" for "received." In State v. Molier, 1 Dev. 263, "sive" for "sieve." In State v. Shepherd, 8 Ired. 195, "twelfth" for "twelfth." In State v. Hedge, 6 Ind. 330, "fifty-too" for "fifty-two," and in State v. Crane, 4 Wis. 400, "assalt" for "assault;" in all of which cases the misspelling was held to be immaterial.

The case of State v. Caspary, 11 Rich. 356, is not in conflict with these cases, for there, by the misspelling, another word different from the one intended was formed. In that case the indictment was for bastardy, and the word "father" was written "farther," and the judgment was arrested, but in that case it is said "clerical and grammatical errors which do not affect the sense will be ordinarily disregarded, but where the omission or addition of a letter makes a change of the word, so as to make another word, it becomes material when it occurs in certain parts of an indictment," and it was suggested that if the word had been written "faether," the result would have been different, "for that would not be a different word."

There is an old case decided in North Carolina about the beginning of the present century, (State v. Carter, N. C. Conf. 210, by Cameron and Norwood,) which seems to be in conflict with the position above taken. In that case, in an indictment for murder, in describing the locality of the wound, the word "breast" was written "brest," and the error in spelling was held fatal on a motion in arrest of judgment. That case, however, was decided by a divided court and no authorities were cited to sustain the decision; it does not appear to have been recognized since, and, on the contrary, is directly in conflict with two subsequent cases in the same state, (State v. Molier and State v. Sheppard, supra,) and it is expressly disapproved by that eminent author, Bishop, in his work on Criminal Procedure, Vol. I., § 354, 2d edition. We cannot, therefore, regard the case as entitled to any weight.

Now, in the case under consideration, the misspelling of the word "razor" does not result in the formation of another word, *for we know of no such term in the English language as "raysor," and even if it be true, as asserted in the argument, although there is no evidence of the fact, that the word "Raysor," is a proper name, still we do not think that this would affect the question, for the misspelling, to make it fatal, must be such as to constitute another word designating a thing and not a person. If, for example, in an indictment for murder the weapon used should be described as a "double-barreled shot-gunn," we do not think the additional "n," in spelling the word "gun," would be fatal because there happen to be persons known by the name of "Gunn."

6. The next ground seems to be based upon a misapprehension of the judge's charge. He says that he only referred to the statute of 1 Jac. 1, by way of illustration and not as being the law under which the accused was being tried. There is nothing, therefore, for this ground to rest upon.

7. So, too, with the seventh ground. It is very manifest that the indictment was not framed under that statute, but was an ordinary indictment for murder at common law, and the conclusion, "contrary to the form of the statute," cannot impair the validity of the indictment, as such conclusion may be rejected as surplusage.

8. The next inquiry is as to the competency of the testimony of the witness James Campbell. It seems that when the prisoner was on the stand he was asked if he had not said, on January 15th, 1880, that "he would have to cut somebody," and that he denied saying so. When Campbell was offered as a witness to prove that he had made use of such language, objection was made upon the ground that the proper foundation for contradicting White had not been laid, inasmuch as when he was asked the question as to whether he had used such an expression, he was not warned before he answered of the purpose to contradict him; and, also, because he had not been advertised of the place where he was alleged to have used such language.

Where the purpose is to impeach the credit of a witness by proof that he has made statements out of court contrary to what he has testified at the trial, the rule is that the witness shall be advertised distinctly as to the particular circumstances attending *the contrary statement which it is proposed to prove by asking "as to the time, place and person involved in the supposed contradiction." 2 Phillips on Ev. 959; 1 Greenl., § 462. But we are not aware of any rule which requires that the witness should be warned before he answers of the intention to contradict him, in case he denies having made the statement which it is proposed to prove, in any other way than the character of the preliminary questions as to the time when, the place where and person to whom such contrary statement is alleged to have been made, would be likely to do.

So that the only real objection to Campbell's testimony, if it should be considered as offered to contradict the testimony of White and thereby discredit him, is that White was not asked, when on the stand, as to the place where the contradictory statement proposed to be proved was made. This would seem to constitute an insuperable objection to the testimony, if offered with the view to discredit White, for as Mr. Greenleaf, in the same section above cited, after laying down the rule as above stated and giving the reasons for it, says: "This course of proceeding is considered indispensable from a sense of justice to the witness," and we see no reason why a failure to comply with that portion of the rule which requires that the attention of the witness, whom it is proposed to contradict, should be called to the place where the supposed contrary statement was made, would not be just as fatal as a failure to comply with another portion of the rule which requires that the attention of the witness should be called to the person to whom such contrary statement is alleged to have been made; and this every one would concede would be an omission fatal to the introduction of the testimony to contradict the witness.

It is to be observed, however, that White was not an ordinary witness but was the party accused and, under the statute, was only permitted "to testify as to the facts and circumstances of the case," (Gen. Stat. 517,) and it may admit of grave question whether his character could be impeached either in the manner suggested or in any other way; but as this is an important question not raised in the record and not argued in this case, we do *not propose upon this occasion to do more than merely suggest the question, without undertaking now to decide it.

There is, however, one view under which the testimony of Campbell might be admissible. White being the party accused, it would be competent to prove any statement or declaration previously made by him relative to the matters in issue, subject, of course, to the rules regulating evidence of confessions or admissions and subject also to the rule as to evidence in reply, even if when on the stand he had been asked nothing about such previous statements or declarations, or if he had not been put upon the stand at all. What the purpose was in introducing Campbell as a witness is not very clear from the statement of the case furnished us, but we infer from the argument here that the object was to impeach the credit of White as a witness. If so, his testimony would have been incompetent upon the ground that the attention of White was not called to the place where the supposed contradictory statement was made, even if it should be regarded as competent in any way to impeach the credit of a party accused when offered "to testify as to the facts and circumstances of the case."

9. The only remaining inquiry is as to the effect of the Circuit judge expressing his opinion, in his charge to the jury, as to the character of the homicide. The Constitution, Art. IV., § 26, declares that "judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact, but may state the testimony and declare the law." This clause of the constitution has been construed in two cases (Redding v. Railroad Company, 5 S. C. 69), in which, in speaking of this section, it is said: "Its sole intention was to prevent judges from forcing upon juries their own convictions as it regards matters of fact. The juries are the judges of such matters and cannot properly look to the court for a controlling view of the proper conclusions of fact, nor can the court, on the other hand, employ its influence over the minds of the jurors to force upon them its conclusions in such cases." In State v. Green, 5 S. C. 66, it is said: "We are not to be understood as holding that a judge, in his charge to the jury, is to be confined to a mere narration of the evidence. While he is not as liberty to give his conclusions on any particular portion of the testimony, nor the *result of his judgment as to the whole, he is not restrained from comparing the various parts of it, that the jury may have before them, in as concise a form as possible, the issues upon which they are to pass, so that they may be the better enabled to apply the law to the facts presented in the cause."

While we would not be disposed to use altogether as strong terms as are employed in one of the above extracts, certainly not in reference to the case under consideration, we agree in thinking that the real object of this clause of the constitution is to leave the decision of all questions of fact to the jury exclusively, uninfluenced by any expressions of opinion by the judge, whose position would very naturally add great weight to any opinion he might express upon any question of fact arising in a case. While, therefore, the judge is not expected to confine himself to a mere statement or repetition of the testimony as it was delivered, but may place it before the jury in the order in which it relates to the propositions which it is adduced to support or contradict, by pointing out the questions of fact which arise and calling the attention of the jury to the evidence applicable to such questions, yet he should carefully avoid expressing any opinion which he may have formed from the facts, leaving it for the jury to draw their own conclusions unbiased by any impressions which the testimony may have made upon the mind of the judge.

In this case there does not seem to be any question as to the fact that the prisoner was the person who inflicted the fatal wounds, and the only question, therefore, for the jury to determine was the character of the homicide. This being the case we think it was a violation of the rule for the judge to say to the jury "that no doubt a cruel, brutal and savage homicide had been committed." This certainly was expressing to the jury, in very decided terms, the opinion which the judge had formed from the testimony of the character of the homicide, and was well calculated to influence the minds of the jurors in the determination of the important inquiries in the case, whether the character of the homicide was such as to make it murder, manslaughter or reduce it to a killing in self-defence. It is very true that no one who knows the distinguished judge who presided at the trial of this *case would for a moment suspect that in using this language he had the slightest design to influence the jury, but still its natural, and we may say, its inevitable tendency would be to incline the jury to take the same view of the character of the homicide as that taken by the presiding judge.

The admonition given to the jury at the close of the charge, though eminently proper, "that the law makes them the sole judges of the evidence, and that the judge can express no opinion on the facts, or if he does they are not bound by it," was not, in our opinion, sufficient to do away with the effect of the previous expression of opinion as to the character of the homicide in question. For the jury are not only not bound by any expression of opinion by the judge as to the facts, but the object of the constitutional provision is to preserve the jury from being in any way influenced by the judge's opinion as to the facts, and when, as in this case, a very decided opinion is expressed by the judge as to the real point in issue—the character of the homicide—we think it not unlikely that some or perhaps all of the jury may have been influenced by such an expression of opinion from so high a source, and that, therefore, a new trial should be granted.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

(Case No. 1053.)

HYATT v. McBURNEY.

[1. Mortgages ⇐479.]

At the suit of C., owner of a prior mortgage, the Supreme Court of the United States held such mortgage unsatisfied, and directed a foreclosure and sale against the purchasers of the mortgaged land, who were parties to that cause; but H., a mortgagee of the purchasers, was not a party, and his rights were reserved; H. then brought his action in the state court upon the bonds and mortgage held by him, making parties defend*ant his mortgagors, and also C., who, after action brought, but before answer, became, at the marshal's sale, the purchaser of the lands in dispute. The State Circuit judge decreed that the prior mortgage was fully paid and satisfied as to the plaintiff here, (to which finding of fact no exception was taken by C.,) but, in deference to the contrary decision in the United States court, binding the other parties to this action, directed an inquiry whether the plaintiff might not, without difficulty, realize on his bonds, so as to save to C. the land in dispute. Held, that the court could not require the plaintiff to pursue any other remedy than the foreclosure, to which he was primarily entitled, under his mortgage contract.

[2. Equity ⇐426.]

Equities between co-defendants may sometimes be adjusted and enforced, but not in disregard of the legal rights of the plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 1000; Dec. Dig. ⇐426.]

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, March. 1880.

This action was commenced October 15th, 1879, by Mary A. Hyatt and Joaquin Delmonte as executors of Edmund Hyatt, deceased, and Mary A. Hyatt, Mary E. Hyatt and Julia Delmonte, devisees and heirs-at-law of said Edmund Hyatt, against William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred L. Gillespie and Thomas R. McGahan, members of the late firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., and Caroline Carson.

In 1856 William A. Carson died, leaving of force a last will and testament, whereby he directed his executors to sell the residue of his estate, and to hold the proceeds in trust for his wife and children, according to the shares as therein specified. By virtue of this power Alexander Robertson and John F. Blacklock only qualified executors, sold a plantation called Dean Hall, in Charleston district, to Elias N. Ball, on March 3d, 1857, for $50,000, of which $35,000 was on credit, secured by bonds and a mortgage to the executors of the premises. In June, 1857, the debts of the estate being paid, the executors transferred these bonds and the mortgage to themselves as trustees of Mrs. Carson and her two children, under the will.

In 1861, Mrs. Carson and her eldest son (who attained his majority in 1863), and Blacklock, the trustee, left Charleston, and were beyond the limits of the Confederate States until after the war. The younger son of Mrs. Carson did not attain his majority until after the war.

On May 7th, 1863, Elias N. Ball, for $100,-

000, conveyed the *Dean Hall plantation to Edmund Hyatt, William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred L. Gillespie and Thomas R. McGahan, in proportion to their interests in the capitol and profits of the copartnership of Hyatt, McBurney & Co. On May 8th, 1863, Edmund Hyatt released his interest and title to Dean Hall to the partners, and on the same day sold his interest in the firm to the other partners, receiving in payment their bond for $40,000, secured by a mortgage of Dean Hall. About the same time Ball paid to Robertson, trustee, the balance due on his bonds, and the mortgage of Ball was afterwards marked satisfied by Robertson. All of these payments in 1863 were in Confederate treasury notes.

Mrs. Caroline Carson, after the war, being then a citizen of New York, and having purchased her sons' interest in the Ball bonds and mortgage, brought her action against McBurney, and afterwards against the other partners and Ball, for a foreclosure of the Ball mortgage, and to have its satisfaction canceled. See Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. 94, and McBurney v. Carson, 9 Otto 569. Hyatt (a citizen of New York) was not made a party to this action, and in holding the mortgage unpaid, and its satisfaction fraudulent, the court say that its decree would not affect Hyatt's right. Decree of foreclosure was rendered.

In 1876 Edmund Hyatt died, and this action was commenced by his executors, heirs and devisees. After complaint filed, but before answer put in, Dean Hall was sold by the marshal under the order of the United States Circuit Court, and purchased by Mrs. Carson, for $5000.

By order of Judge Aldrich, it was referred to Master Clancy to take testimony, and upon his report Judge Pressley rendered the following decree:

In this case plaintiffs seek to foreclose their mortgage on Dean Hall plantation, which secures a debt due them by McBurney & Co. Their co-defendant, Mrs. Carson, held an older mortgage on said plantation, which one of the executors to whom the mortgage was given, satisfied during the late war. That satisfaction was set aside as fraudulent and void by the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case to which McBurney & Co. were parties, but plaintiffs here were not parties to *that case. I find here not a shadow of fraud, either in the circumstances attending the said satisfaction, or in the nature of the payment, and the very high character of all parties to that transaction, would rebut even strong proof of fraud, if such had been produced in the case. In the absence of all proof in that respect, I follow the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, and hold that plaintiffs have a valid mortgage on said plantation, discharged of the said older mortgage.

But the obligors of the bond which plaintiffs' mortgage secures, being parties to the decision of the United States court, are bound by it. It is a final adjudication of their rights, and I am bound to respect it. In doing so I must give it full effect if that can be done without impairing the lien of the plaintiffs. They are not entitled to enforce payment of their bond out of property which the said decision gives to Mrs. Carson, if they can, without difficulty or expensive litigation, enforce payment by the obligors, who are bound by the said decision. Were I to decree that, my profession of respect for that decision would be only a flimsy pretence.

It is, therefore, ordered that this case be re-committed to Master Clancy, to take testimony and report whether the plaintiffs can, without difficult or expensive litigation, procure payment from the obligors of said bond otherwise than by the foreclosure of their said mortgage.

The code, as construed by the Supreme Court of this state, requires that every case, without regard to the pleadings be decided according to right. To that end leave must be granted to amend the pleadings, even after the hearing. If Mrs. Carson be advised that amendment of her answer be necessary, leave to amend it according to the claim set up by her at the hearing, is hereby granted.

From this decree the plaintiffs appealed to this court upon the grounds—

1. That his Honor was in error in holding that the plaintiffs are not entitled to foreclose their mortgage until it is ascertained that they cannot in some other way make their money, for such ruling in effect alters and changes the contract between the par*ties and deprives the plaintiffs of the benefit and advantage of their security.

2. That such a defence, if it could have been entertained at all, came too late upon the hearing of the cause upon the merits, and that his Honor erred in allowing Mrs. Carson leave to amend her answer "according to the claim set up by her at the hearing."

Upon the points decided by this court, an abstract of the arguments is given.

Messrs. McCrady & Son, for appellants.

1. The United States court did not give this property to Mrs. Carson; it only held her mortgage to be a subsisting lien. She is now a purchaser and has only such title as the United States courts could give. That decree was understood to be at variance with the decisions of this state, and she was warned what Hyatt could do, and our mortgage being held valid, we clearly have right to foreclose. The Circuit decree permits Mrs. Carson to amend her answer by asserting a claim to a decree against McBurney for that debt to Hyatt, which her land is compelled to pay. But Mrs. Carson has no warranty from McBurney and others, she takes no title through them, and can have no protection in a court of equity as against them. 3 How. 333; 11 Wall. 232. Her authority (Dixon on Subrog. 28) does not sustain her position, Mrs. Carson is not a subsequent creditor, and see Id. 29, and Spears Eq. 37. But the defendants here have not answered and Mrs. Carson, a co-defendant, can have no relief not demanded in the pleadings. 1 Hill Ch. 147; 2 Sch. & Lef. 690. Nor can a decree be made between co-defendants here, because no such decision is required to give the plaintiff his rights. 3 Hare 637; 5 Russ. 45; 27 Beav. 515; 11 Cl. & Fin. 661.

2. But the defence came too late. 9 S. C. 334; 5 S. C. 285. It would make a new case.

Mr. A. G. Magrath, contra.

Hyatt standing simply as a junior mortgagee was no proper party to the case of Carson v. McBurney. The nature of the *title of McBurney and his partners has been adjudicated. That is the title which was mortgaged to Hyatt. His rights were reserved, but they were only the rights of a junior mortgagee—to redeem, &c. It is really the old case in Hyatt's name. The property was purchased for the partnership, and as such is bound by the former decree, all the partners in the state being parties. The comity due to the United States court should prevent a different judgment. But Hyatt should be forced to proceed on his bonds, as Mrs. Carson would be entitled to recover from McB. what Hyatt obtained from her land. Dixon on Subrog. 22, 28; 1 Strob. Eq. 52; 1 Hill Ch. 35, 228; 12 Wheat. 594; 93 U. S. 96. And such decree may be awarded between co-defendants. 1 Hill Ch. 147; 2 Sch. & Lef. 710.

SIMPSON, C. J. In December, 1862, Hyatt, McBurney & Co., of the city of Charleston, purchased from Elias N. Ball a citizen of South Carolina, a certain tract of land known as Dean Hall, situate in Charleston county, at the price of $100,000. This tract had been purchased in 1857 by Ball from the executors of W. A. Carson, deceased. Ball had given his bond for the purchase money, with a mortgage of the premises to secure its payment. This bond and mortgage had been satisfied with the executors of Carson by Ball about the time he sold to Hyatt, McBurney & Co.

A short time after this purchase by McBurney & Co., Hyatt concluded to withdraw from the firm, and he conveyed his interest in the Dean Hall property to the surviving members of the firm, to wit, William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred Gillespie and Thomas R. McGahan. Upon the withdrawal of Hyatt, the firm was found indebted to him some $40,000. For this sum McBurney & Co. gave their bonds, with a mortgage of the Dean Hall land to secure their payment.

After the war, Mrs. Caroline Carson, one of the legatees and devisees of her husband, and who had become sole party interested in the estate, being a resident of the State of New York, instituted proceedings in the United States court, denying that the Ball mortgage had been legally satisfied, (it had been paid off *during the war with Confederate money,) and praying that it might be set up against the Dean Hall tract and be foreclosed. Hyatt was not made a party to this proceeding, but the other members of the late firm had been. This case was heard on Circuit and was taken to the Supreme Court. The satisfaction of the mortgage was held fraudulent and a foreclosure ordered. It was expressly stated, however, that as Hyatt had not been made a party, the decree would not affect his rights.

After this foreclosure decree in favor of Mrs. Carson in the United States court, as above stated, and before the sale of the land, Mr. Hyatt instituted this action in the state courts, claiming the foreclosure of his mortgage. To this proceeding Mrs. Carson, being made a party, appeared and set up as a defence the illegality of the satisfaction of the Ball mortgage and also the decree of foreclosure of the United States court as an estoppel to plaintiff's action. In the meantime she had purchased the land under this foreclosure decree.

The case was referred to W. D. Clancy, Esq., one of the masters of the court, to take testimony and report the same. Upon the coming in of this report Judge Pressley found, as matter of fact, that "there was not a shadow of fraud either in the circumstances attending the satisfaction of the Ball mortgage or in the nature of the payment by Hyatt, McBurney & Co. to Ball," and he decreed, as matter of law, that the plaintiff had a valid mortgage on said plantation discharged of the older or Ball mortgage, under which Mrs. Carson claimed.

There has been no appeal from either this finding of fact or law by the Circuit judge. The judge, however, further decreed "that the obligors of the bond which plaintiff's mortgage secures being parties to the decision of the United States court, are bound by it. It is a final adjudication," says Judge Pressley, "of their rights, and I am bound to respect it. In doing so I must give it full effect, if that can be done without injuring the lien of the plaintiffs. They are not entitled to enforce payment of their bond out of property which the said decision gives Mrs. Carson, if they can, without difficulty or expensive litigation, enforce payment by the obligors, who are bound by the said decision. Were I to decree that, my profession of respect would be only a *flimsy pretense. It is therefore ordered that this case be recommitted to Master Clancy to take testimony and report whether plaintiffs can, without difficulty or expensive litigation, procure payment from the obligors of said bond otherwise than by foreclosure of said mortgage. The code, as construed by the Supreme Court of this state, requires that every case, without regard to the pleadings, be decided according to the right. To that end leave must be granted to amend pleadings even after the hearing. If Mrs. Carson be advised that amendment of her answer be necessary leave to amend it according to the claim set up by her at the hearing is hereby granted."

The plaintiffs appealed, and the appeal brings up the correctness of this position of the decree.

The Circuit judge held that the mortgage under which Mrs. Carson claimed had been satisfied; that the mortgage of the appellant was a valid and subsisting lien on the plantation and expressly discharged from the older mortgage of Ball. Under these circumstances, we cannot see how the appellants, if they demand it, can be denied their right to foreclose their mortgage. This was the contract between the parties, and it belongs to a class of contracts which can be specifically enforced through the courts.

The mortgage of the appellants did not give them the right to pursue other property of the mortgagor, but it gave a specific lien on the Dean Hall plantation; none other. The contract was, that under this mortgage the mortgagee should have the right through the courts to a decree of sale of that plantation on failure of the mortgagors to meet their obligation. The decree denies this right, and requires the appellants to give up the lien which they contracted for, and to pursue property over which they have no lien.

The action of the appellants is primarily an action in the nature of an action in rem. If they do not obtain a judgment by which the specific property embraced in the mortgage is set apart for the payment of their debt, they can only have a general one on the bonds of the mortgagor, upon which they would be compelled to issue executions, so as to reach such leviable property of the respondents as they might be able to find. In other *words, the contract made by the parties themselves is ignored and a new one substituted by the court.

As has already been stated, the Circuit judge found that the mortgage under which Mrs. Carson claims had been paid off and extinguished by Ball, the mortgagor, before he conveyed to Hyatt, McBurney & Co., and that the mortgage of the appellants was the only valid lien upon the land. Mrs. Carson has not appealed from this portion of the decree. These facts, then, stand as established before this court, and cannot now be disputed by her. Such being the fact, much of the argument, pressed with great zeal and force by her counsel, is inapplicable and cannot be considered, because the questions to which it was addressed are not before the court.

The only question before the court is, was the Circuit judge in error when he declined to allow the appellants the benefit of the remedy which they sought, and which the facts of the case, as found by the Circuit judge and admitted, so far as this case is concerned, by all of the parties, including Mrs. Carson, entitled them to demand? Was the Circuit judge in error in denying to appellants this remedy and in turning them over to another, which the appellants did not seek, and are now unwilling to receive, being different from that for which the parties contracted?

Sometimes there may be equities between defendants which should be adjusted, and when they properly arise in a case the court has power, under the code, to enforce them; but in endeavoring to have justice done between defendants, the legal rights of the plaintiffs should not be disregarded and overthrown.

What is the equity of Mrs. Carson in this case, to which the rights of the appellants have been subordinated? The decree fails to furnish any tangible equity upon which the court can found a judgment in her favor. She does not claim that appellants have a lien upon two funds, either of which would satisfy appellants' debt, and that she has a lien upon one of these, and, therefore, that appellants should be thrown upon the other. She does not show that she has paid to appellants a debt to which the doctrine of subrogation would attach. No principle of recognized equity is invoked. Her only claim is that the United *States court has previously held that as between herself and the other defendants her mortgage was good. To that decision, however, the appellants were not parties, and the court, in pronouncing judgment, expressly declared that it would not bind the appellants. This decision, therefore, is not res judicata as to them, and it has no binding force here.

Now, while we have a profound respect for the United States court, and admire the learning and ability which has always characterized its decisions, and while we would most cordially yield to its authority in a case where all parties interested in the question acted upon were before the court, yet in a case like this, where all the parties in interest were not before the court, and where the rights of the absent parties were expressly reserved, and where the matters in issue have since been adjudicated by our own courts, with all parties interested present, from which adjudication there has been no appeal, we feel constrained to sustain that judgment, although it is different from that of the United States court.

We think that the appellants, by virtue of the Circuit decree, which held that the mortgage of appellants was the only lien upon the land in question, and from which respondents have not appealed, became entitled to have said mortgage foreclosed, according to the usual mode in such cases, and that it was error in the Circuit judge to postpone this established right of appellants to the claim of respondents.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for such further proceedings as may be necessary to enforce the principles of this opinion.

STATE v. CLARK.

[1. Criminal Law ⇨1134.]

This court declined to consider exceptions to a refusal of the Circuit judge to grant a new trial, as they alleged no errors of law.

[2. Death ⇨61.]

The Circuit judge committed no error in permitting an experienced physician to give his opinion that deceased was dead before a certain train passed over the body, although such opinion was founded upon facts testified to by others, and not upon matters coming under his own observation.

[3. Criminal Law ⇨921.]

A witness upon the stand repeated a remark made by him when he found a bloody handkerchief in the coat-pocket of deceased—"this looks like he was hurt before the train hurt him;" the presiding judge refused to rule this remark out of the evidence, but in his charge told the jury that they should not regard it. Held, that this furnished no ground for a new trial.

Before Hudson, J., Lexington, June, 1880.

The defendant, Squire Clark, was indicted in February, 1880, for the murder of Walter Scott Hook, in Lexington county, on October 8th, 1879. The deceased was found dead upon the railroad track at day-dawn on October 9th, the body showing unmistakable signs of having been run over by one or more trains of cars. The theory of the state was that deceased was killed before any train passed over the body; the defendant relied upon an alleged insufficiency of proof to establish such fact, or to connect him with the killing. Defendant introduced no testimony.

Dr. W. L. Addy, the eighth witness for the state, testified as follows: Have practiced medicine for thirty years; examined the dead body of Hook; head mashed badly, face not run over, apparently; on the right side of the neck, under the jaw-bone, there was a gash of several inches, as if by a sharp knife; made the post-mortem examination at the depot; I never viewed the spot where the body was found; I heard the description of the blood; if killed by a train the blood would be scattered more *than the witnesses have here described, and not pooled; I found no bullet in the body; I give it as my opinion that the body was dead when the train struck it.

Cross-examination.—I say so because the blood was pooled and not scattered along and around; I made no chemical examination of the blood; the appearance of the wound will not enable an expert to tell whether the same was done before or after death; I have not had much experience in surgery.

The matter complained of in the 12th exception is fully stated in the report of the presiding judge.

The defendant was convicted, moved for a new trial, and, it being refused, appealed to this court upon twelve exceptions. It is unnecessary to report the first ten; the others were as follows:

11. Because, it is respectfully submitted, that his Honor erred in ruling that the opinion of Dr. Addy, upon the question as to whether the deceased was alive when the 11 P. M. train passed over the spot where the body was found, was competent testimony, and it is submitted that his Honor, after he heard the answer and explanations by Dr. Addy, should have withdrawn his evidence upon that point from the jury.

12. Because his Honor erred in ruling in the remarks made by the witness, Bieman, to Capt. Griffith over the body on the morning of October 9th, 1879, in regard to the supposed blood upon the handkerchief found in the coat-pocket of deceased.

The report of the Circuit judge is as follows:

The defendant was convicted, and thereupon moved the Circuit Court in arrest of judgment, and, failing in that, for a new trial, upon the same grounds upon which he has appealed to the Supreme Court, and which are embodied in the "case."

These grounds, twelve in number, all refer to the insufficiency of proof, except the 11th and 12th, which allege errors in the rulings of the presiding judge. The case rested exclusively upon circumstantial evidence, and I omitted nothing, so far as I remember, in my efforts to explain to the jury the rules of law by which they were to be governed in weighing circumstantial evidence. I endeavored specially to impress upon them the fundamental rule that the circumstances established when *taken together must be consistent with the theory of defendant's guilt, and inconsistent with any other hypothesis; and hence if the facts proved could be explained upon the theory of a killing by the engine and cars of the railroad as satisfactorily as upon the theory of defendant's agency in the homicide, he could not be convicted; nor should he be convicted if the facts found left their minds in doubt as to which theory to refer the killing. I further told them that the surrounding facts and circumstances of time, place, &c., made a prima facie case of killing by the railroad train, and that, before they could convict the defendant, they must find from the other evidence in the case, sufficient proof to rebut this presumption and to satisfy them of defendant's guilty agency beyond a reasonable doubt. In every particular I endeavored to throw around the defendant every safeguard vouchsafed to him under the law applicable to the facts of the case.

Two errors in my ruling and instructions are assigned by the defendant's counsel viz., the 11th and 12th grounds on motion for new trial.

Dr. Addy, an experienced physician, made the post-mortem examination of the dead body of Hook, which had been removed from the spot on the railroad where it was first found. That spot and the scene around it he did not see. This medical expert, after listening to the testimony of those who did view the ground, was permitted to give his opinion as to the length of time the body had probably been dead, and whether or not it was probably dead before a certain time when, by the schedule, the first train passed the road that night. This was allowed, because I regarded it a matter peculiarly competent for an expert to testify to, especially an expert who had himself made the post-mortem examination, and had attentively listened to the statements of those who found the dead body, and described its appearance, position and surroundings. But I took special pains, in charging the jury, to say to them that the opinions of experts, whilst competent testimony, were not to be taken by them as proof of facts, but, on the contrary, should be weighed carefully, and with caution. Such opinions were often errone*ous, and only constituted evidence for a jury to weight along with the other testimony.

The assignment of error in the 12th ground, I did not think well taken. The witness, Bieman, was present with Hawes and Griffith when they came to the dead body on the track. In giving a description of the body, its condition, the signs of blood, the state of the clothing, &c., he stated that in one coat-pocket on which there was no blood a bloody handkerchief was found, upon the discovery of which he remarked to Captain Griffith: "This looks like he was hurt before the train hurt him." I was asked to rule out this remark, but declined to do it, regarding the exclamation or remark of the witness of no consequence, but the fact discovered as alone worthy of weight with the jury. In my charge I so instructed them, telling them that the fact stated, and not the witness' impression, should be considered by them.

The case was earnestly and ably argued on both sides, and submitted to a very intelligent jury. I refused the motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, because I was not made conscious of error in my rulings, and because there was evidence sufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury.

Messrs. H. W. Rice and T. S. Arthur, for appellant.

An expert cannot give an opinion on subjects of general knowledge. 1 Phil. on Ev. 778, 779; 1 Greenl. on Ev. 490; 1 Smith's Lead. Cas. 286; and if the facts are doubtful and remain to be found by the jury, it has been held improper to ask an expert who has heard the evidence, what is his opinion in the case on trial, though he may be asked his opinion upon a similar case hypothetically stated. 1 Greenl. on Ev. 492; 1 Whart. & Stille's Med. Jur., §§ 288, 289. Here the jury being fully competent to draw conclusions from facts, the expert should have confined himself to facts. 2 Whart. & Stille's Med. Jur. (3d ed.,) § 1245.

The 12th exception complains of a ruling which was clearly erroneous. The evidence received was the opinion of a non-expert, and was wholly inadmissible.

ter Scott Hook. Upon the first trial he was convicted, but a new trial was granted him by the Circuit judge, and now, upon the second, he has been convicted again. Upon this, his second conviction, he moved the court below in arrest of judgment, and failing in that for still another trial, on various grounds. These motions were refused by the Circuit judge, and he now appeals to this court.

His grounds of appeal are twelve in number. The first ten embrace exceptions expressed in different forms, to the finding of the jury as to matters of fact, and they attack the verdict for insufficiency of proof. These have been passed upon by the Circuit judge upon motion for a new trial. The evidence against the accused seems to have been circumstantial entirely. In view of this fact the judge, in his charge, threw every possible safeguard around the prisoner. He appears to have impressed fully upon the minds of the jurors the fundamental rule in such cases —that the circumstances established, when taken together, must be consistent with the theory of the defendant's guilt, and inconsistent with any other hypothesis. Under this charge the jury solved these circumstances against the accused, and pronounced him guilty. We see no error of law growing out of these ten exceptions on the part of the Circuit judge in refusing a new trial, and, therefore, they need not be considered further.

The last two exceptions—the 11th and 12th —assign errors of law in the rulings of the Circuit judge, and are properly before us.

The Circuit judge, in his report of the case, states that Dr. Addy, "an experienced physician, made the post-mortem examination of the dead body, which had been removed from the spot on the railroad where it was found." That spot and the scene around it he did not see, but after listening to the testimony of those who did view the ground, Dr. Addy was permitted by the court to give his opinion as to the length of time the body had probably been dead, and whether or not it was *probably dead before a certain train passed the road that night upon schedule time. The ruling of the judge that this testimony was competent, is the basis of the 11th exception.

Mr. Greenleaf, vol. I., Section 440, says: "That in questions of science, skill or trade, or others of like kind, persons of skill, sometimes called experts, may not only testify to facts, but are permitted to give their opinions in evidence. Thus, the opinions of medical men are constantly admitted as to cause of death or disease or the consequences of wounds, and as to the sane or insane state of a person's mind, as collected from a number of circumstances, and as to other objects of professional skill; and such opinions are admissible in evidence, though the witness founds them, not on his own personal observation, but on the case itself as proved by other witnesses."

Dr. Addy, as stated in the report, was an experienced physician, and was in law an expert as to all matters embraced within the range of his profession. Had he seen the dead body, therefore, when first found on the railroad track, there could be no doubt that his opinion as to the length of time it had been dead would be competent, on the ground that he was an expert, and this fact is within the range of his profession.

But this principle, as appears from the authority already cited, does not confine the opinion of the expert to facts coming under his own observation alone, but it permits him to found and express his opinion upon facts testified to by others. This was all that was done in this case, and the authority from Greenleaf seems to be directly in point. It fully warranted, in our judgment, the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the competency of Dr. Addy's opinion.

One of the witnesses who was present when the dead body of the unfortunate Hook was found on the railroad track, in giving a description of the body, its condition, the signs of blood, the state of the clothing, &c., stated that in one coat-pocket on which there was no blood, a bloody handkerchief was found, upon the discovery of which, he further stated, that he remarked to the others present: "This looks like he was hurt before the train hurt him." The judge was asked to rule out this remark, which he declined to do, regarding it, as he says, as the mere exclama*tion of the witness at the time, and of no consequence, the fact discovered alone being worthy of weight with the jury.

In his charge he so instructed the jury, telling them distinctly that the fact stated and not the impression of the witness should be considered by them. Even if the admission of this remark, which is the foundation of the 12th exception, was improper, of which we are not satisfied, the judge, in his charge, in effect ruled it out, as he pointedly instructed the jury that they were not to consider it.

The judge, in the conclusion of his report, states that he refused the motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial, because he was not made conscious of any error in his rulings, and because, in his opinion, there was sufficient evidence to sustain the verdict.

In view of the awful fate impending the accused, we have carefully examined the case, but we see nothing whatever which can be interposed in his behalf. He has now been tried twice. On the first trial the Circuit judge, before whom he was then tried, out of tenderness, no doubt, granted a new trial. Upon the second trial all the safeguards vouchsafed to him by the law were thrown around him by the judge who then tried him. He was again found guilty. We see no error in the rulings excepted to, and there is no other alternative but that the law shall take its course.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Thomson, J., Sumter, February, 1881.

This was an indictment against Wesley Toney, Reece Toney and Lawrence Toney, for malicious trespass. The report of the presiding judge is as follows:

"The said defendants were indicted for malicious trespass. The act charged was the beating and wounding, against the act of assembly, of a cow of D. E. Keels, the prosecutor. The proof was that on November 1st, 1880, the cow was seen in Wesley Toney's lot or cow-pen. The prosecutor said he was thirty or forty yards from the cow-pen and not seen. He saw some one at the cow-pen—his cow was in the pen. Lawrence Toney and another son of Wesley Toney were there—two dogs there—W. Toney was outside of pen; one or both of the dogs had hold of the cow. The cow was very gentle and tame * * * cow lost parts of both ears from biting, and she could not eat for some time. W. Toney did not seem to do anything. Reece Toney struck cow with a rail; one of the dogs had hold of cow. Reece and the other son were setting dogs on; clapping their hands and halloaing, and keeping cow in pen, &c.

"Wesley Toney, for the defense, said: The cow had been in his field, supposed all night, and he directed Reece Toney to drive the cow out of the field. The cow when driven jumped into the cow-pen—he told Reece Toney to open the bars of the lot, and let the cow out, and the cow then went away. The fences of the field and cow-pen were from four feet to neck or chin high. He said the dogs got on the cow, but denied it was by his orders.

"The age of Lawrence Toney was not proved, but it seemed to be admitted he was not fourteen years of age. He was a well-grown boy, apparently at least over twelve years. The facts in the main were not in dispute; the questions were made under requests to charge presented to the court.

"The jury were charged that this was a statutory offence, and *the act of assembly was to be construed strictly. That where by the act the intent constitutes an element of the offence, it must be proved. That express proof of malice against the owner of the animal was not required. That if the prosecutor's cow was willfully beaten and wounded, and the act was unlawful and without excuse, and the owner of the animal known, that the offence of malicious trespass was complete. And the jury were asked as an illustration, would the defendants have done the same injury to a cow of a son or brother, the ownership of the animal being known? That the malice intended by the act could be inferred from the circumstances proved without proving direct malice to the owner of the animal.

"In the case of Lawrence Toney it was left to the jury to determine if malice did not supply age. The prisoner was before them in court, his conduct and acts had been stated in the testimony. Was he conscious that his act was wrongful, or could he discern between right and wrong? If so, he was responsible. That the law looked to capacity for evil as a measure of responsibility as much or more than an infant's having attained the age of fourteen years. Did his acts and conduct show this capacity? Then if guilty he was responsible. The jury found Wesley Toney not guilty. Lawrence Toney and Reece Toney guilty."

Lawrence Toney and Reece Toney appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. His Honor was requested to charge the jury that it was necessary for the state to prove malice on the part of the defendants against the owner of the property alleged to have been injured. His Honor refused to make this charge, and instructed the jury that if at the time the cow was injured they "believed that the defendants knew the owner and connected in their minds the owner with the animal," it was sufficient. The defendants excepted to this as error of law.

2. His Honor was requested to charge the jury that the defendant, Lawrence Toney, was entitled to an acquittal, as according to the testimony he was an infant under the age of fourteen years, and there was no evidence rebutting the presumption of law that he was incapable of committing a crime. His Honor refused to make this charge and the defendants excepted.

Mr. Solicitor J. J. Dargan, contra.

July 16th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. In this case the defendants were indicted for malicious trespass. The act charged was the beating and wounding, against the act of assembly, a cow of Keels, the prosecutor. The presiding judge was requested to charge the jury that it was necessary for the state to prove malice on the part of the defendants against the owner of the property alleged to have been injured. He was further requested to charge that the defendant, Lawrence Toney, was entitled to an acquittal, as, according to the testimony, he was an infant under the age of fourteen years, and there was no evidence rebutting the presumption of law that he was incapable of committing crime. His Honor refused to charge as requested. The defendants were convicted, and Reece Toney and Lawrence Toney have appealed.

The appeal assigns as error in the judge his refusal to charge as requested upon the two points stated.

The terms used in the act under which these defendants have been indicted and convicted are "unlawfully," "willfully" and "maliciously." These terms are not synonymous, and were not intended to express the same idea. They have each a different signification and import different degrees of guilt. As was said by the learned judge in the case of State v. Alexander, 14 Rich. 249, "an act may be unlawful and so involve legal responsibility, without being either willful or malicious, or it may be both unlawful and willful without being malicious. They constitute an ascending scale in culpability—a legal climax."

All of these elements are necessary to the crime denounced in *the act in which these terms are employed, and they must all be proved upon the trial or the defendant is entitled to an acquittal. But what is the true import of the word malicious as used in the act? Does it necessarily embrace the idea of hatred towards the owner of the property injured?

Several authorities have been furnished by the appellant's counsel, both from England and some of the adjoining states, construing statutes in which these words are used, which sustain this view. But in the face of the case of State v. Doig, 2 Rich. 179, we cannot declare that to be the law of South Carolina. In that case Wardlaw, J., said: "Malice is a term of art implying wickedness, and excluding a just cause or excuse. It is implied from an unlawful act, willfully done, until the contrary be proved." Clearly implying that such act may be willful without being actually malicious. In that case the defendant was indicted for breaking down a portion of the canal on Broad river, owned by the state. There was no charge or proof that this was done out of ill-will towards the state, yet he was convicted and punished.

The accepted legal meaning of the term malice, as found in the best lexicographers, is wickedness, and even in the most startling of all crimes—that of willful murder—it is not necessary to show personal ill-will towards the victim of the murderer. Where the heart is devoid of social duty and totally bent on mischief, which may be implied from the character of the act, a party may be convicted even of murder without the slightest proof of personal ill-will towards the deceased.

Under the authorities in this state, then, it would not have been good law for the judge to have charged in this case that defendant could not be convicted in the absence of proof of express malice towards the owner of the cow beat and wounded by the defendants.

This brings us to the second question raised by the appeal. Lawrence Toney was between seven and fourteen years of age. He claimed, through his counsel, that as he was under fourteen the judge should charge "that there was no evidence rebutting the presumption of law that he was incapable of committing crime."

*It is true at common law an infant under fourteen is prima facie doli incapax, and before he can be convicted it should appear to the court that he is doli capax, and is able to discern between good and evil. 4 Blackstone 24. But this principle when enforced most rigidly, would not have demanded of the presiding judge in this case to have charged the jury that there was no proof before them rebutting this presumption, unless it be sound doctrine, as contended by the appellants, that in a question of this kind there must be direct and positive proof as to the fact of capacity independent and outside of the facts and circumstances of the transaction itself.

Out of tenderness to infants—the case with which they may be misled—their want of foresight and their wayward disposition, no doubt, the evidence of malice, which is to supply age, should be strong and clear beyond all doubt and contradiction; 4 Bl. Com. 28; Archb. Crim. Pr. & Pl. (8th ed.) 11; but we find no authority for the position that this evidence must be outside of the facts of the offence itself, and must be directed expressly to the question of capacity. There was no error, then, in the judge submitting this case to the jury upon its own facts, leaving it to them to say whether, under all the circumstances, the offence charged had been committed, both as to the actual beating of the cow and the capacity of the parties charged.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit court be affirmed.

*Before Aldrich, J., Barnwell, July, 1880.

Motion made at Chambers, July 3d, 1880, in behalf of H. M. Myers, executor of Gideon S. Brown (who died in 1878), to set aside renewal execution of Duncan Malony & Co. against G. S. Brown, issued May 11th, 1880, by Robert Aldrich, as attorney for the plaintiffs, upon grounds affecting the regularity and validity of the renewal. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. C. Davant, for appellant.

Mr. Robert Aldrich, contra.

July 16th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. In this case a motion, after notice, was made before his Honor, Judge Aldrich, to set aside an execution upon certain grounds, not necessary now to be noticed.

The notice of the motion, with the affidavits upon which it was made, was served upon Robert Aldrich, Esq., the attorney who had renewed the execution in question, but no notice or summons of any kind in connection with the proceeding had been served upon the parties plaintiff therein. Upon these facts being brought to the attention of the judge he declined to hear the motion, upon the ground that the proper parties were not before the court—the judge holding that the service upon Mr. Aldrich alone was no service upon the parties interested in the execution, and he made the following order:

"The motion is refused, with ten dollars costs to the plaintiff. This is the second motion to stop the sale, made just before the day of sale, which necessarily increases the costs and expenses, and, as the property liable is said to be scant, it is not just to increase the expenses. But as there may be merit in the motion, and no great harm can result by a short delay, it is further ordered if the moving party do pay the costs of this and the expenses of the sales heretofore advertised, the sheriff be restrained from making the sales advertised, and, upon notice to the parties in interest, the motion be set down for hearing on Wednesday, July 14th, 1880."

*To this order Myers excepted, and has appealed to this court upon the following grounds:

"1. That his Honor erred in holding that the service of the motion papers is not the service required by law.

"2. That his Honor, in effect, grants affirmative relief against the moving party in the terms imposed for a rehearing of his motion, and erred therein.

"3. That the renewal of the execution was contrary to law, the execution void, and his Honor erred in refusing to set it aside."

Section 432 of the code provides that "where a party shall have an attorney in the action, the service of papers shall be made upon the attorney instead of the party." This section is invoked in behalf of the appellant in this case.

In our opinion this section applies only after action begun by the service of summons or notice, as the case may be, upon the proper parties. After these have been brought into court then service of all subsequent papers may be made upon the attorneys. But it would be extending the operation of this section far beyond its legitimate purpose and intent to hold that the service of an original summons or notice on the supposed or actual attorney of a party is sufficient to institute original proceedings against him and make him a party to the cause.

For the appellant, then, to get relief under this section, it should appear that action had already commenced against the respondents by the service upon them of the proper notice; that they had already been made parties to the proceeding, and that the notice now served was a notice as to some further proposed action in the progress of the case, and, also, that Mr. Aldrich was their attorney. Do these facts appear? The proceeding here is by motion, and is in the nature of a special proceeding, as contra-distinguished from an ordinary action. Its purpose is to set aside an execution alleged to have been illegally issued. The proceeding is outside and beyond the execution and is intended to assail it. To this proceeding the respondents are necessary parties, and they were entitled to have notice served directly upon them before they could be regarded as in court, or before they could be represented either in person or by attorney.

*Mr. Aldrich was their attorney in the execution, but this does not make him their attorney in this new proceeding, which is intended to attack the execution. With the entry of the execution the duty of Mr. Aldrich ceased in that case. Treasurers v. McDowell, 1 Hill 185 [26 Am. Dec. 166]; Poole v. Gist & Roddy, 4 McC. 259; Hyams v. Michel, 3 Rich. 303.

Such being the fact, it is apparent that the real parties in interest here have had no legal notice whatever, and they are not properly before the court. We see no error, therefore, in the ruling of the Circuit judge that after judgment obtained and execution entered, the duty of the attorney ceased, and in any subsequent proceedings to set aside the judgment and execution, or stay the same, notice must be served on the real parties in interest. This not having been done, he was right in declining to hear the motion on its merits.

The second exception complains that the presiding judge, in effect, granted affirmative relief against the appellant in the terms imposed for a rehearing of the motion. We do not so understand the order. The judge held that the motion, in its present status, could not be heard for the want of parties, but as there might be merit in it he provided for a rehearing upon notice to the proper parties, and in the meantime he stayed the execution upon terms, allowing the appellant the privilege of availing himself or not of the order, as he might be advised, to renew his motion. We do not see any affirmative relief in this to the parties who were not before the court and against the appellant.

The third exception raises a question as to the validity of the execution. In our opinion the execution was not before the court. The motion was dismissed, and properly dismissed, on account of defect of parties. In the absence of these parties any adjudication of the merits of the motion involving the validity of the execution, would have been nugatory. It would have been an ex parte judgment, having no effect whatever on the rights of the respondents.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BENNETT v. SANDIFER.

[Appeal and Error ⇐⇒898.]

In a trial de novo in the Circuit Court on appeal by the defendant from the judgment of a trial justice, the plaintiff is entitled to open and reply; and the denial of this right is appealable to this court.

Before Thomson, J., Barnwell, October, 1880.

The opinion states the case.

McGOWAN, A. J. This case was submitted without any argument on either side. The brief itself is very imperfect and perfunctory, but we gather from it that Miles Bennett sued Riley Sandifer in a trial justice court on an account of $36, the price of six thousand brick, at $6 per thousand, and got a verdict for $15, from which the defendant appealed to the Court of Common Pleas. When the case was reached on the call of the calendar, both sides insisted on the right to open and close. Judge Thomson denied this right to the plaintiff and accorded it to the defendant, for whom the jury found. The plaintiff appeals to this court and moves for a new trial, on the ground of error in the said ruling of the Circuit judge.

The general rule certainly is that the plaintiff who makes a claim shall have the opening and reply, unless the defendant shall admit the plaintiff's cause by the pleadings and take upon himself the burden of proof, under Rule 59 of the Circuit Court Rules, p. 32. We see nothing tending to show that such was the course here. Does it alter the case that this was an appeal from a trial justice court, in which the defendant was the appellant? The same rule above cited, also declares that "on all motions or special matters, either springing out of a cause or otherwise, the actor or party submitting the same to the court, should, in like manner, begin and close."

*It does not appear upon what ground the judge accorded the position of "actor" to the defendant. We are not informed as to the character of the defence, whether it was simply a denial of the plaintiff's account, payment of it, or a counter claim. It does, however, appear that the case involved more than $10, and that it was submitted to a jury; and we, therefore, infer that the appeal was upon an issue of fact and "not upon a question of law only," which would have carried it before the judge on the evidence taken below. Assuming, then, that it was an issue of fact, the effect of defendant's appeal was simply to give a new trial in the Circuit Court. Code, § 369. In such case the process originally issued, but not the evidence taken below, shall be returned to the court above, and the "issue shall be tried in the same manner as in actions commenced in the Circuit Court." Code, 4th subdiv., § 383. Although this trial "de novo," was the effect of defendant's appeal, the plaintiff was still the "actor" and entitled to open and close his case. How else could the case be tried? Such is necessarily the practice in all new trials as in original trials, upon the universal principle that he who affirms must prove, and that no one can be required to prove a negative.

Whether the ruling complained of was such an error of the law as may be corrected on appeal to this court, is not so clear. There is a class of rulings which must necessarily be left to the discretion of the Circuit judge, such as continuing cases, granting further time to answer, &c. There are others not final, but administrative in character, which are not appealable to this court. The amendment of the code (15 Stat. 868), gives this court the right to review final judgment, and any intermediate order "necessarily affecting the judgment." It is not always easy to decide whether a ruling necessarily affects the judgment. It is especially difficult if it does not touch directly the question of law or fact constituting the cause of action or the defence, but is one of those rulings made in the progress of a case relating to its conduct and the order of proceeding falling under the general head of practice. Can we say that it would "necessarily affect the judgment," whether the plaintiff or defendant had the opening and reply? Yet the right is considered, by those who know best, as of great consequence. Orders may be made as to the mode of *trying a case, which would as certainly "affect the judgment" as if they related directly to the law and evidence involved.

In the case of Blakely & Copeland v. Frazier, 11 S. C. 134, this court held that a defendant had the right to have the venue changed to the county where he resided, and that the refusal to grant an application for that purpose was an error in a matter involving a substantial right material to his defence, and appealable. The court says: "The jurisdiction of this court extends to all appeals from intermediate orders and final judgments in actions where such order or judgment involves the merits. 15 Stat. 868. An order involving merely the exercise of discretion on the part of the court making it, is not appealable, as error of law cannot be alleged as against such an order. 1 Wait's Pr. 465. When, however, the order affects a substantial right, necessarily affecting the judgment, it must be regarded as affecting the merits. The term 'merits' is not very clearly defined. It certainly embraces more than the questions of law and fact, constituting the cause of action or defence. As it regards the principle of construction, the necessary means of attaining an end stand upon the same grounds of privilege as the end itself. * * * Whatever can be regarded as affecting the necessary means of obtaining a judgment, must be regarded as affecting the judgment itself."

We think the general rule which gives to the plaintiff the opening and reply "in actions commenced in the Circuit Courts" should have been held to apply to "the new trial"—the mode provided by the law to give to the appellant the benefit of his appeal. Such is the usual course in ordinary new trials. The ruling deprived the plaintiff of a substantial right material to his case, and thereby necessarily affecting the judgment. Johnson v. Wideman, Dud. 327; Brown v. Kirkpatrick, 5 S. C. 268.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case remanded to that court for a new trial.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

Before Thomson, J., Orangeburg, May, 1880.

Action commenced September 9th, 1874, by Zipporah R. Shuler, against William H. Bull and Waring Bull. Pending suit Waring Bull died, and the action was continued against W. H. Bull alone. The nature of the plaintiff's claim and of the defences are stated in the opinion. The release relied on by defendant was executed in 1867, during the pendency of a suit instituted in the Court of Equity in 1866, by Lincey M. Burkett, Dorcas E. Griffin, D. G. B. Shuler and Z. R. Shuler, his wife, against William H. Bull and Waring A. Bull, executors and trustees under the will of William Bull, deceased, for account, payment of interest, &c. This release was as follows:

Know all men by these presents: That we, Lincey M. Burkett, Dorcas E. Griffin, David G. B. Shuler, and Zipporah R., his wife, do hereby release and forever discharge William H. Bull and Waring A. Bull from all liabilities, debts, claims or actions or suits at law or in equity, which he is under or liable to us, or either of us, by reason of any bequest or legacy to Lincey M. Burkett and her children, under the will of William Bull, the father of the said Lincey M. Burkett and

William H. *Bull, of which the said William H. Bull and Waring A. Bull were the executors and trustees, or by reason of any receipts by them received, or payments or investments by them made in regard to the same from the beginning of the world to the date of these presents.

Witness our hands and seals this fourteenth day of January, anno domini one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

Lincey M. Burkett. [L. S.]
Dorcas E. Griffin. [L. S.]
David G. B. Shuler. [L. S.]
Zipporah R. Shuler. [L. S.]

It was duly witnessed. D. G. B. Shuler and his wife, Zipporah, both survived Lincey M. Burkett, who died in August, 1874. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

These questions, in order, are: The illegitimacy of the plaintiff, the alleged investment of the funds in Confederate securities, and the release. The defendant excepts, because, as he alleges, the testimony proves the illegitimacy of the plaintiff, and that the referee erred in not finding that as a fact. The referee does not, in words, say that he regarded the plaintiff legitimate; but unless he is of opinion that an illegitimate child of Lincey M. Burkett could take under the terms of the will, he must have regarded the plaintiff legitimate to reach his conclusion of law.

The referee has found as a fact that Lincey M. Burkett was living with Andrew Keller when the plaintiff was born. There is proof that Z. Burkett was in the country, and was living after plaintiff's birth. The relations of Andrew Keller and Lincey M. Burkett were such that he may be—the court may go further and say he was, probably—the father of the plaintiff. The proof, however, upon a question of this kind, is peculiar. To bastardize the issue of a married woman, non-access of the husband must be proved. Proof of probable paternity by another man than the husband is not enough. In a word, the question is not so much who is the father of the child, as, could the husband have had access to the wife. Reasons of policy, public decency, and the peace of families, require the observance of the principle, "Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant."

The usual *proof adduced to overcome this presumption is the absence of the husband beyond the seas, or of facts showing that the husband could not have been the father of the child.

There is no question as to the paternity of Lincey M. Burkett's oldest child; and the evidence impresses the court that fidelity in these relations was not a marked characteristic of Lincey M. Burkett.

Is the proof of non-access of the husband so complete that Z. Burkett could not have been the father of the plaintiff? Though undoubtedly strong, the proof does not seem of that conclusive kind required in these cases—proof that there could not have been access of the husband. Upon this point the court concurs in the conclusion of the referee, that the plaintiff takes under the will as a child of Lincey M. Burkett.

The plaintiff, when she executed the release, was a married woman, though of age. Her interest was a remainder, to take effect in possession upon her mother's death. To make this transaction valid, her interest should have been assigned or released through the intervention of the court.

Giving effect, however, to the release as an act of her husband, with what has she parted? May she not yet claim a settlement? This she can do until her husband reduces her expectant legacy into possession. The husband cannot transfer a greater interest than his own. He has never reduced the legacy to possession, nor could he during the life-estate.

The executors were aware of the wife's rights; indeed, they were trustees to preserve her rights until division was made according to the will. Whatever interest the husband had, they may have, but no more. But the relation of trustee and cestui que trust existed between the plaintiff and defendant. This required on the part of the trustee the utmost fairness of dealing in a settlement, and especially when the transaction was with one who had but lately attained her age. The circumstances under which the release was given, what knowledge of her rights was communicated to the plaintiff, the consideration of the release, how much, if paid, are not clear, and strengthen the plaintiff's statement that she did not have full information to which, in such a settlement, she was entitled. The court con-curs in *the conclusion of the referee, that the release is no defence or bar to the suit.

In directing the payment of a specific sum of money, the referee went too far. The plaintiff seeks equity, and must do it. An account must be taken, and in taking the account, whatever sum she received from the executors at the time the release was given, must be included as a credit; but not money received by her husband. So, too, the question of investments in Confederate securities must be considered, and any payment legally made by the executors for the plaintiff connected with the legacy.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed: That the exceptions to the referee's report upon the defences of illegitimacy and the release be overruled. That the exception as to an account be sustained, and that it be referred to T. B. Whaley, Esq., as special referee to take an account between the parties, including in the accounting any money or payment received by the plaintiff connected with her release, but not money received by her husband; that he consider the question of alleged investments by the executors in Confederate securities, and also take in the accounting any payments made by the executors to the plaintiff connected with the legacy. That, if need be, he summon witnesses and take testimony in reference to the said matters, and make his report of actions to this court.

Defendant appealed.

Bull, (the latter of whom has since died,) in trust for the use of his daughter, Lincey M. Burkett, during her natural life, and after her death to be equally divided among her children. The interest on this fund was regularly paid to Mrs. Burkett during her life. She died in August, 1874, leaving the plaintiff and another daughter, Dorcas, surviving her.

†Here, as elsewhere, points not decided by the court, are omitted, as also the authorities cited to sustain them.—Reporter.

In September, after her death, the plaintiff instituted this ac*tion against the defendant to recover this legacy, claiming to be a child of the said Lincey. The defendant answered the complaint with a general denial as a first defence, and pleading as a second defence a written release signed by Lincey M. Burkett, Dorcas E. Griffin, David B. Shuler and the plaintiff, his wife, Zipporah R. Shuler, dated January 14th, 1867, under seal, a copy of which will be found in the "case."

The cause at this stage was referred to T. B. Whaley, Esq., as special referee, "to hear and determine the issues therein."

The referee found as matter of fact: 1. "That the sum of $1704 came into the hands of the executors of William Bull, as alleged in the complaint.

2. "That Lincey M. Burkett, the life tenant, died August 12th, 1874, leaving two children, Dorcas E. Griffin and the plaintiff surviving her.

3. "That the plaintiff was born in 1843 while her mother lived with one Andrew Keller on the premises of F. N. Hart.

4. "That the plaintiff united with her husband, sister and mother in the execution of the release, but without due information or knowledge of her rights.

5. "That Waring A. Bull died since the commencement of this action."

He found as matter of law: 1. "That plaintiff is entitled to one moiety of the fund with interest, thereon from August 12th, 1874.

2. "That plaintiff is not bound or estopped by the release.

3. "He adjudged and ordered that defendant pay the plaintiff the sum of $1157.65 and the costs," submitting with his report the testimony.

To this report of the referee the defendant excepted, assigning as error: 1. That the referee did not report as to the investments by the executor of the trust funds in Confederate currency during the war.

2. That he did not report as to the legitimacy of the plaintiff; and

3. That he erred in reporting that plaintiff executed the release without due information and knowledge of her rights, and that she was not estopped thereby.

*The cause, upon this report and exceptions, was heard by Judge Thomson at the May Term of the court for Orangeburg, 1880.

Judge Thomson decided that the exceptions of defendant as to the illegitimacy of plaintiff and as to the release be overruled, and that the case be remanded to the referee for an accounting between the parties; upon which accounting he directed that the question of investment in Confederate currency by the executors be considered.

The defendant appealed from this decree upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor erred in finding that plaintiff is the legitimate child of Lincey M. Burkett and entitled to take under the will of William Bull.

2. "Because his Honor erred in finding the release no defence or bar to the present action."

For the proper adjudication of the questions raised it is not necessary for this court to express any opinion as to the paternity of the plaintiff.

Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant is the general rule, and ordinarily, as was well said by Judge Thomson, "reasons of policy, public decency and the peace of families require the observance of this principle." But while this is true as a general rule, and was formerly adhered to with considerable strictness, yet it has undergone some change and relaxation, and now evidence may be introduced to overcome the presumption arising from marriage.

Shakespeare in his drama of King John, act I., scene 1, gives us a trial before the Aula Regis, the king himself being present in person, Fitz-Peter being chief justiciar, in a "legitimacy case" as it was called, which involved the legitimacy of one who was said to be the illegitimate son of Richard Cœur de Lion. In that trial the doctrine pater est quem, subject, however, to the exception of the absence of the husband extra quartuor maria, was contended for, and Lady Faucombridge having remained in England while her husband was employed in Germany, the defendant was found illegitimate, much stress being given to the testimony of Dowager Queen Eleanor, who declared that the defendant had a "trick of Cœur de Lion's face," and that "she read in his com*position the token of her son, and she was sure that she was his grandame." So by the advice of Lord Chief Justice Fitz-Peter, judgment was given for the plaintiff, while the defendant, kneeling before the king, rose Sir Richard Plantaganet. Lives of the Chief Justices vol. I., p. 43.

Judge Thomson ruled as matter of law, in substance, that nothing short of proof of impossibility of access could overthrow the presumption arising from marriage, and he based his decree upon the fact that the evidence did not show that this impossibility existed in this case.

We think that Judge Thomson contracted the principle applicable to such cases within too narrow a boundary, and in endeavoring to solve correctly the delicate question of fact which was before him, he applied an incorrect principle of law. The law as it now stands is: That a question of paternity is in itself a question of fact, to be determined like any other question of fact—by testimony, the principle pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant having its full influence, subject, however, to such competent evidence as in the judgment of the jury may be sufficient to overthrow it; and this may be done by proof other than impossibility of access. It may be done by showing non-access, or any other facts which may satisfy the minds of the jury.

True, out of regard to the sacred interest involved in the marriage relation, the happiness and reputation of families, the character of children, and the public peace, evidence of this character should be watched with great care and admitted with great caution by the courts; but such testimony is competent, and, when admitted, is entitled to be considered.

Judge Thomson in his decree said: "Is the proof of non-access of the husband so complete that Z. Burkett could not have been the father of the plaintiff? Though undoubtedly strong, the proof does not seem of that conclusive kind required in such cases —proof that there could not have been access of the husband." In the absence of this proof, and on account of its absence he found as matter of fact that plaintiff was legitimate.

In State v. Shumpert, 1 S. C. 87, Moses, C. J., quoting from 2 Greenl. on Ev. 125, said: "A child born during coverture is presumed to be legitimate; proof of non-access, or any*thing else which plainly shows that, in the course of nature, the husband could not be the father of the child, removes the force of this presumption. If the husband and wife had the opportunity of intercourse this merely strengthens the presumption of legitimacy." And, again, he says: "The rule is stated in clear terms in the answer of the Lord Chief Justice in the celebrated Banbury Peerage case, 1 Sim. & Stu., 153, where he says: "That the fact of birth of a child from a woman united to a man by lawful wedlock is generally by the law of England prima facie evidence that such child is legitimate. That such prima facie evidence of legitimacy may always be lawfully rebutted by satisfactory evidence that such access did not take place between husband and wife as by the laws of nature is necessary in order for the man to be in fact the father of the child." The same doctrine is laid down in Reeves Dom. Rel., 271; in Phil. Evid. 630, and in numerous decided cases in England.

Under the force of these authorities, without going into the question whether in this case the evidence was sufficient to establish the illegitimacy of the plaintiff, we think that Judge Thomson reached his conclusion upon this question of fact by the light of a principle which he incorrectly applied as a principle of law, and in this respect that he erred.

The next question is as to the effect of the release. The referee found as matter of fact that the plaintiff executed the release without due information or knowledge of her rights. In this finding Judge Thomson concurred, and he held the release to be no defence or bar to this suit.

From the view which we take of this case it is not necessary to determine whether this finding is fully sustained by the weight of the evidence, or whether the evident preponderance is the other way. The release here was not only executed by the plaintiff, but it was also executed by her husband. They signed it at the same time. There is no evidence in the case, nor is there any finding either by the referee or the judge as to the information of the husband as to the matters intended to be settled by the release. In the absence of all proof on that subject we must take it for granted that he at least understood what he was doing, and while no judgment of the court, in his absence as a *party, will be conclusive upon him, yet his acts, unassailed, may bind others.

Now, what interest did the plaintiff take under the will of her grandfather in the legacy in question? and what effect did the release, executed by her husband, with full understanding as to its purport and effect, have upon that interest?

The will is not set out in the case, but in the complaint it is stated that William Bull died in 1852; that he directed, inter alia, that the legacy should be held by his executors in trust for the use of his daughter during her natural life, and after her death to be equally divided among her children. At the time of the execution of this will the plaintiff was near ten years of age; her sister, Dorcas, had also been born. The will was made, no doubt, with the knowledge of these facts on the part of this old man, and these grandchildren of his were in all probability especial objects of his bounty. They took a vested remainder in the legacy given to their mother for life. This vested remainder was in personal property, and the interest of the plaintiff was personal estate. To what extent did the marital rights of the husband attach to this interest, is the important question now to be considered. William Bull, the grandfather, died years before the adoption of the constitution of 1868. At that time the marital rights of the husband did not only attach to all personal property in the possession of the wife at the time of the marriage, but authorized him to reduce to possession all such as rested in action, or had not been reduced to possession by the wife.

The interest of the wife here was a chose in action, her title being complete, but the payment postponed to the death of her mother. In some respects it was like a note or bond, due at a future day. Did the husband have the right to assign or release this future payment upon a present consideration? Was his assignment and release such a reduction to possession as his marital rights authorized and empowered him to make of the personal estate of his wife?

At first, in this state, the right of the husband to assign the interests of the wife, not in possession, seemed to depend upon the fact whether the interest in question was vested or contin*gent, using these terms in their technical sense. And it was said, in the case of Terry v. Brunson, 1 Rich. Eq. 78, "that a vested right of the wife may be effectually assigned by the husband, but her contingent interest will survive to her against his assignee, even though the assignment was made for a valuable consideration and with her concurrence." In Larey v. Beazley, 9 Rich. Eq. 119, it was ruled "that where the wife has an expected interest in chattels, whether such interest be vested or contingent, legal or equitable, no act of the husband, or of any third person, investing the husband or wife, or both, with the present or particular estate, will operate to vest the future or expectant interest of the wife in her husband."

Other cases since have recognized this principle, but this does not touch the question here. It decides that there can be no merger of the remainder of the wife by the husband obtaining the particular estate upon which it depends. In such case the remainder will still exist as the right of the wife. But the doctrine of merger is not involved in this case.

In Reese v. Holmes, 5 Rich. Eq. 562, Chancellor Johnstone, who delivered the opinion in the case of Terry v. Brunson, supra, in a very elaborate and full discussion of all the cases upon this subject, both in England and in this state, in a circuit decree which was adopted as the opinion of the Appeal Court, announced the conclusion to be: "That neither the husband nor the wife alone, nor the husband and wife acting jointly, have the power during coverture, without the sanction of the court, to assign the wife's vested remainder in slaves expectant upon the termination of a life estate therein, so as to defeat the right of the wife to the remainder when it falls in, should the husband then be dead; should the husband be alive when the remainder falls in, and he then have the right to reduce it to possession, his previous assignment will, it seems, hold good." Chancellor Johnstone, with that earnest desire always to be right, which was a beautiful and prominent trait in his character, and with that frankness which characterized all his judicial utterances, in the discussion of this case admitted that his language in the case of Terry v. Brunson had not been sufficiently guarded, and that his meaning was loosely and inaccurately expressed. He says that the words *vested and contingent, used in that case, were intended in the sense of accrued and yet to accrue.

In Duke v. Palmer, 10 Rich. Eq. 380, following the case of Reese v. Holmes, supra, it was held that where the wife has an expectant interest in chattels, though a transfer or concurrence in the transfer of her interest by herself and husband will not bind her if she be the survivor when the expectancy falls in, yet if, at that time, they both be living, and he be capable of reducing the expectancy to possession, they will both be bound by the transfer. This appears to be the law in this state, as held in several cases cited in Reese v. Holmes and Duke v. Palmer, supra.

Now, in this case the husband and wife were both alive at the falling in of the estate of the life tenant. Is there anything to prevent the principle held in these cases from applying? Section 8, Article XIV. of the constitution of 1868, in reference to the rights of married women, is relied upon. The life estate fell in after the adoption of the constitution, and it is contended that the plaintiff being at that time entitled to the possession of this legacy, and not until then, she was entitled to it free from the marital rights of her husband.

As we have seen, the interest of the plaintiff in the legacy was a vested remainder, the title to which passed to her at the death of her grandfather. It was in her when she married and during coverture. Upon this vested title the marital rights of her husband attached, at least so far as to give him the right to reduce the property into possession if it should fall in at any time during coverture; and in addition to this, as held in the cases of Reese v. Holmes and Duke v. Palmer, he had the right to contract with reference to this interest of his wife, whether it was a vested or contingent interest, subject to the peril only of his wife being the survivor at the time when this interest should fall in. This being so, to subject his contract now to a new condition and a new peril, by virtue of subsequent legislation, either by legislative enactments or constitutional provisions, would be in violation of well-established principles. A state can no more impair an existing contract by a constitutional provision than by an act *of the legislature —both are within the prohibition of the federal constitution. Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 628 [21 L. Ed. 212]. The law which exists at the time and place of making a contract enters into and forms a part of it. Walker v. Whitehead, 16 Wall. 317 [21 L. Ed. 357]. True, it is said in both Reese v. Holmes and Duke v. Palmer, supra, that the validity of the assignment of the husband depends, not only upon both being alive when the expectancy falls in, but, also, that he shall then be capable of reducing this expectancy into possession.

The right to reduce to possession this expectancy was one of the rights embraced in the jure mariti when this plaintiff married. This right had vested in D. B. Shuler, the husband, before the adoption of the constitution of 1868. This capacity to act under this right attached and became complete upon the marriage. Now, without undertaking to speculate as to the manner in which this capacity might have been lost before the falling in of the expectancy, it is enough to say that in our opinion the constitution of 1868 did not, and could not legally create such incapacity. This would be divesting vested rights. We think that the release set up as a defence in this case having been executed by the husband, and there being no proof or allegation that he was without due knowledge and information, it should have been held as a bar to this action.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

*July 18th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The indictment in this case contained a count for burglary, a count for arson and a count for grand larceny. The jury rendered a general verdict of guilty, upon which the defendants moved, before the Circuit judge, to arrest the judgment and for a new trial, substantially upon the following grounds:

1. Because there was an improper joinder of offences in the indictment.

2. Because the judge erred in instructing the jury that where two or more persons are on trial and the testimony of an accomplice is relied on, which is corroborated as to one of the accused and not as to the others, this will warrant the jury in finding all of the defendants guilty.

These motions were refused by the Circuit judge, except so far as the motion to arrest the judgment for arson was concerned, which was granted, whereupon the defendants appeal upon the grounds above stated, and upon the additional grounds that the arrest of the judgment for arson operates as an arrest of the whole judgment; and that the testimony of C. L. Peeples, to the effect that he had heard the two accomplices, who were introduced as witnesses by the state, make the same statements, out of court, not in the presence of the accused, that they made while on the stand.

First, as to the question whether the offences named can be joined in the same indictment. The rule upon this subject seems to be that there is no valid objection to the joinder of several distinct felonies in the same indictment, and that such joinder constitutes no ground for demurrer or motion in arrest of judgment. 1 Chitty on Cr. L. 253; Young v. King, 3 T. R. 98; State v. Johnson, 3 Hill 1; State v. Tidwell, 5 Strob. 1; State v. Nelson, 14 Rich. 172 [94 Am. Dec. 132]. But where the several felonies charged all grow out of the same transaction, the jury should be distinctly instructed as to the effect of a general verdict of guilty, which is understood to find the highest offence charged, if there is testimony to support it, in order that they may shape their verdict so as to conform to their real convictions by finding upon each count separately. State v. Nelson, supra; State v. Priester,

*Cheves 105. If, however, distinct felonies are charged in separate counts, not growing out of the same transaction, then the proper practice is to require the prosecuting officer to select one of the felonies and confine himself to it, even though no motion to that effect should be made by the accused. State v. Nelson, supra.

The case of State v. Fant et al., 2 Brev. 487, though, at first view, somewhat in conflict with these views, is not really so. In that case Fant was indicted, as keeper of a tavern, for allowing the other defendants to game in his house, and the others were indicted for gaming, the punishment in the former case being a fine of $50, and in the latter case a fine of $25. So that in Fant's case there were not only different offences joined in the same indictment, but different persons were charged with different offences in the same indictment. It does not distinctly appear whether the defendants were all charged in the same count, but the inference is that they were, for the statement is: "The defendants were all included in one indictment, which did not state any particular place where the offences were committed." The judgment was arrested by the Circuit judge "because two distinct offences were laid in the same indictment," and all that is said upon this point by the Court of Appeals is: "The judgment was properly arrested on the first ground of objection to the conviction. The offences are distinct different in their nature, and admitting of different degrees of punishment, and ought not to have been combined in the same indictment."

The probability is, as we have said, that there was but one count in the indictment, but even had there been two, the case would not be decisive of the one now under consideration, for in that case different persons were indicted for different offences in the same indictment, while here the same persons are charged in different counts of the same indictment with different offences; and the court in Fant's case, which was an indictment for misdemeanor, certainly could not have intended to decide that the same persons could not be charged in different counts of the same indictment with different misdemeanors, as that would be opposed to the current of the authorities.

felonies charged *all grew out of the same act, for although it is asserted in the argument that such was the fact—that the building was broken into, robbed and then set fire to—yet as these facts do not appear in the "case" as prepared for argument here, we cannot regard them as entering into the case which we are called upon to decide. It does not appear, however, either that any instruction was given to the jury to shape their verdict so as to show what particular felony they intended to find the prisoners guilty of, or that the prosecuting officer was required to elect upon which count he would proceed, and, therefore, we think there should be a new trial.

The next inquiry is, whether the Circuit judge erred in saying to the jury that if the testimony of the accomplices was corroborated as to one of the defendants, this would warrant the jury in finding all of the defendants guilty. It seems to be very well settled that the testimony of an accomplice is competent, but that the usual practice is for the presiding judge to advise the jury not to convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice. 2 Stark. on Ev. 23, 24; Roscoe on Cr. Ev. 120, 121; 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 380; State v. Wingo, 11 S. C. 275, note. But these authorities also show that it is not necessary that the accomplice should be corroborated in every particular; but that where he is corroborated in some portions of his testimony material to the issue, the jury may regard this as sufficient to warrant them in giving credit to his whole story.

The object of the corroboration is not to add strength to the proof of the fact as to which the accomplice may be corroborated, but to test the credibility of the accomplice; and if the jury find that he is truthful in regard to some of the matters in issue, they may regard him as entitled to credit in other matters as to which he is not corroborated. As is said in 2 Stark. on Ev. 24: "It seems that it is not necessary that the accomplice should be confirmed in every circumstance, or with respect to each of the prisoners against whom he testifies. If it were necessary to confirm his evidence in all points, his testimony would be useless. * * * His evidence upon points where he is confirmed by unimpeachable evidence is useless: the question is, whether he is to be believed upon points where he receives no confirmation.

and of *this the jury are to form their opinion from the nature of his testimony, his manner of delivering it and the confirmation which it receives, derived from other evidence which is unsuspected. If, upon such consideration, his character be established as the witness of truth, he is credible in matters where he is not corroborated."

See, also, Rex v. Jones, 2 Camp. 133, in which four prisoners were convicted upon the testimony of an accomplice, whose testimony as to one of the prisoners was not corroborated, and the case being referred to the twelve judges they held unanimously that the conviction was legal. So in Roscoe on Cr. Ev. 120, 121, it is said: "Where on the trial of several prisoners an accomplice who gave evidence was confirmed in his testimony with regard to some of the prisoners, but not as to the rest, Bayley, J., informed the jury that if they were satisfied by the confirmatory evidence that the accomplice was a credible witness, they might act upon his testimony with respect to others of the defendants, though, as far as his evidence affected them, he had received no confirmation." It is true that in 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 381, it is said that there are differences of opinion upon this subject, some judges holding that when several prisoners are on trial confirmation should be required as to all before they can all be safely convicted; but we think the rule laid down by Starkie, in the passage above cited, is more in accordance with principle.

Indeed, as long as the testimony of an accomplice is competent and as long as the jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of witnesses, we see no reason why a jury may not convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, provided they are satisfied of the truthfulness of his testimony; and if corroboration in certain particulars or as to certain of the parties charged satisfies them that credit should be given to the whole testimony of the accomplice, they certainly would be fully warranted in acting upon such testimony. See State v. Brown, 3 Strob. 508. We do not think there was any error in that portion of the charge which relates to this subject.

The next inquiry is, whether arresting the judgment for arson operated as an arrest of the entire judgment. We do not see how the position taken in this ground of appeal can be sustained. We *are not informed as to the ground upon which the Circuit judge arrested the judgment for arson, but we can very well understand that where an indictment contains several counts one of them may be so defective in form as not to warrant any judgment upon it, and if in such a case the judgment be arrested as to such defective count, we know of no reason, and have heard none suggested, why this should affect in any way the other good counts or prevent judgment being rendered upon them.

While, therefore, we do not think the ground as taken can be sustained, yet we do think that this furnishes a good ground for a new trial. The verdict was a general verdict, and according to the rule above stated, as laid down in State v. Nelson, such a verdict is understood to apply to the highest offence charged in the indictment, where there is testimony to support it; and although we are not informed as to the testimony in this case, yet it may be that the testimony was sufficient to convict under the count charging arson, but not sufficient to convict of either of the other offences charged; and as no judgment can now be rendered under the count for arson, it may be that these defendants have received judgment for offences of which the jury did not intend to convict them. In this uncertainty we think it proper that the defendants should have the benefit of another trial. State v. Anderson, 1 Strob. 455.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the competency of the testimony of Peeples. It is not very clear from the statement furnished us what were the exact facts or how this question arose, but as well as we can understand it, Peeples was offered by the state as a witness to corroborate the testimony of the two accomplices who had also been used as witnesses by the state, and that for this purpose he was allowed to prove that these accomplices had made the same statements out of court that they made while on the stand as witnesses. If this be a correct statement of what occurred, then we think that the testimony of Peeples was incompetent. Davis v. Kirksey, 2 Rich. 176.

It would certainly be no corroboration of an accomplice to prove that the statement made by him under oath conformed to that which he had previously made while not under oath. That is not our idea of corroboration. The facts sworn to by the ac*complice must be shown by other witnesses, or by circumstances, to be true, in whole or in part, not merely that he has previously stated the same facts. The object of the corroborating evidence is to test the truthfulness of the accomplice, and surely the fact that he has, while not under oath, told the same story which he tells upon the stand affords no such test. The accomplice goes upon the stand under a cloud, with the presumption against his truthfulness, but when it is shown by independent unimpeachable evidence that some of the facts material to the issue, which he has sworn to, are true, that may satisfy the jury that his whole story is worthy of credence. The testimony of Peeples did not furnish any independent evidence of the truth of any of the facts testified to by the accomplices, and therefore lacked the essential element of corroborative evidence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

MOORE v. SANDERS.

[Wills ⇐601.]

A will provided as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath my whole estate both real and personal, all that I now possess or may hereafter become possessed of, to my beloved son Matthew. Learning that the law takes cognizance of the intention, even when illegally expressed, I desire to express my wish, as strongly and emphatically as I can do so by will, that my beloved son Matthew shall inherit, possess and own, in fee simple, all my worldly goods—to dispose of as he may think fit. But should he die without leaving a will, then the whole to go" over. Held, that the limitation over depended upon a condition subsequent, which was void because repugnant to the estate devised, and that Matthew held, in fee simple absolute, a tract of land derived under this will.

July 20th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. This is a case submitted without action under section 389 of the Code. It appears that Matthew S. Moore, the respondent, bargained to sell and convey, in fee simple, a certain tract of land to George M. Sanders, the appellant, for $3500. Moore offered and is still ready to execute titles, but Sanders declines to accept his deed, alleging that Moore cannot convey in fee. Moore's title is derived from the will of his mother, Mrs. Sarah J. C. Elliott, deceased. So much of this will as it is necessary to consider, is in the following language: "I give and bequeath my whole estate, both real and personal, all that I now possess or may hereafter become possessed of, to my beloved son, Matthew S. Moore. Learning that the law takes cognizance of the intention, even when illegally expressed, I desire to express my wish as strongly and emphatically as I can do so by will, that my beloved son, Matthew S. Moore, shall inherit, possess and own, in fee simple, all my worldly goods, to dispose of as he may think fit. But should he die without leaving a will, then the whole to go to my grandchildren, share and share alike. The child or children of any grandchildren who may die before such division taking the share which the parent would have been entitled to had said parent lived to the period of said distribution or division."

Upon the hearing below Judge Thomson decreed that the estate devised to Moore is a fee and that he is able to make good and sufficient titles to Sanders. Sanders excepted to this decree. *His appeal brings up the single question: "Did Moore take under the will of Mrs. Elliott a fee indefeasible in the land in question?

It will be seen on reading the will that Mrs. Elliott in the beginning of the clause above, bequeathed and devised to her son, the respondent, her entire personal property, and also a fee in all of her real estate; and if there was no other provision in her will, no difficulty whatever could have arisen as to its construction. She, however, with the view, as she thought, more distinctly to declare her intention, went further, and, as is not uncommon in such cases, instead of more clearly expressing her purpose, said just enough to create doubt and to demand the assistance of the courts to ascertain and declare what she really did mean. After giving her whole estate to her son, in the first part of the clause above quoted, in the latter she directed that if her son should die without leaving a will, then the whole should go to her grandchildren, share and share alike. It is here that the ambiguity arises. It is contended that this portion of the clause attached a condition to the estate previously given, which, if not complied with by Moore, will forfeit the estate, and, therefore, that he is not able to convey a perfect title, absolute and indefeasible.

Conditions are of two kinds—conditions precedent and conditions subsequent. A condition precedent is a condition upon the happening of which an estate will vest. A condition subsequent defeats an estate already vested. It is contended that this is a condition subsequent.

It is a general rule as to conditions subsequent, that to be valid they must not be repugnant to the estate given or devised. They must not be an exception to the very thing, that is, to the substance of the gift; if so, they are void, and the estate granted will stand unaffected by such conditions. Thus, in Blackstone Bank v. Davis, 21 Pick. 42, it was held that "a condition in a grant or devise that the grantee shall not alienate, is void, because repugnant to the estate." Also in Bradley v. Peixoto, 3 Ves. 324, it was held that an exception to the very thing itself by way of condition is null. 2 Bl. C.; 2 Washb. on Real Prop. 6, lay down the doctrine clearly that a condition subsequent, in*consistent with and repugnant to the amplitude of the powers of the estate granted is void, and, therefore, no condition.

Now, test this clause of Mrs. Elliott's will by this principle. It is conceded that an estate in fee was devised in the first instance by Mrs. Elliott to her son. The power of alienation belongs to a fee; in fact it is the very essence of a fee. Is the condition which the latter portion of the clause attempts to attach to the devise inconsistent with and repugnant to this devise? The performance of the condition would require Moore to die in possession of the real estate devised to him. In no other way could he leave a will disposing of it.

The condition, then, is a direct and positive restriction upon his powers of alienation. The will invests him with a fee, but the condition strikes at the very substance of this fee, and if valid would take away and destroy its most important and essential quality—the power of sale. A fee may be defeated by a condition which is independent of the estate granted upon the happening of which the estate is lost; but a condition, the effect of which is to cut down a fee to a less estate, is void because repugnant to the fee. Such is the character of the condition in this case, and according to the authorities cited is void.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Johnson, 19 S. C. 497, to the definition of negligence.]

Before Thomson, J., Aiken, September, 1880.

This was an action by Marina S. Gunter against the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, a body corporate, commenced October 4th, 1879, for injuries to the plaintiff in the August preceding, resulting in the loss of her right eye, to her damage $10,000. The defendants admitted the injury, but alleged that it was the result of an accident incident to her employment, was caused by a fellow-servant, and by her own gross negligence. The defendant denied the allegation of the complaint that the injury resulted from defective machinery, and from the negligence of the defendant in repairing a loom during work-hours. Upon these issues the case was tried, the evidence conflicting.

The opinion states the facts relating to the challenge of jurors.

The plaintiff requested the court to charge the jury inter alia—

3. If, through the negligent repairing of machinery the plaintiff is injured, then the defendants are liable, the master being liable for the repairer's negligence.

5. It is the duty of the employer to advise the employé of all such latent defects that he has no obvious means of knowing, and if the defendants failed to do so, and by reason of such neglect the plaintiff is injured, then the defendants are liable.

*7. That if the jury find that Mr. Collville had notice that the loom was unsafe, and that he neglected to have such loom repaired, and by reason of such neglect the plaintiff was injured, then the defendants are liable, notice to Mr. Collville being notice to the company.

8. That if the plaintiff gave notice to Mr. Collville of the defects of the loom, and was promised it should be repaired, she is not, as a matter of law, guilty of contributory negligence by remaining, and if the injury afterwards occurred through the negligence of the defendants, the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

The defendants requested the court to charge the jury inter alia—

2. That if the jury find that the plaintiff contributed to the accident, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have prevented it, then the verdict must be for the defendants.

3. That even if the defendants are found to be negligent because of any defects in the looms, or want of repairs thereon, if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care could have avoided the accident, she cannot recover.

4. That even if the defendants are found to be grossly negligent because of any defects in the looms, or want of repairs thereon, if the plaintiff, by her want of care, contributed in any wise to the accident, she cannot recover.

5. That if the jury conclude that the accident was caused by some defect in the looms, not open, but latent, not known to the president, or directors, or superintendent of the company, whose duty it was to furnish suitable machinery, then the verdict must be for the defendants.

6. That if the jury conclude that the accident was caused by some defect in the looms, whether known to the witness Harling, or not, he being merely a fellow-servant of the plaintiff, engaged in the same common business, and having no power to hire or discharge hands, furnish or change machinery, the superintendent, who alone had said powers, having no knowledge of said defect, then the verdict must be for the defendants.

8. That the plaintiff, when she entered into the employment of the defendants, as a laborer in their factory, assumed all the *risks incident to said employment, and that negligence of co-servants is one of said risks; hence, if the jury find that she was injured by the negligence of Harling, her co-laborer, she cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendants.

13. That in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff, the jury must be satisfied that the misfortune happened without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, but from the gross negligence of the defendants.

His Honor charged the plaintiff's request as follows, to wit: The 3d, 7th and 8th, in the words as requested. As to the 3d and 5th request, he charged as follows: "I charge as requested by the plaintiff, but you must first find that the defect really existed, and that it was the immediate cause of the injury."

He refused to charge the 5th and 6th requests of the defendants. He charged their 2d request, modified as follows: "That if the jury find that the plaintiff contributed to the accident from want of ordinary care, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have prevented it, then the verdict must be for the defendants." He charged their 3d request modified as follows: "That even if the defendants are found to be negligent because of any defect in the looms, or want of repairs thereon, and the defects are not the proximate cause of the injury, if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the accident, she cannot recover." He charged their 4th request, modified as follows: "That even if the defendants are found to be grossly negligent because of any defects in the loom, or want of repairs thereon, and the defects are not the proximate cause of the injury, if the plaintiff, by her want of care, contributed in any wise to the accident, she cannot recover." He charged their 13th request, modified as follows: "That in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff the jury must be satisfied that the misfortune happened without the fault or negligence of the plaintiff, but from the want of proper care on the part of the defendants."

The Circuit judge also charged the jury that in order to find a verdict for the plaintiff, they must find that the loom which inflicted the injury was, as is alleged in the complaint, that is, "unsafe, defective, and insecure."

The judge also instructed the jury, "That the acts of the employés were governed by the rules of the company. Harling *had his duties to perform, Collville, boss of the section, his, the weavers theirs, and the spinners theirs. That these duties were performed by the several employés under rules made by the corporation. That the company thus became responsible for Harling's performance of his duties, and for his negligence in their performance. That if plaintiff were injured by his neglect to repair the defects of the loom, and such duty were imposed upon him, and that these defects were the immediate cause of the injury to the plaintiff, then the defendant was responsible."

The presiding judge refused to charge according to the 8th request of the defendant, as it was expressed. The 8th request was subjected to or modified by the instruction given under the 4th request to charge.

The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000.

Defendants appealed, upon the following grounds:

1. In that his Honor erred in permitting the plaintiff to challenge George Cook and F. P. Woodward, jurymen who were drawn from the supernumeraries after a full jury had been presented to the plaintiff for selection, and she had failed to challenge any member thereof.

2. In that his Honor erred in not charging the jury as requested by the defendants, in their requests to charge numbered 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8 and 13.

3. That his Honor erred in charging the jury that the company were responsible for Harling's negligence, and if the jury found that the plaintiff was injured by his negligence, then the defendants were liable.

4. That his Honor erred in not submitting to the jury the question whether Harling was a fellow-servant or not.

5. That his Honor erred in charging as requested by the plaintiffs, in their requests to charge, numbered 3, 5, 7 and 8.

[For subsequent opinion, see 18 S. C. 262, 44 Am. Rep. 573.]

Mr. D. S. Henderson, for appellants.

Mr. G. W. Croft, contra.

*SIMPSON, C. J. The plaintiff, while in the employment of the defendant as an operative in the weaving department of a cotton mill of defendant, was injured by a shuttle being thrown with great force from one of the looms at or near which her duties required her to be stationed. The shuttle struck in the right eye of the plaintiff with such force as to cause its total blindness.

This action was brought to recover damages for this injury. The complaint alleged negligence on the part of the defendant, in that the loom was unsafe, defective and insecure; and, further, that at the time of the injury the said loom was being repaired during work hours of the mill, and while the plaintiff was compelled, in performance of her duty, to be so near the same as to greatly endanger her person.

The defendant denied the right of the plaintiff to recover, and relied upon three defences:

1. "Because the injury was an accident incident to the employment of the plaintiff, the risk of which she took upon herself.

2. "Because, if it was more than an accident, it was caused by the negligence of a co-laborer and not by the defendant.

3. "Because the accident and consequent injury were due and caused by the gross negligence and carelessness of the plaintiff."

Upon the issues thus made up the jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for $2,000. The defendant has appealed upon grounds which will now be considered:

First. In the organization of the jury, after a full jury had been presented to the parties litigant and the plaintiff had announced "no objection to the jury as it then stood," the defendant exercised his right of peremptory challenge as to two. Two others from the talesmen were then called. To these the plaintiff objected; and although she had declined to exercise her right of challenge in the first instance she was permitted to do so as to these two persons called to supply the places of the two challenged by the defendant. To this ruling the defendant excepted, and this forms the first ground of defendant's appeal.

In a recent case, Huff v. Watkins, ante 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680], the exact point raised here was decided, and we need not now go beyond that decision. It sustains fully the exception of the defendant here, and must govern in the construction to be placed upon Section 26,

*Chapter CXI. of General Statutes in reference to challenges to jurors in civil cases. It is unfortunate that that decision was not announced before the trial of this case below, as much trouble, time and expense would thereby, no doubt, have been prevented. The court, even now, would be gratified if this difficulty, which lies at the very threshold of this case, could be removed, but this cannot be done except by overruling the case of Huff v. Watkins, which the court, notwithstanding the earnest argument of the able counsel of plaintiff, does not feel authorized to do. Upon this ground, then, if upon no other, the case must be remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial.

This opinion might close at this point, but several other important questions are raised in the other grounds of appeal, which, if decided now, might relieve the case from some embarrassment and contribute, on the second trial, to a more speedy and effectual administration of the law as applicable to cases of this kind. With that view the other grounds involved will be now considered.

There are three classes of cases in which a party may receive injury while in the employment of another, and for which he may become entitled to an action for damages, dependent upon the facts in each case. First, where the injury is the result of a direct act of the employer—either negligent or otherwise—or of a representative of his. Second, where the injury is the result of an act of a co-laborer with the employee. And, Thirdly, where it results from defective instruments or machinery with which the employee is furnished to do his work. In these several classes there are always both questions of fact and of law. For instance, in the first a question of fact may arise whether the party defendant is the employer or a subordinate principal. In the second, whether the party causing the injury is a co-laborer; and, in the third, whether the machinery is unsafe and defective, and, if so, whether known or unknown to the employer. These questions of fact, with such others as may be involved, when they arise in the case, must of course be tried by the jury. The questions of law must be decided by the court. And in a case like this—sounding in damages—which is a case at law, the only questions which can be brought to this court, by way of appeal, are the *questions of law passed upon or omitted by the Circuit judge to which exception has been made. With this statement, let us examine the questions presented here.

It is not contended that the injury in this case resulted directly from any positive act of the defendant as employer. The allegation is that it resulted from unsafe and defective machinery, which was improperly undergoing repairs during work hours by the direction of the defendant.

The defendant served numerous exceptions to the charge of the judge, assigning errors both of omission and commission, refusals to charge and incorrect charges. It will not be necessary to take up these exceptions seriatim. Taken as a whole, they raise four questions of law, as presented in appellant's points and authorities.

The first involves the law as to contributory negligence. The second as to the degree of proof of defects in the machinery, which must be brought home to the master or employer. The third as to the liability of the master for the negligence of a fellow servant with the party injured. And the fourth as to the degree of negligence required to make the master liable to his servant. These are the points which have been mainly discussed before this court, and to these we will confine our opinion.

Inasmuch as negligence is a thread which runs through and is common to all these questions, it will not be amiss to understand clearly at the beginning what is the meaning of this. Mr. Wharton, Section 1, page 1, defines negligence as correctly as it can well be done. He says "that negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent person would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under existing circumstances would not have done, the essence of the fault being either in omission or commission."

Now, as to contributory negligence. This involves an inquiry into the question how far negligence, as above defined on the part of the injured party, will relieve the party whose act is complained of as the cause of the injury.

This is a very important question to the business interests of the country. There are indeed but few industries which can be carried on by a single individual, and consequently but few in*dustries that this question does not touch. Capital and labor, employers and employees, masters and servants, are all absolutely necessary to progress, and the combination of these relations reach out and affect every interest of society. It is no wonder, then, we find that this question has been often and thoroughly discussed—discussed by some of the ablest judges, most distinguished lawyers and elementary writers of the country. It will not be our purpose to follow this discussion into the numerous cases where the different phases have been considered. What is important here is to reach the result; to ascertain what has been settled.

We have found some confusion and seeming conflict in some of the cases, but we think that the following proposition may be regarded as well established.

The question in all the cases seems to be: Has the damage or injury complained of been occasioned entirely by the negligence or improper conduct of the defendant, or notwithstanding such improper act of defendant, would the injury have been avoided but for the negligence or want of ordinary care of the plaintiff? In the former case the plaintiff is entitled to recover. In the latter the defendant is entitled to the verdict. And this principle applies whether the injury complained of is alleged to be caused by the negligent act of the employer or a co-laborer, or resulting from defective machinery. In other words, the courts cannot undertake in these cases to solve the problem how far such party may have contributed to the unfortunate result, and by this means assess the damages on each pro rata. The only question that can be considered is: Has the defendant entirely caused the injury? If so, he is responsible. If, however, the injury could have been avoided by reasonable or proper care on the part of the plaintiff, then the defendant is held harmless. R. R. Co. v. Jones, 5 Otto [95 U. S.] 442 [24 L. Ed. 506]; Wilds v. Hudson River R. R. Co., 24 N. Y. 430; Philadelphia and Reading R. R. Co. v. Hummell, 8 Wright (Penna.) 375.

In this state, in the case of Conlin v. Charleston, 15 Rich. 201, this doctrine was recognized. The court said: "That where one has himself contributed to the cause of the damage of which he complains he cannot recover against another who also contributed *to the same cause." This additional remark, however, was made, "but this may be understood of the proximate and not any remote or collateral cause." That is, the contributory act of the plaintiff must not be simply a remote or collateral cause, but it must be proximate.

This remark would seem at first to have been intended as a modification of the general principle announced above as extracted from the cases decided elsewhere. But upon an examination of the cases referred to by the court, this will be found to be a mistake. Judge Moses, in making this remark, referred to the cases of Witherly, Adm'x, v. Regent's Canal Co., 104 Eng. C. L. 2; Tuff v. Warman, 2 C. B. (N. S.) 740. In these cases it was held that where the negligence or default of plaintiff was in any degree the direct or proximate cause of the damage he was not entitled to recover, however great might have been the negligence of the defendant. But if the negligence of the plaintiff was only remotely connected with the accident, then the question was whether the defendant might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have avoided it. It must be understood, in this connection, that the term "proximate" does not mean the sole and direct cause, but it includes all such acts or omissions as may have contributed to the injury complained of, and there may be more than one proximate cause. Sherman on Neg., 10, 33, 34.

Now, apply the test of these principles to the charge of the judge. He seems to have charged in general terms, "that if the plaintiff contributed to the accident from want of ordinary care or by the exercise of ordinary care could have prevented it, then the verdict must be for the defendant." This, though not in the precise language of the request, was in substance in accordance with the principles announced above, and standing alone, would not be objectionable. But he charged further, "that if the defendant was found to be negligent, grossly or otherwise, because of any defect in the looms, or want of repairs thereof, and the defects thereof are not the proximate cause of the injury, if the plaintiff, by the exercise of ordinary care, could have avoided the accident, she cannot recover." This charge, when analyzed, conveyed the idea that there could be but one proximate cause, *and if that was the negligence of the defendant, whether gross or otherwise, then, although the injury might have been avoided by ordinary care on the part of the plaintiff, still she would be entitled to recover. This, we think, was narrowing the principle extracted from the cases already cited too much, and was stating it too much against the defendant.

We do not think the cases of Conlin v. Charleston, Witherly, Adm'x, v. Regent's Canal Co., and the case of Tuff v. Warman, supra, will bear this construction. In these cases, as was held in the often-quoted Donkey case of Davis v. Mann, 10 M. & W., 46, the principle applied was that where it appeared from the evidence that the proximate cause of the injury—in the sense that the plaintiff in no way contributed thereto—was not the negligence of the plaintiff, and the injury could have been avoided or prevented by ordinary care on the part of the defendant, then the injury is to be ascribed to his gross negligence—for which he may be held responsible — notwithstanding there may have been remote and collateral negligence by the plaintiff. In a case of that kind it devolves upon the defendant to show that he could not have prevented the injury by the exercise of ordinary care.

The judge failed to state the principle in this limited form. He held the defendant responsible if the jury found the defects in the loom proximate cause of the injury, without regard to the fact whether the negligence of the plaintiff contributed directly as an additional proximate cause or not.

Now, as to the second point: What is the extent of the employer's responsibility for injuries growing out of defective machinery? The plaintiff requested the judge to charge: That if the accident was caused by defects in the loom—not patent, but latent—not known to the president or other controlling officers of the company, then the verdict must be for the defendant, and even if this defect was known to Harling, Harling being a mere fellow-servant, that plaintiff could not recover. The judge refused. We think he was right in refusing to charge thus broadly. The liability of an employer for defective machinery does not depend on the fact that the defects are latent and unknown, but it depends on the question of proper care in select*ing this machinery and keeping it in repair. If the employer has been careless and reckless in the purchase and fitting up the machinery, or if its defects could have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care, either in the purchase or afterwards, the fact that they were not discovered and were unknown, will not, and ought not of itself, to shield the employer. Wood on Master and Servant, §§ 416–418; Sherman on Neg., § 87. Whether Harling was a fellow-servant was a question of fact and not a question of law. What constitutes a fellow-servant, and what an officer representing the company, would be a question of law, but whether a particular individual is the one or the other would be a question of fact. The judge, therefore, could not properly have charged as defendant requested, as the request assumed that Harling was a fellow-servant.

Next, as to the liability of the master for the negligence of a co-servant with the party injured. The respondent requested the judge to charge "that whether a middleman represents the company, and whether the injuring party and employee were of a common employment, were questions of fact for the jury." And the appellant requested him to charge "that when the plaintiff entered the service of the company as a laborer in the factory she assumed all the risks incident to said employment, and that the negligence of co-servants is one of said risks. Hence, if the jury find that she was injured by the negligence of Harling a co-laborer, she cannot recover." The judge declined to charge as thus requested.

A part of both of these requests he might have charged. He could have charged the latter portion of respondent's request, and he could have charged that an employee assumes the risks incident to his employment—one of which is the negligence of a co-servant. Sherman, § 88; Wood, § 422. But, as a whole, he could not have properly charged either request. Whether a middleman represents the company, is a question of law. Whether such an one is a middleman is a question of fact. And whether Harling was a fellow-servant was a question of fact.

Where requests are made for the charge of the judge upon propositions submitted as a whole, unless they are correct as a whole, it is not his duty to disconnect them, sustaining such as *are sound and rejecting such as are unsound. He is to consider them as presented, and sustain or reject accordingly.

The judge, in overruling these requests, did charge that Harling was performing his duties under rules and regulations of the company; that the company thus became responsible for Harling's performance of his duties and for his negligent performance; that if plaintiff was injured by his neglect to repair the defects of the loom, and such duty was imposed upon him, and that these defects were the immediate cause of the injury, the defendant was responsible. We think this, as a whole, was error, because questions of fact are intermingled and decided with questions of law, and because the principles of law laid down are stated stronger against the appellant than the decided cases warranted.

It does not follow that because different employees act in different departments of the same general business that they are not fellow-servants. And the fact that one acts in one department and one in another, does not impose any greater responsibility on the employer in case of injury by one to the other than when they are both in the same department. The question is: Were they co-servants in the general business? And the test is: Were they acting under a common employer, and in the same general business? Wood, § 425. This being established, then they assume the risk of each other's proper performance of duty, the employer being responsible for failure to exercise proper care in the original employment of his servants and in ascertaining their qualifications after they are in his service, Wood, § 416.

As to the degree of negligence of which the master must be guilty in order to be held responsible for an injury to his servant, the judge was requested by the appellant to charge that the measure was gross negligence. The judge laid down the rule to be the want of proper care. We see no error in this. A master is liable to his servants for his own negligence, and the measure of his negligence, when applied to him, must be the same as when applied to others. The case of Brickman v. South Carolina R. R. Co., 8 S. C. 198, does not fully sustain the position of appellant. In that case the Circuit judge had prescribed gross negligence as the true measure of defendants' *responsibility. From this there was no appeal, and the Supreme Court said: "It would be difficult to state the law more favorably for the defendants." The court also said, "as neither party alleges error in the limitation of the liability of the defendants to a case of gross negligence, it is unnecessary for the court to look into the state of the law on that subject."

We think that the same rule should apply to both master and servant.

In conclusion, it may not be improper to recapitulate the legal propositions herein adjudged as applicable to this and similar cases. Where an injury has happened to a servant or employee the master's liability is fixed as follows: If the injury results from the master's own negligent act, or from that of one of his representatives, he is prima facie liable. If it results from defective machinery or the negligent act of a co-servant with the injured party, he is not responsible unless the proof shall go further and show that the master's negligence or want of reasonable care in purchasing and overlooking his machinery or in employing and supervising his servants, was the cause of his having defective machinery in use, and negligent servants engaged. And in all these cases, if it should appear in the defence that the negligence of the injured party, in the sense in which that term has been defined above, contributed to the injury in such degree as to become one of the proximate causes thereof so as to relieve the other causes mentioned from being the entire cause, then this will be a good defence.

The limitations above as to the master's responsibility for the acts of a co-servant with the party injured is a departure from the general common law rule imposing liability upon the master for injuries by servants to third parties. This departure was announced first (says Mr. Wood) in the year 1841, in this state, in the case of Murray v. Railroad Co., 1 McM. 385 [36 Am. Dec. 268]. Previous to this in England, in the case of Priestly v. Fowler, 3 Mees. & W. 1, a similar principle had been adopted in reference to appliances and machinery, but as to co-servants, as Mr. Wood says, our state seems to have been the pioneer in this new departure, and in the case of Murray v. Railroad Co., supra, essentially laid the foundation for the doctrine which has since been adopted both in England and in all the American states, as the true rule upon this subject.

*The next year after the decision in Murray v. Railroad, the case of Farwell v. Boston, &c., R. R. Co., (in Massachusetts,) 4 Metc. 49, came before that eminent judge, Judge Shaw, who not only endorsed this doctrine, but sustained it in as able an opinion as perhaps ever came from the pen of that distinguished jurist. The principles herein announced will be found sustained in Sherman on Neg., ch. II., 24, et seq.; ch. X., 65; Wood on Mast. & Serv., ch. XVI., 795, and in many cases referred to in the notes. They are not only sustained by abundant authorities, but they are founded upon principle, justice and public policy. An employee enters the service of another upon contract; it is a voluntary service; he knows when he engages that he is to be surrounded by fellow-servants; he knows, too, that this will expose him to risks other than such as his own conduct may create; he is aware that the machinery is complex, and, to some extent, dangerous, and he is presumed to contract with full knowledge of all the risks incident to these things, and, therefore, to assume them.

To hold the employer as an insurer against the negligence of fellow-servants, or against all defects of appliances, would be a deathblow to some of the most important enterprises upon which the material progress of the country depends. Under such a principle no one would be safe in engaging in any industry beyond the reach of his own eyes, and the management of his own hands. It would hamper and cripple labor, and destroy capital. In justice, however, to the employee, the employer should not be entirely exempt. The rule is the one adopted—a medium line—which holds the employer responsible for that part of the work which falls to him, either personally or through his agents, i. e., the proper selection and superintendence of both his operatives and his machinery. He is a guarantor that all reasonable and proper care shall be exercised in the performance of these duties, and his liability should be limited to a failure to meet his obligations in this respect.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

Messrs. Caston & McIver, for appellant.

Mr. A. A. Pollock, contra.

July 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. During the year 1879 the plaintiff (appellant) carried to defendant's (respondent's) gin certain cotton of his own to be ginned and packed into a bale. The bale having been ginned and packed, was at respondent's gin on December 9th, 1879, when appellant demanded it of respondent. The delivery was refused, and appellant commenced action before a trial justice, alleging the facts as above stated, demanding judgment in his complaint for the recovery of the cotton or for the sum of $68, in case possession could not be had, with $20 damages for the detention. The answer of respondent was made orally, and was as follows: "The defendant puts in a general denial."

On the trial of the case the defendant, without previous notice, offered evidence to show a prior indebtedness of plaintiff to defendant on an old account of $20, and also a balance of rent due *for the year 1879. The evidence was objected to by plaintiff as not in reply to the case made. This objection was overruled by the trial justice and the evidence was admitted, which established a certain balance due for rent in 1879.

Upon this evidence the trial justice decreed: "That the defendant, as landlord, was entitled to a balance of rent for the year 1879; that the amount of cotton taken exceeded the amount to which defendant was entitled as rent by two hundred pounds of cotton, which was worth, at twelve cents per pound, $24; and that this amount of cotton was wrongfully taken, and that the plaintiff was damaged thereby $10 in addition to the value of the said two hundred pounds of cotton." He then decreed for plaintiff $34 and costs. From this judgment both plaintiff and defendant appealed to the Circuit Court.

The plaintiff appealed on numerous exceptions; when condensed, however, they present but three grounds:

1. "That the trial justice erred in permitting evidence of a counter-claim, without notice, after issue joined upon a general denial of the facts alleged in the complaint.

2. "Because the trial justice erred in allowing defendant to answer orally after service of written complaint upon him.

3. "Because the trial justice, after having found that the cotton was taken, as charged in complaint, erred in holding that defendant, as landlord, had the right to hold the cotton, and out of it to enforce payment of plaintiff's indebtedness to him for rent," &c.

The defendant appealed upon the ground: "That the trial justice erred in not dismissing the complaint on his motion; because, as was patent, no affidavit had been filed and served at the commencement of the action as required, as he claimed, by Section 74 of code."

Upon the hearing of the appeal, Judge Aldrich rendered the following order: "I have examined and considered the testimony. It appears to me that the trial justice has done substantial justice to the parties litigant. The appeal is dismissed."

From this judgment of Judge Aldrich the plaintiff has appealed, assigning as error, in substance, that the presiding judge overruled his exceptions to the judgment of the trial justice, and *that, disregarding these exceptions, which raised questions of law, the judge based his judgment on what appeared to him to be "substantial justice between the parties litigant."

Section 91 of the code, Subdivision 2, provides that the pleadings in trial justices courts may be either oral or in writing. Appellant contends that while this section permits the pleadings to be either oral or in writing, yet that they apply to the whole pleadings, embracing the pleading both of plaintiff and defendant; that a proper construction of this section requires the pleadings on both sides to be the same. If the one is in writing the other should be so also, and the same as to oral pleadings; and inasmuch as the complaint in this case was in writing, it was error to permit the defendant to answer orally.

If this is the true construction of this section of the code, it would, in effect, give to the plaintiff, who always pleads first, the power to determine whether the case should be conducted upon oral or written pleadings. We do not think that this was the intent of this section. No doubt it would be much better in all cases that pleadings on both sides should be in writing. If this were so, much uncertainty and confusion, which often occurs from loose pleadings, would be prevented; and if it was within the power of this court to establish such a rule it might be wise to do so, but this court has not been invested with such power. It is our province to construe and declare, not to enact. In our judgment the section under consideration allows either party to plead either in writing or orally, as he may see proper, without regard to the pleadings on the other side, "the substance of the pleadings to be entered by the trial justice on his docket." There was no error, then, in the Circuit judge disregarding this exception.

The exception as to the counter-claim, we think, should have been sustained. In the first place, even had it been a proper counter-claim, one which, under the rules of pleadings, could have been legally set up as a defence to this action, yet it was objectionable here on the ground that no notice, either orally or in writing, had been given. It seems that the first that plaintiff heard of it was when the testimony of defendant was entered upon after the plaintiff had closed his case.

*Subdivision 4, Section 91 of the code, provides that the answer of defendant may contain a denial of the complaint or any part thereof, and also a notice, in a plain and direct manner, of any facts constituting a defence or counter-claim. In this case the answer of defendant was nothing more than a general denial. This answer put in issue the allegations only in the complaint.

The testimony, according to well-understood rules governing trials, should, under the code, have been confined to the matters thus put in issue. "Under the general denial of the code, evidence of a distinct affirmative defence is not admissible. The only evidence which the defendant is entitled to give is limited to a contradiction of the plaintiff's proofs, and to the disproval of the case made by him." Pom. on Rem., § 660. It was a mistake, then, to allow the defendant to travel beyond the record and to introduce a defence which made its first appearance in the testimony which was offered to sustain it, and which the plaintiff objected to. This objection being overruled, exception was taken on appeal to the Circuit Court. In our judgment this exception should have been sustained on the grounds above referred to.

We think, too, that it was fatal upon another ground. The answer of defendant must contain either a general or specific denial of the material allegations in the complaint, or a statement of new matter constituting a defence or counterclaim. Code, § 172. If a counter-claim is relied on, it must be one existing in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and arising out of the following causes of action:

1. A cause of action arising out of the contract or transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action.

2. In an action arising on contract, any other cause of action, arising also on contract, and existing at the commencement of the action. Code, § 173.

The demand set up in this action by the defendant does not appear to be embraced in either of the classes of counter-claim provided for in this section of the code.

The plaintiff's action was for the recovery of a specific chattel—a certain bale of cotton.

The defendant's counter-claim orig*inated on a contract, either actual or implied. It was in no way connected with plaintiff's foundation of action, and it is apparent that it could not be sheltered under either one of the specifications contained in Section 173. Mr. Pomeroy, in Section 767 of his admirable work on Remedies and Remedial Rights, says: "It would seem that in an action to recover the possession of specific chattels no counter-claim is possible, unless, perhaps, equitable relief may be demanded under some exceptional circumstances."

The claim of defendant here is not based upon an equitable right. His claim is a clear, legal claim—a claim growing out of contract—for the enforcement of which he has a plain and adequate remedy at law. He cannot, therefore, invoke the exceptional circumstances, which, it seems from the authority above cited, will sometimes allow an exception to the general rule. He must stand on the general rule, and that rule shuts out his defence. The Circuit judge, we think, was in error in not sustaining this exception of the plaintiff.

The discussion of the last exception of plaintiff has, in effect, determined his third exception. It will be, therefore, unnecessary to discuss that. The defendant has not appealed, and we do not regard the point made by him before the trial justice, and submitted in his points and authorities, as before us.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Mackey, J., Richland, October, 1879.

The plaintiff association commenced business under its charter in the city of Columbia in 1873. The defendant, John Dorsey, became a member of the association in January, 1878, by purchasing five shares for $295. In the same month defendant borrowed $1000 on these five shares, upon the terms mentioned in the opinion of this court. His bond did not call for the repayment of the principal sum borrowed, it being the scheme of the association that it was his shares of the capital stock received in anticipation. The bond was secured by mortgage of real estate. Defendant continued his payments under his bond until he had paid the sum of $189.75, after which no payments were made. This action was commenced September 27th, 1879, for foreclosure of the mortgage, alleging that defendant was in arrears nine months of subscription, interest and premium, and that the principal sum was, therefore, due also. The defence was usury.

This association was chartered February 15th, 1872. 15 Stat. 39. The usury law was passed December 20th, 1877. 16 Stat. 325. The loan was made January, 1878.

The Circuit judge, after a statement of the case and a review of authorities, concluded his decree as follows:

I am constrained, therefore, in accordance with the overwhelming weight of the decisions in this state, dating from the eighteenth century to the present time, supported by many most elaborate *decisions of the highest courts, both of this country and of England, to declare that in my judgment the statute of usury has been violated in the case under consideration.

It is the opinion of the court that the interest paid to the association plaintiff by the defendant, John Dorsey, should be credited upon the dues that should legally have been collected by the plaintiff, to wit, $5.83 per month, which is the interest, monthly, on $1000, at the rate of seven per centum per annum. The amount in interest, installments and premiums paid into the association plaintiff from January, 1878, to November, 1879, by the defendant, John Dorsey, was $174.75. The amount to which the association was entitled from the same date to November, 1879, at seven per centum per annum, was $134.09, leaving a balance of $40.66 in favor of John Dorsey.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed—

1. That the complaint be dismissed, with costs.

2. That the balance of $40.66 be placed to the credit of the defendant, John Dorsey, on the books of the association plaintiff, who shall apply the same at the rate of $5.83 monthly, to the satisfaction of the defendant's dues, until the said amount of $40.66 shall have been exhausted.

The plaintiff appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred when he held that the bond was usurious.

2. When he allowed any interest at all to the plaintiff, it being clear law that if it was usurious no interest whatever can be collected.

3. When he did not decree and adjudge that the plaintiff should recover the principal sums loaned, under the act relative to usury, assuming that the judge was right in finding the contract was usurious.

4. Because the whole decree is erroneous throughout, and in conflict with all the law and decisions both for and against usury.

Mr. John T. Sloan, Jr., for appellant.

Mr. Andrew Crawford, contra.

SIMPSON, C. J. The respondent, a stockholder to the extent of five shares, at $200 each, in the appellant association, on January 19th, 1878, under the rules and regulations of the association, obtained a loan of $1000 from said company. To secure this loan he gave his bond with mortgage of real estate, conditioned to pay to the association monthly payments of $17.25, itemized as follows: $5 for monthly subscription on his shares; $5 for interest on the sum advanced to him at the rate of six per cent. per annum, and $7.25 for the monthly premium which he contracted to give for the loan—in all $17.25.

This sum was reached in this way: The company was made up of those who had shares therein at $200 per share. These shares were not paid up in full at once, but were to be paid monthly at the rate of $1 per month. The money thus paid was to be lent out to stockholders in amounts not exceeding $200 per share, at the rate of six per cent. per annum. The privilege to borrow, however, was dependent upon the premium which might be offered at public bidding for the money proposed to be lent. The company, under the charter, was authorized to continue its operations until each share should amount to $200. In other words, the company expected, by lending out the monthly receipts on shares, the monthly receipts of interest, and *the premiums, to be able ultimately to return to each stockholder his stock of $200 per share, and when this time arrived the company was to end.

As has been stated, the respondent, being a stockholder of five shares, borrowed $1000, the full extent of his privilege. He obtained this sum at public sale, agreeing to give a premium of $1.45, which premium was to be paid monthly, and amounted to $7.25 for five shares. For this amount, and for the monthly interest, as also the monthly subscription on his five shares, he gave his bond above referred to with the mortgage, the monthly payments, as therein stated, being in the aggregate $17.25.

The respondent failing to meet his bond, according to its terms, this action was commenced to foreclose the mortgage. As a defence, the respondent interposed the plea of usury. The Circuit judge sustained this plea, and the appeal here presents the single question whether the contract is or is not usurious.

The association was chartered in 1872, and organized soon thereafter. At this time there was no law in this state making contracts usurious at any rate of interest; but when the contract sued on in this case was made, the act of 1877, known as the statute of usury, had been passed, and was of force. The respondent relies on this statute.

If the rules and regulations by which the association exercised the right and power to lend their assets, at public sale, to the highest bidder at a premium, in addition to a regular fixed interest thereon, had been a part of the original charter of this association, or had been incorporated therein as by-laws, then a question might arise whether, even though the contract was in violation of the act of 1877, that act could apply.

In the case of Bibb County Loan Association v. Richards, 21 Ga. 592, the decision was placed upon the ground that the charter had adopted the constitution and by-laws of the association as a part of the law by which it was regulated, and the charge being according to it, could not be illegal. So, here, if the constitution and by-laws of this association authorizing it to lend its money at a premium, to be ascertained by public sale, in addition to six per cent. interest, had been adopted as a part of the charter, it might be a question whether a subsequent act *could divest the company of this right; but such was not the case. No constitution or by-laws had been adopted. On the contrary, the second section of the act gave power to the association to make such rules and by-laws for its government as are not repugnant to the constitution and laws of the land. This section limits the power of the association to the adoption of such rules and regulations as may not conflict with the constitution and laws of the land, and, by necessary implication, negatives any rules and regulations which may be in conflict, whether they were in conflict at the time of their adoption, or become so by subsequent enactments. So that the main question before us is still whether the contract of respondent is usurious, as in conflict with the act of 1877.

The expectation of the association, if it could be fortunate and successful in its operations, was that at the winding up each shareholder would be entitled to $200 for each of his shares. This being a reasonable hope, founded upon the experience of such institutions, it was not supposed to be an unsafe proceeding to allow each stockholder to borrow the amount to which he would ultimately become entitled at the winding up, in advance, to wit, $200 per share. But to make the business profitable and the more certainly to ensure the result desired, some arrangement had to be devised to secure upon the money lent out a greater per cent. than six per cent., the regular established interest. Hence, the plan of permitting each shareholder to draw in advance of the winding up of the concern the amount which he would no doubt become entitled to at that time; but, getting it thus in advance, he was required to pay not only the interest but such premium as other shareholders, who desired the money also, might force him at public sale to pay. Each shareholder, by paying up his monthly dues of $1 on his shares and remaining quiet, might legitimately expect to get back, at the termination of the business, $200 per share. If he desired, however, to get the use of this money before the winding up, he was entitled to borrow it at the rate of six per cent., and such premium as the public sale might force upon him. This was the scheme. Was it usurious?

Usury is giving more than the legal rate of interest for the use *of money. Under the act of 1877 the legal rate is seven per cent. Dorsey borrowed $1000 from this association. This money, he expected, would be his at the end of the association, but he was not entitled to it, as owner, until the end. He borrowed it years in advance of the time when it should be his: until then it belonged to the association, and until then he contracted to pay not only six per cent. for the use of it, but an additional sum of $7.25 per month, $77 more than the legal rate of seven per cent. The interest on $1000, at seven per cent., would be $70. Dorsey, according to his contract, was to pay $147, to wit, $60 at $5 per month, styled interest, and $87 at $7.25 per month, styled premium: just $77 per annum more than the act of 1877 allowed.

Now, although this amount is designated as part interest and part premium, can the fact be disguised that Dorsey has contracted to pay this amount for the use of the money which he obtained from the association? He may have been willing to give this large premium to this company because he was a shareholder thereof, and because, on this account, he was interested in making the operations of the company successful; but, nevertheless, was he not giving the sum which he contracted to give for the use of the money which he obtained? Suppose a stranger had borrowed this money upon the same terms, and the amount which he contracted to pay for the use of it had been split into fragments—a part styled interest, a part premium, and a part expenses, or something else, could any court hold such a contract other than an evasion of the act forbidding more than seven per cent. for the use of money? If so, the act had as well be repealed. The ingenuity of money lenders could easily devise plans by which more than seven per cent. could be realized, if simply styling the excess by some other name than interest, can pass the courts.

There may be a doubt as to the wisdom of any act limiting the per cent. which parties shall charge for the use of money. There may be a doubt whether legislation upon this subject is not as injurious as legislation attempting to regulate and control the contracts of parties in reference to corn or cotton, or any other article of commerce and trade. But there can hardly be a *doubt that a contract of this kind, where—cover it up as you may—it is apparent that a party has contracted to pay $77 per annum more than the legal interest, is in violation of the act which forbids the taking of more than this interest. It is useless, however, to discuss the question upon general principles, or upon the construction which shall be given to this special contract. This court is bound by authority, and when a question has been decided by our own courts, as long as that decision stands—whether wise or unwise—whether destructive of the interests to which it applies or not, it must be enforced, unless so apparently wrong as to demand overruling.

We regard the question here as settled by the case of Columbia Building and Loan Association v. William Bollinger, 12 Rich. Eq. 124 [78 Am. Dec. 463], in which a very learned and able opinion of the distinguished Chancellor on the Circuit, Chancellor Carroll, was overruled by the Supreme Court. That case and this are almost identical. The charters of the two companies were nearly the same; the by-laws almost exactly alike. A stockholder in that company, as in this, borrowed in advance a certain sum of money, which, he expected, would ultimately be his. He borrowed at public bidding, as in this. He contracted, as here, by bond and mortgage, to pay the monthly interest. The premium, instead of being paid monthly, was deducted at the time of the contract. This was paid in cash, instead of by monthly installments. This is the only difference between the cases. Is this a difference in principle? We do not so understand it. The court, in that case, held the contract usurious. Judge O'Neall, with that strong conviction which characterized all of his opinions, declaring "that there was no doubt about it," and, but for the earnest and able decree of Chancellor Carroll, he would not have thought it necessary even to look into the authorities on the subject.

The argument of Chancellor Carroll, and the opinion of the Supreme Court overruling it, present the two opposing views on this subject. The decree of Chancellor Carroll is based upon two prominent grounds: First. That the dealing of the parties was a transaction between partners and in reference to partnership funds, and was not a loan. He cited Silver v. Barnes, *6 Bing. N. C. 180, and several English authorities. Second. That the money advanced to Bollinger was but that which he, Bollinger, would get when the corporation wound up, and if he was willing to deduct $300—the premium—because he was getting the money in advance, there was nothing illegal in this. In that case, as has already been stated, the premium was deducted at the time the contract was made instead of being contracted to be paid in monthly installments, as the interest was to be paid. The Chancellor thought that, in this respect, it was like a party agreeing to take less for a debt than the amount actually due, and, having executed the contract, he could not afterwards dispute or repudiate it.

These positions, which are the only ones that can be taken with any plausibility in support of such a contract, after full consideration by the Supreme Court, were overruled, and the contract of Bollinger was declared usurious. We are bound by this decision. It is therefore unnecessary to go into a discussion of the authorities referred to by Judge Mackey, showing the feelings and tendency of the courts on the subject of usury. The case of Bollinger is controlling.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CHAPMAN v. LIPSCOMB.

[Reference ⇐2, 47.]

The master's act (16 Stat. 608) does not withhold from that officer jurisdiction to hear and determine issues of law and fact in a common law action, when empowered to do so by a consent-order of reference; and the trial in the Circuit Court should be had upon his report and the exceptions taken thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 2, 78; Dec. Dig. ⇐2, 47.]

*Action by William W. Chapman against Thomas J. Lipscomb, as superintendent of the South Carolina penitentiary, commenced in August, 1879.

The case is stated in the Circuit decree, which is as follows:

An action was brought by the plaintiff to recover one hundred and seventy-one thousand brick, or the value thereof.

The defendant denied plaintiff's right to recover, and set up, by way of defence, amongst other things, that defendant entered into an agreement with J. A. & J. P. Bondurant for the manufacture of brick; that the services and contribution of material and labor to be furnished by each party were set out in a written agreement, a copy of which is exhibited in the answer; that he was to receive one-half of the brick made; that under terms of the agreement he was entitled to the brick, and to show this an account should be ordered by the court between himself and the said J. A. & J. P. Bondurant, under whom the plaintiff claims.

Issue being thus joined between the parties, an order was made by the presiding judge, November 22d, 1879, "to take testimony and determine all issues of fact and law" in the cause, and to report to the court. This order was consented to, in writing, by the attorneys of both parties. In pursuance of this order the master heard the case, and has filed his report and the testimony. Exceptions to this report have been duly filed and served by the defendant.

When the case came before me to be heard, the defendant's counsel raised the objection that the Circuit judge had no right, even with the consent of parties, to order the reference. Under the old practice, there was no such thing as a trial by referees in cases at law; and on the chancery side of the court a reference to the master was for the purpose of "information" to the court. So far as I have been able to investigate the matter, there was in this state, previous to the adoption of the code, no such thing as a reference of "all issues of fact and law." A reference by consent in cases not provided by statute was equivalent to an "arbitration." Wait's Pr., vol. III., 242. And in this case, and where the reference is to a greater or less number of referees than is described by statute, it amounted to a "discontinuance of the action," and the reference became an

"arbitra*tion" merely. Wait's Pr., vol. III., 254. When a case is on trial before a referee who has been appointed in pursuance of the statute, he has full power to swear witnesses under the penalties of perjury, to force their attendance by rule or attachment, and the master has like power under an order properly made in pursuance of the practice in such cases.

The sections of the code (294, 295 and 296), which gave the power to the courts to refer all issues of fact and law, have been repealed by the master's act, and this latter confers no such power to hear and determine "all issues of fact and law."

The case is, therefore, before me for trial, and, in my view of the reference, I have no facts properly proven on which to base a judgment, even if the court in this case could dispense with a trial by jury. If the reference is a mere arbitration and binding on the parties, another proceeding is necessary to enforce it, as in the view above presented it worked a discontinuance of this action.

I have come to the conclusion, however, from the terms of the order, and the circumstances under which it was made, and by which it is to be interpreted, that the order was not an agreement to refer to arbitration, but only an order of reference made in the cause and for which there was no warrant of law, even with the consent of counsel.

I am unable, therefore, to render a judgment in the cause upon the merits, and

It is ordered that the proceedings under the reference be set aside, and that the parties have leave to move for a trial in such mode as they may be advised.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. For that his Honor held that the "order of reference" in the above-stated cause, of date November 22d, 1879, was without "warrant of law, even with the consent of counsel."

2. For that his Honor held that the master had no power to hear and determine the issues of fact and law referred to him in said cause.

3. For that his Honor held that there were

"no facts prop*erly proven on which to base a judgment, even if the court in this case could dispense with a trial by jury."

4. For that his Honor did not hold that the defendant, having set up an equitable defence in his answer, and having consented in writing to the order of reference and proceeded thereunder without objection, is now estopped from raising such objection.

5. For that his Honor did not hold that the defendant, not having excepted to the order of reference or to the master's report upon said grounds, is now estopped from setting up the same.

6. For that his Honor did not hold that the defendant's consent to the order of reference in said cause was "a waiver of trial by the jury," and the master having taken and reported all testimony offered in pursuance of said order, he should proceed to determine for himself the facts at issue upon said pleadings and give judgment in accordance therewith.

7. For that his Honor ordered "that the proceedings under the reference be set aside, and that the parties have leave to move for a trial in such mode as they may be advised."

Messrs. W. H. Lyles and J. T. Barron, for appellants.

Mr. Youmans, Attorney-General, contra.

McIVER, A. J. This was an action brought by the plaintiff, in the county of Richland, to recover certain articles of personal property or the value thereof. By the consent of parties, an order was made by the Court of Common Pleas for that county:

"That it be referred to Nathaniel B. Barnwell, Esq., master for Richland county, to take testimony and determine all issues of fact and law in the above-stated cause, and that he report his actings and doings in said cause with all convenient speed to this court."

Pursuant to this order the master made his report, to which sundry exceptions were filed by the defendant, and when the case came on for hearing before Judge Hudson, the defendant, for the first time, raised the objection "that the master had not jurisdiction to determine the issues in the cause."

The judge *thereupon directed the master to file with the clerk the testimony taken before him in the cause, which was subsequently done, and the case was continued. When the case came up for hearing at the next term before Judge Fraser, he sustained the objection to the jurisdiction of the master, declined to hear the case upon its merits, and ordered "that the proceedings under the reference be set aside and that the parties have leave to move for a trial in such mode as they may be advised." From this ruling and order of Judge Fraser this appeal has been taken, by which the fundamental question presented is, whether, since the passage of the act creating the office of master, the issues in an action of this kind can be referred, by consent of parties, to the master, to be heard and determined by him in those counties where that office has been established.

The code was designed to establish a system of civil procedure in the courts of this state, one of the features of which was, that in certain cases there might be three modes of trial—by jury, by the court and by referees; and the real question is, whether the master's act (16 Stat. 608) was designed to abolish the last mode of trial in those counties where the office of master was established. The title of that act, to which we are at liberty to refer with a view to ascertain its object, is as follows: "An act to repeal the 294th, 295th, 296th, 297th and 436th sections of the code of procedure within the counties herein mentioned, so as to abolish the use of referees in the said counties, and to establish in their stead the office of master."

It will be observed that the object of the act, as declared by its title, is not to abolish the third mode of trial provided for in the code, nor was it merely to abolish the use of referees, but rather to substitute in the place of the triers, previously provided for, who might be mere private citizens, under no bond, a public officer who would be under bond; for, the language is, that these sections are to be repealed "so as to abolish the use of referees, and to establish in their stead the office of master." This would seem to indicate that the purpose was not to interfere with the third mode of trial, but simply to put in the place of those before whom such trial could be had, a public officer who would be under bond for the faithful performance of the duties *of his office; and that the master being put in the place of referees, or "in their stead," as it is expressed in the title, would be invested with all the powers and charged with all the duties which had been previously conferred and imposed upon referees, together with such other powers and duties as are provided for in the act.

Then, when we turn to the body of the act, we find no expression of an intention to abolish one of the modes of trial provided for by the code, except in so far as such intention may be implied from what is termed the repeal of those sections of the code named in the title of the act. But, in fact, those sections are not repealed; they still stand as part of the general law of the state, and are only declared inoperative in the counties named. Then, too, Sections 276 and 277 of the code are left unaffected by the terms of the master's act, and this affords a strong indication that it was not the design of that act to abolish one of the modes of trial provided for by the code, but simply to substitute in the place of referees chosen by the parties or appointed by the court a public officer before whom such trial should be had. Those sections, 276 and 277, contemplate the reference of issues for trial, and the only effect of the master's act is to require that the issues should be referred to the master instead of to referees, in those counties where that office has been established.

Again, the master's act does not simply confer upon those officers the powers and require of them the performance of the duties which were heretofore conferred and imposed upon masters and commissioners in equity, but it also requires them "to execute and perform the orders of the said court [the Court of Common Pleas] upon references made to them or either of them, conformably to the practice of the said court, or to the practice of the Courts of Equity in this state before the said courts were abolished, and so far as the same is not inconsistent with the code of procedure as amended by this act." Now, if the object had been to confine the masters to the powers previously conferred upon masters and commissioners in equity, it would have been very easy to say so. Instead of that, however, the masters are required to execute and perform the orders of the Court of Common Pleas upon *references made to them, conformably, not merely to the practice of the old Court of Equity, but also to the practice of the Court of Common Pleas, and that practice, under the general law of the state, which, as we have seen, is left unaffected by the master's act, is to refer issues in certain cases to be heard and determined by referees, but as it would be "inconsistent with the code of procedure, as amended by this [the master's] act," to refer such issues to referees in those counties where the office of master has been established, the reference there must be to the master.

We are, therefore, unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge that the master had no jurisdiction to hear this case, and, on the contrary, think that the parties were entitled to have the case heard upon the master's report and the exceptions.

From the view which we have taken of this case, the other questions discussed in the argument do not arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

The judgment of this court is, that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court to be heard on the master's report and the exceptions thereto.

(Case No. 1067.)

VERDIER v. PORT ROYAL RAILROAD COMPANY.

[1. Public Lands ⇐92.]

A railroad company constructed its roadbed over lands acquired by the United States, under the provisions of the direct tax act of 1863, (12 U. S. Stat. 422,) without objection by the government, or claim to a right of notice or demand for the appointment of commissioners to assess compensation; after five years' use by the railroad company the United States sold this land by metes and bounds, without reservation of the road-bed, to V., who had knowledge of its possession and use by the railroad company. V. afterwards brought action for the recovery of the strip of this *land used by the railroad company, and for damages, and proved his title-deed from the United States. Held, that V. was properly nonsuited.

[2. Ejectment ⇐9.]

A party who has never been in the possession of land, for the recovery of which he brings his action, can recover only upon the strength of his own title.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Rhodes v. Russell, 38 S. C. 424, 17 S. E. 222.

For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 16–29; Dec. Dig. ⇐9.]

[3. Public Lands ⇐63.]

This land, while owned by the United States, was public land, within the meaning of the act of 1866, (U. S. Rev. Stat., § 2477 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 4919]) which provides that "the right of way for the construction of highways over public lands, not reserved for public uses, is hereby granted."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. § 215; Dec. Dig. ⇐63.]

4. Quere: Did not the United States recognize this statute as operating as a grant, and in the sale of this land did they intend to convey a right to disturb the railroad company in the use of their road-bed?

5. Quere: If the United States were a private owner, and this railroad was constructed without objection, would a subsequent purchaser with notice, have the right to demand compensation from the company for their use of the road-bed?

Under Chapter LXIII., Section 83 of General Statutes, permission to a railroad corporation to enter upon the construction of their highway without previous compensation, may be given by the owner without receiving the notice prescribed in Section 75; and under the circumstances of this case, such permission will be presumed, and the United States and their vendee estopped from afterwards denying it.

C. 485, and distinguished therefrom as to the question of notice.]

Before Thomson, J., Beaufort, November, 1880.

This action was commenced February 5th, 1878, by William J. Verdier, against the defendant corporation, for the recovery of real property, and damages for its detention. The opinion states the case as fully as does the brief. No grounds of appeal are given.

Messrs. W. J. Verdier and J. D. Pope, for appellants.

Mr. William Elliott, contra.

July 27th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This action was brought to recover possession of a strip of land used by defendant corporation as a road-bed in operating their railroad. In 1857 the Port Royal Railroad Company was chartered by the state "for the purpose of establishing a communication by railroad from the waters of *Port Royal harbor, in the neighborhood of Beaufort, to some point on the Savannah river." 12 Stat. 564. The charter was afterwards amended, and the time for the completion of the road extended.

It does not appear who owned the strip of land prior to 1863, but it is conceded that it had been previously granted, and had been the private property of some one, and about that time the title became vested in the United States government under the operation of the direct tax acts of congress, passed during the war. 12 U. S. Stat. 422.

While the land was owned by the United States government, sometime in 1870, the defendant corporation entered upon the land and took possession of so much thereof as was necessary and had been authorized by the charter, to lay the track of their railroad. They finished their road over it in 1871, and are still in possession, using it as their tract, and claim that as against the plaintiff, certainly they have acquired the right of way therein.

In 1876, the defendants being in possession and operating their road over said strip, the plaintiff, with knowledge of that fact, received a conveyance from the United States government of the tract of land through which it runs, and claiming that his deed gave him title to all the land within its limits, commenced this action February 5th, 1878, to recover the same from the defendant corporation. The case was tried before Judge Thomson, who, without assigning any reason therefor, granted a non-suit. The plaintiff filed no specific exceptions to the order of non-suit, but appeals generally therefrom to this court.

The only question is whether the non-suit was improperly granted. Being an action for a strip of land, of which the plaintiff never had actual possession, nor was evicted therefrom, he must recover it, if at all, upon the strength of his own title, and not the weakness of that of the defendant. He must show complete chain of title back to the original grantor, or possession long enough to presume a grant or give title, or that plaintiff and defendant claim from a common source, and that his title is better than that of defendant. In proving his case the plaintiff did not go back of the conveyance of the government to himself, and, therefore, he failed to show perfect title in *himself either by chain to the original grantee or by possession for a period long enough to give title.

The only question then remaining is whether it appeared that the defendant as well as the plaintiff claimed under the government, and that plaintiff's claim was better than that of defendant. Upon this issue the onus was upon the plaintiff, and, until the necessary proof was made, it was not incumbent upon the company to do more than stand upon their possession. If that were obtained in any other manner than from the government, the principle indicated was not applicable to the case, and in order to recover it was necessary for the plaintiff to prove title in himself. It does not seem to be perfectly clear that the company entered under the government. It is certain that no written connection was shown, and, from all that appears, it is possible that the company claimed in some way other than from the government.

But, as the company built and located their road in 1870, while the government owned the land, let us assume that this fact created such a relation between them and the government as to authorize the application of the rule in regard to tracing title to a common source, and inquire how the matter stands in that aspect. The plaintiff insists that he purchased land and received a conveyance with certain metes and bounds, which include the strip sued for, and that his title to that is as good as to any other portion of the land; that the right of way in the land was never acquired by the company, which could be done only by condemnation of the land according to law, or by the assent, expressed or implied, of the owner. The plaintiff received conveyance in 1876, from the United States government. There is no copy in "the case," and we are not informed of its precise terms, or whether it makes any reference to the fact of the railroad running through the land conveyed; but we assume that it was a quit-claim deed or grant in the usual form, conveying lands by metes and bounds, which include the slip in controversy, and we take it as clear that the plaintiff can have no higher right than his vendor had at the time of the conveyance.

If the land through which the track runs had not been conveyed to the plaintiff, could the government in an action recover *this tract from the company? If not, the plaintiff, holding under the government, cannot. There was no evidence that the land had been condemned in the manner prescribed by law, or that the government had executed a formal release of the right of way, but it does appear that while the government owned the land the public authorities of the government granted to the company the right of way under the operation of the general statutes of congress, passed in 1866, which was operative in 1871, when the track of the railroad was located, and declares that "the right of way for the construction of highways over public lands, not reserved for public uses, is hereby granted." U. S. Rev. Stat., p. 456, § 2477.

It is insisted, however, that this land was not "public" in the sense of the act of congress, and that the general grant of the right of way in "public lands" did not include this case. It is true that these lands, having been previously granted and owned as private property, were not original public lands like those unsettled in the new states and territories, but we suppose that after the United States acquired the title they were held for the benefit of all the citizens of the government, and were "public lands" in the sense of the act of congress. If so, as they were sold to the plaintiff, we may safely assume that they were not "reserved for public uses," and fell under the operation of the act of congress. That the government acknowledged the force of the grant as applicable, would seem to be indicated by the fact that no objection was made to the location of the road and the use of the road-bed for years—indeed, up to the time of the sale to the plaintiff, it does not appear that the government ever objected. It seems from the statutes that it is the practice of the United Sates to make grants of land to promote public enterprises, and especially the building of railroads; and it may be that the authorities regarded the right of way in this land as already granted to the company before they sold, and that they did not convey or intend to convey to the plaintiff the right to disturb the company in the enjoyment of it.

If we are mistaken in this, and the government should only be regarded as a private owner of the land, does it follow that the plaintiff should recover possession of this road-bed? The ques*tion is not whether the plaintiff, leaving the company in possession of its track, can recover compensation for its use as a right of way, but whether, disregarding all that has been done and the long possession of the company, he may recover the land itself and thus break the track, and to that extent destroy the public usefulness of the road.

The state, by the right of eminent domain, granted to the company the power to take any lands lying in their route, upon only one fundamental condition, viz., that the value of the land so taken should be paid to the owner, if required; for want of an agreement, or where parties would not negotiate, the value to be fixed by commissioners. In any event, however, with or without consent, the company was authorized to take as much as was necessary for a right of way. True, this could be done only in the manner prescribed by law, or with the assent, express or implied, of the owner, and the plaintiff claims that the right of way was not condemned in the manner prescribed, and that the company are as much trespassers as if they never had a charter. If this were true, we suppose that the company would still have the right, under their charter, to re-take the land and have it valued under the act; so that, at last, even upon the view of the plaintiff, the only substantial right really involved is that of compensation for the use of the land; and in such case it has been held, under circumstances somewhat analogous, that that right belongs only to the owner of the land at the time of the construction of the road and cannot be pursued by a subsequent purchaser with notice, whose rights only commence at the date of his deed, and who takes the land in the condition in which he purchased it. Lewis v. R. R. Co., 11 Rich. 91.

The act of 1868 (Gen. Stat. 352), prescribes "the manner of acquiring rights of way" in cases of individual ownership. McCrea v. Port Royal R. R. Co., 3 S. C. 381 [16 Am. Rep. 729]. One of the sections of that act provides that any person or corporation, before entering upon any lands for the purpose of construction, shall give to the owner thereof (if he be sui juris) notice in writing that the right of way over said lands is required for such purpose; which notice shall be given at least thirty days before entering upon said lands; and if such notice shall be given and *the owner shall not, within the period of thirty days, signify in writing his refusal or consent, it shall be presumed that such consent is given. If the owner of said lands shall signify his refusal of consent to entry upon his lands without previous compensation, the person or corporation requiring such right of way shall apply, by petition, for empaneling a jury to ascertain the amount which shall be paid as just compensation for the right of way, &c. And then Section 83 is as follows: "Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent entry upon any lands for purposes of survey and location; and if, in any case, the owner of any lands shall permit the person or corporation requiring a right of way over the same to enter upon the construction of the highway without previous compensation, the said owner shall have the right, after the highway shall have been constructed, to demand compensation and to petition for an assessment of the same in the manner hereinbefore described; provided, such petition shall be filed within twelve months after the highway shall have been completed through his or her lands."

It is insisted that under these provisions there could be no "permission" to enter upon the construction of the highway before the owner had received the notice required by a previous section; that such notice must be the first essential step to set up the easement, and, in fact, a condition precedent to securing any rights whatever under the act by permission, possession, consent or otherwise. The requirement as to notice was made manifestly with a view to formal proceedings to assess the value in case of refusal, but surely it was never intended that the owner could not give the "permission" without first receiving formal notice, without which the right to object remained in abeyance indefinitely. The notice was intended for the benefit of the company in cases of objection, to give them a starting point to condemn the lands but was unnecessary in cases of consent. As the owner could give "permission" without receiving previous notice, it might be inferred from facts and circumstances. There was no express proof that the company gave the government "notice in writing" that the right of way was required; but the company are supposed to have known of the act of congress (supra), and there was proof that they, as early as 1870, entered *publicly upon the lands, located and built their road, and continued in possession of it as part of their road-bed until 1876, when the land through which it ran was conveyed to plaintiff. During the whole of this time the authorities of the government acquiesced in such entry and use without objection, or claiming that they had no notice in writing, or asking the appointment of commissioners to assess the value.

Whether, as matter of fact, this was enough "to presume" that the notice was given, or that regular release of right of way was executed, it was at least evidence that the government "permitted the corporation to enter upon the construction of the highway without previous compensation." The government, considered merely as an individual proprietor, had the right, with or without written notice, to require compensation. The manner of proceeding was open to the authorities of the government as well as to others, and upon the assumption that such right was not granted or waived, it was their duty to speak and warn the company; but they stood by in silence for six years and allowed the company to incur expense in locating and building this road through these public lands. We think, as matter of law, the government would now be estopped from denying this permission, this executed license, and from recovering the lands, and, as a consequence, the plaintiff, who holds the title of the government, is also estopped. "He who can forbid and does not, is deemed to have assented. * * * If one having title to land looks on and suffers another to purchase and expend money on the land without making known his claim, he will not be permitted, afterwards, to assert his title against an innocent purchaser." Herman's Law of Estoppel, § 409.

In Hand v. R. R. Co., 12 S. C. 351, this court said: "If a party having title to property, or a right in respect thereof, permits another to exercise authority over such property, or deal with such right, the latter shall not be subjected to damages by reason thereof, for volenti non fit injuria. This is a well-known legal principle, and, under its operation, a license to use both real and personal property is recognized as existing at law, both by deed and other writing under seal and by parol, and is also *presumed from the conduct and relationship of the parties when not in terms expressed."

This judgment is without prejudice to any right which the plaintiff may be advised that he has to institute proceedings under the act for compensation for the use of the right of way. No opinion is intended to be intimated upon that subject.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

SAMS v. PORT ROYAL AND AUGUSTA RAILWAY COMPANY.

[1. Public Lands ⟸92.]

A tract of land belonging to S. was acquired by the United States under the provisions of the direct tax act of 1863, (12 U. S. Stat. 422,) but was afterwards restored to S. During its occupancy by the United States a railroad was constructed over this land, and, subsequently, an officer of the government demanded of the railroad company compensation for the right of way used by them, but did not obtain it. After the restoration to S., he commenced an action against the successors by purchase of this railroad for the recovery of their road-bed and for damages. Held, that he was properly non-suited.

*Messrs. W. J. Verdier and J. D. Pope, for appellants.

Mr. William Elliott, contra.

July 27th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This case was heard in connection with that of William J. Verdier v. Port Royal R. R. Co., just decided, [15 S. C.] ante p. 476. The general questions are the same, only modified by a difference of one or two facts. In this case the plaintiff was the owner of the land prior to 1863, when the United States became seized, under the operation of the direct tax acts of congress, and held the same until 1875, when the authorities of the government released the same to the plaintiff under the act of congress, June 8th, 1872. In 1870, while the land was owned by the government, the Port Royal Railroad Company entered upon and took so much thereof as was necessary for a right of way. They finished their road over it in 1871. On April 30th, 1872, the following notice was served on S. C. Millett, superintendent, and one of the directors of the company:

"Beaufort, April 30, 1872.

"Gents: You will please take notice that a portion of your road is built upon lands belonging to the United States, without your having procured the right of way. You are hereby requested to make payment or compensation therefor, the same as though it belonged to private parties. By order of the commissioner of internal revenue.

"Respectfully yours,

"W. R. Clautman.

"By S. B. Wright, Deputy.

"To the president and board of directors of the Port Royal Railroad, Beaufort, S. C."

In October, 1878, a new company, under the corporate name of "The Port Royal and Augusta Railway Company," became the owners of the rights, franchises and property of the old com*pany, and continued to operate the road on the same track until September 17th, 1879, when this action was brought against the new company to recover so much of the road-bed as runs through the land. The Circuit judge granted a non-suit also in this case, and the appeal comes to this court.

As the plaintiff originally owned the land, he proved title in himself. The government acquired title from him, and he afterwards received it back, so that there is here no necessity for the application of the principle as to tracing title to a common source. When, however, the plaintiff received back the title and possession of all but the strip on which the track was located, he was not thereby restored to all the rights which he originally possessed when his title was divested, but he received the land in its then condition, affected by all the intermediate acts of the United States authorities touching the same. He acquired such rights only as the government had not, while owner, granted, or in some way lost. Notwithstanding his original ownership, as the last donee, he has no higher title than the last donor could give.

The notice given by the United States authorities in 1872, "requesting the company to make payment or compensation for the right of way," distinguishes this case from the one just decided. If this notice, in disregard of the act of congress granting the right of way "for the construction of highways over public lands," was without proper authority from the government, then it is the same as if no notice was received or given, and being like the case of Verdier v. Port Royal Railroad Company, the principles announced in that case must be conclusive of this. But if such notice was by the authority of the United States government, and by the proper officer, then that notice affords the proof that the government, while owner of the land, did not object to the right of way, nor claim to recover the land, but instead thereof, claimed "payment or compensation for the right of way." This was an admission of the right of the company to take so much as was necessary to locate the road, and a claim for compensation for it, "the same as though it belonged to private parties."

The act of 1868 prescribes the manner of securing compensation by private parties, for lands taken for right of way, and the *government, while owner, having claimed it, the plaintiff, the donee of the government, cannot ignore that claim and recover the land itself. No action of any kind, other than that allowed by the statute, can be maintained for damages. The statutory remedy provided for securing compensation to those whose lands are taken by the authority of the state, supersedes and excludes all other remedies. McLauchlin v. C. & S. C. R. R. Co., 5 Rich. 597; Fuller v. Edings, 11 Rich. 245. In the latter case the court said: "Where the legislature authorizes the laying out of a highway or the establishment of other works deemed by them to be of public necessity and convenience, or when in their opinion it is for the public benefit, and in the construction thereof damages are supposed to result to the property of others, and a mode is provided by statute for the assessment and payment of the same, the party so authorized is not a wrong doer, and the remedy for the person injured is confined to the mode provided by the statute, and none exists at common law. 1 Am. Railway Cases, 163; 11 Mass. 364; 12 Mass. 446; 4 Wend. 667."

In the case from Wendell, Judge Marcy says: "The principles settled by the court for correction of errors in the case of Rogers v. Bradshaw, 20 Johns. 735, applied to this case, are fatal to the rights of the plaintiffs to sustain this action. * * * The rule of construction that if a statute gives a remedy in the affirmative, without a negative expressed or implied, for a matter which was actionable at common law, the party is not deprived of this common law remedy, but may elect to take it or that offered by the statute, does not, I apprehend, apply to acts done by the express authority of the legislature for a public purpose. Such, certainly, has not been the doctrine applied to suits against our public agents employed on our works of internal improvement, and such is not the doctrine that I am willing to apply to this case."

This is without prejudice as to any claim for compensation under the act which the plaintiff may be advised to make. Upon that point we express no opinion.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, February, 1881.

Action commenced December 18th, 1880, by Judith Brown against D. H. Buttz. The complaint alleged the facts stated in the opinion of this court, and none others, claimed $100 damages, and prayed judgment for such damages, and for the vacation of the transcript. No fraud was alleged. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

August 1st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*in the court of a judicial trial justice, in Charleston, for $35 and costs; that this judgment, upon a transcript signed by the clerk of the trial justice, was entered in the Circuit Court; that at the same time the said judgment was assigned by Polite to the defendant (respondent) Buttz; that the trial justice afterwards vacated this judgment for fraud; that Buttz was requested to vacate the transcript, which he declined to do, and proceeded to levy his execution on plaintiff's property. To this complaint the defendant answered, claiming that he purchased the judgment for valuable consideration, and denying the fraud and damages.

The case, as it seems, was to be placed on Calendar 1, to be tried by the jury; the clerk, however, by some mistake, placed it on No. 2. This was not discovered until after the juries had been dismissed, when it was taken from No. 2 and docketed on No. 1. On this calendar the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The presiding judge granted this motion.

The plaintiff has appealed upon the grounds following:

"1. Because it was error for the judge to hear a motion to dismiss the complaint against plaintiff's objections before the trial of the cause and without notice to the plaintiff.

"2. It was error in the judge to hold that the judicial trial justice had no power to set aside a judgment of the judicial trial justice court for fraud.

"3. Because, if the judicial trial justice had no such power, the judge of the Circuit Court should have set it aside.

"4. Because a transcript by the clerk of the judicial trial justice court is not a judgment of the Circuit Court.

"5. Because the judge should have granted a stay of proceedings, as requested by the plaintiff's attorney, until the decision of the Appeal Court."

We do not think that the appellant can take anything by her appeal on any of the grounds stated. The fact that the clerk made a mistake in placing the case, in the first instance, on Calendar No. 2, and afterward removed it to No. 1, when the juries had been dismissed, did not preclude the defendant from inter*posing the demurrer upon which the complaint was dismissed. A jury was not necessary to the hearing of this demurrer. It involved legal grounds and could be addressed only to the court. It was a preliminary motion, and necessarily preceded the trial, and could be heard as well in the absence of the jury as if they were present.

A demurrer upon the ground that the facts alleged do not constitute a sufficient cause of action, like that which excepts to the jurisdiction of the court, is not to be deemed waived, because not presented either by answer or by formal demurrer. It is always in order when the case is reached on the calendar, and no formal notice need be given to the other side. A party plaintiff is supposed at all times to be prepared to vindicate the action which he has deliberately instituted against a demurrer of this kind, raising, as it does, only issues of law.

2. Did the trial justice transcend his powers in vacating for fraud the judgment which had been obtained in his court, especially after it had become a judgment of the Circuit Court by the filing of a transcript in that court?

A trial justice court is one of limited jurisdiction. Its boundary is prescribed by the acts which have created it, and which have invested it with its powers. We must look to these acts to ascertain the limit of its jurisdiction. Judicial trial justices, under that name and title, exist only in the city of Charleston; but the jurisdiction of this officer does not differ materially from the trial justices in the other counties of the state. The act defining the civil jurisdiction of trial justices, which applies to judicial trial justices as well as to others, is found incorporated in the code.

In this act the jurisdiction of these courts is specially defined and limited, without enumerating the different classes of cases in which jurisdiction is conferred. It is enough to say that nowhere in this act, nor in any subsequent act, have trial justices been invested with power to grant relief in cases of fraud, except in the single case of an action for damages, for fraud in the sale, purchase or exchange of personal property, where the damages claimed do not exceed $100. There is no general jurisdiction conferred over the subject of fraud. It is confined to the case *mentioned, and the power of the trial justice cannot be extended beyond such a case. It is true, that by the act of 1874 trial justices may grant new trials for reasons for which new trials have usually been granted in the courts of law of the United States, provided the motion is made within five days after the rendition of the judgment; and, provided further, that the new trial shall be had only before the trial justice who first heard the case.

It does not appear in this case that the judgment was vacated on motion for a new trial, made within five days after judgment rendered. From the statements made in the brief, it is inferred that the judgment was attacked for fraud, and that it was vacated permanently by an original proceeding to that end. This, we think, the trial justice had no power to do. Hence, there was no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge as to this exception.

3. It is claimed by appellant that if the trial justice had no power to vacate this judgment the Circuit Court should have set it aside. The Circuit Court, no doubt, has jurisdiction of fraud in all of its phases; and, upon a proper case made, its powers in this respect—which are full and complete—can be successfully invoked. But to accomplish this result the proceeding must be shaped to that end. In this case the action was not to set aside the judgment, but it was brought to recover damages for an alleged trespass by the defendant upon property of the plaintiff. The judgment in question was only incidentally involved, and although in the prayer of the complaint the vacation of this judgment was asked, yet the main issue was as to the trespass, and the main relief sought was damages for this alleged trespass.

4. The fourth exception assails the validity of the transcript filed in the Circuit Court on the ground that it was signed by the clerk of the trial justice instead of the trial justice himself.

Section 90 of the code provides that a trial justice, on the demand of a party in whose favor he shall have rendered a judgment, shall give a transcript thereof, which may be filed and docketed in the office of the clerk of the county where judgment was rendered, and from that time the judgment so filed shall be a judgment of the Circuit Court. Section 12 of the act approved December 14th, 1878, regulating the practice and duties *of trial justices' courts in the city of Charleston, authorizes the judicial justices of that city to appoint a clerk. 16 Stat. 685.

Now there is nothing in this act in reference to the transcript which requires that it shall be signed by the trial justice himself. Of course it should be properly authenticated, and with those trial justices who have no clerk, there is no one else to certify the transcript but the trial justice himself, and, in such case, his signature is necessary to authenticate the paper, and to authorize the clerk of the Circuit Court to file it. But with the judicial trial justices who have, by law, a clerk regularly appointed, his authentication of the judgment, rendered and signed by the trial justice, and enrolled as the act requires, would seem to be not only all that is necessary, but, from analogy, the exact legal mode of transmitting the transcript to the higher court. This was the mode adopted in this case, and we think that this was a compliance with the law.

5. On dismissing the complaint the judge refused, without a bond, to stay proceedings until the appeal could be heard in this court, and this is the foundation for the fifth exception.

Section 360 of the code authorizes a party, after giving notice of appeal from a judgment rendered against him, directing the payment of money, to apply to the presiding judge to stay execution; but this section does not require, in mandatory terms, that the application shall be granted. It seems to be a matter of discretion with the judge. In other cases the code provides for the stay of proceedings according to the character of the judgment rendered. There was no error of law, that we can see, in the refusal of the judge to grant plaintiff's motion.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, May, 1880.

Action commenced August 12th, 1873, by E. S. Keitt against G. B. Counts and E. B. Suber, for the recovery of a steam engine and carriage. The complaint alleged that the defendants purchased this property May 24th, 1870, for $600, of which $200 was cash, and balance, with interest, was payable January 1st, 1871, upon which was paid $100 April 15th, 1871; it also alleged that the title to the property was to remain in the plaintiff until it was paid for; that it was unjustly detained, to plaintiff's damage, &c. The joint answer of defendants admitted the purchase, the amount of the note and credit, but denied that it was to be the property of plaintiff until paid for.

All issues of law and fact in the case were referred to the master; whether by consent or otherwise, does not appear. The report of the master found the facts to be as stated in the complaint, and, as conclusions of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to the possession of the property and $100 damages, besides costs, &c. Defendants filed exceptions, which were overruled by the decree of the Circuit judge, stated in the opinion.

*Defendants appealed upon grounds which are substantially stated in the opinion.

Mr. T. S. Moorman, for appellants.

August 31st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. This action was brought to recover possession of personal property—a certain steam engine and carriage—bought by defendants from plaintiff, the purchase being partly for cash and partly on credit. The issue between the parties was whether title to the property had been reserved to the plaintiff until payment of the credit portion of the purchase money. The case, embracing the issues both of law and fact, was referred to the master, who found the question of fact for the plaintiff, and also $100 damages for the detention of the property. As conclusions of law he found:

"1. That the title to the engine and carriage is in the plaintiff.

"2. That the plaintiff is entitled to the immediate possession of said property.

"3. That the plaintiff should recover against the defendants for the damages sustained by him by reason of the unlawful detention of the said property by the defendants the sum of one hundred dollars, besides his costs and disbursements in this action."

To the report of the master there were several exceptions by defendants, all of which were overruled by the Circuit judge, who ordered and adjudged "that the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the master be confirmed and be made the judgment of the court." He further ordered that the property be delivered up by the defendants, as the property of the plaintiff, to Silas Johnstone, master, and that said master do sell the same, after fifteen days' notice, for one-half cash and the balance on a credit of twelve months, the net proceeds to be applied first to costs and then to the debt and interest, as set forth in the complaint as due and owing by defendants to the plaintiff, the balance, if any, to be paid to the defendants.

*From this judgment the defendants have appealed to this court, objecting to the conclusions of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to the immediate possession of the property in question, and to $100 damages for its detention, and also to the order of sale—the defendants contending, as to the latter, that this was converting the action from an action at law for the recovery of personal property into an action in equity for the foreclosure of a mortgage, while this was not the prayer of the complaint, and the defendant had no opportunity to make defense against the debt claimed.

As to the first question—the question of title—that depends upon a question of fact, to wit, whether there was an understanding and agreement between the parties at the purchase by defendants that the title should remain in the plaintiff until the purchase money was fully paid. The master heard testimony on this question and decided that such agreement was made. The Circuit judge concurred in this finding of fact, and under repeated decisions this is conclusive, unless this finding is patently and clearly against the weight of evidence, which we do not find to be the case here. This agreement then being established, the conclusion objected to followed as a necessary consequence, and must be sustained.

The objection made by appellants to the order of sale in the opinion of this court, is also untenable, especially coming from the defendants in the action. The plaintiff might have demanded a judgment for the recovery of this property and the damages found in his favor, leaving the defendants to such course as they might see proper to adopt to obtain relief on account of the payments which they had made on the purchase; but the plaintiff seems willing to forego his rights in this respect and to allow the property to be sold, and while the parties are all before the court, that justice may be done according to the equities established between them. We cannot see the force of defendants' objection. They claim that they had no opportunity of resisting the debt. The amount claimed by the plaintiff was set out in the complaint, the contract of purchase, the amount paid in cash, the subsequent payment and the credit portion were all alleged and were material averments, and we cannot see but that the defendants had *full opportunity to make any questions they might have desired on this subject. Having failed to do so, the court was warranted in assuming that the facts averred in the complaint were true, and that the amount therein stated was due by defendants. The order of sale was in fact an order for the benefit of defendants.

We do not clearly understand whether it was the intention of the Circuit judge, that in addition to the debt and interest which he directed to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale ordered, that plaintiff should also have judgment for the $100 damages found for the detention of the property. No part of the proceeds of sale is directed to be applied to this damage. And if that amount is to be recovered at all, it must be enforced by execution.

This amount of $100 was allowed upon the theory that the judgment would be for the recovery of the specific property. Since that theory has been departed from with the view to adjust the equities between the parties, and the plaintiff has been adjudged his debt and interest to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale, we do not think he should recover, in addition to this, the damages also. The interest upon the amount due is generally sufficient to cover damages, and this he has been allowed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed as to the order of sale and the application of the proceeds thereof; but that so much as allows the plaintiff $100 damages in addition to the interest on the debt be reversed.

FRASER v. DAVIE.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1194.]

A judgment creditor having acquired title to the lands of her debtor, signed and sealed a deed which was to be delivered when a sum agreed upon as a compromise of the judgment, was paid. Held, that moneys of the judgment debtor afterwards applied by the sheriff to such judgment and received by the judgment creditor, should be credited as part payment of the consideration of the deed.

Before Hudson, J., Chester, October, 1880.

Action by Fredrick E. Fraser, trustee, against Mary F. Davie and Churchhill B. Jones, his wife and children. The opinion sufficiently states the case.

The Circuit decree is as follows:

This cause has been heretofore heard on the Circuit, and on appeal in the Supreme Court, and has been there decided except in one particular. The facts affecting the controversy hitherto, are so fully set forth in the report of the case in 11 S. C. 56-70, that it is needless to restate them here.

At the close of the judgment in that case the court says: "The case must be remanded to the Circuit Court for an inquiry whether the situation of the property and of the parties is such that the deed of trust can take effect in substantial compliance with the terms of the contract between the parties as hereby established, and for a final decree upon the principles as hereinbefore stated." Now, what is the meaning of this order, and what are we to infer therefrom?

The chief question involved in the controversy on Circuit and in the Supreme Court, seems to have been whether a certain deed of trust had been delivered or not. The judge below determined that it had been delivered, and ordered it to be recorded. The Supreme Court drew a different conclusion from the testimony and decided that the deed from Mrs. Davie to the plaintiff, as trustee for Churchhill B. Jones and family, had not been delivered and was only to be delivered and placed upon record when Jones should pay the unpaid balance of $1500 in compromise of a certain judgment held by

Mrs. Davie against *Jones for a much larger amount, the excess of which was also to be assigned to the same trustee on the final delivery of the deed.

At the date of the execution of the trust deed, Jones paid $500, and gave his obligation to pay the balance, $1000 in a certain time, at a heavy rate of interest. The period fixed for the fulfillment of the contract by payment of the amount aforesaid and interest, had elapsed before the institution of this action, which fact, of course, was known to the Supreme Court when it directed this inquiry as to the practicability of still carrying out the contract in substantial compliance with its terms.

In submitting the case to the Supreme Court, counsel for the plaintiff laid down and used in argument these propositions: 1. That the deed purports to be voluntary, and hence equity will not aid Jones in enforcing a voluntary contract. 2. That the deed, however, is in reality not voluntary, but for a valuable consideration. But that consideration is an agreement to take in full satisfaction of a judgment an amount much less than the principal and interest; such being the consideration, Mrs. Davie cannot, in law or in equity, be compelled to accept it and to assign the excess. 3. The delivery of the deed was never complete, and was only to be so when the whole of the $1500 and interest should be paid in the time agreed upon. This was not done, and it is accordingly too late now after so long a delay to require it to be done.

The judgment of the Supreme Court, we regret to say, does not clearly and expressly determine all these propositions; but we think it does virtually and by implication determine the propositions by recommitting the cause to the Circuit Court for the simple inquiry above stated. It, in terms, or by necessary implication, decided that the deed is not voluntary, but is for a valuable consideration, to wit, the contract and agreement to pay $1500; that the contract is in compromise of a judgment for a large amount; that the contract is past due, it is true, but that time is not of its essence; that it is such an agreement as equity will enforce, and that, although much time has elapsed, yet it must be enforced, provided, the situation of the parties and the property is such that the substantial terms of the agreement can *still be carried into effect, to wit, the payment of the money, and the delivery of the deed, and the possession of the land, and assignment of the judgment. It is thus that I interpret the judgment of the Supreme Court, and hence I do not regard any of the above questions of law on the proposition aforesaid as open for argument again on Circuit. We are simply to make the inquiry which that Court has sent to us, and decree according as the fact may be, without regard to any question of the validity or legality of the original agreement.

By previous order of this court it was referred to J. J. Hemphill, Esq., as special referee, to make the inquiry directed by the Supreme Court to be made. He has made the inquiry, and has reported to this court that the situation of the property and of the parties is such that the original agreement and contract between Mrs. Davie and C. B. Jones can still be carried into effect in substantial compliance with its terms and according to the principles announced in the judgment of the Supreme Court. The land has not changed hands, but is in statu quo, and all that remains to be done is that the balance of the purchase money be paid, and the deed delivered to be recorded. This balance he finds to be on October 11th, 1879, $1287, after allowing credits for all payments deemed proper to be allowed.

To this report of the referee both parties except. The counsel for C. B. Jones claims that certain rents of the land should have been allowed as credits, which were refused by the referee. The counsel for Mr. Fraser and Mrs. Davie except to the report, upon several grounds, one of which assails a credit allowed, and the other grounds substantially re-open before this court the positions noticed above, which we have already said are, in our judgment, put at rest by the judgment of the Supreme Court. All the exceptions, by both parties, to the report of the referee, are overruled, and the findings of fact therein, and conclusions of law are sustained.

It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed that Churchhill B. Jones do, on or before the 1st day of January next, pay the balance aforesaid, to wit, $1287, to Mrs. Davie, with interest thereon from October 11th, 1879, and the costs of this action, and that thereupon the said deed be delivered for record according to the *terms of the agreement and the balance of the judgment assigned to said Fraser, as trustee as aforesaid. That upon the failure by the said Jones to make payment as aforesaid, the said deed be returned to Mrs. Davie for cancellation, and the said contract be annulled and all rights of the said Jones and other beneficiaries under said deed and said contract be completely barred and determined, and all parties be remanded to their previous status and rights as it no contract had ever been made, and that in that event the costs and disbursements of these proceedings be likewise paid by C. B. Jones.

Mrs. Davie appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the former decision of the Supreme Court had precluded inquiry as to the character of the agreement in this case, and had decided that time was not of the essence of the contract, and that the agreement must now be enforced, provided that the payment of the money and delivery of the deed, and the possession of the land and assignment of the judgment, could now be carried into effect.

2. Because his Honor erred in decreeing that upon the payment by the defendant, Jones, of the sum of $1287, with interest and costs, that the deed be delivered for record according to the terms of the agreement.

3. Because the situation of the property and of the parties is not such that the deed of trust can take effect in substantial compliance with the terms of the contract between the parties.

4. Because his Honor erred in not sustaining the defendant, Mary F. Davie's, fourth exception to the master's report, in which the master allowed a credit to Jones of $701.40, November 17th, 1873.

Mr E. McCrady, Jr., for appellant.

Mr. G. J. Patterson, contra.

August 31st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. The purpose of this action was to determine whether or not a certain deed, purporting to be a trust deed, *executed by appellant, Mary F. Davie, to Fraser, trustee, in favor of Churchhill B. Jones, his wife and children, respondents, had been delivered and should be put upon record as a valid deed for the purposes therein expressed.

The complaint was filed by Fraser, as trustee, against Churchhill B. Jones and his family, and also Mrs. Davie, to have the nature of his interest and duties in regard to the trust properly defined and settled as against the grantor and the cestuis que trust. Mrs. Davie, answering, denied that the deed had been delivered. She contended that C. B. Jones being indebted to her, by judgment, in the sum of $6300, represented that he was unable to pay the debt, and proposed to settle it by paying $1500—$500 in cash and the balance in three equal annual installments, at the rate of eighteen per cent. interest; the credit portion to be secured by bond and mortgage on certain real estate, and upon the payment of this sum she was to assign the judgment for the benefit of Jones' family; that afterwards Jones had titles to this real estate, which he had proposed at first simply to mortgage, executed to her, and had its value, some $2475, credited on her judgment. Upon this being done, she executed the deed of trust conveying the land to Fraser, but with the distinct understanding that it was not to be delivered or become operative until the balance of the $1500, agreed upon as a compromise of her debt, was paid according to the agreement. In other words, she was to retain control of the land as a security for the full payment of the $1500, instead of the mortgage which was to have been given according to the first agreement. And, inasmuch as this sum had not been paid, the deed had not been delivered, and should not be recorded.

Jones contended that the deed had been duly executed and delivered at its date, and that it was a valid instrument; that the agreement in reference to the settlement of the judgment was an independent agreement, having no connection with the deed, and, therefore, the complaint should be dismissed.

The case was heard by Judge Mackey, who, sustaining this view of the controversy, ordered the deed to be forthwith recorded. From this judgment Mrs. Davie appealed. The Supreme Court reversed this judgment of Judge Mackey, and sus*taining her construction of the agreement, ordered the case to be remanded to the Circuit Court for an inquiry, "whether the situation of the property and of the parties was such that the deed of trust could take effect in substantial compliance with the terms of the contract between the parties as established, and for a final decree upon the principles therein stated." 11 S. C. 69.

Upon its return to the Circuit Court in December, 1878, Judge Aldrich ordered the case to be referred to J. J. Hemphill to make the inquiry directed in the opinion of the Supreme Court. In October, 1879, the report of the referee came in. In this report it was stated that the parties and the property were in such condition as that the trust deed could take effect in substantial compliance with the contract, and after allowing Mr. Jones credit for the sum of $701.40, derived from the sale of Jones' property under the judgment of Mrs. Davie, since the agreement, he recommended "that Jones be allowed until the first day of December, 1879, to pay up the balance reported by him to be due, to wit, $1287. And upon his paying to Mrs. Davie, or her attorney, this sum, with the interest that might accrue thereon, and to the clerk of the court all costs and disbursements, that the trust deed be delivered and recorded, and the case ended." Mrs. Davie excepted to this report on several grounds, one of which assailed the credit allowed by the referee, and the others contending that the agreement had expired by its own limitation and could not now be enforced.

Judge Hudson overruled these exceptions and confirmed the report of the referee. Judge Hudson interpreted the judgment of the Supreme Court, above referred to, to have settled the points raised in the exceptions as to the validity of the trust deed, and he held that the questions of law raised by the exceptions as to the consideration and delivery of the deed, and as to the time within which the contract was to be carried out, were not open for argument before him. The sole question, in his judgment, being whether the condition of the property and parties was such as that the contract, as established, could be substantially carried out.

From this judgment Mrs. Davie has appealed to this court; her appeal raising, substantially, the two questions raised before

*Judge Hudson, to wit, that his Honor erred in holding that the former decision of the Supreme Court precluded inquiry as to the character of the agreement in this case, and that the court had therein decided that time was not of the essence of the agreement, and that the situation of the parties and property was such as could be enforced. Second. That the credit of $701.40, reported by the referee, should not have been allowed.

The history of this case shows that it is a hard case upon Mrs. Davie. Ten years ago she held a judgment upon Jones for over $6000. Jones was her nephew, or rather a nephew of her deceased husband. He had been unfortunate and was much embarrassed —his misfortunes, no doubt, growing out of the result of the late war between the states. Mrs. Davie was kind-hearted and indulgent, and seemed to sympathize deeply with her relative, and with a liberality almost unprecedented, yet, under the circumstances, in the highest degree commendable, she agreed to settle this large debt, secured as it was by judgment, for the small sum of $1500, giving a credit on the greater part of it in one, two and three years, the credit portion to be secured by a lien upon real estate.

The parties disagreed as to the understanding between them. Expensive litigation ensued, and Mrs. Davie is still without payment, even of the small amount agreed upon as a compromise. If the questions as to the binding character of the contract of compromise, and the validity of the deed then before the court had been an open question before Judge Hudson, much might have been urged against both. An agreement to take less than the whole amount for the whole, as a general rule, is a nudum pactum, and especially would this principle apply in a case where the debtor failed to comply promptly with the proposed reduction. And if this position had been taken by Mrs. Davie at the proper time, it may be that she might have invoked the protection of this principle successfully. The time, however, to have claimed its benefit was at the former trial; but this she failed to do. The question which she raised then was not that an invalid agreement had been made, but that the agreement which Jones contended for was not the agreement which had been made. She claimed that the true agreement was the one *set up by herself, and she does not seem to have manifested any unwillingness that this should be carried out.

The court sustained her view of the case, and it is not surprising that the court should have declared that contract valid and binding. To this result she not only did not object but contributed. Under these circumstances we are constrained to hold that the former opinion of this court settled these questions, and they are now res adjudicata. Such being our opinion, we are compelled to say that Judge Hudson did not err in confining his jurisdiction of this case to the single inquiry contained in the order remanding the case to the Circuit Court. After it reached the Circuit Court under that order it was properly referred to a referee. He confined his examination to the inquiry submitted in the order, and reported that there was no obstacle in the way of the execution of the contract. This has been confirmed by Judge Hudson, and we think that this is an end of the case.

The last exception contests the credit allowed by the referee and confirmed by the court below. This credit is for $701.40. This amount was received by Mrs. Davie in this way: Jones had a judgment on one Blackburn. Certain property of Blackburn was sold under the judgment, and when the proceeds of the sale reached the sheriff's office Mrs. Davie levied on it, and had it applied to her judgment. We do not see how Mrs. Davie can claim this besides the $1500 which she agreed to take for her judgment. The court has decided that the agreement between them is to be enforced, and this sum must be credited on the agreement; otherwise, Mrs. Davie would receive $701.40 more than she had contracted to receive.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Peake v. Young, 40 S. C. 59, 18 S. E. 237, without specific application.]

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, May, 1880.

At the hearing of this appeal the Hon. Thomas B. Fraser, judge of the Third Judicial Circuit, sat in the place of the Chief Justice, who had been of counsel in the court below.

It was an action commenced March 23d, 1877, by A. J. McCaughrin & Co. against J. W. Williams and his mortgage and judgment creditors, praying a foreclosure of a mortgage given by Williams to plaintiffs, and that the other defendants be required to present and prove their liens, &c. The only contest in the case arose upon the mortgage debt of L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler, which was disputed by the other creditors.

All the issues of law and fact were referred to J. F. J. Caldwell, Esq., who made his report, which stated the pleadings, the claims presented, &c.; and also the mortgage of Young and Chandler, its recitals and date, the notes to the bank and the endorsements on the bond, all of which are repeated in the opinion of this court. The report then continues:

It will be observed that this bond was signed just one year *after the date of the mortgage. It is not contended that it is a copy of any bond executed at or before the execution of the mortgage. Nor is it asserted, positively, that any bond was executed by Williams to Young and Chandler, or to either of them, at or before the execution of the mortgage. My notes of testimony, which are filed herewith, show the expression of a general belief on the part of Young that a bond of this character was executed on the same day as the mortgage; but he does not undertake to say certainly that there was such a bond, or, if there was, that the one just described is anything else than a substitute for it. And not even Young has undertaken to say that the matters written at the foot of the bond above described were ever embraced in any other bond than this.

Under these circumstances it became necessary for Young and Chandler to prove the consideration moving Williams to the execution of the mortgage. It was, indeed, contended by their counsel, on argument, that the mortgage operated to secure to them the payment of $8000, and that it rested upon Williams or other creditors of his to reduce that sum; but Young and Chandler themselves recognized the necessity of proving the consideration, and undertook so to do at the trial without being required by my order to make such proof. I am, however, free to say that I would not have hesitated to require such proof. Young, Chandler and Williams, and also J. W. Ferguson, Esq., who drew the mortgage, have testified on behalf of Young and Chandler. As my notes accompany this report, I content myself with a brief summary of the testimony of each of these witnesses. Young insists that the mortgage was executed for the avowed purpose of securing himself and Chandler as endorsers on the two bank notes, and also for the purpose of securing the payment of the $2000 note from Williams to himself, above described. Williams does not remember whether he gave a bond at the time the mortgage was executed or not, and says that he gave the mortgage to secure Young and Chandler, as his endorsers, and also to secure all his creditors—among whom he mentions J. N. Martin, specially. He adds, that at the time of executing the mortgage he had given Young a note, but that they "had had a sort of settlement in a general way." He states *on his examination in reply, that he "intended first to secure Young and Chandler as my [his] endorsers, and the former as my [his] creditor." "And then," he adds, "I designed to make other debts secure." I confess that this testimony strikes me as a fine specimen of the palpable obscure. Chandler does not think that any bond was executed at the time the mortgage was given. He says the mortgage was given to secure himself and Young as endorsers, and he thinks "it was William's intention to secure Young individually also, on account of the debt he owed him." Col. Ferguson testifies that he drew the mortgage. Williams, Young and Chandler having come to his law office to have it done; that they "desired a mortgage drawn for four thousand dollars;" that he "put the penalty at eight thousand;" that they then "concluded that they did not know how much money it would be needed to secure," so he "put the consideration in the same sum;" that the mortgage was the only paper he ever drew for them; that there was talk about a bond, but it was never drawn; that they spoke of a debt to the Bank of Newberry, but he does not know whether the mortgage was intended to secure it or not; that the parties spoke of money borrowed, or to be borrowed, from the Bank of Newberry; that he was led to believe that the mortgage was given to secure the payment of money which was to be, or had been, borrowed from that bank; that he does not remember to have heard of the intention to secure any other debts; that it was the debt to that bank which they stated the mortgage was intended to secure.

It is very plain, from all this, that the bond exhibited amounts to nothing more than a statement by Williams in regard to the purpose of his mortgage. As between himself and Young and Chandler, it would constitute an important admission; but as regards other and subsequent lien creditors, it signifies nothing. It is not pretended to be a copy of any former bond, and it is not pretended to contain even the substance of any former bond. I, therefore, hold it to be nothing more than a bare memorandum, which should not affect other creditors in the least.

To further relieve the case of unnecessary discussion, I may state that I am satisfied that no bond was executed at or before the date of the mortgage, or at any other time, except this one *which has been exhibited. The mortgage has, therefore, to stand or fall upon its own contents and the parol testimony taken at the trial.

I confess that I have been much troubled by this case. Indeed, of all the causes which have been referred to me since my coming to the bar, no one has exercised me half so much. My own private opinion is, that the mortgage was given for the purpose of securing Young and Chandler as endorsers on the bank notes; for that matter was certainly spoken of as the object of its execution among both the parties to it and the attorney, Colonel Ferguson, who drafted it. Indeed, unless we presume so serious an instrument to have been drawn and executed without any purpose whatever, we can scarcely arrive at any other conclusion. As regards the individual note I feel differently. I do not dispute that Mr. Young expected it to be secured by the mortgage; but there is no proof that Williams so intended. They wanted security drawn for $4000. Now, this could not embrace $3000 payable to the bank, and drawing one per cent. interest per month, and also the $2000 note, with more than a year's interest, at twelve per cent. per annum, already accrued upon it. I, therefore, unhesitating decide against the claim made for this individual note to the benefits of the mortgage. And this decision is based, not so much upon legal grounds as upon the evidence before me.

But to recur to the two bank notes, against which it is claimed the mortgage was intended as an indemnity. There it was not intended that there should be such certainty of description as in the case of individual note, as it is called. The bank held the notes, and it might have been difficult, perhaps impracticable, to obtain copies of them. Besides, it is quite likely that renewals were contemplated, which would, of course vary dates and amounts. And, certainly, a bond of indemnity would have been eminently proper, and this bond might well have been the sole evidence of indebtedness recited in the mortgage. If there had been such a bond executed contemporaneously with the mortgage, or before it, its proper setting forth in the mortgage would have furnished the means of ascertaining the objects of the *mortgage, and it would, therefore, have been sufficiently certain for the purposes of the claim.

But one's private opinion should never be allowed to upset legal rules or contravene established legal principles. And it is upon the strength of such rules and principles that this matter must be determined.

Judge Wardlaw has well spoken, in Mitchell v. Bogan, 11 Rich. 686 of mortgages of real estate as anomalies in the laws of this state. In England they are conveyances, subject to defeasance. Here chattel mortgages operate to transfer the title of the mortgaged property. But, as he says, a mortgage of real estate, with us, is not a conveyance of property, for the mortgagor remains completely the owner of the land; but it is rather a lien conferred upon the property, under which the mortgagee acquires the right to have the property sold for the satisfaction of the debt intended to be secured, or for the providing for compensation for the breaking of covenants, as the case may be. A mortgage of real estate should therefore be defined to be, not a conveyance of real property from the mortgagor to the mortgagee, with a mere equity of redemption or right left in the mortgagor to recover title to the land upon paying the debt or performing the duty acknowledged in the mortgage, but it should be defined as a mere right given by the mortgagor to the mortgagee, by an instrument in due form, to make the land pay the debt or compensate for the failure to perform the covenants recited in the mortgage. Hence it comes that the mortgage is not the principal thing, but the debt of money or other obligation intended to be secured is the principal thing, and the mortgage only its incident. Hence, also, it is held throughout the United States that where a note or bond is secured by a mortgage of land, the transfer of the note or bond carries with it, whether expressly so stipulated or not, the mortgage, whereas the transfer of the mortgage does not carry with it a transferal of the note or bond. Hence, also, the release of the mortgage by the mortgagee, after his transfer of the note or bond, whether the mortgagor or others have notice of the transfer of the note or not, will not operate as a release. Muller v. Wadlington, 5 S. C. 342.

*It is true, that there need not be a separate statement of the debt to be secured expressed in any other writing than the mortgage itself; and in this case the mortgage will occupy the place both of evidence of the debt and the lien which is intended to be given it on the land. But it seems to follow, from the principles just announced, that where the mortgage does not undertake within itself to specify and reasonably ascertain the debt, that debt must be fixed elsewhere, because the mortgage is executed for the sole purpose of securing the debt, and, therefore, when there is nothing fixing the debt, the mortgage is a nullity. I do not mean to say that every inaccuracy or uncertainty in regard to the debt will invalidate the mortgage, for anything is certain in law which may be made certain. And parol evidence would be freely admitted in any court to establish the identity of the real note with that attempted to be described in the mortgage—ut res magis valeat quam pereat. But I apprehend that no mortgage would be held valid to secure the payment of a bond when the obligation intended to be secured is described in it as a promissory note or as an open account, or vice versa. It has been held in this state that a mortgage may be valid, although the note which it professes to have been executed to secure is shown to be invalid; as in Gillett v. Powell, Speers Eq. 142, where the note was adjudged nugatory, on account of material alterations, yet the debt held to be enforceable under the mortgage. This decision followed from the holding by the court that the note was no obligation, and, therefore, the mortgage itself expressed the debt. And it is probable that the court was influenced by the fact that it was a chattel mortgage which was sought to be enforced. It has frequently been held that a mortgage conditioned for the payment of future loans or advances, or for the indemnification of sureties or endorsers of contemplated obligations, is valid, without any specifications of the amount or dates of such loans, advances or written obligations in the mortgage, whether there be a bond executed to cover such future indebtedness or not; but whether a mortgage professing to be executed to secure a certain note or bond, and for that purpose alone, is valid without such a bond or note ever being executed, is quite another question. If the bond in such a case is conceded to be the *principal and substantial thing, and the mortgage only an incident to it, how can it be said that the mortgage has any real legal existence or any available quality about it when there is no note or bond to sustain it? For the mortgage, in such case, does not constitute a debt, but is only a security for a debt. And if there is no debt there can be no mortgage. It is not sufficient to uphold the mortgage that there is some sort of liability from the mortgagor to the mortgagee; the mortgage must be construed according to its own language, and it must be held to apply only to those to which it professes to apply. I am not speaking of mere uncertainty in the language of the mortgage in its description of the debt, but of the debt itself. If the mortgage professes to secure an existing debt which is proved not to exist, it is available for nothing—it is nudum pactum. As before stated, I am satisfied that no such bond was ever executed as is described in the mortgage. There is, therefore, no bond secured by the mortgage. There is, therefore, no such debt in existence as this mortgage undertakes to secure. The mortgage is, consequently, a nude pact.

It appears to me useless to say that Young and Chandler had, and have, a contingent claim against Williams, arising out of their endorsement of his notes, in the bank, and that Williams has for six years owed Young a note. Williams gave them no bond; he owes them no bond except that executed a year after the mortgage. He, therefore, did not owe them the debt which the mortgage undertakes to secure as already owing them, so I cannot see that the mortgage secures any debt at all.

Young, however, although having no valid mortgage on Williams' land, is entitled to a judgment against Williams for thousand dollars; and as this proceeding is in the nature of a creditor's bill, it might not be improper to allow Young and Chandler a judgment, to be entered at the foot of whatever decree may be pronounced in this cause, for any sum of money they may hereafter pay for Williams on account of the two bank *notes. But this latter matter I must leave entirely to the discretion of the Circuit judge, as it is without precedent, so far as I know.

I find as matters of fact: * * *

13. That the defendant, L. L. Young, holds a valid sealed note against the said J. W. Williams for the sum of $2000, with annual interest thereon from November 4th, 1873, at twelve per cent. per annum.

14. That the National Bank of Newberry holds a promissory note against the said J. W. Williams, maker, and the said J. W. Chandler and L. L. Young, accommodation endorsers, (which is a renewal of two notes for $1500 each, made by the said maker and endorsers on December 8th, 1874,) on which there is now due the sum of $3522.02.

15. That the said J. W. Williams executed a mortgage of the lands described in the complaint to the said J. W. Chandler and L. L Young on December 21st, 1874, professing to secure the payment to the said mortgagees of a bond from him to them in the penalty and condition of $8000, which mortgage was duly recorded in the said county of Laurens on January 4th, 1875.

16. That no such bond as is recited in the said mortgage was ever executed.

17. That a bond of such description was executed by the said J. W. Williams on December 21st, 1875.

19. That J. W. Williams is indebted to the said L. L. Young by a sealed note, now amounting to $3695.62.

I find as conclusions of law:

3. That the mortgage from J. W. Williams to L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler is void.

I therefore recommend that the real estate of the said J. W. Williams, described in the complaint, &c., be sold, &c., and that the said L. L. Young have his judgment against the said J. W. Williams for the sum of $3695.62.

This report came before the Circuit Court on exceptions. The decree is as follows:

This action having been brought to a trial before me at Newberry court-house, by special consent of all the counsel concerned, *on the report of James F. J. Caldwell, Esq., as referee herein, filed on November 17th, 1879, and the exceptions thereto exhibited by the defendants, L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler, jointly, and by L. L. Young as an individual.

The exceptions demand at my hands but a statement by me of their purport. Especially is this the case, as the referee, in his report, is full and explicit.

1. Can a mortgage of land which recites its execution to secure a bond, be held as a valid security against the rights of third persons, if the bond referred to in the mortgage to be secured by it was not executed contemporaneously with or prior to it?

2. If such a mortgage, so executed in the absence of the bond recited in it, should be held valid, can it be made to protect a contingent liability of the grantor of the mortgage to the grantees of the mortgage, arising from their endorsement of his two promissory notes for $3000?

I am satisfied that a mortgage answering to the description named by me in the first proposition of this opinion should be sustained, but the controlling difficulty, to my mind, is embraced in the second proposition, viz., the contingent liability of the grantor, Williams, to the grantees, Chandler and Young, arising from their endorsement of his two promissory notes for $3000.

I am of the opinion that the mortgage in this case, purporting on its face to secure a debt evidenced by a bond, when no such bond was executed until a year after the mortgage, cannot be made available by the mortgagees to secure a contingent liability, not mentioned in the mortgage, of mortgagor to mortgagees.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the exceptions be overruled and the report of the referee be confirmed and made the judgment of this court. It is further ordered, adjudged and decreed that the mortgages proved herein be foreclosed, &c.

To which decree the following notice and grounds of appeal were presented:

Please take notice that the defendants, J. Williams, L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler, appeal from the decree of Judge Wallace, and will move the Supreme Court, at its next session hereafter, to reverse said decree upon the following grounds:

*1. Because the said Circuit judge erred in adjudging that the defendants, L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler, were not entitled to have the mortgage executed by J. W. Williams to them, set up as a subsisting lien upon the lands therein described.

2. Because the said Circuit judge erred in adjudging that the defendant, Young, was not entitled to have the mortgage executed by Williams to Young and Chandler to secure a bond in the penalty and conditions for $8000, set up as a subsisting lien in favor of the said Young, to the extent of the sealed note for $2000, made by Williams to the said Young.

3. Because the said Circuit judge erred in adjudging that the mortgage made by J. W. Williams to L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler was not available to the said Young and Chandler to secure a contingent liability not mentioned in the mortgage of mortgagor to mortgagees; while it is respectfully submitted that his Honor should have held that the mortgage made to secure a bond for $8000 by Williams to Young and Chandler created a lien capable of being enforced for the benefit of the said Young and Chandler, to protect them as the endorsers of the said Williams on his two notes for $3000 to the National Bank of Newberry, South Carolina.

September 9th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

FRASER, A. A. J. The case is so fully and clearly stated in the report of the referee, which was confirmed and made the judgment of the Circuit Court, that only so much will be stated here as is necessary to explain the judgment of this court. The *finding of fact by the referee having been concurred in by the Circuit judge, and upon such testimony as has been introduced in this case, will not be overruled in this court.

On December 21st, 1874, J. Wash. Williams, one of the defendants, executed in the usual form a mortgage to J. W. Chandler and L. L. Young, of a tract of land. The mortgage recites that "whereas I, the said J. Wash. Williams, &c., in and by certain bond or obligation, bearing date December 8th, 1874, stand firmly held and bound unto L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler in the penal sum of $8000, as in and by the said bond and condition thereof, reference being thereunto had, will more fully appear."

The condition is for the "payment" of the said debt or sum of money aforesaid, "with interest." The referee finds, as a fact, that no such bond as here described had been executed at or before the execution of the mortgage.

A bond was, however, executed December 21st, 1875, one year after the mortgage, by Williams to Young and Chandler, in the penal sum of $8000, conditioned to pay $8000. This bond is without a witness and has no time fixed for the payment.

On this bond is a written declaration of the same date as the bond signed by Williams; that it was "executed in the place of the bond mentioned in the mortgage, * * * it being for the same amount and for the same purposes, and intended to occupy its place under the mortgage, not in payment thereof, but in lieu thereof." On the other side of the sheet is a further declaration, in writing, signed by Williams, without date, that this bond and mortgage were given by him "to secure the payment and thereby to save harmless the said Young and Chandler as endorsers thereon of two notes for $1500 each," &c., * * * and "to secure the payment of such renewals thereof as may be made," &c., and "to secure the payment of ——— to L. L. Young," with interest, "the amount of individual indebtedness" to said Young. The notes bore date December 8th, 1874. The referee finds, as a fact, that the mortgage was intended, or, to use the words of the referee, "given for the purpose of securing Young and Chandler as endorsers on the bank notes." The referee finds *that there was no proof that Williams intended to secure the individual note of $2000 to Young.

His conclusion, therefore, may be stated to be this: that the mortgage was given at its execution to secure the endorsers on the bank notes, but the feature in the transaction, in reference to the individual note of Young, was an attempt to engraft it upon a mortgage with which it had no original connection.

The questions raised by the appeal in this case are—

1. Is a mortgage of land a valid security, which recites a bond to be secured by it, which bond in fact was not executed before the mortgage or at the same time with it?

2. Can such a mortgage be held a valid security for the contingent liability of the mortgagor to the mortgagees, arising from an endorsement by the mortgagees on promissory notes of the mortgagor?

3. Can a mortgage, which is a valid security only for contingent liability, or for any other debt, be extended afterwards to secure other debts not included in the original agreement between the parties, and after its execution and delivery?

The first question has been decided by the Circuit judge affirmatively, and, we hold, correctly. The case of Bramhall v. Flood, 41 Conn. 58, was a case in which the debt was described as a note for $1000. No such note had been given, but the mortgagor was indebted to the mortgagee for $756 for goods sold, and there was an agreement to furnish the balance to the amount of $1000. The mortgage was held to be void. This is said in Jones on Mort., § 70, to be "an extreme case and not to be relied on."

In Jones on Mort., § 353, we find the doctrine laid down in these words: "A deed of trust or mortgage is valid without any note or bond, although it purports to secure a note or bond and substantially describes it. The mortgage debt exists independently of the note. The inquiry is: Does the debt exist? If it does, it is not essential that there should be any evidence of it beyond what is furnished by the recital of the deed. The validity of a mortgage does not depend upon the description of the debt contained in the deed, nor upon the form of the indebtedness, whether it be by note or bond or otherwise; it depends *rather upon the existence of the debt it is given to secure. Although there be no note or bond, and no time is specified for the payment of the mortgaged debt, the mortgage, if given to secure the payment of the debt that actually exists, is valid, and may be enforced immediately."

As soon as this mortgage was executed it enured to the benefit of the bank to secure an existing debt, the notes endorsed by Young and Chandler. The renewals of the original notes do not affect the security. Jones on Mort., § 355. If the mortgage was valid to secure the debt which really existed, and that debt was a note or notes payable in bank, it is not correct to say that this was a mortgage to secure a contingent liability. If the agreement between these parties had been that the mortgage should secure a note thereafter to be made and endorsed, or an account for goods thereafter to be contracted, it might very well be held that as no such debt existed at the time the mortgage was executed, no such future and uncertain liability could be secured by it; but such is not the case here. The mortgage describes an obligation absolute on the face of it, and parties are estopped from denying its existence. A deed, absolute on its face and reciting full consideration, can be shown by parol evidence to be only a mortgage, and there seems to be no good reason why a mortgage reciting a bond, which in reality has no more existence than the recited considerations of a deed, can be shown to be in reality security for the payment of a debt for which the mortgagor and mortgagees are liable at the time of its execution.

The only question which remains is as to the individual note to L. L. Young. The referee holds that it was no part of the original agreement that this mortgage should secure this note. "A mortgage given to secure a certain debt is valid for that purpose only." Jones on Mort., § 357. The security remains good so long as the debt can be traced, but it cannot cover a new debt by any subsequent agreement of the parties.

It is, therefore, the judgment of this court that the mortgage of J. Wash. Williams is a valid security for the two notes in bank, endorsed by L. L. Young and J. W. Chandler, with their renewals and interest, but that it is not a security for the note of J. Wash. Williams to L. L. Young, individually, for $2000.

*It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as herein modified, be affirmed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

Pending action to subject a railroad to sale for the payment of its mortgage debts, the president and directors of the company were ordered to continue in the possession and management of its property of all kinds under the order of and subject to the court; and such officers were in like manner to continue to conduct and carry on the business of the company and to make report to the court, when required, of the condition of the property of the company, of its earnings and expenditures, to the end that such orders might be moved for as were necessary for the protection of the property of the company and the interests of all parties concerned. Held, that by this order the president and directors, and their successors in office, were constituted receivers of the court. Before Hudson, J., Richland, July, 1880.

In this case, Hon. A. P. ALDRICH, of the Second Judicial Circuit, and Hon. T. B. FRASER, of the Third Circuit, sat in the places of Chief Justice SIMPSON and Associate Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the original causes.

*These were four petitions to be paid out of the fund in court, which was realized from the earnings of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, while in the hands of the receiver, who was appointed under the actions of James S. Gibbes and others, creditors, against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and the State, ex relatione the Attorney-General, against the same corporation. Ex parte E. M. Brown and Emily Brown, his wife; Ex parte William Cummings; Ex parte William H. Redwood, were petitions for the payment of judgments obtained by them against the railroad company in May, 1878, for injuries received by them while passengers over the road on June 1st, 1874, resulting from the breaking of a trestle. Ex parte Elizabeth J. Layne, administratrix of the estate of John Y. Layne, deceased, was for the payment of balance of $1140 and interest due on judgment for $2000, taken by her against the company by consent, in September, 1877, damages for the death of her husband and intestate, an engineer on the road, his death being caused by the bursting of a defective boiler, on January 23d, 1874. Other facts are stated in the opinion of this court.

The petitions were filed by leave of court and referred to N. B. Barnwell, Esq., master, who made an unfavorable report. Exceptions were taken thereto by the petitioners, and the cases were heard by Judge Hudson, whose decree, after a statement of facts, was as follows:

The view I entertain of the law of the cases renders the payment or not of earnings to the interest on the mortgage debt, in preference of these judgments, not decisive of the issues; and although it may be that the interest was in fact not paid from earnings, but from funds otherwise raised, as the counsel for creditors claim they can show, yet, for the purposes of this contention, I am willing that it be conceded by the court that between the years 1874 and 1878, a portion of the earnings of the road was applied to payment of interest on the mortgage debt, sufficient to have paid all the claims of these petitioners. If the petitioners have a superior claim upon the fund of such payment was a diversion; otherwise, not.

With this statement of facts we proceed to examine the issues *raised by the exceptions to the master's report. The whole matter may be resolved into a single question, viz., has a passenger or an employee who holds a judgment for damages to the person against an insolvent railroad company, which has been placed in the hands of a receiver, a right to be paid out of the net earnings of the road in preference of senior mortgage creditors? Is the legal or equitable right to this fund set up by such a judgment creditor superior to the legal and equitable right of a prior mortgage creditor?

The petitioners rest their claims upon a supposed prior and superior equity to this particular fund, contending that whilst the mortgagees have a superior lien upon the property, they have a superior equitable lien upon the net earnings; that they do not stand upon the footing of ordinary and general judgment creditors, but of creditors whose claims are so peculiarly meritorious that a Court of Equity will, in the exercise of extraordinary power, displace existing liens and subordinate superior legal rights to these judgment claimants.

That they ought to be paid no one can deny, and that they will be paid is a fact, provided the assets of the corporation, in a due course of administration by the court, are sufficient. But if the assets of the company in the possession of the court, at the end of a legal and equitable administration, should fail to pay these debts, the petitioners are in no worse condition than the multitude of creditors who will have to go without pay. The question is not one of liability. It cannot be denied that a company, while managed by its own direction, is liable to demands of this kind, and where managed by a receiver as an officer of the court, it is equally liable out of its property to respond to unpaid claims of this kind, whether the cause of action arose before or after the judgment of insolvency and appointment of a receiver; whether the court may be solvent or insolvent, whether under its own directorship or the control of the court, does not affect the question of liability, but affects only the mode of establishing the debt and enforcing its payment.

So that whether a receiver can be sued in a court of law upon a demand of this kind, what is the effect upon the parties if they elect to sue the company, instead of going against the property *of the company in the hands of the court; what is the effect upon their rights, whether the cause of action arose prior or subsequent to the appointment of a receiver, all such questions, in the discussion of some of which much learning has been displayed by our judges and text writers, do not, in my opinion, greatly affect the fundamental issues in these cases. The main question is one of priority and not of liability. The petitioners have a right to be paid, they ought to be and will be paid, if the property be sufficient; but they claim a right prior to that of mortgage creditors, to be paid out of the income in the hands of the receiver; and that claim of priority we will proceed to examine. When a railroad corporation becomes insolvent, its property may be taken out of its hands by the court and managed by an officer of the court. This step is taken at the instance of creditors, in order to have the property controlled, protected and managed for the benefit of existing creditors, whose rank and priority, as then existing under the law, remain and must remain unchanged. No court has the right or power to displace existing liens, to divest vested rights, or to derange that order in which creditors, by their own contracts, have classed themselves under the law. It would be alarming to creditors, if not a monstrous doctrine, if a court, having forcibly taken possession of the property of a railroad, should have the power to upset the status of things and unhinge the vested rights of creditors by a rule of discretion resting on caprice.

Equity follows the law, and will not and cannot violate its mandates and behests. The harshness of the rules of law it will moderate, but then only to protect rights and prevent wrongs, which the rigid rules of law fail to do. Estates of decedents, and property of all kinds, coming into the control of a Court of Equity, will be administered by fixed and established principles, and not by caprice or fancy.

The property of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company is now being administered by this court. It has been brought here by creditors who ask this court to administer it, not for the benefit of the company, out of whose hands it has been taken, but for the benefit of the creditors. This the court has undertaken to do, and must do, and must, in so doing, *have a sacred regard for the rights of creditors as fixed at the date of the forcible sequestration of the property by the court. But a material part of this administration consists in the management of the road as a highway for traffic and travel, and whatever is essential to this proper management, the creditors have asked the court to carry out. This also the court will do, and to all the necessary incidents of good management, the creditors have, by coming here, agreed and contracted to submit, and are bound to acquiesce therein, even though their liens and rights may be affected thereby.

The necessary expenses incurred in the management and preservation of the property, it is evident must be defrayed by the court. This must be done out of the earnings, and earnings alone, if sufficient; and if not sufficient, then out of the property, and this before any creditor can receive a cent of his debt. Wages of employees of every class, and all kinds of material and labor furnished in order to keep up the road, constitute the leading items of necessary expense. To produce income for the creditors these expenses are absolutely necessary, and upon every principle of equity, as well as from the implied agreement of creditors, who have forced the road into court; these expenses must be paid in preference of all outstanding debts. Beyond this the court will not go, nor allow its officers to go, in incurring new liabilities.

This is the doctrine of fairness, equity and good faith, and is established by the uniform current of the decisions of our courts and the doctrines of our text writers. High on Rec., §§ 390–398; Jones on Rail. Sec., ch. XIX., §§ 557–566, and authorities there cited. Numerous decisions of the Circuit and Supreme Courts of the United States and the states might be referred to, all concurring in this leading doctrine as to the powers and duties of courts in running and managing insolvent railroads. The duty of the court is not to teach railroad officials how a railroad can and ought to be managed, but itself so to manage it as best to subserve the interest, real not imaginary, of existing creditors, whose servant and agent the court has undertaken to be. Economical management and prompt sale, if sale must be had, should, therefore, be the sole end and aim of the *court. Whatever, therefore, pertains to and is necessarily incident to the good management and preservation of the property, the court should do, and the creditors must submit to; but beyond this the court must not be led by caprice, taste, fancy or supposed kindness and mercy.

Therefore the petitioners, to succeed in their prayer for precedence, must show that the payment of their claims out of the income falls within this rule, and that such payment is necessary to the management of the road, and is to the interest of the mortgage bondholders.

The petitioners contend that their causes of action arose and their judgments were recovered while the road was in the hands of a receiver, and hence their equity to be paid out of the income. They say that the road was sequestered by the court in 1872, by the order of Judge Melton, and that the officers of the company were, by that order, made receivers; that the appointment of James Conner, in 1878, as receiver, did not change the status of the road, but only made definite and complete the status which before was anomalous. The counsel for the bondholders, resisting these petitioners, contend that no receiver, properly so called, existed until the appointment of James Conner.

I deem the settlement of this dispute not necessary to their judgments, and will consider the question as if the position of the petitioners in regard to it is correct, and I hold that the claims of the petitioners, admitting that they arose subsequent to the receivership, are no more entitled to priority over the liens of mortgage bondholders, as far as the earnings are concerned, than if they arose prior to the insolvency of the road and the appointment of a receiver.

Jones on Rail Sec., § 571, lays down the following doctrine: * * *

In the further discussion of this point the author cites the case of Davenport v. Alabama and Chattanooga R. R. Co., 2 Woods 519, which was for damages to a passenger on that road while in the hands of a receiver,

In none of the authorities cited by counsel for the petitioners do we find anything to sustain their claim. All are in harmony with the above case, and the doctrine of the text of Mr. Jones. *The case of Fosdick v. Schall, 9 Otto [99 U. S.] 235 [25 L. Ed. 339] which is most relied upon by claimants' counsel, is not at all at variance with the above, and the law as laid down in Davenport v. Alabama and Chattanooga Railroad Company is sound doctrine and well established.

It follows that the payment of income heretofore, if any has been paid, to interest on the mortgage debt, was not a diversion of funds, which of right, or in equity, belonged to the petitioners, nor have they any equity to any part of the present income or future earnings, prior to the right of the mortgagees, to whom it belongs primarily after payment of expenses.

It is, therefore, adjudged that the judgment of the petitioners do rank with the other judgments according to date and lien in the distribution of the assets of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, in the possession of the court, and that, as such, they are not entitled to be paid out of the income or property in preference of superior liens.

The exceptions to the master's report are overruled, and the same is confirmed.

The petitioners appeal to this court upon the following exceptions to this decree:

1. Because his Honor erred in ruling that the payment of income heretofore, if any has been paid, to interest on the mortgage debt, was not a diversion of funds which of right, or in equity, belonged to the petitioners.

2. Because his Honor erred in ruling that the petitioners have not any equity to any part of the present income or future earnings prior to the right of mortgagees.

3. Because his Honor erred in adjudging that the judgments of the petitioners do rank with the other judgments according to date and lien in the distribution of the assets of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and that they are not entitled to be paid out of the income or property in preference of superior liens.

Mr. S. W. Melton, same side.

September 10th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

FRASER, A. A. J. The action in the above case in which James S. Gibbes and others are plaintiffs, was commenced May 6th, 1872. On May 25th, 1872, an order was made by his Honor, Judge Melton, "that until further order of this court the said Greenville and Columbia Railroad [Company] be enjoined and restrained from paying out or in anywise transferring and delivering to any person any of the moneys, property or effects of the said company, except so far as the same may be necessary to the keeping up and to the operating of the road of said company."

On June 11th, 1872, the action in the name of the attorney-general was commenced. A motion was made for a receiver and other relief and Judge Melton, by consent of counsel for the company and certain creditors, on July 2d, 1872, ordered "that any and all judgment creditors of the said company be restrained and enjoined from enforcing their said judgments against the property of the said company." The same order contained this further provision: "As the state cannot be required to give security as other plaintiffs, it is ordered that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, under the order of and subject to this court, continue in the possession and management of the property of all kinds of said company, and in like manner continue to conduct and carry on the business of said company; that they make report to this court at such time as this court may require, of the property of all kinds of said company, of its earnings and profits and expenditures, to the end that such orders may, from time to time, be moved for as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the property of said company and of the interest of all parties concerned, pending litigation."

Affairs continued in this situation until November 23d, 1878, when Judge Pressley made an order in which it is said: "I con*sider that the said order of Judge Melton did make the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad company officers of this court, and responsible to it in the character of receivers; but they have not executed the proper bond nor have they filed their accounts or performed the other duties required by that order. It is, therefore, imperative on me to put an end to that condition of the property and to place it more substantially in the hands and under the custody and order of this court. It is, therefore, ordered that James Conner, Esq., be, and he is hereby, appointed receiver of all and singular the property and assets, rights, credits and franchises of the corporation defendants, the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company; that he do forthwith demand and receive possession thereof, * * * and the same safely keep and preserve, subject to the control, order and direction of the court, with power and authority to manage and operate said railroad, to receive the income and earnings thereof, and of the same to disburse whatever may be necessary for the expenses of running said road, and with all the other and further power and authority as may be conferred by the decree of this court hereafter to be filed. It is further ordered that all and singular the creditors of the said the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company be, and they are hereby, enjoined and restrained * * * from enforcing judgments against said company."

After this order was made, James Conner, as receiver, took charge of the road and all the property of the company and for some time conducted the operations of the road very successfully, and, after meeting all current expenses of his administration and investing a considerable sum out of the income in necessary rolling stock, &c., had on hand and has turned over to the master of this court a considerable sum arising from income.

By the order of the court the road and all its outfit and all the property of the company have been sold by the master. The sum realized was sufficient to pay all the first mortgage bonds and the guaranteed bonds.

The second mortgage bonds constituted a third lien on the property, and after exhausting the proceeds of the sale and all the surplus of income, there would still be a large deficiency in the amount necessary to pay these bonds.

The petitioners in the case before the court are not lien cred*itors. They claim, however, that they have a right to be paid out of the income: that their claims were expenses incurred during the period in which the railroad was in the hands of a receiver, or if not a receiver eo nomine, in the hands of persons appointed by, responsible to, and acting under the orders of the court which had enjoined the enforcement of judgments against the property of the company.

The petitioners have unnecessarily complicated their cases by suing them to judgment in the Court of Common Pleas, in which they are severally parties plaintiffs and "The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company" defendants.

The first three cases were claims for injuries done to passengers, June 1st, 1874. The amount of the judgments are for Brown and wife, $8137.15; Redwood, $2636.85; and Cummings, $2650.90. The last case was for injury resulting in the death of John T. Layne, an engineer in the employ of the company, or rather of those who, under the order of the court, had charge of the road and directed its operations. The injury resulted from a defective boiler. In this case there was a judgment by consent of the counsel of the administratrix and the counsel of the managers of the road. "The president and directors" had the company represented by counsel in these cases and, so far as appears, raised no objection to the appearance on the part of the company. It is not clear that there could have been any valid objection raised to a suit against the company, as only the enforcement of judgments was enjoined.

These claims are all pressed in this case not on account of their rank as judgments, but on account of the cause of action on which those judgments are based. It would have been more regular to have based the claim in this court at once on these several causes of action. This, however, would have opened the cases anew and led to a very long and expensive investigation. It is as well, therefore, and perhaps the duty of this court to disregard the mere form and treat the judgments as they seem to have been regarded by all parties as sufficient evidence of the nature of the claims and the amounts due on them severally. These claims were referred to the master, were reported on unfavorably and the report confirmed by the Circuit judge, and this *appeal is from his ruling. Claims for cotton lost and also counsel fees for professional services rendered after the commencement of the proceedings by the creditors against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, have been paid out of the income made by the receiver, James Conner, but it does not follow that these claims, which are contested by the lien creditors, should also be paid out of the fund; they must stand on their own merits.

These claims arose during the management of the road by "the president and directors," under the order of the court and before the appointment of "Receiver Conner." The president and directors did not turn over to Receiver Conner any surplus of income and it was claimed by the petitioners and conceded for the purposes of these cases that a considerable amount of the income during the administration of the president and directors was paid out as interest on the bonds held by the lien creditors. The fact was not settled by the presiding judge, but it seems not to have been seriously questioned in the argument, and in the view taken by this court of these cases it is not material what the fact is. The question of a diversion of the income to interest becomes important when claims which ought to be paid out have not been paid and such income has been diverted to the payment of interest, and the question is whether such income so diverted should not be restored out of the sale of the property. In this case there is no such question. There is a considerable sum turned over by the receiver to the master and now under the control of this court.

If the order of the court of July 2d, 1872, created a receivership in fact, then the mere transfer of that office to Receiver Conner certainly cannot have the effect of invalidating claims which were good under the first administration. The management of the court is one even if it becomes necessary to change the receiver once, twice or oftener. Claims against receivers would stand on a very unstable basis if they could be defeated by a change which could so easily be made. The questions, therefore, are these:

1. Was the order directing "the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company" to continue in the possession and management of the property of all kinds of the *company" and "to conduct and carry on its business under the order of and subject to this court," and "to make report," that orders * * * "may from time to time be moved" for "pending litigation," the appointment of a receiver? If not in name was it so in substance?

2. What are the relations of such a receivership to third parties with whom it may have transactions in reference to the property and business of the corporation shippers, passengers, employees, &c.?

It is true, that this order of July 2d, 1872, was somewhat anomalous. It was without bond that the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company were intrusted with valuable property, but they were not the owners of the property, and it was competent for the Circuit judge to dispense with the security, and if, in his judgment, they were proper persons for the appointment, it was in his discretion to make it. It is true that it was no individual by name that was appointed, but it was an organized board whose identity was provided for and secured by the rules laid down for preserving the vitality of the corporation whose exponent it was. It is, perhaps, a peculiar appointment, but it was competent for the court to make it. See High on Rec. 66, 67, 68, 81, as to persons to be appointed.

All the essential powers of a receiver were conferred by this order. It is the business of the receiver "to receive and preserve the property" pendente lite—"the court itself having the care of the property by its receiver." The receiver has no powers other than those conferred on him by the order of his appointment, or such as may be derived from the established practice of Courts of Equity. High on Rec. 1.

These officers, "the president and directors," were ordered to continue in the possession and management of the property and "conduct and carry on the business of the company," and "make reports," that further "orders" may be made. In the order of Judge Pressley, of November 23d, 1878, James Conner was appointed receiver eo nomine and he was required "to demand and receive possession of all the property of the company, to keep and preserve the same, subject to the control, order and *direction of the court, with power and authority to manage and operate the said railroad, to receive and disburse the income, the disbursements to be confined to the expense of running the road." In the first case the sweeping power is given "to conduct and carry on the business of the company," and in the latter the power is somewhat limited in the matter of expenditures of income. Every essential feature of a receivership was created by the order of July 2d, 1872, and the office ought to have been so called, and to be treated so now after the property has been, at the instance of the creditors, held for eight years in the same way as if it had been in name as it was in substance, a receivership. Fifty-four Bonds case [15 S. C.] ante 304.

Having come to the conclusion that the property of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company has been in the hands of receivers since the order of July 2d, 1872, and the road operated by the receivers, it remains to determine what are the liabilities of the receivers.

The railroad company was a common carrier, and, as if in anticipation of events which have come to pass, the charter of the company, (A. A. Stat. 1845, p. 328, § 13,) provided for the right to let or farm out to others, the right of transportation of person, produce, &c., and that the company, in the exercise of this right, and the persons to whom this right of conveyance and transportation should be let, shall, in so far as they act on the same, be regarded as "common carriers." It would be an easy way to defeat the wise purposes of the legislature if, on the application of a mortgage creditor, the railroad and all the important and valuable franchises of the company could be put, by an order in chancery, in the hands of a receiver, who could, for years, as in the case before the court, conduct the operations of the railroad, and enjoy the franchises of the company, entrusted to it on considerations of an enlightened public policy and escape the responsibilities of the common carrier. The convenience of transportation of persons and property, secured by this responsibility constituted in large measure the inducement to the legislature to exercise the right of eminent domain, and transfer to railroad companies valuable franchises, and in some cases against their will, the property of private citizens. The current of opinion *seems to be very decidedly in favor of the view that receivers are common carriers. It is said in High on Rec., § 398: "Receivers in possession of, and operating a railroad under appointment of a Court of Equity, may be held liable as common carriers for negligence in the performance of their duties." In Jones on Rail. Sec., § 511, we find these words: "But considerations of public policy may likely lead to the adoption of the rule that a receiver shall not be allowed to exercise the rights and powers of a common carrier without being also held subject to a common carrier's duties and liabilities." And this we hold to be the better doctrine.

The case of Davenport v. Railroad Company, 2 Wood 519 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,588], was one for the recovery of damages for a personal injury, and in it Judge Wood says: "It was regarded as too clear for argument that if the road had been run by the president and directors when the injury was sustained, such a claim could not possibly have priority; but the receivers act merely in place of the president and directors, except so far only as the court may otherwise direct." In one sense the receiver does so act, but in another sense, especially in that sense which is important in these issues, he does not so act. The receivership is the transfer of the property to a new owner, who begins his work cut off from the past, with new duties and new obligations. The court could order a sale at once and let new and absolute owners take the property and assume their proper liabilities to third parties. If, instead of doing this, a receiver is appointed, he represents, technically, the interests of an insolvent corporation, but technically and substantially the interests of creditors, who ought not to be allowed to enjoy the franchises and property of the corporation without its responsibilities.

The intimation is given by Chief Justice Waite, in Fosdick v. Schall, 9 Otto [99 U. S.] 254 [25 L. Ed. 339] that cases may arise in which it would be proper to apply a part of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property to the payment of expenses incurred during the receivership. While the opinion in that case throws a flood of light on the subject of the payment of the expenses of a receivership and the mode of these payments, as well as the general relations of all creditors to the income, there is nothing in the *case specially applicable here, as in the view taken by this court, there is a fund arising from the income during the time the property has been under the control of the court, in the hands of its appointees, out of which can be paid the claims of petitioners.

Under the order of July 2d, 1872, the president and directors were instructed "to conduct and carry on the business of the company." This is language certainly broad enough to authorize the payment for losses and damages usually paid for by a railroad company, if any order on the subject was necessary. If there has been a receivership of this railroad since July 2d, 1872, and receivers are common carriers, there can be no doubt of the liability of the receiver in all these cases.

In Kinney v. Crocker, 18 Wis. 74, it was held that a state court could entertain jurisdiction of an action against a receiver appointed by the United States court for injury to the plaintiff in that case, from negligence of the employees. In Meara's Adm'rs v. Holbrook, 20 Ohio St. 137, it was held that a receiver was liable for injury to an employee. These doctrines are, of themselves, in accord with the best reason and public policy, and sufficiently sustained by authority in cases where the whole field is new and comparatively unexplored.

If the receiver is liable, and there is nothing to show and no intimation that there was any personal fault so as to make him personally liable, the claims ought to be paid out of the fund in court. No question of jurisdiction between two courts has arisen here as in most of the cases on this subject.

It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed that the decree of the Circuit judge be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court, that proper orders may be made for the payment of the claims of these petitioners, in accordance with the views herein expressed.

McIVER, A. J., and ALDRICH, A. A. J., concurred.

[2. Homestead ⇐51.]

The return of appraisers to lay off a homestead was handed to the sheriff, who retained it in his possession for sixteen days, until he received the surveyor's plat, without which the return was imperfect, when he filed both papers with the clerk of court for record, and within thirty days thereafter the creditors served exceptions. Held, that the exceptions were taken within the time allowed by law.

[3. Homestead ⇐51.]

Where an assignment of four hundred acres of land as a homestead had been, after trial, set aside as excessive, and new appraisers appointed, who assigned the same land and fifty-four acres additional, without affixing any valuation to such homestead tract, the Circuit judge determined that there was good cause shown against this second return, and ordered a new assignment. Held, that this court could not disturb this conclusion of the Circuit judge.

[4. Homestead ⇐51.]

An order of the Circuit Court setting aside a return of homestead appraisers and directing a new appraisement, does not exhaust the power given to the court by the statute; this power may properly be exercised more than once when necessary to correct erroneous assignments.

Before Hudson, J., Marion, April, 1880.

Francis W. Kerchner and Asa K. Walker, execution creditors, and Robert L. Singletary, execution debtor and claimant of homestead, are the parties to this appeal. To the full statement of the case, made in the opinion of this court, it will be necessary to add nothing, except this—that the return of the appraisers of February 7th, 1880, required a survey to determine the precise boundaries indicated and the number of acres contained.

Mr. W. W. Harllee, for appellant.

*September 12th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. The plaintiffs had judgments and executions for large sums against the defendant. The plaintiff, Francis W. Kerchner, levied on the land of the defendant, who claimed homestead. Three appraisers were appointed to lay off homestead, and, in December, 1877, two of them made return, assigning as homestead four hundred acres, including the dwellinghouse. The other appraiser dissented. The judgment creditors objected to the returns, both by complaint and exceptions, alleging:

"1. That the return was only signed by two of the appraisers, the third being present and dissenting in writing on the return.

"2. That the appraisers did not take the oath prescribed by law.

"3. Because the assignment was excessive, the lands set apart exceeding in value the sum of one thousand dollars."

The defendant demurred, denying the jurisdiction of the court to determine the matter by action, and also answered. At October Term, 1879, Judge Kershaw referred the facts to a jury, reserving the question of law until the question of fact should be determined. The jury found, as matter of fact, that the value of the land assigned as homestead exceeded $1000. Judge Kershaw thereupon ordered "a new assignment," appointing different appraisers thereof. On February 7th, 1880, the new appraisers made return, setting off by metes and bounds four hundred and fifty-four acres as homestead, including the four hundred before assigned, and adding fifty-four acres. The return, without a plat, was handed to the sheriff on the day it was signed, and he retained it until the plat was handed him, February 23d, when he filed both in the clerk's office, "for record in court." On March 18th, 1880, plaintiffs again excepted, and March 21st, 1880, filed regular complaint, setting out at length the grounds of objection. The defendant again demurred on the ground that a regular action was not the proper remedy, and also made motion to dismiss the exceptions on the grounds that they were not taken in time, and the return of the appraisers appointed by Judge Kershaw was conclusive on the parties, the *act making no provision for any further proceedings. Judge Hudson sustained the demurrer to the action and dismissed the complaint, but sustained the exceptions of plaintiffs, set aside the return and appointed new appraisers. From this order the plaintiffs appeal because the judge dismissed the complaint, and the defendant also appeals on the following grounds:

"1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the exceptions to the return of the appraisers, dated February 7th, 1880, returned to the sheriff on that day were filed in proper time, and that the same was not filed until February 23d, 1880, when so marked by the clerk.

"2. Because his Honor erred in his decision that the first return, signed by but two of the appraisers, the third being present, participating and dissenting, was null and void, not being signed by the three appraisers.

"3. Because his Honor erred in holding that the failure to insert the value of the lands laid off as the homestead vitiated it, when each of the appraisers was served with a copy of the order of Judge Kershaw, instructing them to admeasure the homestead, not exceeding $1000 in value, and their return in obedience thereto, returning the said order with their return, was a sufficient compliance with the law.

"4. Because his Honor erred in holding that after the second return of appraisers, appointed by the court in November, 1879, the law authorized any further proceedings to set aside the homestead laid off by them, on the ground of its being excessive or otherwise, when, as it is submitted, the homestead act of 1873 makes no provision for any further proceedings, and it is insisted that such second return is final, unless attacked for fraud or misconduct in the appraisers.

"5. Because his Honor erred in holding that the appraisers appointed by the court were bound by the verdict of the jury and the judgment of the court in November, 1879, as to their assignment and valuation of the premises; and it is submitted that it was error in his Honor, Judge Hudson, to set aside the second return without inquiry or evidence touching the same."

From the view the court takes it will not be necessary to consider the respondent's ground of appeal to so much of Judge *Hudson's order as sustained the demurrer and held that a regular action was not the proper way by which to make "complaint" to a return assigning homestead.

The appellant has very properly abandoned his exceptions to the first order of Judge Kershaw. That order was not before Judge Hudson for approval or disapproval, and nothing that he said about it is properly in the case. There is no appeal from one Circuit judge to another. The order was binding upon him. It was not appealed from at the time it was made or until it had been executed by a second return, and cannot now be considered by this court. Judge Hudson could only deal with the second return, and our inquiry upon appeal from his order is limited to that. Besides, Judge Kershaw did not rule the law complained of; he set aside the first return simply on a question of fact found by the jury, viz., that the assignment was excessive.

The first exception of appellant to the order of Judge Hudson makes the point that "complaint" as to the homestead assigned was not made in time. The homestead act of 1868, (14 Stat. 19), provides that "the appraisers shall be sworn by a justice of the peace to impartially appraise and set off by metes and bounds a homestead of the estate of the debtor, such as he may select, not to exceed the value of $1000; and the said appraisers shall proceed accordingly to set out the homestead, and the set-off and the assignment so made by the appraisers shall be returned by the officer along with said process for record in court, and if no complaint shall be made by either party no further proceedings shall be had against the homestead, but the residue of the lands and tenements of the head of the family, if any more or other he shall have, shall be liable to attachment, levy and sale; provided, that upon good cause shown the court out of which the process issued, may order a re-appraisement and re-assignment of the homestead either by the same appraisers or others appointed by the court," &c.

The act of 1872 (15 Stat. 229) changed the above only in allowing for "complaint" thirty days after return for a record in court. The return was handed to the sheriff on February 7th, but without the plat. He held it until the plat was completed, February 23d, when he filed both in the "clerk's office for *record." Up to that time the return was incomplete. The creditors could not know that it was made so as to object. It was filed for record on February 23d, and on March 18th the plaintiffs made "complaint," both by exceptions and regular action, so that they were within the "thirty days" allowed by law.

The defendant further objects that it was error in Judge Hudson to hold that the failure to insert in the return the value of the lands laid off as homestead vitiated said return. It does not appear that the judge placed his order upon that ground alone. The words of the act are "upon good cause shown" the court out of which the process issued may order a "re-appraisement and re-assignment," &c. This charges the Circuit judge with the responsibility of determining upon the facts whether "good cause" has been shown. Who else could know whether, in his judgment, there was "good cause?" That was a matter for the exercise of his judgment, and if he made a mistake as to what was "good cause," we do not see how it could be corrected on appeal as error of law. Various considerations affected his judgment. He says: "Ordinarily where, by exceptions, a question is raised as to the value of the homestead assigned, a question of fact is presented which must be determined judicially by the court, either with or without the aid of a jury, and upon legal evidence. But in this case it has already been adjudged by the court, after a tedious hearing, that the same land now assigned (less fifty-four acres) is worth more than a thousand dollars. * * * Besides, it is a noticeable fact that the three appraisers do not fix any value whatever to the large tract allowed to the debtor; they do not say whether the same is worth a thousand dollars, or more or less. In this the return is fatally defective." It is manifest that the judge considered the assignment as excessive, and that, in connection with the fact that the appraisers, whose duty it was to make a re-appraisement, made no mention whatever of the value of the land assigned as homestead, convinced him that there was "good cause" for a new assignment? The very gist of the matter was that the land assigned should not exceed the value of $1000, and we cannot say that the judge erred in ruling that there was "good cause" for a new assignment.

*The defendant further objects that Judge Kershaw having set aside one return and ordered a new assignment, Judge Hudson had no authority to order another assignment; that the power given by the act was exhausted by the first order.

The act does not declare that the power given shall be limited to one exercise of it. If it had done so, it would have been unusual and extraordinary. We do not think that is the meaning of the act—such construction would limit the power of the court over its own process and subject it to the absolute control of its appointees. The power of the judge under the act to order a new assignment for "good cause," is somewhat analogous to the right to grant a new trial. In the case of Means v. Means, 6 Rich. 1, the old Appeal Court of this state granted three new trials in regard to the validity of a will. In granting the last new trial the court says: "Where a valid will is set aside in consequence of the misapprehension of the jury, or from any other cause, it is the duty of the court to re-establish it. If the court does not constantly and firmly perform this duty, the property of the citizen may be wrested from him under the forms of law. The verdict is so wholly unsupported by the evidence that the court is constrained to grant the motion for a new trial." So here, the same duty rests upon this court.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Newberry, February 1881.

This was an indictment against Isom Workman and John P. Satterwhite. The report of the presiding judge is as follows:

The defendants were jointly indicted under Chapter CXXIX., Section 4, page 714, General Statutes. Upon their arraignment they claimed the right of twenty peremptory challenges each to the jurors. This I refused, and held them each entitled only to five peremptory challenges. The law clearly defines in what felonies the accused shall have the incidents of arraignments and the right to twenty peremptory challenges, and expressly declares that in all other cases the accused shall have but five peremptory challenges. The present offence is not one of those in which the right to twenty peremptory challenges is given. I allowed the state to give in evidence the confession of Isom Workman because it appeared that the same was made freely and voluntarily, and upon his own solicitation; but I held the confession to be admissible only against Workman, and carefully charged the jury that they must not regard the confession as evidence against Satterwhite; that even if made in Satterwhite's presence the con*fession would not be evidence against him, but his conduct and words in response thereto would be.

The wife of Satterwhite was offered as a witness in his behalf. I held her an incompetent witness for or against either of the defendants.

To these rulings exceptions were taken by defendants; that to the confession being that it was made under duress, and should have been entirely excluded. The defendants were found guilty, and a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial was made upon the exceptions aforesaid, and upon the ground that the verdict of the jury is against the law and evidence, and also upon the ground of newly-discovered testimony. I refused the motion, because I can see no error in my aforesaid rulings, because there was evidence to sustain the verdict, and because I do not regard the showing as to newly-discovered testimony sufficient in form or in substance to justify me in setting aside the verdict.

The defendants moved for a new trial upon the following grounds.

1. Because his Honor erred in not allowing the prisoners the right and benefit of twenty peremptory challenges each, but restricted them to five each.

2. Because his Honor erred in permitting the confessions of the defendant, Isom Workman, to go to the jury, when it clearly appeared that they were made under duress and threats of bodily injury.

3. Because the arresting officers did not state to the defendant, Isom Workman, before he made his confession, that what he had to say would or could do him no good, and might or could be used as evidence against him.

4. Because his Honor erred in refusing to allow the wife of the defendant, John F. Satterwhite, to give testimony either in the behalf of her husband or in behalf of the defendant, Isom Workman, in the above-stated case.

5. Because the verdict of the jury was in all respects contrary to the law and the evidence, and that there was no proof what*ever of conspiracy between the above-named defendants to commit the offence charged in the indictment.

6. That the newly discovered evidence, as shown by affidavit, shows facts calculated to change the testimony and lead to a conclusion of innocence.

The affidavit referred to in the last ground was as follows:

Personally came O. L. Schumpert, one of the defendants' attorneys, who, being duly sworn, says that since the rendition of the verdict in the case of State v. Workman and Satterwhite, to wit, on Sunday, February 13th, instant, certain evidence was brought to his attention as said attorney for the first time, which goes far to show that the alleged confession of Isom Workman was extorted under duress; that two of the state's witnesses were paid five dollars each to testify against said defendants, and that the prosecutor in said cause and Detective Alley prevented the arresting party from lynching said defendants on the night of their arrest.

Defendants appealed upon the grounds taken for a new trial in the court below.

Messrs. G. S. Mower, J. Y. Culbreath and O. L. Schumpert, for appellants.

Mr. Solicitor Duncan and Mr. Geo. Johnstone, contra.

September 12th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. In this case the defendants were indicted and tried jointly for burning a frame of timber prepared for making a house, which is made a felony by Section 4, Chapter CXXIX., General Statutes, page 714. Upon their arraignment they each claimed the right to challenge, peremptorily, twenty of the jurors presented, but the Circuit judge held that they were each only entitled to five peremptory challenges, and this presents the first question raised by this appeal.

It is very clear that the prisoners were properly restricted to *five peremptory challenges each. The statute designates specifically the cases in which twenty peremptory challenges are allowed, and declares that in other cases the right of peremptory challenge on the part of the accused shall be limited to five. General Statutes 747, 748. The offence for which these defendants were indicted does not fall within any of the classes in which twenty peremptory challenges are allowed. If there could be any doubt upon this point that doubt would be removed by the decision of this court in the recent case of State v. Pope, 9 S. C. 273, which is, in principle, identical with this case.

The next question is as to the admissibility of the confessions of one of the defendants—Isom Workman. Three objections seem to be made. 1. That the confessions were not free and voluntary. 2. That no previous warning had been given to the defendant as to the effect his confessions might have. 3. That even if the confessions were admissible as against the party who made them, they were not competent evidence against the other defendant, and the witnesses in proving them should have been required to omit the name of Satterwhite wherever it was used by Workman in making his confession.

As to the first objection the rule is that the evidence upon the point whether the confessions are free and voluntary or have been extracted by fear or induced by hope excited in the prisoner's breast by some outside influence, is addressed to the presiding judge, and it as a matter for him in his discretion to decide; but as it is difficult to lay down any particular rule by which the proper exercise of this discretion is to be tested, each case must, in large measure, depend upon its own circumstances. 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 219. In this case the Circuit judge reports that the confession of Workman was admitted in evidence "because it appeared that the same was made freely and voluntarily, and upon his own solicitation," and we think the testimony set out in the "case" fully sustains this statement of the Circuit judge, and that there was no error in admitting the confessions.

The next objection to the confessions cannot be sustained. No previous warning was necessary. In 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 229, it is said: "Neither is it necessary to the admissibility of any confession to whomsoever it may have been made, that it should ap*pear that the prisoner was warned that what he said would be used against him. On the contrary, if the confession was voluntary it is sufficient though it should appear that he was not warned."

The remaining objection to the confessions is, not only that they were not admissible against the co-defendant, but that the witnesses in detailing the confessions should not have been allowed to use the name of Satterwhite where it had been used by Workman in making the confessions. The first branch of this objection rests upon a misapprehension of the ruling of the Circuit judge, for he not only did not hold the confessions of Workman to be admissible as evidence against Satterwhite, but, on the contrary, he seems to have carefully instructed the jury that the confessions were evidence against Workman only, and that they must not regard them as any evidence against Satterwhite.

The only remaining inquiry on this branch of the case is whether the witnesses who were put upon the stand to prove the confessions of Workman should, in detailing such confessions, have been required to omit the name of Satterwhite where it was used by Workman in making his confession. The rule seems to be that the name should not be omitted. Rex v. Fletcher et al., 19 Eng. Com. Law 369; Rex v. Hearne et al., 19 Eng. Com. Law 350; Rex v. Clewes, 19 Eng. Com. Law 356. In Hearne's Case, supra, where it was insisted on behalf of Cox, one of the defendants, whose name had been mentioned as one of the parties engaged in stealing the horse, in proving the confessions of Cotton, another of the defendants, that the witness, in proving the confession, ought to be required to omit his name and merely say "another person," Littledale, J., said: "The witness must mention the name. He is to tell what Cotton said, and if he left out the name he would not do so. Cotton did not say 'another person,' and the witness must give the conversation just as it occurred, but I shall tell the jury that it is not evidence against Cox;"—just as the Circuit judge seems to have done in this case. The doctrine established by these cases appears to be recognized by these eminent text-writers. Phillips, ch. V., § 5; Starkie, part 4, p. 54, and 1 Greenl., § 218.

to the competency *of Satterwhite's wife as a witness. The appellants insist, first, that she was a competent witness for both of the defendants, and next, that if she is held to be incompetent as a witness for her husband, she was, nevertheless, a competent witness for the other defendant. It is conceded that at common law the wife would not be a competent witness for her husband in a case of this kind, and we are not aware of any statute which renders her competent. The act of 1866, incorporated in Gen. Stat., Chap. CX., p. 514, § 17, and in Chap. CXL., p. 748, §§ 5, 6, is relied upon by the appellants as rendering the wife a competent witness for her husband in a criminal case. We do not think that such is the effect of that act. The manifest object of that statute was to remove objections to the competency of witnesses upon the ground that they were parties to the action or interested in the event of it; and as Dunkin, C. J., in Moseley v. Eakin, 15 Rich. 338, says, the other provisions of the act of 1866, contained in the third section, were simply intended to preserve the then existing rules of law by which persons could not be required to criminate themselves, and by which confidential communications between persons standing towards each other in the relation of husband and wife were protected. But the rule which renders the wife an incompetent witness for or against her husband did not rest alone upon the ground of identity of interest, but also upon "principles of public policy which lie at the basis of civil society." 1 Greenl. on Ev., § 334.

The passage, therefore, of this act, removing all grounds of objection to the competency of witnesses on the score of interest, does not remove the other ground of objection to the competency of a wife to testify for or against her husband based upon considerations of public policy. Lucas v. Brooks, 18 Wall. 453 [21 L. Ed. 779]; Gee v. Scott, 48 Tex. 510; Same case, 26 Am. R. 331; Steen v. State, 20 Ohio St. 333; Gibson v. Commonwealth, 87 Penna. St. 253. It is insisted, however, that even though the wife of Satterwhite may not be a competent witness for him, yet she was a competent witness for his co-defendant, Workman. These parties were indicted and tried jointly, and there was no motion to sever, upon the ground that one of them desired to use a witness who would not be competent for the other; nor was it proposed to prove by Mrs. Satterwhite a distinct and independent defence *in behalf of Workman, which would not affect the defence set up by her husband, and when this is the case it is well settled that the wife of one defendant is not a competent witness for any of the other defendants. State v. McGrew, 13 Rich. 316; Commonwealth v. Eastland, 1 Mass. 15; Commonwealth v. Robinson, 1 Gray 555; State v. Smith, 2 Ired. 402.

The next question is whether the judge erred in refusing the motion for a new trial based upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence. This motion was addressed to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and unless his discretion was abused or some rule of law was violated we have no authority to interfere. In this case, so far from there having been any abuse of discretion, or any violation of any of the rules of law, we agree entirely with the Circuit judge that the showing upon which the motion was based was altogether insufficient, both in form and substance. Without undertaking to specify all the objections to it, there was one which was absolutely fatal, and that was the absence of any showing to the effect that the alleged newly-discovered evidence could not, by due diligence, have been discovered in time for it to be offered at the trial. Indeed, there is nothing whatever to show that the so-called newly-discovered evidence was not known to the defendants at the time of the trial, for the motion is based solely upon the affidavit of one of the counsel for the prisoners, and while it may have been, and no doubt was, entirely true, that this evidence was only brought to the attention of the counsel after the trial, it does not by any means follow from this that such evidence was not known to the defendants.

The last ground relied upon by the appellants is that "the evidence discloses no offence against the statute under which this indictment is framed. The testimony shows that it was a dwelling-house nearly completed." The real point upon which this ground rests, as we gather from the argument here, is, that the thing burned was not a frame of timber prepared for making a house, which is the offence denounced by the statute under which this indictment was framed, but that it was a dwelling-house partially completed.

We do not see how the appellants can raise this point here *under the statements contained in the "case" as prepared for argument here, for it presents a mere question of fact, and one, therefore, beyond our jurisdiction. No exception seems to have been taken to the indictment, and hence we are bound to assume that it was sufficient in form, and that it properly charged the offence created by the statute; nor does it appear that the Circuit judge was requested to make any ruling upon the subject. All that does appear is that the defendants were charged with burning a frame of timber prepared for making a house, and that of this charge the jury have found the defendants guilty. We must, therefore, conclude that the charge was sustained by the evidence submitted, for we have no authority to look into the evidence for the purpose of ascertaining whether the verdict of the jury is in accordance with the evidence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Before Thomson, J., Sumter, February, 1881.

Action commenced in the Court of Common Pleas, January 2d, 1879, by William G. Kennedy against Frederick L. Reames and Washington Miller. Miller was living upon the land on which the crop in dispute was made. Reames owned the land, but did not reside upon it. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Joseph H. Earle, for appellant.

Messrs. Haynsworth & Cooper, contra.

McGOWAN, A. J. About January 1st, 1878, Washington Miller agreed with his co-defendant, Frederick L. Reames, to cultivate a certain farm belonging to the said Reames, (who was also to furnish the stock), and to receive for his labor one-third of the crop to be produced upon the place, subject, however, to the payment of any claim Reames might have against Miller for money or supplies which might be advanced to him during the year. This agreement was verbal, but under it Miller went into possession of the farm. He got some supplies from Reames, and, desiring more, April 9th, 1878, gave to the plaintiff, Kennedy, a lien under the act of March 4th, 1878, (16 Stat. 411), purporting to be on all the crop to be made on the farm that year, and also a mortgage of "four shoats," to secure an advance for agricultural purposes to be made by the said plaintiff. The "shoats" were stolen and do not enter into the case. The instrument given to the plaintiff was registered, and an advance to the extent of $40 made.

There was made upon the place that year five bales of cotton and a small amount of corn. The cotton, at different times in the autumn of the year, was received by Reames and the proceeds retained, but did not satisfy his share of two-thirds and advances. The corn was divided, and one-third, forty or fifty bushels, was left in the hands of Miller, who afterwards disposed of it. In December the plaintiff took out under the act an agri*cultural warrant against Miller. When the sheriff, with the warrant, went on the place the cotton was not there, and the defendant, Reames, claimed the corn also to satisfy the balance of his claim for advances. The sheriff did not seize the corn, saying "he had no instruction to take it." He did seize some small articles of inconsiderable value, from which nothing was realized. The plaintiff then brought this action in the Court of Common Pleas against both Reames and Miller, praying that the five bales of cotton which Reames got be produced to satisfy his debt, or that the money arising from the sale should be paid into court. The case was heard by Judge Thomson, who ordered the complaint to be so amended as to be a simple action for money, and that being done, he gave judgment for $40 and interest for the plaintiff, against the defendant, Reames, who appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because Washington Miller was an employee of the defendant, Reames, and not a 'cultivator of the soil' in the sense of the act of 1878.

"2. Because, under the agreement between the defendant, Reames, and Miller, he (Miller) had no title to any part of the produce or crop until the same had been divided and his portion delivered to him by Reames.

"3. Because Miller did not own such an interest in the crop as was subject to an agricultural lien.

"4. Because the defendant, Reames, had no actual notice of the plaintiff's lien, and having sold the cotton before notice was given him of such lien, and before any demand was made upon him for said cotton, he is not liable for conversion.

"5. Because the remedy of the plaintiff, if any, was an action in rem.

"6. Because the plaintiff was bound to exhaust the crop which he found in defendant, Miller's, possession before proceeding against defendant, Reames."

In the view which the court takes it will not be necessary to consider exceptions first, second, third and sixth, as to the character of the relation which Miller bore to Reames in the cultivation of his farm, whether as tenant or mere employee. We incline to think that he was a mere hireling, to be paid in kind *and had no right to give a lien upon the crop which belonged to Reames until the third part was delivered to Miller in payment for his labor. Upon this subject see Huff v. Watkins [15 S. C.] ante 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680].

But for the purposes of the case let us assume that Miller was a "cultivator of the soil" in the sense of the act of 1878, and had such an interest in the crop to be produced by his labor, assisted by the stock and lands of Reames, as to enable him in advance to subject it to a legal lien: and it does not follow, even in this view, that the plaintiff had the right to recover from Reames the $40 in money which he advanced to Miller, and for which he had only his agricultural lien. Upon this assumption what were the relative rights of the parties? If Miller was an independent cultivator of the soil, so as to be able to make the lien, it must have been as tenant, and, if so, Reames was his landlord. The soil, of which Miller was the cultivator, and the stock used in the cultivation, belonged to Reames, and in reason and justice the amount due for such use and occupation was as much an advance for agricultural purposes as any supplies that could be furnished him.

Section 5 of the act of 1878, supra, under which plaintiff took his lien, provides as follows: "That the above section shall be subject to the provisions of the following sections of the act. That each landlord leasing lands for agricultural purposes shall have a prior and preferred lien for rent to the extent of one-third of all crops raised on his lands, and enforceable in the same manner as liens for advances, which said lien shall be valid without recording or filing." So that in this view, Reames having leased the land to Miller, had a preferred statutory lien to the extent at least of one-third of the crop.

As to the remainder of his share of the crop and advances, he had no lien, as he had not filed an agreement in the office of the register or clerk, but that was still a debt which Miller owed Reames and which he chose to pay by transferring to him the whole of the cotton made on his place.

Did Reames, by receiving and selling the cotton and applying the proceeds to the balance of his debt, not secured by registered lien, make himself legally responsible to pay plaintiff's claim? We think not. He was certainly not liable under the proceed*ing provided by the agricultural lien law. He was not a party either to the agreement or the process issued under it. The statute declared the lien and furnished the machinery to enforce it, viz., affidavit and warrant in the hands of the sheriff to seize the crop itself, wherever found, but not the proceeds received from the sale of the crop. The warrant was issued and failed to secure any part of the crop, and this proceeding was instituted to have efficacy given to that statutory lien by an ordinary action based upon it.

The view, as we understand it, is that the lien given was a right, which the defective machinery of the statute failed to give the means of enforcing, and the Court of Common Pleas will supply the deficiency by way of supplement to the statute—that the lien declared will be considered in the nature of a chattel mortgage to secure an ordinary debt, and, upon the principle that there should be a remedy for every right, the court should give the remedy to enforce it applicable to such a mortgage. As the right of the plaintiff did not exist at common law, but was entirely the creature of statute, the court cannot supply the remedy and go beyond that afforded by the statute. "It is the general rule that if an affirmative statute, which is introductive of a new law, direct a thing to be done in a particular manner, that thing shall not, even although there are no negative words, be done in any other manner." 9 Bac. Ab., tit. "Stat.," letter G, and authorities; McLauchlin v. R. R. Co., 5 Rich. 598; Sternberger v. McSween, 14 S. C. 35.

The last case cited was very much like this, and it is not necessary to do more than refer to it. The action was to recover the value of a bale of cotton sold to the defendant by one Morris, upon which plaintiff claimed to have an agricultural lien. Judge McIver, in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "One who attempts to enforce his rights under a lien, which is the creature of a statute, must confine himself to the remedy furnished by the statute. The right derived is solely from the statute, and the remedy resorted to must be that furnished by the statute. The attempt to invest an agricultural lien with the qualities of a chattel mortgage, is an attempt to interpolate into the statute provisions which the legislature has not seen fit to adopt, for, *certainly, if that body had designed to give an agricultural lien the qualities of a chattel mortgage, it would have been very easy to have said so. On the contrary, however, the agreement provided for by the statute, which creates the lien, lacks one of the qualities of a chattel mortgage, which has been held (Green v. Jacobs, 5 S. C. 283,) to be essential to invest the mortgagee with the right to the possession of the property, in that it does not contemplate any provision whatever for the transfer of title; and, as we have seen, the remedy provided by the statute manifestly contemplates no change in the title, but, on the other hand, pre-supposes the continuance of the title in the lienor, subject, however, to the lien, until it is transferred by the execution of the process of the law; just as in the case of property covered by the lien of a judgment or execution, the title of the property remains in the judgment debtor until it is transferred by a sale under process of law, and one who purchases from the judgment debtor takes subject to the lien, which follows the property into whosoever hands it may go; but the purchaser, after he has disposed of it, cannot be made liable for the value of the property or for the proceeds of its sale. Paysinger v. Shumpard, 1 Bail. 237."

Besides, if the civil remedy were not limited to that given by the act, and the lien were enforceable according to the terms in which it is declared, we do not see that Reames—a bona fide creditor of Miller—in receiving the cotton from his debtor and applying the proceeds to his debt, committed such a conversion of plaintiff's property as would support either an action of trover, or, waiving the tort, for money had and received as upon an assumpsit, express or implied. "To sustain trover the plaintiff must show a legal title; he must have property, general or special, or actual possession, or the right to immediate possession at the time of the conversion." Cooley on Torts 443, and cases there cited.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

WIESENFELD, STERN & CO. v. STEVENS & CURETON.

Whether an assignment for the benefit of creditors was executed with intent to defeat, hinder or delay, is a question of fact. The finding by the Circuit judge that there was no such intention in this case, approved.

A and B, partners in trade, conveyed each to the other, by exchange, their interest respectively in two lots of land held by the partnership, and on the next day made an assignment for the benefit of their creditors of all the rest of their partnership property, preferring some, and authorizing the trustees to defer sale if to the interest of the creditors, the rents and profits meantime to pass under the assignment. No mention was made of B's lot, but A's lot, which contained two acres, was specially reserved as a homestead to him. Afterwards A became a bankrupt, and one and two-thirds acres of this lot were assigned to him as a homestead; and he then obtained his discharge in bankruptcy. Held, that the assignment was [not] rendered fraudulent and void, by the preference to some of the creditors.

Before Hudson, J., Lancaster, September, 1880.

This was an action commenced on November 18th, 1879, by the plaintiffs, against James H. W. Stevens and Thomas J. Cureton, who had been merchants and copartners, under the firm name of Stevens & Cureton, and against R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, trustees, under an assignment made by Stevens & Cureton, for the benefit of their creditors. The object of the action was to set aside this assignment as fraudulent, and also a deed from Cureton to Stevens, for the appointment of a receiver, account by the trustees, injunction, &c. The debt to plaintiff was a partnership debt, contracted prior to February 12th, 1878, when the deeds stated in the opinion were exchanged between Stevens and T. J. Cureton. In October, 1879, this debt was *put in judgment. On February 13th, 1878, the deed of assignment was executed. In this assignment no mention is made of the lot conveyed to Cureton, but all of the personal property of the firm, and several tracts of land are transferred, including "another tract containing fifty acres, situate in the town of Lancaster, * * * excepting the lot or portion of said tract on which is situate the residence of the said J. H. W. Stevens, containing about two acres, bounded * * * which said lot is hereby excepted and reserved as a homestead for said J. H. W. Stevens." The assignment continues:

To have and to hold the real and personal property aforesaid, with all the rights, privileges and appurtenances thereto belonging, unto the said R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, their heirs and assigns, in special trust and confidence nevertheless, as follows, that is to say, the said trustees shall proceed to take immediate possession of the said property, and after having given notice to the creditors herein provided for, as the law directs, shall proceed to collect the debts and sell said property, for cash, as speedily as practicable, by public or private sale, as in their judgment may best tend to promote the interest of the said creditors; should the said trustees find it impracticable to sell the real estate aforesaid at what they consider fair and adequate prices, they are hereby specially empowered to defer the sale thereof for a period not exceeding two years from the date hereof, and in the meantime to rent or operate the said farms as in their judgment may be best for the interests of the said creditors, and in the event that the said trustees shall determine to rent or operate the said farms, or any of them, they shall have the right to retain in their possession the mules, wagons, farming implements, corn and forage, and such other articles of personal property as may be necessary in operating the said farms, and out of any money that may come into their hands, to purchase such provisions and supplies as may be necessary for the purpose, and to replenish and keep up the stock of goods in store, if deemed best to enable the assignee to run the farm and collect the debts of the firm. The proceeds arising from the sale of said property and any profits that may be realized from operating the said farms the said trustees shall apply as follows, after retaining their commissions, to wit:

First. To defraying the expenses incident to the execution of this trust, including attorney's fees.

B. Massey, $75; John Sinclair, $50; *Merchants' and Farmers' Bank (Charlotte) overdraft, $200.26; also any balance that may be due any of the laborers on the Miller plantation.

Third. To the payment of all the other debts, equally and ratably; and,

Fourth. Any surplus that may remain in the hands of the said trustees after paying the debts and expenses and charges aforesaid, they shall apply to the payment of all other debts that the said firm may owe, equally and ratably.

The trustees carried on the business of the firm and the farms, defraying the expenses thereof, until the first Monday in February, 1879, when sale was made of the assigned lands, goods and other personalty. Other facts are stated in the opinion. The Circuit decree is as follows:

The object of this action is to set aside, as fraudulent and void, a deed of assignment, executed and delivered to R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, by J. H. W. Stevens and T. J. Cureton, co-partners in trade, under the firm name of Stevens & Cureton. The assignment was executed and delivered on February 13th, A. D. 1878, and was for the benefit of the creditors of the said failing firm. In the assignment the order of payment of creditors is prescribed and certain preferences are made, all of which will fully appear by reference to the deed.

The deed is assailed by the plaintiffs principally on two grounds, viz.:

1. Because, in the deed is reserved to J. H. W. Stevens, as a homestead, his residence in the town of Lancaster and the two acres of ground around it.

2. Because power is given the trustees to defer the sale of a part of the estate as long as two years, if, in their judgment, it should be deemed advisable.

Other objections are urged, but these two are chiefly relied upon.

It appears from the testimony submitted, that shortly before the deed of assignment was executed, T. J. Cureton conveyed to J. H. W. Stevens all his right, title and interest in the said lot and dwelling, so that, at the date of the assignment, this was the separate property of J. H. W. Stevens, and not copartnership property. The conveyance by Cureton was for valuable consid*eration. After the assignment to the aforesaid trustees and their acceptance of the trust, to wit, in 1879, J. H. W. Stevens was adjudged a bankrupt by the United States District Court and received his discharge as such. To him was allotted by that court a homestead in the said family dwelling and one and one-third acres of the lot appurtenant. To these proceedings in bankruptcy the present plaintiffs were parties, and are, of course, estopped from now agitating in this court any question which either was or should have been made there. It must also be borne in mind that it is not sought here, nor indeed could it be, to set aside the conveyance of Cureton to Stevens. We deem further recital of the testimony or facts unnecessary at this point.

The counsel for plaintiffs has, with commendable zeal and ability, urged his positions upon this court; and whilst we have been more than usually entertained and instructed by his learned argument, we are constrained to differ as to the views of the law as applicable to this case. It is not denied that it has for a long time been well established in this state that a debtor may lawfully prefer one creditor to another. The only qualification is that the preference must not be undue and inherently calculated to hinder, delay and defeat others. We see nothing in the deed before us so calculated, nor is anything revealed by the testimony going to show that such was the purpose and intent of the assignors.

It is also well established that a deed of a failing debtor, which is made for the apparent benefit of creditors, but which, in its terms and provisions, secures to the debtor a benefit and advantage at the expense of the creditors, is void. But we do not regard the reservation of the homestead of Stevens in this deed as rendering it obnoxious to this objection. It was the sole property of Stevens and need not have been mentioned in the deed. The law allows him a homestead, and, at the end of final process, this family homestead could not have been reached by the plaintiffs or any other creditor. It was a benefit accruing to him, not by virtue of the reservation in the deed, but by virtue of the constitution. But it is said that Cureton's deed to Stevens was made in fraud of the rights of creditors and is null, and that this homestead should be pronounced partnership assets; that in *partnership property the right of homestead does not exist. But this remedy against Cureton's deed must be sought by different proceedings than the present action, which assails the assignment, not for matter dehors but apparent on the face of the deed. There is no evidence of fraud on the part of Cureton, and the house and lot is, in fact, the separate property of Stevens. This proposition of the plaintiffs is not maintainable. Besides, they were parties to this assignment to Stevens of this homestead by the Court of Bankruptcy, and were at the time aware of the deed to R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, and we regard them estopped now to make a question as to the nonexistence of the right of homestead in copartnership property. As against the plaintiffs, this property has been allotted to Stevens by a court of competent jurisdiction, so that the reservation in the deed is not of property to which the creditors were entitled, and the insolvent did not thereby reserve a benefit to himself at the expense of the creditors and to their injury.

Nor do we think the deed of assignment obnoxious to the second objection of the plaintiffs, viz., that it defers the sale of the property and thus hinders and delays creditors. The main purpose of such a deed should be to devote at once all the insolvent's property to the benefit of creditors; and if, instead of this, the property is, by the deed, placed for an unreasonable time beyond their reach, it is regarded in the eye of the law as mala fides, and will be declared void; but this deed does not seek to do this, nor is such its inevitable effect. On the contrary, it declares on its face that the trustees shall, as soon as practicable, proceed to sell the property, and to pay the debts from the proceeds thereof. But if, in their judgment, having the interests of creditors in view, they should find it unwise to sell the property promptly, they are empowered to retain a part thereof as long as two years, and manage the same for the benefit of the creditors. A perusal of the deed clearly reveals the fact that the trustees are required to act, not for the benefit of the assignors, but for the good of the creditors. The discretion to be exercised by them is intended to be for the advantage of creditors, and hence they are allowed only such time and such discretion as may enable them to save the property from sacrifice.

The postpone*ment of the sale of any part of the property is not enjoined upon them, and it is dependent on circumstances.

We see no cause of complaint because of this reasonable request and power conferred. The action of the trustees is a matter subject to the control of the creditors. There is nothing in the deed to prevent them from urging and effecting an early sale. The other objections raised are of minor force and importance, and the plaintiffs are overruled on all the grounds presented to this court.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the complaint be dismissed, with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because the said court, it is respectfully submitted, erred in said decree in refusing to set aside the assignment executed by the said defendants, "Stevens & Cureton," to the defendants, Robert M. Miller and Taylor G. Cureton, on February 13th, 1878.

2. Because the said assignment was made with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiffs and others, the creditors of the said "Stevens & Cureton," and should have been declared to be void and of no effect as against these plaintiffs.

3. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the Circuit Court erred in said decree in holding that the reservation to the said Stevens of the two-acre lot in the town of Lancaster, in and by said assignment, did not render the same fraudulent and void as to these plaintiffs.

4. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the Circuit Court erred in said decree in holding that the provision made in said deed of assignment, allowing the trustees thereunder to defer the sale of the property thereby assigned for the space of two years, did not render the same fraudulent and void as to these plaintiffs.

5. Because the Circuit Court erred in said decree in holding that the provision made in said deed of assignment allowing the trustees to carry on the business of merchandising and to rent and operate the farms upon the lands thereby conveyed, for the space of two years, did not render said deed fraudulent, and void as to these plaintiffs.

*6. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the Circuit Court erred in said decree in finding, as matter of fact, that the conveyance made by Thomas J. Cureton to James H. W. Stevens, on February 12th, 1878, of his interest as a joint owner in fee of the two acre lot in the town of Lancaster, was, as against these plaintiffs, for a valuable consideration and made in good faith.

7. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the Circuit Court erred in said decree in holding that these plaintiffs were estopped by reason of proceedings had in the Court of Bankruptcy (upon the petition of James H. W. Stevens, as an individual, to be adjudged a bankrupt,) from contesting the validity of the reservation of the house and lot in the town of Lancaster, contained in said deed of assignment.

8. Because, it is respectfully submitted, the said decree of the Circuit Court is, in other respects, erroneous.

September 20th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. In this case the defendants, (respondents,) Stevens and Cureton, who had been partners, doing business at Lancaster Court House, in this state, under the name and style of Stevens & Cureton, on February 13th, 1878, made an assignment by deed of indenture to defendants, Miller and Cureton, of their entire partnership property, real and personal, for the benefit of their creditors, the property assigned being estimated at about $10,000.

In this assignment creditors to the amount of some $550 were preferred. No release was exacted of the creditors who might accept. Besides the property assigned, the partners had owned a small lot containing two acres in the village of Lancaster, upon which Stevens resided; also, a tract of land —quantity not mentioned—in York county. The day before the execution of the assignment these parties each transferred to the other his interest in said lot and tract, so that Stevens became the sole owner of the lot in Lancaster, and Cureton of the tract of land in York, the consideration of the transfer in each case being the acquisition of the interest of the other in the lands which each, by the exchange, became entitled to in severalty.

In the deed the lot in Lancaster was reserved as the homestead of Stevens. There was nothing said as to the tract in York, acquired by Cureton. The remainder of the partnership *property seems to have been embraced in the assignment. This property was conveyed to Miller and T. G. Cureton, as trustees, for the benefit of the creditors, with directions to take immediate possession, and, after due notice, to collect the debts, and to sell the property for cash as speedily as possible, either at public or private sale, as in their judgment might be deemed best for the creditors. But, should the trustees find it impracticable to sell the real estate at fair prices, they were empowered to defer the sale for a period not exceeding two years, and in the meantime, in that event, to rent out the lands or farm them, as they thought best; all, however, to be conducted for the benefit of the creditors.

Shortly after the execution of this deed, defendant, Stevens, petitioned the United States District Court to become a bankrupt under the bankrupt laws of the United States, and was discharged on September 12th, 1879. To this proceeding his creditors, the appellants among the others, were made parties, by notice. Under the orders of the bankrupt court the lot in question, or a portion of it, which he had reserved in the deed, was set apart to him as a homestead. From this there was no appeal.

Under this state of facts this action was instituted in the Circuit Court by the appellants, judgment creditors of Stevens, for themselves and such other judgment creditors as might elect to come in and share the expenses, to set aside the general assignment, and also the conveyance of Cureton to Stevens of the small Lancaster lot as fraudulent and void as to them, and for other relief. The case was heard by Judge Hudson, who dismissed the complaint with costs.

From this order the plaintiffs have appealed, claiming that the Circuit judge should have held the assignment void—1st. Because it was made with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiffs and other creditors. 2d. Because Stevens reserved the two-acre lot in the town of Lancaster as a homestead; and, 3d. Because the trustees were empowered to carry on the business for the space of two years. And, also, that he erred in not vacating the conveyance of the two-acre lot in the village of Lancaster by Cureton to Stevens, because, as they alleged, it was *without consideration, and therefore void; and, also, that he erred in holding that the plaintiffs were estopped from contesting the validity of the reservation of the two-acre lot by Stevens, on the ground that they were parties to the bankrupt proceedings when the lot was set apart to him as a homestead.

The first ground of attack upon the assignment involves a question of fact. Did the respondents, Cureton & Stevens, execute the assignment with the intent to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiffs? If so, this would certainly mark the assignment as fraudulent, and the Circuit judge, no doubt, would have decreed it void; but upon this point Judge Hudson said: "We see nothing in the deed before us so calculated, nor is there anything revealed in the testimony going to show that such was the purpose and intent of the assignors."

We have carefully examined the deed of assignment and the facts agreed upon by counsel, contained in the "case," and we concur with Judge Hudson, that there is nothing on the face of the deed, or in the facts submitted, which evinces any intention on the part of respondents to hinder, delay and defraud the plaintiffs, or any other of their creditors.

A failing debtor has no right to stipulate for terms in any assignment which he may make for creditors, securing benefit or advantage to himself at the expense of his creditors; but this the respondents have not done. They seem to have surrendered their entire partnership property. It is true that the lot in Lancaster was not embraced in this surrender. This was reserved as a homestead for Stevens, and, as was said by Judge Hudson, need not have been mentioned in the deed, as it was the private property of Stevens. There seems to be no ground, therefore, to assail the deed on account of this reservation, certainly not in the absence of all proof showing a fraudulent intent on the part of these parties in the exchange which they made, and by which Stevens became the sole owner of this lot.

There is nothing on the face of the deed except a preference to some creditors over others. In the face of the decisions in this state it cannot be contended that this in itself is an evidence of a fraudulent intent. On the contrary, whatever may be thought of the morality of permitting a debtor to give prefer*ences about which, if it was an open question, much might be said, yet his legal right to do so is well established in this state; and the decisions have even gone further, holding that this preference may be accompanied with a condition that the creditors shall release the debtor, the only qualification being that the preference shall be free from an intent to delay, hinder and defraud other creditors. It is needless to discuss the wisdom or soundness of this principle at this late day. The doctrine has been long since established in this state, as well as elsewhere, and is now a well-settled principle in our jurisprudence. Niolon v. Douglass, 2 Hill's Eq. 443 [30 Am. Dec. 368]; Maples v. Maples, Rice's Eq., 300.

Is the deed vulnerable in the feature which authorizes the trustees to defer the sale for a period not exceeding two years? We think not. There was no advantage to the assignors in this; on the contrary, it appears to have been intended for the benefit of the creditors. It was intended to prevent a sacrifice of the property, and, besides, it was not a peremptory injunction. It was more in the nature of advice, and was left entirely to the discretion of the trustees. It does not appear to us that there was a single element of fraud in this.

Should the judge have decreed the conveyance of Cureton to Stevens of the Lancaster lot void because without consideration? He declined to do so, for two reasons. 1st. He said "the remedy against Cureton's deed must be sought by different proceedings than the present action, which assails the assignment, not for matters dehors, but apparent on the face of the deed." He further says that "there was no evidence of fraud on the part of Cureton, and the house and lot is, in fact, the separate property of Stevens." 2d. He held that the plaintiffs were estopped by the bankrupt proceedings whereby this lot was set apart to Stevens as a homestead, without objection by the plaintiffs. For these two reasons he declined to interfere. In our opinion he was not in error. The deed of Cureton to Stevens does not appear to have been before the court. There was no evidence that it was without consideration, or that its purpose was to defraud creditors.

These facts the judge could *not be expected to assume, and without these there was certainly no ground to set the deed aside.

And besides, the plaintiffs had full opportunity to raise the question as to the validity of this deed, and to claim that the lot was partnership property before the bankrupt court. They were parties to the proceeding in that court, and having failed to avail themselves there of the opportunity to assail this deed, we think, with the Circuit judge, that they have waived their rights in this respect, and that they are now estopped.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

15 S. C. 565

MAULDIN v. GOSSETT.

[1. Judgment ⇦688.]

A rule was issued requiring a sheriff to show cause why he did not apply moneys in his hands derived from a sale of the lands of one deceased to a judgment obtained against the deceased in his lifetime. Upon return made, the rule was referred to a referee, who reported a certain amount still due. To this report the administrator of the deceased filed exceptions, which, in substance, alleged that the judgment was paid. The report was confirmed. Held, that this proceeding was not res judicata as to creditors and distributees of the deceased not parties to the rule.

[2. Judgment ⇦688.]

The proceeding by rule was proper, and the report, when confirmed, became a judgment binding upon parties and privies; but even if the administrator was a party and became thereby bound, his appearance would not bind his privies, unless he had a right to appear as a necessary and proper party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 1211; Dec. Dig. ⇦688.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇦75.]

The creditors are privies of the administrator and bound by his legitimate acts, but not where his act related to the disposition of moneys arising from a sheriff's sale of the intestate's land after his death, under judgment obtained against him in his lifetime.

*This was an action by Hannah E. Mauldin against John R. Gossett, administrator of John A. Easley, Sr., Mary H. Cleveland, administratrix of B. F. Cleveland, J. H. Cleveland, William Choice, Emily Choice and Harriet D. Evins, commenced in 1878.

The questions involved are clearly stated in the referee's report, and also in the opinion. Omitting so much of the report as finds as matter of fact and law, that the judgment of William Choice against John A. Easley, Jr., (based upon the same debt as the judgment against John A. Easley, Sr.,) was paid, the report of J. J. Norton, Esq., the referee, was as follows:

The issues of law and fact in this case having been referred to the referee for decision, he begs leave to report that on March 15th, 1879, reference was opened herein.

The plaintiff is the owner of a judgment in favor of John W. Brooks for $1799.30 and interest, with $19.40 costs, against John A. Easley, Sr., and John A. Easley, Jr.

The defendants, Mary H. Cleveland and J. H. Cleveland, are owners of the judgments against John A. Easley, Sr., as set forth in plaintiff's complaint, and not contested by any of the other defendants. William Choice, Emily Choice and Harriet D. Evins are the owners of a judgment in favor of William Choice, the elder, for $5613.48 and interest, and $9.95 costs, against John A. Easley, Sr., these four judgments being of the same date, to wit, March 20th, 1858. The last is based on notes, which are included in a previous separate judgment for $7167.60, besides interest and costs, in favor of William Choice, the elder, against John A. Easley, Jr.

The issue in this action is, whether the last-mentioned judgment has been paid in fact—and, if so, whether the plaintiff is concluded from setting up such payment in the present action by the proceedings in this court under a rule by William Choice, the elder, in his lifetime, against J. Riley Ferguson, sheriff of this county, for failing to pay on his judgment moneys collected by sale of the property of the defendant, John A. Easley, Sr. * * *

The proceedings set up in bar are, briefly —First, A notice of a rule upon J. Riley

Ferguson, sheriff of Pickens county, to *show cause why he should not be attached for contempt in not paying over the money in his hands to the plaintiffs in the cases of William Choice v. John A. Easley, Sr.; Mrs. B. F. Cleveland v. John A. Easley, Sr., and J. H. Cleveland v. John A. Easley, Sr. Second. An order thereunder referring it to William H. Perry, Esq., to ascertain and report what amounts, if any, have been paid on the various judgments against J. A. Easley, Sr., now standing on the sheriff's books, dated June 10th, 1874, by Judge Cooke, and by consent of plaintiff's and defendants' attorneys. Third. The report of the referee, filed March 5th, 1875, that he has held references, heard testimony and examined the records in the sheriff's office, and that he found that the judgment of William Choice v. John A. Easley, Sr., was obtained upon a note upon which the said J. A. Easley, Sr., was surety for his son, J. A. Easley, Jr. "Previous to that time the plaintiff, Choice, had obtained judgment against the said J. A. Easley, Jr., for $7167.60, which included the note just mentioned. The lands of J. A. Easley, Jr., were sold by the sheriff of Pickens county. At various times W. K. Easley, who was the administrator of J. A. Easley, Jr., and purchaser of one of the tracts of land sold by the sheriff as aforesaid, made payment to the said William Choice and took receipts. These receipts are in evidence. On March 19th, 1860, L. C. Craig, then sheriff of Pickens county, entered upon his books on the case of William Choice v. J. A. Easley, Jr., that he had received from the sale of defendant's land $3508.21.

"On the same day the said W. K. Easley, as attorney for William Choice (as the receipt purports), entered upon the same case a receipt for the various amounts which he had paid the plaintiff, Choice, and for which he had taken said Choice's receipts as before mentioned. He receipts for these amounts as if paid to him by the sheriff. This receipt of William K. Easley, attorney for William Choice, the referee thinks was an application of the $3508.21 received by the sheriff on the same day. Taking these receipts together, with one for $600, which was subsequently given by Choice, as a basis of calculation, the referee finds that there was due upon said judgment of William Choice *v. J. A. Easley, Jr., on February 1st, 1861, the date of the last receipt, the sum of $2211.88.

"The judgment of William Choice v. J. A. Easley, Sr., being upon a note which was included in the previous judgment of William Choice v. John A. Easley, Jr., the referee thinks and reports that there is now due upon the judgment of William Choice v. J. A. Easley, Sr., $2211.88, with interest on the same from February 1st, 1861. And that no payments have been made on the judgments of Mrs. B. F. Cleveland v. J. A. Easley, Sr., and of J. H. Cleveland v. J. A. Easley, Sr."

Fourth. The administrator of John A. Easley, Sr., by Earle & Wells, his attorneys, excepted to the referee's report, so far as it reported a balance due on Choice's judgment—1. Because the referee adjudged the sheriff's books to be an application of the proceeds of the sale of J. A. Easley, Jr.'s, lands, insisting that the records and receipts showed the contrary, one being for contra claim of J. A. Easley, Jr., two for payments made by J. A. Easley, Sr., amounting to $1123.13, and that the receipts for $1050, for $1750 and for $600, and the administrator's returns showed that they were paid from the personal estate of J. A. Easley, Jr. 2. Because the payments from the estate of J. A. Easley, Jr., should have been applied pro rata to the notes composing the judgment, and the payments of J. A. Easley, Sr., applied exclusively to the note upon which he was surety. 3. Because the real estate of J. A. Easley, Jr., sold for over $6000 more than the sheriff applied, and that surplus should be applied to the extinguishment of William Choice's judgment in full or pro tanto; and, 4. Because the report was otherwise contrary to the law and the evidence.

Fifth. An order, July 23d, 1877, confirming report of referee.

To the proceedings just set forth, neither the plaintiff nor her assignor were parties, and the plaintiff insists that they are not a bar to her present action. First. Because the court has no power to adjudicate such questions under a rule against the sheriff. Second. Because no judgment had been rendered. Third. Because the exceptions by the administrator are a nullity, as he was no party. Fourth, Because if, by litigating, he became a party, a judgment against him is not binding on the plaintiff; *and, Fifth. Because the subject matter is not the same as in the present action.

A judgment is "the final determination of the rights of the parties in the action." Rev. Stat. 630, § 268. The order confirming the report of the referee in this proceeding was binding on the sheriff and all the other parties to the proceeding, if the court possessed the power to adjudicate the questions involved under that form of proceeding. Emory v. Davis, 4 S. C. 36. It is conceded that it is not usual to decide such questions under a rule against the sheriff. When there is a contest for the recovery of money by different bona fide contending parties, the sheriff should be regarded as a stakeholder. "A rule will always go where the legal rights of the parties can be made to appear from a conceded state of facts. But where the facts are disputed, and the law depends on their development, the parties should be kept to their action at law, or should enter into a consent rule to make up an issue to ascertain their rights. The court think that the motion should be granted, and issue is directed to be made up to try the question whether the money in the hands of the sheriff should not be applied to the payment of the judgment of Cooper v. Scott." Cooper v. Scott, 2 McM. 156. The questions involved in the rule were properly tried by the referee by consent.

The administrator of J. A. Easley, Sr., having come in under the rule and litigated, is as much bound by the decision under it as if he had been originally a party. Tate v. Hunter, 3 Strob. Eq. 145; Freem. on Judg., § 174.

In Freem. on Judg., § 163, it is said that "A judgment against an administrator is binding on the creditors of the estate," citing Stone v. Wood, 16 Ill. 177; Pickens v. Yarborough, 30 Ala. 408.

In McDowall v. McDowall, Bail. Eq. 330, the plaintiffs were residuary legatees under the will of John McDowall, deceased, and the defendants were his executor and executrix, the latter of whom was also the widow of testator. The executrix had sued her co-executor at law and recovered dower, to which the Court of Equity thought her not entitled, as she had long previously accepted the legacies under her husband's will, which he *considered a full compensation for any right of dower she had in his estate, but as the court of law had decided the question under a suit, though so irregular in form that it might have been abated, the Court of Equity held the matter res adjudicata not only as to the executor, who had been a party, but also as to the residuary legatees, who were not parties.

Under these authorities I conclude that the plaintiff is bound by the judgment in the rule above mentioned against the administrator of J. A. Easley, Jr. It is plain from an inspection of the complaint herein and the exceptions to the rule above mentioned, that the main question in each case was whether the judgment of William Choice against J. A. Easley, Sr., was satisfied, either in fact or by operation of law, and that the same evidence was relied on to establish satisfaction, but it was argued that the object of the rule was to obtain from the sheriff moneys then in his hands from the sales of the real estate of John A. Easley, Sr., deceased, on the judgment of William Choice and other judgments, according to their apparent status on his books, and that the object of this action is to have the assets in the administrator's hands applied to the judgments according to their legal priorities as they appear in the sheriff's office, excluding the judgment in favor of William Choice, which plaintiff prays may "be marked satisfied." Whether the purpose be the same or not, is, in the referee's opinion, immaterial, one of the precise issues, both in the rule and in the present action, being whether the judgment recovered by William Choice against J. A. Easley, Sr., was paid—and, if not, how much was due thereon. See Freem. on Judg., §§ 256, 257, and also Jones v. Weathersbee, 4 Strob. 50 [51

Am. Dec. 653], in which the object of the suits was to recover different sums of money on account of the same nuisance, and the defendant was ready to prove title in the second suit, which he had attempted to do in the first and failed. The first judgment was held to be a bar on the question of title. Also in McDowall v. McDowall, above cited, the object of one suit was to recover dower, and of the other to recover legacies. We have many cases to the same effect which need not be here cited.

No evidence was offered as to the pecuniary irresponsibility of the administrator, John R. Gossett, nor of any unfitness on his *part to manage the estate of the intestate, nor of any misconduct on his part in reference thereto. The law therefore assumes him to be a fit and proper person to exercise the trusts reposed in him, and that he has faithfully performed the duties of his office.

It is therefore adjudged that John R. Gossett do pay out all moneys in his hands, and all which may come into his hands as such administrator—First, To the expenses of administration, including a proper counsel fee to his attorney in this action, and that he be allowed also a reasonable counsel fee in the case of the rule against J. Riley Ferguson, sheriff, in the cases of William Choice v. J. A. Easley, Sr., B. F. Cleveland v. Same, and J. H. Cleveland v. Same. Second. To any demands against the estate of his intestate having priority under the statute to the judgments owned by the parties to this action, if there be any such. And, Third. Pro rata to the four judgments owned by the parties to this action, as hereinbefore stated estimating the one obtained by William Choice at $2211.88, on February 1st, 1861, and the other three judgments at their face, taking into account in the distribution any payments made by himself or the sheriff upon any one or more of them since July 23d, 1877, if any such have been made, so as to secure equality in such distribution according to this decision.

It is further adjudged that the plaintiff pay the costs of this action.

Both parties excepted to this report. The Circuit decree was as follows:

Judge Hudson referred this case to J. J. Norton, to hear the same and decide the issues of law and fact involved. Both parties have argued before me their exceptions to the referee's report without claiming that his judgment be entered as that of the court, and even without bringing to my attention the terms of the order.

The report shows that the plaintiff and three of the defendants, J. H. Cleveland, B. F. Cleveland, and the assignees of W. Choice, represent four judgments against J. A. Easley, Sr., all of same date, March 20th, 1858. Plaintiff avers that the Choice judgment has been fully satisfied, and the referee so finds, as *matter of fact, in which finding I concur. But the assignees of Choice claim that this issue has been formerly settled in their favor by a judgment of this court, binding upon the administrator of Easley, and therefore binding on the plaintiff and all other creditors of Easley.

The facts on that point are these: The sheriff of Pickens had funds of the estate of Easley, and the parties representing the Choice and the Cleveland judgments served him with a rule to show cause why he should not be required to pay said money to their judgments. It was referred to W. H. Perry "to ascertain and report what amounts, if any, had been paid on the various judgments against J. A. Easley, now standing open on the sheriff's books." He reported a balance unpaid on the Choice judgment, and that nothing had been paid on those of the Clevelands, but does not report on or mention that of the plaintiff, who was not a party to the rule, but whose judgment was manifestly included in the said order, it being then open on "the sheriff's" books. The administrator of Easley filed exceptions to that part of the report which allowed a balance on the Choice judgment, but made no exceptions to the Cleveland judgments. It does not appear how the said administrator was admitted to take part in the proceedings under the said rule, or even whether he was allowed to do so. His exceptions to the report are not expressly overruled or even in any respect referred to in Judge Cooke's order, which confirmed said report, and made the rule absolute against the sheriff.

Nor does it in any manner appear whether the said administrator was allowed a hearing on his exceptions or was disregarded as not a necessary or proper party in that proceeding. The source from which the sheriff derived the money then in his hands, is not proved or reported on in this case. Whether it came from real estate or personal, or whether the said administrator would, in any event, have been entitled to receive and administer it, does not appear; except that it is clear that he does not dispute the right of the Clevelands to have it applied to their judgments by the sheriff.

The order of Judge Cooke in making the rule absolute against the sheriff contains nothing about the application by the admin*istrator of any funds in his hands, nor does it at all settle that the money then in question was any part of that which he was entitled to administer.

I therefore do not concur in the report of the referee, that the said order of Judge Cooke was any final adjudication of the respective rights of the creditors of J. A. Easley, Sr., or that it fixed as against them the status of the Choice judgment. They who represent it were bound to prove their plea in this case. The burden is on them to prove that the fund then in question arose from personal estate, which the administrator was entitled to receive and apply in due course of administration, and therefore as to that fund that he was entitled to litigate in that case, for the rights of all the creditors of his intestate.

That not being proved in this case, I hold that the said administrator was neither a necessary nor a proper party in the said proceedings against the sheriff, and that his voluntary interference therein could not so make the plaintiff a party to that case as to bar her claim to try the merits of her case in this action. It is therefore adjudged that so much of the referee's report as decides that the said judgment of William Choice has been paid is hereby confirmed, and that the remainder of said report is overruled.

Further ordered and adjudged that J. R. Gossett, administrator of J. A. Easley, Sr., apply the assets of said estate to the expenses of administration, including the costs of this case and a reasonable counsel fee to his attorney, and the remainder in due course of administration, according to the legal priorities and liens of the various creditors, excepting the said judgment of William Choice v. J. A. Easley, Sr.

From this decree William Choice, Emily Choice and Harriet D. Evins appealed upon the grounds considered in the opinion. The second proposition approved but not stated, was as follows, (omitting authorities): "That the question here was properly determined by rule, is fully sustained by the argument of the referee. A reference now is equal to order of issue. The final order upon the report of a referee in such case is a final judg*ment. Being a judgment, it cannot be attacked collaterally, and is binding on parties and privies."

Mr. R. W. Shand, for appellant.

Messrs. G. G. Wells and M. F. Ansell, contra.

September 20th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. In this case the plaintiff, (respondent), a judgment creditor of one Easley, deceased, brought this action against Gossett, administrator of Easley, and the other defendants, (appellants), who claimed to be judgment creditors also of Easley, to have the judgment claimed by Evins, William and Emily Choice, appellants, known as the William Choice, Sr., judgment, declared paid, and to require the administrator to pay out the moneys in his hands to the unsatisfied judgments, her own among others.

The appellants, who had become the owners of the William Choice, Sr., judgment, resisted this action, or so much of it as alleged that their judgment had been paid. They claim that this question had been settled in their favor in a previous action, to which the administrator of Easley was a party; that the administrator represented all the creditors in this action; that the plaintiff, being one of the creditors, was bound thereby, and that the question now raised by her was res judicata.

The case was referred to J. J. Norton, Esq., as special referee. Mr. Norton seems to have been of the opinion that the William Choice judgment had been legally satisfied by the receipt of certain moneys by the sheriff, in 1861, which should have been applied to this judgment; but, believing this question to be settled the other way in the previous case, he sustained the plea of res judicata and reported the judgment still open and entitled to its share of the moneys in the hands of the administrator. And he recommended that the assets in the hands of the administrator, Gossett, after first being applied to certain expenses connected with the litigation, be paid out pro rata, on four judgments established before him, including the Choice judgment, *upon which last judgment he held that the previous proceedings, out of which the plea of res judicata had sprung, had established that the sum of $2211.88 was due on February 1st, 1861. Judge Pressley overruled this report, holding upon the facts of the previous case that the plea of res judicata could not be legally interposed by the appellants; and he adjudged that the Choice judgment had been paid. He, therefore, ordered the administrator, Gossett, to apply the assets in his hands, after expenses of administration, &c., in the due course of administration, according to the legal priorities and liens of the several creditors, excepting the Choice judgment.

This appeal is from this decree of Judge Pressley, and it involves the single question whether Judge Pressley was in error in overruling the plea of res judicata relied on by the appellants and sustained by the referee. To determine this question we must now examine the previous proceedings.

During the lifetime of William Choice, Sr., the precise date not given, but some time in 1874, he instituted a proceeding by rule upon the then sheriff of Pickens county, the county in which his judgment had been entered, to show cause why he should not be attached for contempt in not paying over the money in his hands to his judgment, the one now in controversy, and also to the Cleveland judgment. This rule was referred to William H. Perry, to ascertain and report what amounts, if any, had been paid on the various judgments against Easley, then standing on the sheriff's books. Mr. Perry reported that, among other judgments, he found the Choice judgment, after deducting all payments, open to the extent of $2211.88.

The administrator of Easley, by attorneys, excepted to the referee's report, as far as he reported a balance due on the Choice judgment, on the ground that the sheriff had received, in the sale of the real estate of J. A. Easley, Jr., also covered by this judgment, over $6000 more than he had applied, which surplus it was his duty to apply, and, if applied, the judgment would be paid.

How the administrator of Easley became a party to this rule—whether by service of process or by his own voluntary act—does not appear, nor does it appear whether his exceptions were heard and considered by the court. He is not mentioned *in the proceeding, and at no stage appears, except in the filing of these exceptions. This is the first and last that we hear of him in the rule. In the order of Judge Cooke, confirming the report of Mr. Perry, and making the rule absolute against the sheriff, these exceptions are not overruled or referred to in any way whatever.

It is expressly admitted in the argument of Mr. Shand, appellant's attorney, that the object of the rule was to have applied to the Choice judgment the proceeds of the sale of the land sold by the sheriff, and which were in his hands. Now, the position taken by the appellants is, that Gossett, the administrator of Easley, having been a party to this rule, either voluntarily or otherwise, and one of the issues arising under the rule being whether their judgment was still open, which issue had been determined in their favor without appeal, that this question is now res judicata, estopping the administrator and all creditors, as his privies, from denying its existence, and that the Circuit judge should have so held.

It cannot be denied that a direct and final judgment or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction is forever conclusive and binding as to the subject matter embraced between the same parties and all privies in law or estate. Manigault v. Deas, Bail. Eq. 284.

If, then, the decision rendered on this rule was a decision by a competent court, on the same subject matter and between the same parties, the principle announced above would apply and the plea of res judicata would be conclusive. This plea, however, to be effective, requires the concurrence of four conditions: 1st. Identity in the thing sued for. 2d. Identity in the cause of action. 3d. Identity in the persons or parties. 4th. Identity in the quality of the persons for or against whom the claim is made. Bouvier L. Dic. 465. As an example of the last condition, a final judgment against a party in his own right would be no bar to an action by him as administrator.

If any one of these unities is wanting, and especially the unity of parties, the plea cannot be made out, because, while it is just and proper that litigation between the same parties, after they have once had their rights adjudicated by a competent tribunal *without appeal, should end, yet a thing done between others ought not to injure another. A transaction between two parties ought not to operate to the disadvantage of a third. The maxim res inter alios acta nocere non debet is as strong for the protection of those not before the court as that of res adjudicata for those who are present.

There is no question here as to the competency of the court. The rule was in the nature of a special proceeding, not unusual in cases of this kind, and it was heard by a competent tribunal. The thing demanded by the rule was the money supposed to be in the hands of the sheriff, derived from the sale of the real estate of the judgment debtor. The cause of action involved the right of Choice to have the money applied to his judgment.

The parties were the judgment creditor, the sheriff, and, the respondent contends, Gossett, the administrator of the deceased debtor: the quality of the judgment creditor being in his own right, that of the sheriff in his official capacity, and that of Gossett as administrator of the debtor.

Now, how does the case before the court stand as to these matters? The thing demanded here is the money in the hands of the administrator derived from the personal estate of the debtor. The cause of action involves the right of the Choice judgment to a portion of this money. The parties are the plaintiff, a judgment creditor, the administrator of the deceased debtor and the present owners of the Choice judgment. The thing demanded in both cases is money belonging to the deceased debtor: in the first case being proceeds of his real estate, and in the latter that of his personalty. The object of the suit in each case is to determine the proper application of the assets of the deceased debtor, and especially whether the Choice judgment should receive any portion; the main question is the same, and the parties are the same, with the addition of the plaintiff. The conditions, then, may be regarded as the same in each case, with the exception that the plaintiff, who is a party in the present proceedings, was not a party, at least nominally, in the first.

This exception is fatal to the plea, unless it can be made to appear that the plaintiff, although not nominally before the court in the former proceeding, was yet present by her repre*sentative in such way as to bind her. And this is the real question in the case. Now, waiving the point whether the administrator was a party to the former proceeding or not, the question arises, was he a necessary party? and in such sense as that, his being a party, the judgment of the court, unappealed from, bound him as well as the creditors and distributees of the estate which he represented.

It will not be denied that the acts of the administrator are binding as to all matters over which he has legitimate control as such administrator. The power delegated to the administrator is to administer the goods and chattels, rights and credits which were of his intestate at the time of his death, and the condition of his bond is to perform this duty. His power goes to this extent, and no further. Within the range of this power his acts not only bind himself, but also all those of whom he is in law the representative; creditors and distributees are his privies in law, and his acts, when free from collusion, bind them. As to all matters, therefore, connected with the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the deceased, undergoing litigation, he is not only a proper, but a necessary party.

But the administrator does not represent the real estate of his intestate. The real estate, it is true, may be made subject to the debts of the intestate, but not by the action of the administrator—that is, by virtue of his administration. The creditors may reach the real estate without his aid, and he is not responsible on his bond if it be lost. He can commit no devastavit in connection therewith.

In the case of Garlick v. Patterson, Cheves' Eq. 27, referred to in the argument, it was held that where a balance is found in the hands of a sheriff, after the sale of the real estate of an intestate in satisfaction of executions, the administrator is not entitled to this surplus, either in law or equity, as assets for the payment of debts, though the creditors themselves may claim it. Nor would his bondsmen be liable even if it passed into his hands. In the case of Bank v. Inglesby, Speers' Eq. 399, the same doctrine is held as to a surplus in the hands of the master upon sale in foreclose of a mortgage of real estate. The master was ruled by the administrator. Chancellor Dunkin *dismissed the rule, and, upon appeal, Chancellor Johnson said: "That the defendant is not, in his character as administrator, entitled to receive the money is directly decided in Ex parte Foster, Rice's Eq. 19." "It is plain, therefore," says the Chancellor, "that the sureties on his bond would not be liable for money arising from the sales of real estate."

The attorney of appellant has placed upon the record an admission that the money in controversy in the rule was derived from the sale of real estate of the deceased debtor. Under the decisions referred to, the administrator had no legal interest in this money. He was not entitled to demand or receive it from the sheriff by virtue of his powers as administrator, and if he had received and wasted it his bondsmen would not have been liable. If this be so it was no interest of his, nor was it any part of his duty, to see that the sheriff applied this money properly. That was a matter for the sheriff, the heirs-at-law and the creditors. Such being the fact, we cannot see how the administrator was a necessary or even a proper party to the rule. If he was not a necessary or proper party, then his appearing in the case, either voluntarily or otherwise, would be an act outside of his duty and beyond his power as administrator, and would not bind those of whom administrators are the representatives, to wit, distributees and creditors. It is urged, however, that the main question in controversy under the rule, was whether the Choice judgment had been paid, and that this was a question in which the administrator was interested as administrator, and that this interest rendered it necessary and proper that he should have been made a party to that proceeding.

If the effort in the rule had been to establish the judgment of Choice against any funds under the control of the administrator, and a judgment or decree sought to be enforced therein against him as administrator, or if the funds in the hands of the sheriff had been derived from the sale of personal property, and were a subject of controversy between himself and Choice and the rule had been resorted to to settle the rights of the parties, he should have been a party. But neither of these cases existed; no redress was prayed against the administrator, nor was he entitled to any relief. No act of his had given rise to the rule, nor was *any interest of his imperiled by its issue. Was it not time enough for him to attack the judgment when an effort was made to set it up against the personal estate in his hands? Was he bound, or was it in any sense his duty, to intervene in a proceeding between others, simply because a question was incidentally raised there which might possibly thereafter be raised against him? If he had been in possession of any facts showing payment of this judgment, why could he not have been a witness, instead of a party? We cannot see that he was either a necessary or proper party, and we find no error in the order of the Circuit judge overruling the plea of the appellants.

The appellants contend that where money arising from the sale of lands of an intestate is in the hands of the sheriff, whether a judgment claiming this money has been paid or not, is an issue to which the administrator of the deceased is a proper party, and to support this position the following authorities have been referred to in the argument, to wit: Story's Eq. Pl., §§ 176, 169; Rae v. Stead, 2 Cr. 407; Fretwell v. Neal, 11 Rich. Eq. 559; Rogers v. Huggins, 6 S. C. 356; Pomeroy 315. We do not think that the authorities referred to fully sustain the position claimed. It is stated both in Story and Pomeroy that the administrator or executor is a necessary party to an action against the heirs on a debt of the ancestor, on account of real estate descended or devised to them; but in this case the debt in question had been reduced to judgment against the intestate in his lifetime, and the rule was not intended to obtain a judgment against the heirs, but to have the judgment already obtained paid out of moneys in which they were interested. Whether the judgment was satisfied came up incidentally as one of the facts in the case upon which the main issue depended, but it was not in itself the main issue.

The second proposition of appellants is no doubt correct.

The third, that where an administrator appears in a proceeding, whether personally a party or not, he is bound and estopped, may be true, and yet his appearance in such case would not bind his privies, unless the administrator had a right to appear as a necessary and proper party.

*The fourth, that where the administrator is estopped, having been a party, the creditors, who are privies, are also estopped, is true as to all matters where the administrator legitimately acted as administrator; but in this case, as we have seen, this doctrine does not apply.

Besides, the proceeding under the rule was had in 1875, some three years before this action commenced. The rule was made absolute against the sheriff. It does not appear but that the sheriff paid this money on the Choice judgment, since the order making the rule absolute. The plea of res adjudicata should not shut off an inquiry of this sort.

If it could avail at all, it should only avail as to the matters involved in the rule. We think there was no error in the Circuit judge overruling the plea, but we think, under all the circumstances, the Circuit judge should not have held that the Choice judgment was satisfied. This is a matter which should undergo a full investigation, unencumbered with the former proceeding.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so that so much of it as overrules the plea of res judicata be sustained, and so much as holds the Choice judgment satisfied be reversed, subject to further investigation, and that the case be remanded for such further proceeding as may be necessary.

PELZER, RODGERS & CO. v. CAMPBELL & CO.

[1. Bills and Notes ⇐194; Evidence ⇐461.]
A creditor agreed to give his debtor, a partnership firm, further indulgence, if notes were given him for the amount due, signed by the firm and by C., the mother of one of the partners. The notes were signed in the partnership name, with a seal added, and were then taken to C. by her son, and afterwards delivered to the creditor with her signature and seal.

There is nothing in the constitution of 1868 which prevents the legislature from giving to married women rights and powers in addition to those conferred by that instrument; and, therefore, the provision in the act of 1870 (Gen. Stat., ch. C., § 3,) authorizing a married woman to contract and be contracted with, in the same manner as if she were unmarried, is not unconstitutional.

[This case is also cited and approved in Witte Bros. v. Clarke, 17 S. C. 314.]

Before Pressley, J., Anderson, September, 1879.

Action commenced in 1879 by the plaintiffs against A. R. Campbell & Co. and Mary M. Campbell, upon the three notes set out in full in the opinion of this court. W. N. Mitchell was not served and A. R. Campbell put in no appearance. The three notes were given for a debt of A. R. Campbell & Co. to Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., then past due.

A. R. Campbell testified that his mother was not present when he settled with the agent of plaintiffs, and she knew nothing of *the extension of time given to A. R. Campbell & Co. by the plaintiffs; that she was not a partner and was not owing the firm anything, and had no interest in it; that when he offered his mother as security plaintiffs' agent left, and he then went to see his mother and told her that he expected it would be necessary for her to sign a note with A. R. Campbell & Co., and her reply was, "Well, you can sign my name." Then the following questions were put to witness: (1.) "Who signed this note?" Ans. "I did it for my mother." [Question objected to by counsel and was ruled out.] (2.) "What authority did you have?" (3.) "Did she authorize you to sign her name as surety for yourself, individually, or for the firm of A. R. Campbell & Co.?" (4.) "Was she aware that any extension of time was granted to A. R. Campbell & Co. by the plaintiffs, on the consideration that she would sign the notes?" All of which questions were ruled out and exceptions noted.

It was not pretended that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the matters between A. R. Campbell and his mother, in regard to his signature to the notes for her, which defendants offer to prove by A. R. Campbell, or that he signed them for her.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

$213.44. Belton, S. C., May 17, 1878.

On the first of December next, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., without off-set, two hundred and thirteen 44-100 dollars, value received. Witness our hands and seals.

$746.21. Belton, S. C., May 17, 1878.

On the first of February next, we, or either of us, promise to pay to the order of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., without off-set, seven hundred and forty-six 21-100 dollars, value received. Witness our hands and seals.

A. R. Campbell & Co. [L. S.]
Mary M. Campbell. [L. S.]

A. R. Campbell and W. N. Mitchell, doing business at Belton, Anderson county, under the name and style of A. R. Campbell & Co., became indebted to Pelzer, Rodgers & Co., who agreed to give indulgence for the time indicated in the notes if the mother of A. R. Campbell, one of the firm, would sign the notes as surety. Campbell took the notes and returned them, signed by Mrs. Campbell. The plaintiffs accepted them and gave the indulgence.

Mrs. Campbell was not connected with the firm of A. R. Campbell & Co., and signed the notes only to enable them to get indulgence on the debt. The complaint stated that Mrs.

*Campbell was a married woman and owned in her own right a farm in Anderson county, worth $2000. The principal defence was that Mrs. Campbell, being a married woman, had no legal capacity to make a personal contract upon which judgment could be recovered so as to bind her separate estate. The Circuit judge held that she had such capacity and was liable. The plaintiff had a verdict for the amount of the notes, and Mrs. Campbell appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because his Honor erred in not dismissing the complaint on the demurrer; that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action to charge the separate estate of defendant.

"2. A. R. Campbell signed the sealed notes in the firm name, without special authority. He could not bind W. N. Mitchell, the other partner, and Mrs. Campbell being surety, she is not bound by the contract, being different from that she signed. And his Honor erred in ruling that a sealed note now stands on exactly the same ground with an unsealed note in every respect, and that both Mitchell and Mrs. Campbell were bound.

"3. Because his Honor erred in ruling that if the constitutional clause defining the rights and powers of married women had been under the legislative department, the legislature could not have enlarged or narrowed its provisions, but being under the miscellaneous department they could do so.

"4. Because his Honor erred in not making the following charge, as requested by defendant's counsel: First. 'As to separate estate of wife, the constitution declares that she can bequeath, devise or alienate it the same as if she were unmarried. The legislature cannot enlarge its provisions so as to allow a married woman to contract and be contracted with generally.' Second. 'The proof by plaintiffs being that the only consideration for signature of Mrs. Campbell was the extension of time to A. R. Campbell & Co., she is not bound.' Third. 'That nothing appearing in the contracts showing an intention to charge the separate estate of defendant or to alienate it, and there being no proof of an intention to charge it, it cannot be made liable for the debts of A. R. Campbell & Co.' Fourth. 'That plaintiffs having failed to show any benefits or consideration accruing *to this defendant or her separate estate from them, she is not bound by said notes.'

"5. Because his Honor erred in holding that Mrs. Campbell was bound by the consideration of extension of time to A. R. Campbell & Co., when their own admissions show that Mrs. Campbell was not a party to any such agreement, and was not present when arrangements were made.

"6. Because this defendant is not bound by any agreement or consideration between A. R. Campbell & Co. and plaintiffs, of which she had no knowledge.

"7. Because this defendant having denied any consideration for her signing said note, before plaintiffs can make extension of time to A. R. Campbell & Co. sufficient consideration to bind her, they must show that she knew of that consideration before she signed the notes.

"8. Because his Honor erred in ruling that a married woman could bind her separate property as a surety to a contract wherein she was not interested.

"9. Because his Honor erred in holding that a married woman could bind her separate estate in a contract, where her separate estate derived no benefit therefrom, or where the contract itself expressed no intention to bind such estate.

"10. Because his Honor erred in ruling out the questions propounded to A. R. Campbell, a witness for the defence."

The second, fifth, sixth, seventh and tenth exceptions relate to alleged want of consideration for the signature of Mrs. Campbell to the notes in question, and to the exclusion of testimony as to whether her son had authority to sign for her, and whether, at the time, she knew of the extension of time given to A. R. Campbell & Co. It appears in the case, as admitted, that "the plaintiffs agreed to give A. R. Campbell & Co. the specified time in said notes if the defendant, Mrs. Mary M. Campbell, the mother of A. R. Campbell, would sign the said notes, and they were returned signed by her and accepted by plaintiffs." After this admission, proof as to who signed for Mrs. Campbell, whether such person had authority to do so, or whether she knew of the consideration of indulgence given to A. R. Campbell & Co., was immaterial and irrelevant. A. R. Campbell knew the consider*ation which was offered for the security, which, it was supposed, the name of his mother would afford. He procured his signature and got the consideration. Parol evidence was not admissible to explain the notes as to whether they were signed as surety for the firm or for A. R. Campbell, individually. The notes were the only evidence of the intention of Mrs. Campbell in signing them, and by them her responsibility must be tested. "There is no rule better settled than that evidence of contemporaneous parol declarations is inadmissible to vary the terms of a written agreement." Wright v. Remington, 12 Vroom 54.

Mrs. Campbell had no connection with the business of A. R. Campbell & Co. In order to secure indulgence for them, at the instance of her son, who was one of the firm, she signed the notes. Was that consideration enough to make her, in this connection, considered as a person sui juris, liable upon the notes? We think it was. "An agreement on the part of the creditor to extend the time of payment to the principal for a definite time, is a sufficient consideration for the contract of suretyship or guaranty—the one agreement being a consideration for the other—and the delay usually operating both as a benefit to the principal and a detriment to the creditor." Brandt on Suretyship, § 8; Thomas v. Croft, 2 Rich. 115 [44 Am. Dec. 279].

But these were sealed notes, and it is urged that A. R. Campbell could not legally sign them for A. R. Campbell & Co.: that they are, in fact, not the notes of the other partner, Mitchell, and in consequence of this rule of law, of which she was ignorant, Mrs. Campbell, a mere surety, is released from liability. She signed the notes with A. R. Campbell & Co., and their tenor is: "We or either of us promise to pay," &c. When she signed she knew that they were sealed notes. There is no proof of fraud practiced upon her, or misrepresentations by the plaintiffs to induce her to sign, and even if there was a mistake in matter of law as to the liability of Mitchell upon the notes, that could not release her.

The question of Mitchell's liability has not been tried, and it may possibly be that he is not liable on the notes, but we suppose there is no doubt that he is still liable for the partnership debt for which the notes were given.

The notes of A. R. Camp*bell alone, although in the name of A. R. Campbell & Co., did not merge the firm debt so far at least as Mitchell was concerned, and he is still liable therefor. Fleming, Ross & Co. v. Lawhorn & Co., Dud. 362; Pierce v. Cameron et al., 7 Rich. 116; Spear v. Gillet, 1 Dev. Eq. 466; 4 Dev. 90, 459.

All the other exceptions, in one form or another, make the question that Mrs. Campbell, being a married woman at the time she signed the notes, without advantage to herself or her estate, had not legal capacity to make such a contract, and, therefore, is not liable.

The relation of husband and wife, whether we regard the responsibilities of the parties to each other, or to the community and its members, is the most important known to society; indeed, it is "the parent, not the child of society." The exact status which the wife should occupy has always been a most fruitful source of discussion, especially as to her capacity to hold, change and dispose of property in her own right as separate from that of her husband. From the very nature of the subject it is not without difficulty. Husband and wife are separate, natural persons, with different faculties, sentiments and desires, and yet their relation makes them the heads of one family, with common interests, common hopes and common purposes. The doctrines of the old common law upon the subject are familiar. To speak in general terms, husband and wife are a unity, or, as it was expressed by the great law-giver, "they twain shall be one flesh." The civil existence of the wife was merged in that of the husband, whose duty it was to support and govern the family, and to enable him to do so he was, with small exception, entitled to the property, the earnings and the obedience of his wife, whose disabilities were complete.

In modern times the position of woman in the community, and particularly the wife, in regard to her husband, is different from what it was ages ago. But it is matter of wonder to observe what confusion still prevails, and how far the subject still seems to be from final and satisfactory settlement. Most of the states of the Union originally adopted the old common law of the mother country, modified as it had been by the introduction of trusts and the peculiar doctrine of "the separate estate" of married women, created by act of the parties and administered *exclusively in courts of equity. But later, as property increased and the relations of a highly civilized society became more complex, there was developed a tendency to escape from what was regarded as the hard and unbending rules of the common law, and to bestow upon the wife a larger capacity to hold property in her own right, and to dispose of it without regard to the wishes of her husband. There is no doubt of such general tendency, but there never has been unanimity upon the subject. A part of every community adhered to the old rule as best calculated to promote harmony, prosperity and happiness, while another part pressed forward in the direction of what was called the civilized doctrine of emancipating the wife from the slavery of the old law and re-endowing her with the faculties and rights of a human being.

In this modern reform most if not all of the states joined, but not with even pace. Each made its own rules and regulations, and the result was an entire want of uniformity, and great confusion and perplexity in the principles applied to the vexed question of "the separate estates" of married women. In the language of Mr. Bishop: "Since the confusion of tongues at the Tower of Babel there has been nothing more noteworthy, in the same line, than the discordant and ever-shifting utterances of the judicial mind on the subject of the power of a married woman, and her separate estate in the absence of specific provision in the deed of settlement. True, there has been sometimes a language, which, though limited in its sphere, was tolerably plain, but no sooner was the language in the way of being understood, when lo! some conquering power of another sort came in, and all was confusion once more." 1 Bish. on Mar. Wom., § 847.

In this "sea of troubles" two currents of opinion were dimly visible, one holding that a married woman, as to her separate estate, was a feme sole, and, as such, entitled to exercise all rights not taken away from her, and the other maintaining that as to such property she was still under the disabilities of coverture and entitled to exercise no rights except such as were expressly conferred upon her by the deed creating the estate. The courts in this state always adhered to the latter opinion. Reid v. Lamar, 1 Strob Eq. 27. Around and between these two great leading *currents there was every conceivable variety of opinion, expressed in qualifications, modifications, exceptions, explanations, &c. These intricacies and contradictions in the old law of the "separate estate," as created inter partes, were so great and bewildering that in considering questions growing out of our late laws, which create what is known as "the statutory separate estate," little assistance can be derived from the multitudinous decisions of other states upon the subject; none, indeed, except from the states which have laws similar to our own. On the contrary, the most laborious effort to harmonize and utilize these decisions will be found to be utterly hopeless, and, indeed, to make "confusion worse confounded."

For a series of years before the adoption of the constitution, efforts were made in the legislature of this state to pass a law making the property of the wife her separate estate, not liable to the debts of her husband, without the necessity of a deed to that effect or the appointment of a trustee. In 1868 the constitution was adopted, of which Article XIV., Section 8, declares as follows: "The real and personal property of a woman, held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried; provided, that no gift from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the just claims of his creditors."

Soon after the adoption of the present constitution the legislature passed the "Act to carry into effect the provisions of the constitution in relation to the rights of married women," ratified January 27th, 1870, (14 Stat. 326), re-enacted in the General Statutes 482, which provides as follows: "That the real and personal property of a married woman, whether held by her at the time of her marriage or accrued to her thereafter, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise, purchase or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be her separate property."

Sec. 2. "A married woman shall have power to bequeath, devise or convey her separate property in the same manner and *to the same extent as if she were unmarried; and if dying intestate, her property shall descend in the same manner as the law now provides for the descent of the property of husbands; and all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind shall be executed by her in the same manner and have the same legal force and effect as if she were unmarried."

Sec. 3. "A married woman shall have the right to purchase any species of property in her own name, and to take proper legal conveyances therefor, and to contract and be contracted with in the same manner as if she were unmarried. That the husband shall not be liable for the debts of the wife contracted prior to or after their marriage, except for her necessary support," &c.

In the outset it is claimed that in the effort to ascertain the powers of a married woman we must look alone to the constitution; that the act above cited purports to give to a married woman powers larger than those given by the constitution, and to that extent is without authority and void; that the constitution having undertaken to deal with the subject, its provisions are not merely fundamental, but legislative and exhaustive, and amount, by implication, to an inhibition against the legislature touching the subject. The parts claimed to be beyond the constitution are in italics. There is nothing in the act inconsistent with or in opposition to the constitution, but merely supplemental thereto. Both are upon the same view and in the same line, the declared object of the act being "to carry into effect the provisions of the constitution."

It is not perfectly clear that the provisions of the constitution, necessarily stated in general terms, do not authorize the detail of particulars declared by the act. The first section of the act is in almost the very words of the constitution. The same may be said as to the second section, with the exception that for the word "alienate" is substituted that of "convey," with an additional statement as to the modes of conveyance—"and all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind shall be executed by her in the same manner and have the same legal force and effect as if she were unmarried."

There is also in this section another addition: that upon the death of the wife intestate *her estate "should descend as the law now provides for the descent of the property of husbands."

It is plain that these apparent additions were nothing more than stating fully and particularly what was properly inferable from the powers given in the constitution "to devise, bequeath or alienate." So as to the third section. Can it be fairly and with entire confidence affirmed that the powers expressly given in the constitution to acquire property "by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise," do not include and authorize the subordinate powers specified by the act "to purchase property in her own name and take proper legal conveyances therefor, and to contract and be contracted with?" It is asked with some force, how could she purchase or convey without the power to contract? It is insisted that the particulars of the act are nothing more than the filling up of the general outline indicated by the constitution. The constitution was adopted in 1868, and the act was passed in 1870, to a large extent by the same persons who had framed the constitution: therefore, according to contemporaneous construction, the constitution allowed the provisions of the act, and they are not inconsistent but in harmony with each other. Simpson v. Willard, 14 S. C. 191.

But, assuming that some of the powers given by the act are not fully covered by the said section, but are over and above and supplemental thereto, is the act unconstitutional as to such original provisions, although not in violation of the terms or contrary to the spirit of the said section? It is not contended that there is any express prohibition against the legislature passing the act, but that the very existence of the provisions of the constitution negatives, by implication, the right of the legislature to touch the subject at all. It is no small matter to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional. The legislature is the law-making power of the state upon all subjects not prohibited by the constitution, every part of which should, if possible, be so construed as to allow full force to Section 1, Article III., which vests the full legislative power of the state in the general assembly.

"The English parliament, in a political sense, is omnipotent, but with us it is the people, and the people speak and act through the legislature, except when restricted by the constitution of the *United States or of the state. No statute can be disregarded unless a constitutional violation can be pointed out." Thorpe v. R. & B. R. R. Co., 27 Vt. 142; Potter's Dwar. 60–65; Cooley on Const. Lim., §§ 87–173.

"It is an axiom in American jurisprudence that a statute is not to be pronounced void on this ground, unless the repugnancy to the constitution be clear and the conclusion that it exists inevitable. Every doubt is to be resolved in support of the enactment. The particular clause of the constitution must be specified, and the act admit of no reasonable construction in harmony with its meaning. The judicial function involving such result is one of delicacy and to be exercised always with caution." Township v. Talcott, 19 Wall. 673.

"The constitutionality of a law must be presumed until the violation of the constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt, and a reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of legislative action and the act be sustained." Cooley on Const. Lim., § 87.

The general objects of a written constitution are to lay down the fundamental principles and to limit the powers of government, and not to legislate on mere details. It is, in its nature, to be paramount, and in unchanging form is not suited to contain all the laws, which, from time to time, are necessary to conform to the ever-changing necessities and wishes of a people.

It is true that under certain conditions the power to legislate upon a subject may be taken away by a provision in the constitution simply affirmative as well as by express words, as where the provision is of such a nature that its purpose would be frustrated by further legislation on the subject, which occurs generally in reference to modes of procedure and in matters enumerated. But considering how easy it would have been to add words of exclusion, if such had been the intention, and that the alleged frustration of purpose must always be very much a matter of opinion, this "exhaustive grant" doctrine excluding, by implication, the power of legislation, is not favored. Implied limitations of legislative power are only admissible when the implication is necessary, as where language, conveying a particular intent, cannot have its proper force without such implication.

*"It is not upon slight implication and vague conjecture that it is to be pronounced that the legislature has transcended its power, and that its acts are to be deemed void. The opposition between the constitution and the law should be such that the judge feels a clear and strong conviction of their incompatibility with each other." Potter's Dwar. 65.

It seems that one of the rules of construction in such cases is this: If the provision introduces a new subject, and nothing appears to the contrary, that provision may be regarded as containing its own limit; but if the provision is upon the subject of ordinary legislation, in reference to which the legislature had acted before, that old right of legislation will not be taken away by implication, unless it is a necessary implication. Potter's Dwar. 72–74.

This rule has an illustration in the case of Duncan v. Barnett, 11 S. C. 333 [32 Am. Rep. 476], cited by the defendant. That case involved the point whether the act of 1872, exempting from levy and sale "one-third of the annual products of agricultural laborers," in addition to the exemptions allowed by the constitution, was for that reason unauthorized and void. The constitution contains two provisions on the subject of homestead exemptions. Article I., Section 20, declares: "That a reasonable amount of property as a homestead shall be exempt from seizure and sale for the payment of debts," &c., and Article II., Section 32, indicates what is "a reasonable amount of property," by enumerating in detail the articles to be exempt, as follows: "The personal property of such person, of the following character, to wit: Household furniture, beds and bedding, family library, arms, carts and wagons, farming implements, tools, neat cattle, work animals, swine, goats and sheep, not to exceed in value in the aggregate the sum of $500," &c. This latter section, like an ordinary act of the legislature, indicates clearly the articles exempt, and this particular enumeration implies a limit. The act assailed added a new article, not embraced in the list, and it was held that "the legislature can exempt from levy and sale only such articles of personal property as are embraced within the enumeration contained in Article II., Section 32 of the constitution."

In delivering the judgment of the court,

Judge Willard said: * "Until within a few years it has not been regarded as a legitimate exercise of legislative power to place the property of the debtor beyond the reach of his creditor, except to an inconsiderable extent. * * * It may well be considered that in solving the question of the legitimacy of such legislation the constitution had in view a limit that should be imposed to its unrestricted exercise. When it is treating of subjects that have been constantly dealt with by legislative bodies, with the sanction of the courts and the community, such an inference does not necessarily arise. In such cases some special ground would have to appear by inferring, in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, that the constitution, in prescribing the mode in which a power of that class should be exercised, intended to exclude its exercise in any other mode."

The case before us is, in several particulars, different from that of Duncan v. Barnett. Here there is no second section filling up with particulars the general power given in the first, which office, in reference to the rights of a married woman, seems to have been performed by the act of the legislature now assailed; and besides, in the matter now under consideration, the constitution was "treating of a subject that had been constantly dealt with by the legislature." The rights of married women have always been considered and treated as a legitimate subject of legislation in this state. Perhaps no other has been oftener before the legislature.

We can see no necessity for the implication in this case as drawn from the frame of the provision itself. It does not purport to be exhaustive or exclusive, but, in terms, is simply affirmative and without words of negation. The maxim expressio unius est exclusio alterius cannot control the construction. That doctrine as to the effect of omissions under certain conditions, might have some weight if, in this case, as in Duncan v. Barnett, a new subject of legislation had been then and there introduced by the constitutional provision; but it is not perceived why it should be applied so as to limit, by implication, legislative powers which already existed in regard to an old and general subject of legislation.

arising out of the *nature of the subject. Based on the law as it then stood, the main object of the provision in the constitution seems to have been, not so much to declare the rights of the wife as to negative those of the husband in regard to her property—not to enable her, but to disable him and his creditors, and, therefore, no exhaustive catalogue of all her powers was intended to be given, but only a mention, in general terms, of such of them as were incident to the main purpose of excluding the rights of the husband. As was said in the case of Townsend v. Brown,† lately decided by this court, in reference to the mode of renunciation of a wife's dower under our present laws: "The leading object of the section just quoted [under consideration here] appears to have been to relieve the property of the wife from liability for the husband's debts, and to relieve it from any control by the husband; for the first provision is to exempt the wife's property from levy and sale for the debts of the husband, and the second is to authorize the wife to dispose of her property without, and even against the consent of the husband. The real purpose, therefore, does not appear to have been to confer any new powers upon a married woman by changing her legal status, but simply to protect her property from liability for her husband's debts, and to release it even from the partial control of the husband by dispensing with the necessity, which had previously existed, of obtaining his consent and concurrence before her property could be disposed of. These seem to have been the real purposes of the clause in question, and as they can be fully accomplished without in any manner affecting any of the other relations between husband and wife growing out of marriage, we think we are bound to confine the operation of this clause of the constitution to its declared and manifest objects."

We conclude that there is nothing in the provision of the constitution upon the subject of the rights of married women which excludes the legislature from passing any act upon that subject that is not in violation of the terms of that provision; and that the act of 1870, admitted to be in accord with both its terms and spirit, is constitutional, and has the force of law.

*The only other question remaining is whether the defendant, Mrs. Campbell, is liable to be sued to judgment on the notes as her personal contract. After protecting the property of a married woman from her husband's debts, it seems to have been the intention of the act to give to her the absolute right to contract without exception or qualification. The words are: "And to contract and be contracted with in the same manner as if she were unmarried; provided that the husband shall not be liable for the debts of the wife contracted prior to or after their marriage except for her necessary support." The proviso itself indicates that a married woman may contract debts after marriage other than those for her necessary support.

Witsell v. Charleston, 7 S. C. 88, decided in 1875. In this case there was a separate estate created by will prior to the constitution, and the principal question to consider was as to the effect the constitution has upon a separate estate which was in existence at the time of its adoption, and upon that subject we make no ruling here. It was, however, held "that under Article XIV., Section 8 of the constitution a married woman has power to alienate her equitable estate in stock held by her at the adoption of the constitution, and that she might pledge the same as security for her husband's debts." In referring to the married woman provision of the constitution in this case, the court says: "Its object was to enlarge what was before known as the wife's separate estate, so as to embrace all acquisitions, past or future, of such nature that if she were a feme sole they would vest in her as property, and to enlarge her powers over such property to the same extent as if she were a feme sole, and at the same time to shield that separate estate from liability to the husband's debts against her will. * * * Now that the constitution has reversed the rule of the common law, and substituted general competence for the former rule of incompetence as it regards the holding and acquisition of real estate, it is not for the courts, on nice readings of its text, to restore a state of things from which the courts of equity have long striven to be released. * * * We have been referred to cases decided in the courts of other states on statutes similar in their general intention to our own, some regarded as favoring the view that has been expressed, and others as opposing it. When the construction of our own constitu*tion is free from doubt, little aid can be obtained from the decisions of the courts of other states. In the present case the meaning of our constitution is free from doubt, and it demands interpretation at our hands according to the expressed intent of the people of the state who framed it, as our organic law."

Ross v. Linder, 12 S. C. 592, decided in 1879, is the only other case in our reports upon the subject. In that case, in considering the question whether the husband was a substantial or merely a formal party, the point arose incidentally whether a married woman could bind herself by a general personal engagement. It was held "that the ability of a married woman to bind herself by a contract cannot be disputed under the provisions of General Statutes 482."

In some of the states in which the power to contract has been given to a married woman, exceptions have been introduced limiting that power. In New York and New Jersey she is expressly restrained from assuming a liability as surety, but in Illinois she is not. The sixth section of the married woman's act of Illinois is in these words: "Contracts may be made and liabilities incurred by a wife, and the same enforced against her to the same extent and in the same manner as if she were unmarried, but, except with the consent of her husband, she may not enter into or carry on any partnership business, unless her husband has abandoned or deserted her, or is an idiot or insane, or is confined in the penitentiary." Rev. Stat. Ill., 1874, p. 576.

A question arose in the State of New Jersey, as late as 1879, in regard to the liability of a married woman as surety for her husband, contracted in the State of Illinois, and the court of New Jersey, notwithstanding the express exception in their own law, held that the contract must be enforced according to the Illinois law, and that under the section above cited the wife was liable, and judgment was given accordingly. Wright v. Remington, 41 N. J. 51. In delivering the judgment, Justice Reed said: "The proviso contained in the fifth section of our married woman's act is absent from the Illinois statute, and there appears in the latter no restriction upon the contractual ability of the married woman to become endorser, surety or guarantor. Subject *to the exceptional instances of her engaging in partnership business, she is as unrestricted as a feme sole. There can, therefore, be no question but that the contract was valid by the law of Illinois. It is the duty of the courts of this state to recognize and enforce it unless it appears injudicious to the interests of the state or of our citizens. But nothing approaching this result can be deduced, solely from the fact that the foreign statute confers upon the married woman the power to make a contract of suretyship. That it would have been an act of legislative wisdom to have incorporated into the Illinois act a provision similar to that in our own and the New York State married woman's act, by which the married woman is restrained from assuming a liability as surety, I think the testimony in this case demonstrates. But whatever may be our opinion of the policy of legislation beyond our state we are bound by the principles of comity to recognize its validity," &c.

In Massachusetts, under the act of 1874, which provides that "a married woman may make contracts, oral and written, sealed and unsealed, in the same manner as if she were sole, except that she cannot 'convey' property to or make contracts with her husband," it has been held that a married woman was liable on a promissory note, although the consideration for the note was a debt of the husband. Major v. Holmes, 124 Mass. 108; Kenworthy v. Sawyer, 125 Mass. 28; Goodnow v. Hill et ux., 125 Mass. 588.

In Maine, under an act of 1866, declaring that "the contracts of any married woman made for any lawful purpose, shall be valid and binding, and may be enforced in the same manner as if she were sole," it was held "that a married woman was liable as surety on a note." Mayo v. Hutchinson, 57 Maine 547. In this case the court quaintly remarked "that the legislatures of this state have been gradually enlarging the rights and extending the liabilities of married women. The wisdom or expediency of the act is a matter solely for the legislature. Its language is not general, and there can be no reasonable doubt of its meaning. A contract of suretyship is a lawful contract, and for a lawful purpose. It is valid and binding on a married woman. The married defendant may have been indiscreet in entering *into it, but that is not the fault of the plaintiff. Almost all who sign as surety have occasion to remember the proverb of Solomon: 'He that is surety for a stranger shall smart for it; and he that hateth suretyship is sure.' But they are nevertheless held liable upon their contracts, otherwise there would be no smarting, and the proverb would fail."

In Kansas, under a like statute, it has been held that a married woman was liable on a note signed by her, and she was not permitted to allege that she did not intend to charge her separate estate. Derring v. Boyle, 8 Kansas 529; Wicks v. Mitchell, 9 Kansas 88.

In Ohio the act of 1866 makes the property of a married woman her separate estate, but no special power to contract is given; yet in the case of Williams v. Hancock, 35 Ohio St., decided in 1880, it was held that a married woman having a separate estate, may charge the same in equity by the execution of a promissory note for her husband or another. From the execution of the note a presumption arises that she thereby intends to charge her separate estate with its payment, (overruling Levis v. Earl, 30 Ohio St. 147, and Rice v. Railroad, 32 Ohio St. 380.)

In New York there is given to a married woman no express power to contract; but in the case of Manhattan Co. v. Thompson, 58 N. Y. 84, Judge Church seems to lament the absence of such power, in these striking words: "If, when the legislature changed the common law in essential particulars, in regarding the interests in property of the husband and wife to a considerable extent as distinct and independent, and in recognizing the capacity of the wife to judge and provide for what her welfare requires in acquiring and holding the legal title to property, and managing and disposing of the same as if unmarried, and without subjection to the control of the husband, the courts had adopted as a reasonable and legitimate sequence the corelative rule of capacity to contract debts as if unmarried, restricted only to their collection from separate property, it might well be claimed that the rights of married women would have been as well, if not better, protected practically, sound public policy and business morality more promoted, and a flood of expensive and vexatious litigation prevented." Mr. Wells, in commenting on *these views of Judge Church, remarks: "Manifestly, it must come to this everywhere."

In the case before us, Mrs. Campbell did not sign as surety for her husband, but for the firm of A. R. Campbell & Co., of which her son was a member. Therefore, none of the considerations of bad policy as to the wife's being allowed to sign as surety for her husband apply here. But, in considering the general subject, it is proper not to overlook the dangers of such a power under all circumstances.

It has been strongly urged upon us that to give a married woman the unrestricted right to bind herself by contract must result in the destruction of her separate estate; that, so far as her property is concerned, it will put her absolutely in the power of her husband, if not under his baronial authority, certainly under the influence of her affection for him; that every good wife will contribute her last cent to promote the success or to maintain the credit and honor of her husband. It is not for this court to consider the wisdom or policy of the law. That is exclusively for the legislative branch of the government. Our duty is simply to announce what the law is—not what it should be. It may not, however, be inappropriate to say that all the old confusion would at once follow the renewed effort to give the wife two inconsistent characters—that of a feme sole without disabilities as to the power to acquire and hold property, and that of a feme covert under disabilities as to the mode of charging that property and making it liable for her contracts. With every enlargement of the rights of a married woman should come a corresponding increase of her responsibilities. When they take the right to control their separate estates they assume the risks of such control. When the law gives them the privileges of separate individual citizens, they take with it the responsibilities and dangers of such citizens. Given the right to contract, they assume the liabilities of contractors. At first hardships may, in isolated instances, ensue from the inexperience of women in matters of business, but such hardships always arise upon any change in the rules of property or business.

We cannot refrain from making the further observation that if the apprehended consequences should to some extent follow *the radical change in the law, some compensation may be found in its tendency, from another direction, to restore the old condition of absolute unity in interest of husband and wife. In the language of Chancellor Wardlaw: "We trust it may never be considered improper for the wife to contribute, by all lawful means, to the success of her husband's enterprises. In many cases it is both politic and dutiful that such power should be exercised."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

CLINKSCALES v. HALL.

[1. Husband and Wife ⇐87.]

A married woman may be sued at law upon her personal contract entered into as surety for her husband, if it was based upon sufficient consideration, and was not procured by duress.

Before Pressley, J., Anderson, September, 1879.

The appeal in this case was from an order in supplementary proceedings commenced by Reuben Clinkscales, as administrator of Jeremiah Moore, under judgment obtained by the intestate in October, 1876. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Murray & Murray, for appellants.
Mr. J. C. C. Featherston, contra.

*November 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action on a note under seal, as follows:

One day after date we, or either of us, promise to pay Jeremiah Moore or bearer the sum of three hundred and seventy-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents, value received, with interest at twelve and a half per cent. yearly. Witness our hands and seals this January 31st, 1874.

J. G. Hall. [L. S.]
M. Jane Hall. [L. S.]

The signers of the note were both sued and judgment by default rendered against them. Judgment and execution were issued in the usual form. The sheriff returned the execution unsatisfied, and supplementary proceedings were taken against the defendant, M. Jane Hall, who was ordered to appear at Anderson Court-house on September 18th, 1879, to be examined and make discovery on oath concerning her property, &c. She employed counsel, and it then appeared, for the first time, that she was the wife of her co-defendant, J. G. Hall, neither the complaint nor judgment and execution having made any reference to that fact. The judgment was in the usual form against parties sui juris, and the execution contained the mandate "to satisfy the said judgment out of the personal property of the said M. Jane Hall within your county; or, if sufficient personal property cannot be found, then out of the real property in your county belonging to such judgment debtor, &c., * * * in whose hands soever the same may be," &c.

The attorney of Mrs. Hall advised her not to answer the interrogatories until it could be determined whether, as a married woman, she was liable. She was ruled to show cause why she should not be attached as for a contempt in refusing to answer touching her property. She answered the rule, disclaiming disrespect and assigning reasons for not answering interrogatories. The return was heard by Judge Pressley, who made the rule *absolute, and from that order Mrs. Hall appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because the defendant, M. Jane Hall, being a married woman, and having signed the note upon which the judgment in this case was obtained as surety for her husband, the whole proceedings, so far as they relate to her, are void ab initio.

"2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the judgment and execution in this case were valid, whereas he should have held that M. Jane Hall, being a married woman, the pleadings must show the fact, and such other facts as would charge her, under the statutes, as a married woman, and render her liable upon the contract sued on, and that the pleadings in this case having failed so to do, that the whole pleadings were absolutely null and void.

"3. Because the judgment and execution being without the authority of law, all subsequent proceedings under the same are absolutely null and void, and the defendant, M. Jane Hall, cannot be required by virtue of such proceedings to answer concerning her property under proceedings supplementary to execution.

"4. Because, if the pleadings were valid and the debt genuine and binding, his Honor erred in holding that the judgment and execution are valid, whereas they are contrary to the statutes of this state and null and void, and no proceeding can be had under them.

"5. Because his Honor erred in holding that a married woman can become a surety for her husband under the statute of this state, which provides that she may 'make a contract as if she were a feme sole.'

"6. Because the decision of his Honor is incorrect in that it enlarges the powers of married women beyond those allowed by the constitution of this state, and is repugnant to the provisions of said constitution relating to the property of married women."

The first, fifth and sixth exceptions insist that the proceedings were void "ab initio," for the reason that Mrs. Hall, being a married woman, had not capacity to bind herself by a personal contract upon which she could be sued in an ordinary action at law. In the case of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., ante p. 581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], this court held that under our late constitution and *laws, a married woman has capacity to bind herself by a personal contract just as if she were a feme sole. It is not necessary to repeat here the reasons for that judgment, to which reference is made. The consequence is that this plaintiff or his intestate had the right to sue the defendant at law, notwithstanding she was a married woman when she signed the note. It does not matter whether she gave it for property purchased by herself or as surety for her husband, only provided it was given on sufficient consideration and was not extorted under circumstances that would avoid any note upon the ground of duress. Wright v. Remington, 12 Vroom 41.

The second, third and fourth exceptions make the point that, even if the debt was legal and recoverable, the judgment and execution, not having the form required by law, are absolutely void, and, therefore, the supplemental proceedings based on them are also void. Under our law, as it stands at present, a married woman has the right to bind herself by a contract that may be sued to judgment against her, which is nominally a judgment in personam, yet in its character it is so far a judgment in rem that it can be enforced only against a particular kind of property. Subdivision 4 of Section 298 of the code of procedure, under the caption "Manner of Entering Judgment," provides that "in action brought by or against a married woman, judgment may be given against her as well for costs as for damages, or both for such costs and such damages, in the same manner as against other persons, to be levied and collected of her separate estate, and not otherwise." And in Section 310 it is declared that "an execution may issue against a married woman, and it shall direct the levy and collection of the amount of the judgment against her from her separate property, and not otherwise."

These provisions are identical with those upon the same subject in New York. In that state, however, the law does not give a married woman the general power to contract debts, but only in reference to her separate estate, and hence it was logical in that state to enforce such contracts only against her separate estate. In this state a married woman has larger powers—she may contract and be contracted with as if she were unmarried—and it would seem a proper sequence that in this state the judg*ment and execution should, in a corresponding degree, be more general in their tenor. Without regard to the difference in the laws of the two states as to the powers of a married woman to contract, our code follows that of New York as to the forms of judgment and process to collect. It may be that there is no great practical objection to this, as in this state all the property of a married woman is declared to be her separate property. But this consideration at least furnishes a reason why we should not be more exacting as to the insertion of the particular words in question than is thought necessary in the practice of that state.

It has been held in New York that "in case of a judgment against a married woman it shall be expressly stated therein that the amount is to be levied or collected out of her separate estate, and not otherwise, and the execution in its terms should follow the judgment." Baldwin v. Kinnell, 16 Abb. 353. But it has also been there held that the words prescribed by the code are merely directory and not necessary to the validity of an execution, which, even upon motion to set it aside, might be amended. Wait's Ann. Code 533; Thompson v. Sargent, 15 Abb. 452; Moncrief v. Wood, 25 How. Pr. 94. In the case last cited a motion was made to set aside an execution for costs against a married woman, which, in its terms, did not follow the words of the code, but was general. Judge Brady said: "The execution, however, was perhaps erroneous in form, not directing, as it ought to have done, the collection of the amount stated in it out of the separate estate of the plaintiff, but the error is not of any consequence."

The case of Thompson v. Sargent was very similar to this. Judgment was recovered by one Thompson against Lydia Sargent, a married woman. An execution in the ordinary form of executions against property was issued to the sheriff and returned unsatisfied. The plaintiff procured an order under the code for the examination of the judgment debtor, which, with the execution and return, the defendant moved to set aside, precisely as the appellant did in this case. Judge Clarke held as follows: "In the execution against a married woman, it is not necessary to its validity that it should contain the words contended for, [the same as here.] The words are merely directory. Of course the *sheriff cannot levy on any other property than the separate property, and unless the execution contains a contrary direction, there would be no danger that the sheriff would levy on any other. I hold, therefore, that the execution is valid. Being valid, I also hold that all provisions of the code in aid of or supplementary to the execution, apply to this execution as well as to any other." This would seem to be conclusive as to the case under consideration.

There is another view. The execution not being absolutely void could not be assailed in a collateral proceeding. The Circuit judge held that "when defendant permitted judgment to be entered against her by default, that had power to cure many serious defects, and he hesitated to declare the execution invalid in a collateral proceeding, no motion or other steps having been taken to set it aside." The principle announced is correct. Where parties allow judgment to go against them without defence, they cannot afterwards complain of that judgment. It is wise as a rule to sustain records when not assailed directly by proceedings instituted for that purpose. The rule is certainly general where the matters complained of are mere irregularities.

It might be otherwise if the record were absolutely void. In accordance with this principle, it has been held in a number of cases in New York that "in supplementary proceedings the validity of the judgment and execution could not be inquired into." O'Neil v. Martin, 1 E. D. Smith 415; Saunders v. Hall, 2 Abb. 418; Bank v. Sargeant, 53 Barb. 422. We are constrained to follow these cases.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

*No. 1010. BRATTON v. GUY. November Term, 1880.

[Covenants ⇐17.]

This is the same case which was before this court at April Term, 1879, and reported 12 S. C. 42. Upon its return to the Circuit Court, plaintiff introduced his deed, which "in consideration of the sum of five dollars and twenty cents per acre," conveyed "a tract of land containing one thousand and fifty-three acres." The words "more or less" usually added, do not appear in this deed. The covenant of warranty is in words following: "And we do hereby bind ourselves and our heirs, executors and administrators, to warrant and defend forever all and singular the said premises unto the said John S. Bratton, his heirs and assigns, against us and our heirs, and all other persons lawfully claiming, or to claim the same, or any part thereof." Plaintiff also proved a deficiency of twenty-eight acres in the quantity of this land, and some other matters immaterial to the point decided, and then rested. The Circuit judge (Mackey) granted a non-suit, upon the ground that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. Upon appeal, this court held that there was no ground for this appeal; that the deed contains a warranty only in the usual form, and that the consideration expressed of a specified price per acre does not convert this warranty into "such a special warranty, as might possibly, under the old form of pleading, support an action of debt;" and that the question here raised was substantially decided on the former hearing.

Upon the hearing of the appeal in this case at November Term, 1879, three counsel were heard for the appellants. The appeal was sustained, (13 S. C. 279), and in the taxation of costs the clerk of the Circuit Court allowed appellants, the plaintiffs, as disbursements, the expense of printing three points and authorities, one for each counsel heard, and $4 for copying the "case for the printer," in addition to the "making and serving case containing exceptions, $10." Upon appeal to the Circuit Court, this taxation was approved. This court say that they could not hold that there was error on the part of the taxing officer in exercising his judgment as to what was necessary, in the printing of the points and authorities, but that there was no authority for the item of $4 for copying case for the printer.

No. 1014. GANTT v. GANTT. November Term, 1880.

Rawls and Gantt jointly purchased a tract of land from Jones and gave bond and mortgage for the purchase money, and each of them made payments. In July, 1873, Gantt had paid $269.15 over and above the half of the aggregated payments, with interest. Jones then agreed to compromise balance for $1200, of which Gantt paid $398 and Rawls paid $486 [error of $16 here unaccounted for], thus entitling Gantt to receive from Rawls on that day $375.15 to equalize their payments. (Rawls claims that he had at that time some other outstanding demands against Gantt, arising out of other transactions.) By direction of Gantt, and with consent of Rawls, the bond and mortgage were assigned by Jones to the wife of Gantt, and Mrs. Gantt afterwards brought this action for foreclosure. Held—

[1. Mortgages ⇐256.]

That the mortgage was not satisfied as against Rawls.

[2. Husband and Wife ⇐49½.]

That the assignment would operate as a gift by Gantt to his wife of his interest in this mortgage valid between themselves, and binding upon Rawls, there being no creditors before the court.

[3. Mortgages ⇐256.]

That the assignee took the bond and mortgage subject to then existing equities of set-off in favor of Rawls against Gantt; but subsequent transactions between Rawls and Gantt could not be brought into the accounting in this action.

*That Mrs. Gantt not having appealed from the Circuit decree which fixed the amount due her at $698, with interest from the date of the assignment, that amount is assumed to be the extent of her claim, and should be paid out of the mortgaged premises with judgment against the defendants for any deficiency; but as between the defendants, each should be required to pay out of his interest in the land such sum as would equalize their payments, and adjust the equities existing between them.

No. 1026. WINSMITH v. WINSMITH. November Term, 1880.

[1. Costs ⇐13.]

In an equity suit, costs between the parties are wholly within the discretion of the court.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐1022.]

The finding of the referee, that there was no consideration to support a note, concurred in by the Circuit judge, confirmed, such finding not being without evidence to sustain it.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇐340.]

Action was brought by an administratrix to sell land in aid of assets, and creditors were called in; the administratrix, being herself a creditor, could as creditor object to the validity of a voluntary bond and mortgage given by her intestate, when presented for proof.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Werts v. Spearman, 22 S. C. 215; Spoon v. Smith, 36 S. C. 592, 15 S. E. 800.

[4. Executors and Administrators ⇐340.]

And she might, as administratrix, show that conditions have been performed which, under agreement made by the mortgagee with her intestate, operated as a release of the debt and security.

[5. Mortgages ⇐314.]

A written request, not under seal, made by a mortgagee to the register of mesne conveyances, to enter satisfaction on the record of the mortgage, was full authority to the register, and the entry made in pursuance of such request was an acknowledgment of the payment of the debt secured by the mortgage.

[6. Estoppel ⇐87.]

When a mortgagee by his conduct and declarations induces a creditor of the mortgagor to believe that the mortgage has been satisfied, and advises such creditor to take the mortgagor's notes for the debt due, such mortgagee will be estopped from afterwards asserting his mortgage as against the notes so taken.

[7. Fraudulent Conveyances ⇐113.]

A bond and mortgage which were taken with a secret trust for the debtor, are void as to his subsequent, as well as subsisting creditors.

No. 1029. MAXWELL v. THOMPSON. November Term, 1880.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1017.]

The reference to a referee to hear, determine and report all the issues in an action at law does not make it a case in chancery; the referee's report stands as a special verdict, and only the errors of law are reviewable in this court.

[2. Contracts ⇐127.]

A building contract provided that in case of any disagreement, the matter of difference should be referred to three disinterested persons as arbitrators; such agreement is not against public policy, but may be waived by the parties.

[3. Evidence ⇐461.]

The contract further provided: "One-half the openings to be counted in with brick excepting the front to be not measured in with brick work." Held, that this provision was not free from obscurity, and therefore the referee committed no error in receiving testimony of the surrounding circumstances and the usage of bricklayers, and the testimony of experts as to the meaning of the word 'front' as used at that place in like contracts, to enable him to understand what the contract really was.

No. 1032. CHILDS v. FRAZEE. November Term, 1880.

At the hearing of the former appeal in this case (No. 843, March 24th, 1880, unreported,) this court did not consider the merits, but simply adjudged that there was error in this case in ordering a re-sale before the balance due by the purchaser at the first sale upon the cash portion of her bid was ascertained.

[2. Judicial Sales ⇐27.]

A purchaser of property sold under decree of foreclosure is liable for interest on the unpaid portion of the amount that was required by the order of sale to be paid in cash.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. ⇐27.]

[3. Mortgages ⇐518.]

A purchaser of land under a decree of foreclosure having failed to comply, a re-sale was ordered, and pending appeal from this order, the land was re-sold and was purchased by the mortgagee, who took titles and receipted to the sheriff for the amount *of his bid, less the costs which he paid in cash; but upon the hearing of the appeal the order for re-sale was set aside as premature. Held, that this receipt of the mortgagee could not be claimed by the first purchaser as a credit upon the amount due on her unpaid bid.

[4. Costs ⇐13.]

Costs in an equity cause are in the discretion of the Circuit Court, and there appears in this case no abuse of that discretion.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Brown v. Brown, 44 S. C. 383, 22 S. E. 412.

[5. Mortgages ⇐370.]

A re-sale was again ordered to be made by the sheriff; whether the sheriff or the master was the proper officer to make this re-sale is a question which the purchaser at the first sale may raise only when sued for a deficiency; it cannot be made by her an objection to the order of sale.

[Railroads ⇐138.]

Where the cars of one railroad company were used by another with the mutual understanding at first that there was to be no charge for car service because of other advantages enjoyed by the owner of these cars from the connection between the two companies, then regarded a sufficient compensation, such owner must show when and how this understanding was changed before an implied contract to pay for the continued use of these cars will be raised, or remuneration for their use awarded to the car-owners.

No. 1042. VERNER v. JOHNS. April Term, 1881.

V. sold to A. & B. a tract of land and took their three notes payable in one, two and three years, and a mortgage of the land to secure the payment of the purchase money. A. & B. then conveyed to J., who afterwards gave his three notes to V., identical in date, time of payment, amounts, &c., the mortgage remaining open, and A. & B.'s notes were surrendered to them. Action was brought by V. after the first two notes were due, but before the third was payable, for foreclosure,

&c. The Circuit judge, upon testimony *taken ore tenus found that the mortgage was not satisfied, that the intention of the parties was that J. should take the land encumbered with the lien of this mortgage, and that he assumed the payment of the debt, and that his substituted notes were not taken in payment. On appeal this court approved these findings of fact, and held that there was nothing in this arrangement obnoxious to the statute of frauds.

Opinion by HUDSON, A. A. J., (in place of McGOWAN, A. J.,) June 24th, 1881. J. J. Norton, for appellant. W. C. Keith, contra.

No. 1049. BUTTZ v. CAMPBELL. April Term, 1881.

Action on money demand and judgment by default, in December, 1879. A few days afterwards and during the same term, defendant gave notice of motion to open the default, upon affidavits showing that his failure to answer had been caused by illness, and that he had a good defence. The motion was heard upon these affidavits, and upon counter-affidavits which raised a conflict of statement. The Circuit judge refused the motion, and defendant then excepted and gave notice of appeal, and two days after the rising of the court gave to plaintiff formal notice of appeal. Defendant claimed that the Circuit Court should have granted the motion under Section 197 of the code. Plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal, because no exception was served upon the respondent or the Circuit judge within ten days after the rising of the court. Held—

1. That there was no ground for the motion to dismiss the appeal.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐957.]

That no error of law was disclosed in the order refusing the motion to open the default, and it must, therefore, be assumed that the order was the result of the conclusion of the Circuit judge as to the weight of the evidence, a conclusion with which this court cannot interfere.

No. 1050. VOIGHT v. BRITTON. April Term, 1881.

The only point involved in this appeal is, whether a registration of voters was required for the municipal election held in the city of Charleston on October 6th, 1875. The commissioners of elec*tion decided that there was no law upon the statute book requiring such registration, and that therefore the commissioners of election could not direct it—that the act of September 25th, 1868, (14 Stat. 108), in so far as it relates to elections in the city of Charleston, was repealed by the act of February 26th, 1873, (15 Stat. 403.) On appeal taken directly to this court, it was held that there was no error of law in the decision of the commissioners.

Opinion by McGOWAN, A. J., July 8th, 1881. R. S. Tharin, for appellant. E. B. Seabrook, contra.

No. 1062. BLAKELEY & COPELAND v. FRAZIER. April Term, 1881.

This case was before this court on appeal at November Term, 1877, and may be found reported in 11 S. C. 122. Upon its second trial, the Circuit judge ruled that no additional testimony having been offered, he felt constrained by the opinion of this court to grant a non-suit. On appeal from that order, it was held that the order of non-suit upon the ground on which it was based, was erroneous; that this court did not intend, in its former opinion, to adjudicate upon the sufficiency of the testimony, but only to decide that the plaintiffs must prove that the amount paid by them had been overdrawn by Frazier, and that the award, legally construed, did not fix the amount.

The appellant moved for leave to amend his "case" by noting exceptions to rulings which he had overlooked until after the proper time had expired. The appeal was perfected prior to the act of December 24th, 1880, (17 Stat. 368.) Held, that this act did not reinstate rights which were lost before its passage, and that, under the act of December 19th, 1878, (16 Stat. 698), the motion must be refused.

No. 1063. JONES v. MASSEY. April Term, 1881.

After the decision of this court, reported in 14 S. C. 292, Judge Mackey passed an order restraining the sheriff of Lancaster county from putting James R. Massey into possession of the lands which he had elected to take under his mother's will. From that order this appeal was taken. Held, that Judge Mackey had misconstrued the opinion of this court, in regarding the possession of *this land as part of the statu quo intended to be preserved; that Massey's right to the land was not questioned, nor was that portion of the Circuit decree which ordered the possession to be restored to him interfered with; that Massey's right to the possession of this land has been fully adjudicated, and he should no longer be deprived of its enjoyment.

Opinion by SIMPSON, C. J., July 21st, 1881. Ernest Moore, for appellant. R. E. Allison, contra.

No. 1069. HOGG v. PINCKNEY. April Term, 1881.

[Appeal and Error ⇐632.]

Motion to restore to the docket an appeal dismissed by the clerk March 1st, 1881, under Rule VII., as then of force, the appellant having failed after notice requiring it, to serve upon the respondent three copies of his case as prepared for argument. But as that rule required the three copies to be served within twenty days after the return was filed, and as the return had not been filed when the notice was given, and no demand had been made under Rule II., as then of force, to have the return filed within ten days after such demand, the notice was premature, and entailed no waiver upon the appellant for non-compliance. Motion granted.

Opinion by SIMPSON, C. J., August 1st, 1881.

No. 1075. OSTENDORFF v. BROWN. April Term, 1881.

[1. Mortgages ⇐578.]

The rule laid down in Ivy v. Clawson, 14 S. C., on page 272, approved; but where, in an action for foreclosure, the case, by consent, is put upon calendar 1, to be submitted generally to a jury, and the judge orders foreclosure and sale upon the force alone of the verdict, this court will not disturb the judgment on this ground.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Peake v. Peake, 17 S. C. 427.

[2. Mortgages ⇐509.]

The Circuit Court may order the sale to be made within six months from the date of the order. Chapter CXVI., Section 2, of General Statutes, page 536, has no application to this case.

[3. Judicial Sales ⇐7.]

Since the masters' act of March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 609), all sales in the counties therein named, ordered by the court in equity cases, must be made by the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 20; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

4. This action was by an assignee, and the Circuit judge excluded testimony offered by defendant as to the relationship between plaintiff and his assignor. Fraud in the original contract was alleged in the answer, but no charge was made against *the plaintiff, and there was nothing in the case to show what relationship was meant. Held, that this court could not say that the Circuit judge was in error.

5. The judge's charge having probably induced the jury to believe that the assignee was not affected by the equities existing between his assignor and the defendant, a new trial was ordered.

Opinion by McGOWAN, A. J., September 12th, 1881. W. M. Thomas, for appellant. W. E. Klein, contra.

No. 1076. TALBOTT & SONS v. PARKER & CO. April Term, 1881.

Plaintiffs sold a steam-engine, corn-mill, &c., to one S., taking his notes, and a written agreement which the Circuit Court construed to be a chattel mortgage. Afterwards defendants recovered a judgment against S., and had this property levied upon as his property. Plaintiffs then brought action against the defendants and the sheriff, and obtained a verdict—the condition of the mortgage having been broken before action brought. The plaintiffs appealed, raising two points only, upon which this court held—

[1. Chattel Mortgages ⇐173.]

That it was not necessary for the plaintiffs to produce their notes to entitle them to recover, as the action was brought by the legal owners to recover the property, and their title was shown by the agreement, which was proved, and which showed the debt, whose existence was not, in terms, denied by the defendants.

[2. Chattel Mortgages ⇦173.]

That there was no error in the charge of the Circuit judge that "the production by the plaintiff of the mortgage was sufficient prima facie to prove that the debt secured thereby was unpaid," there being no allegation by defendants of payment. If such allegation had been made, it was incumbent upon the defendants to prove it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. ⇦173.]

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

*(Case No. 1082.)

DENT v. BRYCE.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION v. SAME.

[1. Evidence ⇐158.]

Where the law required the board of county commissioners to fix the rate of taxation for county purposes, and to certify the same to the county auditor, a notification to the auditor of the tax levy for county purposes, signed by the chairman of such board, is not, in support of a tax-title, the best proof of the action of the board, nor did it confer upon the auditor authority to make the tax levy indicated.

[2. Schools and School Districts ⇐103.]

But where the law prescribed no special mode of action in the matter of a school tax, and did not direct the manner of notification to the auditor, a circular directing a tax levy for school purposes, signed by the school commissioner and addressed to the auditor, is sufficient authority for the levy of such school tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. § 242; Dec. Dig. ⇐103.]

[3. Appeal and Error ⇐842.]

* Whether a special tax has been directed by the vote of a school district is a question of fact for the jury, and cannot be considered by this court.

[4. Evidence ⇐366.]

A circular purporting to have been issued from the comptroller-general's office should not be permitted to go to the jury as evidence, without proof that the signature of the comptroller-general thereto is genuine.

[5. Evidence ⇐183.]

A county treasurer having testified that he had searched his office, where tax executions were generally filed, for the executions issued by his predecessor, but could not find them, there was no error in receiving as evidence the county treasurer's execution book to show that the taxes on the lands sold, and here in dispute, were unpaid, and that executions therefor had been issued and returned unsatisfied.

[6. New Trial ⇐66.]

A verdict being rendered which the trial judge had charged the jury as matter of law that they could not render, his refusal to vacate it on motion for new trial was error. The jury are the judges of the facts, but they must take the law of the case from the judge's charge, which they are bound to follow whether right or wrong.

[7. New Trial ⇐155.]

The motion being in substance to vacate the verdict, was properly heard when made, although designated a motion on the minutes for a new trial.

[This case is also cited in State ex rel. Hagood v. Thompson, 18 S. C. 542, as to what is best evidence of an assessment.]

Before Thomson, J., Richland, April, 1879.

These were two actions heard together.

The first, Jesse E. Dent against Sarah H. Bryce, was an action to recover a lot of land in the city of Columbia; the second, The Mechanics' and Farmers' Building and Loan Association, of Richland, against the same defendant, was an action to recover the Bluff plantation, six miles below Columbia, in Richland county. This city lot and plantation were both forfeited to the State of South Carolina, for want of bidders, at a delinquent land sale made by the treasurer of Richland county, on June 5th, 1876, for the unpaid taxes of 1874 and 1875, due by Sarah H. Bryce as owner of this property, and were sold as forfeited lands by the State, through the treasurer of Richland, on November 30th, 1876, and were purchased by the plaintiffs, respectively, who received each a grant dated December 1st, 1876, under the seal of the State, and signed by "Daniel H. Chamberlain, governor, S. C."

The taxes unpaid and for which, together with penalties and costs, this real estate was sold, included a county tax of four mills, and a school tax of one mill. The county tax was *inserted in the tax duplicate under the authority of the notification from E. M. Weston, chairman, stated in the opinion of this court. The signature and official character of Weston were duly proven, but no other evidence was introduced to show action by the board of county commissioners. The only authority for the school tax was the following circular:

Office of School Commissioner,
Columbia, S. C., October 23d, 1874.

A. L. Solomon, County Auditor:

Dear Sir—There are five school districts in the county that have levied a district school tax:

School district No. 1.....One mill.
School district No. 2.....One mill.
School district No. 3.....One mill.
School district No. 4.....One mill.
School district No. 5.....Not any.
School district No. 6.....One mill.
School district No. 7.....Not any.
School district No. 8.....Not any.
School district No. 9.....Not any.

But you can do as you did last year; you can make a general levy of one mill on a dollar, on all taxable property in this county, for school purposes. I have the honor of being, Your obedient servant,

D. N. Simonds, School Commissioner, R. C.

The signature and official character of Simonds were duly proven.

Plaintiffs offered in evidence the original return of Sarah H. Bryce, made August 13th, 1873, which included this plantation and city lot, whose assessment was increased by the board of equalization, and, also, personal property to the amount of $1,694.

W. H. Gibbes, witness for plaintiffs, testified that he was county treasurer of Richland, and that tax executions were gen*erally filed in his office, but were not preserved with care; that he had made diligent search for the executions against Mrs. Bryce for the taxes of 1874–75, but could not find them; that the treasurer's execution book showed that two executions had been issued against the personal property of Mrs. Bryce for said taxes, and were returned unpaid and unsatisfied.

In the settlement of the case, the presiding judge reports his charge, and the motion for new trial, order thereon, &c., as follows:

The court will now call the attention of the jury to certain points made by the defense, being in the nature of exception to the proofs of the plaintiffs.

1. The want of power on the part of the assessors to assess the land in 1874 at a higher value than that contained in the defendant's listing or return, the defendant denying the right of the assessors to increase the valuation. Provision was made by the A. A. 1874 for a county board of equalization, giving them power to enter land on the tax list at its true value. This is the action objected to, which seems to the court without force.

2. Exception was taken to the levy of the tax of 1873 in relation to the school purpose. The defendant claims that there were no meetings of the taxpayers in the different school districts in Richland county, except in School District No. 1. You have heard the testimony of Mr. Agnew and others as to such meetings held here. You are without proof of actual meetings being held in the other school districts of the county. If there were no meetings in the school districts it would affect the title. If no meetings were held, then no school tax could be levied: or if meetings were held and not formally conducted, and a sale made thereunder for taxes, the title would be defective; a very small tax illegally levied (laid on) would vitiate the title. If you find such meetings were not held, the court instructs you the title is defective. The question of meetings, however, is one of fact, and for the jury.

3. Objection has been made, that a paper signed by E. M. Weston (without seal), chairman of county commissioners, directing a levy for county purposes and new court house, was informal and defective. Whether

Weston is chairman of board *of county commissioners or not, is a question of fact for you, though the evidence that he was seems to be abundant and unimpeached.

4. The property in question belonged to the defendant. She took the same under her husband's will. The title vested in her, subject to payment of debts. I instruct you, she is the owner of the property, at least in the sense which renders it subject to taxation in her hands.

5. There was no proof by the production of the papers that executions against the defendant had been issued for the payment of taxes. I instruct you, that if there was personal property sufficient to pay the taxes on the real estate, it should have been exhausted first and the land not returned as delinquent. It was the duty of the officer to levy on the personal estate before resorting to the real estate. This is a question of fact for the jury. If the jury come to the conclusion that there was personal property enough to pay the taxes, the land was improperly returned as delinquent. In 1873, there was considerable personal property—more than enough to pay the taxes at that time. If, when the executions were issued, there was personal property to have satisfied them, you should find for the defendant.

The grants in these cases were executed by the governor to the plaintiffs. The practice seems to have fluctuated since 1871. According to the Revised Statutes, the State became the purchaser on the same terms as a private individual. When a sale was made, the governor was required to issue the patent and the title then vested. The act of 1874 changed this. It declares that the land shall be forfeited and remain in the State until sold as forfeited real estate, and I infer that the auditor should make the deed. This was amended or changed by the act of 1875, which requires the governor to sign the patent. Under the act of 1876, it is clear the governor should not sign the patent. The lands in these cases were sold under the act of 1876, and I think the county treasurer should have made the title. The governor has no right, under this act, to convey the land. As a question of law, I instruct you, the grants do not convey the lands to the plaintiffs, and it follows your verdict should be for the defendant.

*The court was requested to instruct the jury, that if there was a meeting in School District No. 1, a failure to hold meetings in the other school districts of the county could not affect the title in School District No. 1. The court instructed the jury, that if there was a levy of a school tax for the whole county, and if any school district had held no meeting, that would vitiate the title.

The jury found verdicts for the plaintiffs in both cases.

Upon the rendering of the verdict, the defendant's counsel gave notice of a motion for new trial upon the minutes of the court. These motions were afterwards heard and refused, as appear by the orders below in this case.

The motion for new trials was urged upon several grounds, but chiefly upon the ground that the verdicts were against the charge of the presiding judge. This is correct, and had the court continued to construe the law to be as it was stated to the jury, new trials would have been granted. But after argument of counsel, and a further examination of the tax acts, since 1870 to the present time, than could be had on the trial, the court is of opinion that the governor was the party to issue the deeds or patents, and that in this respect the parties' titles were good.

The jury having solved the other questions in the case in favor of the plaintiffs, new trials were refused.

The case was brought by defendant to this court by a simple notice of appeal from the order refusing a new trial, and upon the exceptions to testimony taken during the trial.

Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Mr. E. R. Arthur, for appellant.

The board of equalization could act only in 1870, and every fifth year thereafter. Const. Art. IX. § 6. No proof that an execution against real estate was ever issued. Abbott's Tr. Ev. 703, 704. No county tax was levied. 14 Stat. 274, § 3; Blackf. 98. The circular is not signed by a majority of the board, nor attested by the clerk, nor under seal, and does not profess to be under resolution. tax levied. 14 *Stat. 584. Part of tax being illegal, the sale is void. Black. Tax T. 160. The charge of the judge was the judgment of the court, and could be reviewed here, but was binding upon the jury. Const. Art. IV. § 4. It was the duty of the judge to construe the grants or patents. 3 S. C. 253; 6 Ibid. 351; Hill. New Tr. 326; 24 Geo. 372; Stark. Ev. 797. All of the exceptions here are too general to be considered. 3 Wait's Pr. 205.

Mr. J. P. Arthur, in reply.

September 20th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. These two cases were heard together on appeal, and as they involve the same questions, but one opinion will be pronounced.

*The questions involved arise upon exceptions to the rulings of the Circuit judge upon the testimony offered at the trial and upon the refusal of the Circuit judge to grant a new trial, the defendant being the appellant in both cases. The actions were brought to recover real property, the plaintiffs in both cases claiming title under a tax sale, to support which they introduced a patent executed by D. H. Chamberlain, then governor of the State, conveying the land in dispute, and reciting that it had been sold to plaintiffs by Darling, the treasurer of Richland county, as forfeited land, on the 1st day of December, 1876. The patent recited the various acts under which the land had become forfeited. The plaintiffs, feeling it incumbent upon them to make out a complete title, undertook to show that all the steps necessary to forfeit the land had been taken by the proper officers previous to the sale at which they purchased, and that the sale had been conducted according to law. To this end, their testimony was directed, among other points, to the following: First, that a proper levy of county taxes had been made and ordered by the county commissioners; second, that the school commissioner had also levied a proper tax; third, that the county treasurer had conducted the sale under legal regulations from the comptroller-general; and fourth, that previous to the sale, executions had been issued to sell personalty, which had been returned unsatisfied. There were other points, but they need not be considered.

To prove the first point, a paper purporting to be a circular from E. M. Weston, chairman of the board of county commissioners of Richland county, directing the county auditor to levy a tax of four mills for county purposes, was offered. This paper was signed by E. M. Weston, as chairman of the board, and was without seal. To prove the second, a similar paper, purporting to come from the school commissioner, D. N. Simonds, was offered. To prove the third, a circular purporting to come from Thomas C. Dunn, comptroller-general was offered; and to prove the fourth, Mr. W. H. Gibbes, treasurer of Richland county at the time of the trial, was allowed to show from the books in his office that executions had been issued and returned unsatisfied. Mr. Gibbes introduced the execution book. He testified that he *had made diligent search for the original executions, but could not find them, and he was satisfied, from the tax duplicate and the entries in the execution book, that the executions were issued and had been returned unsatisfied, as there was no evidence of payment. The defendant objected to all of this testimony, upon grounds which will be considered in their order.

The judge charged the jury, as matter of law, that the governor had no legal power to execute the patents, and, on that account, he instructed them that their verdict should be for the defendant. Notwithstanding this positive charge upon a matter of law, the jury found for the plaintiffs. The defendant moved for a new trial. This motion was urged upon several grounds, but chiefly because the verdict was rendered against the charge of the judge. The judge refused the motion, saying in substance that, upon reflection and a more thorough examination of the tax acts, he had become satisfied that the governor was the proper officer to issue the deeds or patents in such cases; and inasmuch as the jury had followed the law, although against instructions, he would refuse the motion for a new trial. We have nothing to do with the questions of fact involved in the case. This is not a case in chancery, but a case at law, and our jurisdiction is confined entirely to errors of law, if any, on the part of the Circuit judge, brought before us by exceptions.

Was it error on the part of the Circuit judge to admit as evidence the paper purporting to be a paper signed by E. M. Weston, chairman of the county commissioners, to show that a levy of four mills had been directed by that board? The point that this paper was without seal did not appear in the "case" when first made up, but the case was amended afterwards by leave of the Circuit judge. This was objected to by the respondent at the time, but this objection has not been urged here, and it will not be necessary to consider it.

Formerly the power to assess taxes for county purposes was vested in the county commissioners. See Act of 1869, 14 Stat. 274; Gen. Stat. p. 148, § 10. Their warrant of assessment, signed by the county commissioners, with the seal of the county, certified by the clerk, was the treasurer's authority to collect the taxes thus levied. 14 Stat. 237;

15 Stat. 274, 407. In the *absence of this warrant, thus prepared and verified under the act of 1869, it would have been illegal for the treasurer to act. The act of 1869, however, was repealed by the act of 1873, and a change made in the mode of assessing and collecting both State and county taxes thereafter. Act 1873, 15 Stat. 479. By this last act the rate per centum of taxes for State purposes was fixed by the Legislature. 15 Stat. 515, 657; 16 Stat. 9, 286, 549.

This scheme was in force in 1874, when the taxes which have given rise to this case accrued; and under the act to raise supplies for the fiscal year commencing 1st November, 1874, § 8 (15 Stat. 658), a maximum of three mills in each of the counties in the State was provided for, the exact rate to be fixed by the county commissioners, and by them to be certified to the county auditor. It was necessary for the plaintiffs in these cases to prove that this rate for the county of Richland had been fixed by the county commissioners, and that it had been certified by them to the county auditor. The precise question between the parties as to this point was whether any rate of taxation had been fixed by the county commissioners and had been certified by them to the county auditor. The burden of proving this fact was assumed by the plaintiffs, and the circular of E. M. Weston was permitted by the judge to be introduced for that purpose. This circular is as follows:

"A. L. Solomon, County Auditor, Columbia, S. C.:

"Sir—You are hereby notified to levy for current county expenses three mills, and for the new court house one mill, upon all property, real and personal, returned for taxation in Richland county."

(Signed) "E. M. Weston,
"Chairman Board C. C."

It is a general rule of evidence that the best evidence which the nature of the question admits of must be introduced. This rule admits secondary evidence, where the party has shown that it is out of his power to produce primary. We think that the admission of this paper violated this general rule.

The act of the general assembly required that the rate of *taxation for county purposes should be fixed by the county commissioners, and should be certified by them to the county auditor. The question at issue was, had the rate of county taxes been thus fixed and certified? Now, was this note of the chairman of the county commissioners, addressed to the auditor, the best evidence which that question admitted of? It required the action of the board, as an organic body to fix the rate. This action should have been expressed by resolution or in some other way, showing the assent of the board, or a majority of them. The note of the chairman did not show that the board as a body had taken any action whatever on the subject. It is simply a notification from himself directing the auditor to levy the rate therein specified. The best or primary evidence which this fact required was the production of the proceedings of the board. If this was out of the power of the plaintiffs, then the way would have been open for the introduction of secondary evidence. And upon proof of this fact such secondary evidence as was within the reach of the plaintiffs might have been relied on; but there was no attempt to show, even prima facie, that the plaintiffs had exhausted all effort to produce the action of the board, or that any had been taken. The plaintiffs rested their case, as to this point, upon the note of the chairman alone. This, under the facts, we think was not only insufficient but incompetent at that stage of the case, and there was error in admitting it.

The act of 1874 not only requires that the rate of taxation shall be fixed by the county commissioners, but also, when fixed, that it shall be certified by them to the county auditor. This contemplates some regular proceedings, in such shape as to be the subject of a separate certificate, and the auditor had no authority to act until he received this certificate. As has been said, the primary evidence would have been the production of these original papers. If proof had been offered that these papers were out of the reach of the plaintiffs, the foundation would have been laid for the introduction of secondary evidence, and then possibly as secondary evidence this note of Weston might have been introduced. But even then, if this paper was intended to prove that the tax had been levied by the county *commissioners, it would amount to no more than a written declaration of Weston that the board had taken this action. It would be proving by the parties who testified to Mr. Weston's signature that Mr. Weston, by written declaration, had said that the board had levied the taxes, which he directed the county auditor to have collected. In this view it would be objectionable as hearsay, and therefore incompetent.

The exception of appellant as to the note of the school commissioner is not as well taken. The school commissioner had no power to direct a levy until authorized by a vote of the township. Whether this vote had been taken, was a question of fact to be passed upon by the jury and is not before this court. The question here is whether the paper in question was competent evidence to the point that a levy had been directed by the school commissioner. The act prescribes no special mode of action on the part of the school commissioner, nor does it direct the manner of notification to the treasurer. In the absence of all statutory regulations on the subject, we think any written communication by the school commissioner to the treasurer, directing the levy, would be sufficient. In this case the original paper, after proof of the signature of the school commissioner, was introduced. We see no error in permitting this paper to go to the jury.

The Dunn circular stands upon a different ground. That was introduced by the respondents to account for the fact that the lands had been sold at a different time from that prescribed by the act in reference to the sale of forfeited lands. The comptroller-general, it appears, was empowered by a special act—"An act to provide for extending the time of holding delinquent land sales in the several counties of the State," 15 Stat. 936—to change the time of making these sales; and, by virtue of his powers under this act, it was alleged that he had fixed the time for these sales at a different time from that required by the general act on this subject. And this circular was offered and admitted to prove this fact. It purported to come from the comptroller-general's office, but there was no proof that the signature attached was genuine. In the absence of such proof, it had no foundation to go to the jury as an official paper, and we *think it was error on the part of the Circuit judge to admit it in that form.

We see no error in the ruling of the Circuit judge as to the evidence of Mr. Gibbes on the subject of the executions. Mr. Gibbes proved that he had looked for the original executions but could not find them. The execution book of the treasurer was then introduced, to show by the entries therein that these executions had been issued and had been returned unsatisfied. Mr. Greenleaf, vol. 1, p. 483, says that books "kept by persons in a public office, in which they are required, whether by statute or by the nature of their office, to write down particular transactions occurring in the course of their public duties, * * * are generally admissible in evidence, notwithstanding their authenticity is not confirmed by those usual and ordinary tests of truth, the obligation of an oath and the power of cross-examining the person on whose authority the truth of the documents depends." This book, we think, belonged to that class. True, it indicated higher and better evidence, to wit, the original execution, but these were lost or mislaid, and it was not in the power of the plaintiffs to produce them. The book then became secondary evidence, which, under the rule, was admissible.

This brings us to the last ground of exception—the refusal of the judge to grant a new trial.

The plaintiffs relied upon the deed or patent executed by the governor. This paper involved two questions—first, the authority of the governor to execute such a paper; and, second, the fact of execution. The first was a question of law and the second a question of fact. To entitle the plaintiffs to recover, it was necessary that these questions should be resolved in their favor, because without this—let the other facts of the case be as they might—the defendant was entitled to the verdicts. The court was the judge of the question of law and the jury of the question of fact. Under our system this is the case in all jury trials. The court decides the questions of law and the jury the facts. The value of this system depends greatly upon the preservation of this distinction. The functions of each should not only be preserved intact, but should be kept separate and apart. So important was this regarded by the founders of our judicial *system that it was expressly provided in the fundamental law of the State government—the constitution—that the judges should not only be limited to questions of law, but should be forbidden to comment on the facts. True, there is no such express inhibition upon the jury invading the province of the court, but this, no doubt, was because such invasion was not supposed possible.

It needs no authority, then, to say that the jury is bound to take the law from the court. This principle applies in every class of cases, except one not necessary now to be considered. And when the law is announced by the court it is the law of the case until overruled by a higher authority. It follows, then, that a verdict in direct conflict with the law of the court is a verdict against the law, and will in all cases be vacated in the first instance, either sua sponte by the judge, or on motion of the aggrieved party. Any other doctrine would lead to the utmost confusion. If the jury could question the charge of the judge, the result would be that in every case the whole case, both law and facts, would go to the jury, under the hope that, whatever might be the charge of the judge at the time, he could be satisfied afterwards that he was in error. This could not be tolerated. It would degrade the judiciary and unhinge the whole system. The argument of the respondent, by which he attempts to draw a distinction between a verdict contrary to the charge of the judge and one contrary to law, though ingenious, fails to meet the case. In fact, that doctrine would open the door to the very evil which a separation of the powers and duties of the court and jury was intended to prevent. So far as the jury is concerned, there is no such thing as the charge of the judge being contrary to law, because, whatever may be his charge, it is the law to them.

The question before the court is not whether the governor was authorized to issue the patent—and we have not considered that question—but whether the judge should have set aside the verdicts, which, as matter of law, he had directed the jury they could not render. In our opinion it was error on his part not to vacate their verdicts. Whether this motion was properly made to the court below on the minutes of the judge, under the code, we think is not material here. The motion was, in substance, to vacate the *verdicts as contrary to the law given to the jury by the court, and it was in order for the judge to hear it when made.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

MOORE v. HOLLAND.

[1. Interest ⇐38.]

A note was executed in 1867 for $2,000, payable at one day, with interest at sixteen per cent. per annum, and, at the same time judgment was confessed thereon for the same amount, with interest at the same rate; judgment was entered five days afterwards for the debt so confessed, without specifying any rate of interest, and execution of fi. fa., in usual form, was issued. Held, in action by junior lien creditors of the defendant to the confession, that the rate of interest due on the judgment was regulated by the act of 1866, § 2, (13 Stat. 439,) and not by the agreement of the parties, and that the judgment bore only seven per cent. interest.

[2. Payment ⇐42.]

Payments made and entered as credits "in part of this case," must be so credited by the court, and cannot be applied in extinguishment of the higher rate of interest stipulated for in the confession.

Section 313 of the Code of Procedure, adopted in 1870, declaring that final judgments thereafter rendered, should not, of themselves, constitute a lien upon real or personal property, but that such lien might be obtained by levy, &c., did not impair the obligation of contracts entered into prior to its passage.

*Mr. B. W. Bettis, Jr., for Markert, appellant.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for R. G. M. Dunovant.

September 20th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. To a proper understanding of the questions of law involved in this case it will be necessary to insert the Circuit decree of Judge Mackey. This is the more important as a full statment of the facts of the case will also be found in this decree compactly stated.

It is as follows:

Decree of Court.

On the 4th of January, 1858, R. G. M. Dunovant having been duly appointed guardian of Mary C. Brooks, who afterwards intermarried with George B. Addison, entered into bond to the then commissioner in equity in the penal sum of $25,000, conditioned for the faithful performance of his trust as guardian, with Thomas Lake, W. N. Moore and Z. W. Carwile as sureties thereto.

On the 21st May, 1868, the said George B. Addison and wife filed their bill in the Court of Equity against the said R. G. M. Dunovant, as guardian, and his sureties, praying for an account and settlement. And on the 11th of March, 1870, a decretal order was passed in the said case in favor of the said George B. Addison and wife for the sum of $2,000.

On the 28th December, 1873, the said George B. Addison and wife assigned the said decree to Martha C. Brooks, and the same was, on the 2d January, 1878, assigned, one-half to the heirs at law of Dr. Thomas Lake, and the other half to the heirs at law of W. N. Moore, deceased.

The referee reports as due on said decree, on the 1st October, 1879, the sum of $2,403.62, of which sum $1,955.55 is principal, bearing interest, and the balance accumulated interest and costs.

On the 25th February, 1867, the said R. G. M. Dunovant executed his bond to James M. Richardson, whereby he covenanted, one day after the date thereof, to pay to the said

James *M. Richardson or bearer the sum of $2,000 in currency, with interest thereon from date, at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum.

Suit was brought on said bond on the same day, to wit, the 25th February, 1867, by James M. Richardson; and on the declaration the following endorsement was entered by the said R. G. M. Dunovant, to wit:

"I confess judgment in this case to James M. Richardson, the plaintiff, in the sum of $2,000, with interest thereon from the 25th day of February, A. D. 1867, in currency, at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum; and consent that judgment be entered up and execution be issued against me, without delay, this 25th February, 1867.

"R. G. M. Dunovant.

"Test—J. F. Cason."

Judgment in said suit was signed and enrolled on March 2d, 1867, in the following words, to wit:

"And the said R. G. M. Dunovant, the defendant, comes and defends the wrong and injury when, &c., and says he cannot deny the action of the said James M. Richardson, the plaintiff, nor, but that the said writing obligatory is the deed of him the said defendant, but that he owes to the plaintiff the said sum of $2,000 above demanded, in manner and form as the said plaintiff hath above thereof complained against him. Therefore it is considered that the said plaintiff, James M. Richardson, do recover against the said R. G. M. Dunovant, the defendant, his said debt, and also $16.12½, for his damages which he hath sustained, as well on occasion of the detaining the said debt as for his costs and charges by him about his suit in this behalf expended, by the said court, before the justices thereof, now here adjudged to the ——— ——— and with his assent; and be the said defendant in mercy, &c.

"Abney & Wright,

"Plaintiff's Attorneys."

Fi. fa. was issued on the said judgment on the said 2d March, 1867. The said execution and judgment were assigned to *Bennett Holland by the said James M. Richardson. The sums of $562 and $960 were paid on the said judgment on the 5th January, 1869, and on the 5th February, 1872, respectively, and the receipt thereof acknowledged on the sheriff's books in the following words, to wit:

*19

"Received of the defendant $562 in part of this case, 5th January, 1869.

"Bennett Holland."

"Received of the defendant $960 in part of this case, 5th February, 1872.

"Bennett Holland."

The referee reports the sum of $1,745.47 due on the 1st October, 1879, of which $1,136.60 is principal, bearing interest.

On the 25th of December, 1871, R. G. M. Dunovant having been appointed guardian of his three children, William L., Robert L., and Carrie P., executed his bond to D. L. Turner, then Probate judge, in the penal sum of $7,000, conditioned for the faithful discharge of his trust as guardian, and on the same day, to supply the place of personal sureties to the said bond, he executed to the said D. L. Turner, Judge of Probate, a mortgage of the following described tract of land, to wit:

"All that tract of land containing four hundred and thirty-seven and one-half acres, more or less, bounded by lands of James Cresswell and others, said lands having been conveyed by Whit. Brooks to the said R. G. M. Dunovant, the 29th of October, 1851. Also, a portion of the Anna Williams tract, containing three hundred acres, more or less, to be cut off adjacent to tract above described."

This mortgage was not recorded until the 21st of December, 1876.

The referee reports due on this claim on the 1st of October, 1879, the sum of $2,241.48, of which amount the sum of $1,637.05 is principal, bearing interest.

On the 9th day of June, 1874, a verdict was rendered against *R. G. M. Dunovant, in the Court of Common Pleas, in favor of the defendants, Butler & Youmans, but judgment thereon was not entered up until the 30th of January, 1877.

The referee reports the sum of $286.46 due on said judgment on the 1st of October, 1879, of which sum $208.90 is principal, bearing interest.

On the 25th of January, 1875, the said R. G. M. Dunovant, to secure the payment of $1,526.25, with interest at the rate of eighteen per cent. per annum, executed to M. A. Markert a mortgage of the following described tract of land, to wit:

"All and singular a certain tract or parcel of land situate, lying and being in the county of Edgefield, and said State, containing seven hundred acres, more or less, the same being a portion of the Reeves, Martin and Williams tract of land to me belonging, bounded by lands of the estate of Whitfield Brooks, lands of W. H. Holloway, lands of Kinard, lands of George A. Addison, lands of Henry May, lands of D. C. Bullock, and other lands of the said R. G. M. Dunovant."

This mortgage was recorded on 26th of January, 1875.

The referee reports the sum of $2,728.73 due on said mortgage debt on the 1st of October, 1879, of which sum $1,770.43 is principal, bearing interest.

On the 29th of May, 1876, the said R. G. M. Dunovant, to secure the payment of $950, with interest, executed a mortgage to B. F. Yoe, of a tract of land situate in the county of Edgefield, containing twelve hundred and fifty acres, more or less, and adjoining lands of G. W. Holloway, estate of Whitfield Brooks, lands of D. C. Bullock, lands of Henry May, Calvin Kinard and others.

This mortgage was not recorded until 27th of December, 1876.

The referee reports the sum of $1,179.13 due on said mortgage on the 1st of October, 1879, of which sum $988.80 is principal, bearing interest.

Several parties have become interested, by assignment, in this last mortgage since its execution. But there is no question before the court as to the ownership of the above claims.

The tract of land described in the mortgage to B. F. Yoe, is *the only property of the said R. G. M. Dunovant liable to levy and sale, and embraces the lands described in the mortgage to D. L. Turner, Probate judge, and in addition thereto four or five hundred acres more.

The land described in the mortgage to D. L. Turner, Probate judge, embraces the tract of land described in the mortgage to M. A. Markert, and in addition thereto about one hundred acres more.

On the 9th day of January, 1877, the whole of the lands of the said R. G. M. Dunovant, which are encumbered by said mortgages, were levied on under execution issued on the judgment in favor of James M. Richardson, and afterwards assigned to Bennett Holland. And in the year following the plaintiffs herein served their complaint setting forth the above facts, and alleging, among other things, that the said R. G. M. Dunovant invested the trust funds of his ward, Mary C., wife of George B. Addison, in the lands described in the complaint, and demanded judgment:

1. That the defendants, Bennett Holland and John T. Gaston, sheriff, their servants and agents, be enjoined and restrained from selling the lands of the said R. G. M. Dunovant as advertised under the levy made by the said John T. Gaston, sheriff, as aforesaid, and that the other defendants, their servants and agents, be also enjoined and restrained from attempting to enforce their liens on the said land.

2. That the lands purchased by the said R. G. M. Dunovant with the moneys of his ward, Mary C. Addison, be adjudged to be specifically liable for the payment of the judgment of said plaintiffs.

3. That the priority of the liens of the judgments and mortgages above set forth may be adjudicated. * * *

4. For their costs and disbursements in this action, and for such other and further relief in the premises as to equity may belong.

On the 22d day of March, 1879, it was referred, by order of this honorable court, to S. S. Tompkins, Esq., to take the testimony, to ascertain and state the amounts due on each claim and report the same.

*On the 2d of October, 1879, the said referee filed his report, reporting, among other things, the above stated amounts as due on the said claims respectively on the first day of October, 1879.

No exceptions to the referee's report were filed by any of the parties, except by the defendant Holland, whose exceptions are substantially as follows, to wit:

1. That the referee in computing the amount due on the judgment in favor of James M. Richardson, and assigned to Bennett Holland, erred in not calculating interest on the said judgment at the rate of sixteen per centum per annum.

2. That the referee erred in not reporting that the amounts paid on said judgment were paid as interest, and not as a part of the judgment.

The law and the evidence considered, it is the opinion of the Court:

That the exceptions filed by the defendant, Bennett Holland, must be overruled. The note with all its incidents, including its power of accretion, or interest-bearing quality, merged in the judgment. Free. Judg.

A judgment at common law bore no interest. Free. Judg. § 441; [Warrington v. Glenn] 1 Hill 79. And it is not capable of being impressed with any higher or lower rate of interest than that which the statute stamps upon it.

The act of 1866 enacts: "That in all money decrees and judgments of courts of law and equity hereafter enrolled or entered, * * * the legal interest shall be and remain at the rate of seven per centum per annum." 13 Stat. 429.

The judgment is not a confession of judgment. 6 Stat. 160, §§ 1, 2; 11 Stat. 72, 75; 3 Blackstone *395. It is a consent judgment by the court. But under our statutes there can be no difference in the grades of judgments as to the matter of interest. The judgment cannot be considered as a contract, for a contract in its final analysis made by debtor with creditor, is but a right of action conveyed by the debtor to the creditor, and the right of action ceases with the judgment, which is but the sentence of the law pronounced by the court. If the contract or note upon which the judgment is based had borne no rate of interest, still the judgment would bear interest at the legal rate of seven per *centum per annum. So the judgment could not bear a higher rate of interest, even though the note bore a rate exceeding seven per centum per annum. The other position of the defendant Holland, is equally untenable. He receipted for the two sums of money in part payment. These receipts were endorsed upon the sheriff's books, and were notice to third parties who could not be prejudiced by any private contract that might have existed between the judgment debtor and judgment creditor. But the evidence does not show that any contract that the judgment should bear sixteen per cent. interest existed, nor does it show that the payments were made under any contract to pay sixteen per cent. interest in consideration of forbearance. No doubt the judgment creditor and judgment debtor were under the impression that the legal effect of the judgment was to bear sixteen per cent. interest, and this alone would have prevented them from making any additional contract in regard thereto.

The judgment must be credited with the payments made, and it is a lien upon the entire tract of land, prior to all others, to the amount reported by the referee. But the proceeds of the sale of that portion of the land which was last mortgaged must first be applied toward the satisfaction of said judgment. Ad. Eq. 543, n. 1.

As against the mortgage to D. L. Turner, Probate judge, the defendant Markert stands in the position of an innocent purchaser for value without notice, and his mortgage is a lien to the amount reported by the referee upon the portion of land embraced in the said mortgage, prior to all others except the lien of the judgment in favor of James M. Richardson, assigned to Bennett Holland. The mortgage to D. L. Turner, Probate judge, was executed prior to the mortgage to B. F. Yoe, and also first recorded, and must therefore be next paid out of the proceeds of the land therein embraced.

The mortgage to B. F. Yoe is also a lien upon the entire tract of land, and, although last recorded, it was both executed and recorded before the judgment in favor of Butler and Youmans was entered up, and must therefore next be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the entire tract of land.

*The judgment in favor of Butler and Youmans is a lien upon the entire tract of land from the day it was entered, which being subsequent to the date of the foregoing liens, it is inferior to them and, therefore, cannot cannot be paid until they are satisfied.

The evidence does not establish any secret or equitable trust in favor of the plaintiffs, and the judgment under which they claim is not a lien upon the land, having been obtained on the 11th day of March, 1870, and no action having since been taken to make the same a lien. Code, § 313; 15 Stat. 871.

The act of 1870, denying to final judgments, thereafter rendered, the incidents of a lien upon real property, is not unconstitutional as regards contracts entered into prior to its passage.

The remedy may be modified without impairing the obligation of the contract. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122 [4 L. Ed. 529]; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 270 [6 L. Ed. 606]; Mason v. Haile, 12 Wheat 370 [6 L. Ed. 660]; Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 311 [11 L. Ed. 143].

The land should be sold in such parcels and upon such terms as will most conduce to the payment of all claims upon the same.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed:

1. That two surveyors, one to be nominated by plaintiffs and one by defendants, go upon the land and ascertain the boundaries of the various tracts of land described in the mortgage above mentioned, and further to divide the land into such parcels or tracts as will sell to the greatest advantage and report their action to this court at the next term of the same.

2. That upon the confirmation of the report of the said surveyors, the tract of land described in the complaint be sold by the master for Edgefield county, on such terms and at such a time as may then to the court seem just and proper.

3. That after the payment of the plaintiffs' costs, and the costs of the surveyors and referee, the judgment of Bennett Holland, assignee of James M. Richardson, be first satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the said land by the payment of the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the 1st day of October, 1879. And for that purpose the proceeds of the sale of the portion of the land last mortgaged be first applied.

*4. That the mortgage to M. A. Markert be next satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the land described therein by the payment of the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the first day of October, A. D. 1879.

5. That the mortgage to D. L. Turner, Probate judge, be next satisfied by paying into the Probate Court for the said county the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the 1st day of October, 1879, out of the proceeds of the sale of the land described in the said mortgage.

6. That the mortgage to B. F. Yoe be next satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the whole tract of land by the payment of the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the 1st day of October, 1879.

7. That the judgment in favor of Butler and Youmans be next satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the whole tract of land by the payment of the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the 1st day of October, 1879.

8. That the judgment in favor of George B. Addison and wife, under which plaintiffs claim, be next satisfied out of the proceeds of the sale of the whole tract of land by the payment of the amount reported by the referee, with interest on the interest-bearing portion from the 1st day of October, 1879.

9. That the remainder of the proceeds of the sale of the lands, if any there be, be paid to the defendant, R. G. M. Dunovant.

T. J. Mackey,
April 5th, 1880. Circuit Judge.

The judge overruled the exceptions of Holland, and upon the facts, as will be seen, decreed that the land be divided into suitable tracts for sale by surveyors; that it then be sold, the proceeds, after payment of costs, be applied, first, to the payment of the Holland judgment as reported by the referee, the interest to be calculated at seven per cent., and the payments already on it to be credited on that basis; second, to the Markert mortgage;

*next to the D. L. Turner, Probate judge, mortgage; next to the B. F. Yoe mortgage; next to the Butler and Youmans judgment; then to the George B. Addison and wife judgment claimed by the plaintiff, and lastly, if any remainder, to be paid to the defendant, R. G. M. Dunovant.

From this decree the defendant Holland, the plaintiffs, the Probate judge, and the children of R. G. M. Dunovant appealed upon exceptions. Holland's exceptions raise the question whether his judgment should not have been estimated at sixteen per cent., and, if not, whether the payments made by Dunovant should not have been credited on the interest, estimated at that rate; the plaintiffs', whether the act of the general assembly, March 1st, 1870, denying to final judgments the incident of a lien on real property, did not impair the obligation of contracts made prior to its passage, and was, therefore, unconstitutional.

The exceptions of the Probate judge and the guardian ad litem of the minor children of Dunovant, raised the question whether the mortgage of Markert should not have been credited with the sum of $1,500, with interest from the 5th of February, 1878, the profit on the Roseland tract of land, which, by agreement, Markert was to give to Dunovant. These three questions are the questions which arise in the case, and to these attention will now be directed.

The Holland judgment was obtained on a note payable to James M. Richardson, dated the 25th February, 1867, and due one day after date, with interest at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum. The judgment was by confession, made on the same day. This judgment was afterwards assigned to Holland, who had the active energy of the fi. fa. renewed in November, 1876. The confession, endorsed on the declaration, was for the sum of $2,000, with interest from the 25th February, 1867, the date of the note, at the rate of sixteen per cent. per annum, and the date of the endorsement was the same as that of the note, the 25th February, 1867. The judgment was entered for $2,000, no rate of interest being mentioned therein. The fi. fa. was the ordinary fi. fa. in such cases. Upon this, two receipts had been entered by Holland—"in part of this case"—one for *$562, 5th January, 1869, and the other for $960, 5th February, 1872.

Now, was Holland entitled to recover on this judgment, sixteen per cent., as specified in the note and in the confession, or was the Circuit judge right in restricting him to seven per cent. after judgment? We concur with the Circuit judge, and we do not know that we can add anything to the argument by which he sustains his opinion.

He held that the act of 1866 (13 Stat. 439) controlled this question. That act enacts that in all money decrees and judgments in law and equity hereafter enrolled or entered * * * the legal interest shall be and remain at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. This judgment was entered in 1867, the year after the passage of this act. Without attempting to vindicate or discuss the wisdom of this act, how can the appellant, when it is admitted "ita lex scripta est," evade its provisions? By what authority could the sheriff collect more than seven per cent. upon a fi. fa. in his office, when the act stands in the way? It is said that the defendant consented and still consents to it. This, no doubt, is so, but this can have no effect as to the construction which shall be given to a judgment of the court, which is regulated, not by the consent of the parties, but by the act of the general assembly, in such case made and provided.

A judgment is defined to be the final determination of the rights of parties in the action. Code, § 268. It may be granted in invitum, or by consent. In either case it is the action of the court, in the one case reached by the evidence and law applicable to the facts, in the other pronounced by the consent of the parties, when it is granted upon a contract, it determines what the contract is and closes it, giving the party in whose favor the judgment is rendered, the means of enforcing the contract thus determined, or redress for its breach.

A judgment of this sort involves two ideas —the contract upon which it is rendered and the judgment itself. The one is the act of the parties—the other is the act of the court. They are entirely separate and distinct.

Now, at the time this contract was made by Dunovant with Richardson, there were no usury laws in existence in this state, *and Dunovant had the right to contract to pay any per cent. for the use of money that he saw proper, and such contract, at whatever per cent. agreed upon, was enforceable through the court, either by confession of judgment, or by regular judgment obtained by suit. But Dunovant had no right to contract for the action of the court. The legislature is the only authority that can give power to the courts, and the legislature had said, previous to this, that the courts could give no judgment or decree to bear more than seven per cent. interest. The courts can enforce legal contracts of parties, as made, up to the time of the judgment, but, when the judgment is pronounced, the rights of the parties are determined up to that moment, and then the judgment must be enforced according to the law applicable to judgments.

We concur with the Circuit judge, also, as to the effect of the payments made by Dunovant on this judgment. The receipts on the back of the fi. fa. show that they were ordinary payments, in part of the debt within; and, while it may be that Dunovant could have paid such amounts as he desired on the interest, over and above the seven per cent. allowed by the act, independent of and outside of the judgment and fi. fa., yet when these payments were made and credited on the fi. fa., as in part of the debt therein, the court can make no other application but such as the act requires. So much for the exception of appellant Holland.

The plaintiffs' principal exception involves the constitutionality of the act of March, 1st, 1870, (Code, § 313,) which denies to final judgments the incident of a lien on real property. The plaintiffs contend that the obligation, upon which the decree under which they claim was obtained, was executed before the passage of this act; that, at that time, decrees and judgments had lien on real estate; that this was a part of the obligation of the contract, and that the act of 1870, supra, denying this lien, impaired this obligation, and was, therefore, unconstitutional, being in conflict with Article 1, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States. The correctness of this position depends upon the meaning of the term "obligation," when applied to contracts.

*This term has been often and ably discussed before this. Many authorities might be cited from decisions and writers outside of our own State, among them the oftenquoted case of Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 200 [4 L. Ed. 529], and Kent and Story, and many other authorities; but the meaning of this term having been so elaborately discussed and so fully determined in the recent cases of the State v. Carew, 13 Rich. 498 [91 Am. Dec. 245], and Wood v. Wood, 14 Rich. 154, in our own State, it would scarcely be becoming for this court so soon to renew this discussion as if it were an open question.

These two cases, cited from our own reports, decide, in brief, that the obligation of a contract "is the legal tie which imposes a necessity of doing or abstaining from a particular act, as distinguished from the imperfect obligation arising from gratitude, charity, or other moral duties, binding upon conscience, but having no legal remedy for their enforcement. This latter is the essence of the legal obligation."

This idea as to this term is not only found in the common law, but was familiarly recognized by the Roman jurists in the maxim "Sub hac conditione si volam nulla fit obligatio."

A well-recognized distinction is drawn between the contract itself and its obligation. The contract is the agreement of the parties; the obligation is the remedy which the law affords for its enforcement. There may be, and generally there is, a moral obligation in every contract, which ought to constrain the party making it to perform it, but with this the courts have nothing to do. If we were perfect beings, this moral obligation would at all times be sufficient, and there would be no necessity for courts or civil law; but, unfortunately, such is not the condition of humanity, and hence the necessity of some constraining power, more effectual, direct and imperative than the mere imperfect obligations classed as moral obligations.

The clear meaning of a legal obligation, as contradistinguished from a moral, cannot be better illustrated than by an unpaid note barred by the Statute of Limitations. There the legal obligation is gone, the moral remains; but the courts are powerless in such cases. Where, then, an act is passed which materially interferes with and impairs the legal remedy which *the courts afforded before the passage of the act for the enforcement of contracts, such act is unconstitutional. Did the act of 1870, supra, have this effect upon contracts like this in this case? We think not. The lien on real estate which the previous law allowed to decrees and judgments was no part of the remedy of enforcement. It was a mere incident to the judgment which, in fact, had a tendency to delay and weaken its enforcement. Taking away this lien imparted to the judgment greater vigor and more speedy execution. Judgment having been obtained, this act required, in its effect, the party to act and to act promptly. The fi. fa. for its enforcement was left at his command, and the remedy for the collection of his money was in fact made more effectual. It relieved the party plaintiff from all claim for delay and further forbearance, and it required some prompt action on his part. Besides the act did not entirely destroy the lien, it only prevented the lien in the absence of a levy. By the terms of the act, by keeping the fi. fa. levied, a lien could not only be made to attach but it could be preserved.

Our conclusion is that the act of 1870 did not impair the obligation of the contract under which the plaintiff claims, and, therefore, that the ruling of Judge Mackey on this subject is not obnoxious to plaintiffs' exceptions. In any event the act of 1870 modified merely the previous remedy which, according to the authorities, may be done without impairing the obligation. Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat. 122 [4 L. Ed. 529]; Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 270 [6 L. Ed. 606]; Mason v. Haile, 12 Wheat. 370 [6 L. Ed. 660].

The Probate Judge, Charlton, and the guardian ad litem of the minor children of the defendant Dunovant, except to the decree because it fails to require the Markert claim to be credited with the profit made by Markert in the purchase and sale of the Roseland tract of land, to wit, the sum of $1,500 and interest. We think there is foundation for this exception. Dunovant had purchased this land in December, 1877, at the price of $5,000: his purchase was turned over to Markert under an agreement or contract that Dunovant was to have credit on his debt to Markert for the profit or advance in price that Markert might obtain in a resale. Markert did resell at an advance of $1,500 on the 5th of January, 1878. Why, then, should not *Dunovant have the benefit of this advance? It is said that the contract only allowed Dunovant the benefit of this profit when it was realized by Markert, and that Markert had not as yet realized it.

The evidence is that Markert, on the 5th of February, 1878, resold the land at the price of $6,500, $2,000 of which was paid in cash, and the residue amply secured by the bond of the purchaser and a mortgage of the premises. Now, under these circumstances, when the assets of Dunovant are being marshaled for distribution among his creditors, among whom is Markert, can he fold his arms and say, I have not realized this profit? If he had submitted evidence that the purchaser was insolvent, or even doubtful; that he had neglected to secure the debt by mortgage of the land, or, having done so, that the land had greatly depreciated in value, and was not now a sufficient security, or any evidence of this kind, showing that his actual realization of this profit was precarious, then there would be some justice in awaiting further developments; but when the proof is that $2,000 of the purchase-money has been paid and the residue is amply secured by the bond of the purchaser, with a mortgage of the premises, we think the court below might well have directed that Markert's claim should be credited with the $1,500 at the day of sale.

There were other questions raised in the exceptions of the different parties; but the questions above considered by the court embrace those principally discussed in the argument. We think that the decree of Judge Mackey should be affirmed as to all matters therein, except the last in reference to the profit in the resale of the Roseland tract of land by Markert.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified in accordance with the principles of this opinion, and for that purpose that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court.

*(Case No. 1085.)

Ex parte LYNCH, Trustee.

[1. Constitutional Law ⇐26.]

A constitutional provision must, if possible, be so construed as not to abridge the full legislative power vested in the general assembly by Article II, § 1. Implied limitations of legislative power are only admissible when necessary to give proper force to a particular intent expressed in the constitution.

The provision of Section 78, of the act of 1874, (15 Stat. 760,) requiring the auditor to add fifty per cent. to the assessment of the property of a taxpayer who fails to make return of such property for taxation, does not violate Sections 14 and 36 of Article I., nor Section 1 of Article IX., of the constitution.

The correction, by the comptroller-general, of an error in a tax duplicate, is not a plain ministerial duty for which mandamus will lie, especially after he has acted upon an application for such correction; nor will such officer, on the relation of a taxpayer, be compelled, by mandamus, to ignore as unconstitutional, a statute imposing a penalty for a default in making return.

Original application to the Supreme Court.

Petition for mandamus to the comptroller-general, filed December 7th, 1880, by John Lynch, trustee of Mary E. Allen, and heard on petition, order to show cause and return, on May 2d, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Robert A. Lynch, for the relator.

Mr. Youmans, attorney-general, contra.

McGOWAN, A. J. This is a petition in the original jurisdiction of this court for a writ of mandamus to compel the comptroller-general to have corrected an alleged error on the tax duplicate for Richland county, and that the true value of a house and lot in Columbia be placed upon said tax duplicate as the amount upon which taxes should be imposed. The comptroller-general resists the motion upon several grounds, viz.: That no error was committed by the auditor; that he has no authority to make the abatement demanded; and that what is asked to be done is not his clear ministerial duty, and, therefore, mandamus will not lie.

Section 6, Article IX., of the constitution, is as follows: "The general assembly shall provide for the valuation and assessment of all lands and the improvements thereon, prior to the assembling of the general assembly of 1870, and thereafter on every fifth year." The general assembly made an assessment in 1875, by act of 1874, and in 1878, in advance of the "fifth year," passed an act which provided for another assessment of lands to be made in 1879, "in the manner and according to the rules prescribed for assessment of real estate," &c. 16 Stat. 803. The manner of making assessments is prescribed by the "Act to reduce all acts and parts of acts providing for the assessment and taxation of property, into one act, and to amend the same." 15 Stat. 731. Section 78 of that act provides, "that whenever any taxpayer shall fail to make returns to the auditor of his county, within the time prescribed by law, it shall be the duty of the county auditor to enter on the tax duplicate, against such taxpayer, the property charged to him the previous year, with fifty per cent. penalty added thereto," &c.

John Lynch, trustee, failed to return for taxation, under the act of 1878, a house and lot on the southwest corner of Blanding and Richardson streets, in the city of Columbia, and thereupon John Meighan, the county auditor, in accordance with the legal requirements upon the subject, entered said house and lot on the tax duplicate at its previous assessment of $10,200, and added *thereto fifty per cent., making the taxable value $15,300. To this action of the auditor the relator objected and filed a petition, praying the comptroller-general to have the said fifty per cent. stricken off. The comptroller-general ordered the auditor to submit to the county board of equalization the question of the true value of said house and lot, directing, in case the board should reduce the value, that the fifty per cent. should be attached to the assessment so reduced, instead of the original assessment. Accordingly, the auditor did submit the value to the board of equalization, which reduced the value to $8,000, and this sum was placed on the duplicate as the proper valuation until the next assessment of real estate, but the comptroller-general refused to remit the fifty per cent. already added to the assessment for one year, 1879; thus making the total assessment $12,000. The relator, insisting that it was the duty of the comptroller to correct also the action of the auditor in this particular, filed this petition for a writ of mandamus to compel him to do so.

The relator insists that he was not in default in failing to return the house and lot for taxation under the act of 1878, and the auditor had no right to increase the assessment fifty per cent., for the reason that the act of 1878, ordering a new assessment for that year, and the provision in the act of 1874, allowing assessment of fifty per cent. for default, are both unconstitutional and void. In relation to the act of 1878, he insists that the provision of the constitution which requires that after 1870 the assessment should be made "on every fifth year," amounts to a negation of the right to make it at any other time. That raises a question of construction. Does the declaration that the assessment is to be made "on every fifth year," withdraw from the general assembly the right to make it also at some intermediate time?

It is a delicate thing to declare an act of the legislature unconstitutional. This section of the constitution must be construed, if possible, as allowing full force and effect to Section 1, Article II., vesting the full legislative power of the State in the general assembly. Implied limitations of legislative power are only admissible where the implication is necessary, as where *language, conveying a particular intent, cannot have its proper force without such implication. The general assembly has the general power of legislation upon all subjects not prohibited by the constitution. "The legislative department is entrusted with the general authority to make laws at discretion, and is only limited by express constitutional provision." Cooley Const. Lim. 87–172. "The constitutionality of a law must be presumed until the violation of the constitution is proved beyond all reasonable doubt, and a reasonable doubt must be solved in favor of legislative action and the act be sustained." Id. 182.

As we understand it, the object of a written constitution is to fix the fundamental principles and limit the powers of government, and not to legislate on mere details. It is fixed in its nature, and, therefore, unsuited to contain the laws which from time to time are made necessary by the ever-changing necessities and wishes of the people. A constitution has been defined to be "the fundamental law of a State, containing the principles upon which the government is founded, regulating the division of the sovereign powers and directing to what persons each of these powers is to be confined and the manner in which it is to be exercised."

According to these familiar principles and authorities the presumption is that the act of 1878 is constitutional. The onus is upon the relator to make it clearly appear if it is not so. It does not seem to us that the provision which requires the general assembly to make an assessment of real estate "on every fifth year" necessarily amounts to an inhibition against their doing it at another time. The constitution could not have intended that the people of the State should remain under a false and erroneous assessment of real estate for a number of years, for the only reason that a new assessment could not be made except "on every fifth year." It is not a case for the application of the maxim "expressio unius est exclusio alterius." The provision is affirmative merely that the thing shall be done at particular intervals without negative words, such as "and at no other time." It is mandatory so far as it requires the assessment to be made at all events every fifth year, but that is the full intent of the provision, which does not purport to be exclu*sive and exhaustive. The period indicated is not of the essence, except so far as to require that it shall be done at the times indicated. Lord Mansfield held, in Rex v. Loxdale, 1 Burr. 447: "That there is a known distinction between circumstances which are of the essence of a thing required to be done and clauses merely directory. The precise time in many cases is not of the essence."

When there is no substantial reason why the thing to be done might not as well be done also at some other time, then the courts assume that the intention was that it might be so done. No injury would be done if the assessment were made every year. As was said by Parker, C. J., in Henshaw v. Foster, 9 Pick. 316: "In considering so important an instrument as a constitution, we are not on the one hand to indulge ingenious speculations which may lead us wide from the true essence and spirit of the instrument, nor on the other to apply to it such narrow and constrained views as may exclude the real object and intent of those who framed it."

The general assembly of the State has more than once construed this provision as affirmative merely, and when, in their opinion, the public good demanded it, ordered reassessments of the lands at times other than "every fifth year." Any other construction, we incline to think, would lead to absurd and alarming consequences.

It is also insisted by the relator that Section 78 of the act of 1874, which requires the auditor to add fifty per cent. to the assessment of the property of a taxpayer who makes default in returning his property for taxation, is illegal and void as repugnant to the following provisions of the constitution:

Section 36, Article I., which declares that "all property subject to taxation shall be taxed in proportion to its value. Each individual of society has a right to be protected in the enjoyment of life, liberty and property according to standing laws."

Section 1, Article IX., which requires the general assembly "to provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation."

Section 14, Article I., of the Declaration of Rights: "No person shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled or dispossessed of *his property, immunities or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. And the general assembly shall not enact any law that shall subject any person to punishment without trial by jury; nor shall he be punished but by virtue of a law already established or promulgated prior to the offence and legally applied."

This opens a wide field, but we do not think the case requires a full discussion of these important provisions of the constitution. There is no doubt that the laws for the collection of taxes are summary and not in full accord with the spirit of the constitution, but they are sustained on the ground of State necessity and immemorial usage. It is said in the case of Parham v. Decatur County, 9 Ga. 352, that "the sovereign right to levy and collect taxes grows out of the necessities of the government—an urgent necessity, which admits no property in the citizen while it remains unsatisfied. The right to tax is co-equal with all governments. It springs out of the organization of the government. All property is a pledge to pay the necessary debts and expenses of government."

The Supreme Court of Tennessee, in McCarrol v. Weeks, 5 Hayw. (Tenn.) 246, decided that their summary tax laws were constitutional, holding this language: "It is certainly true that they have the character of summary proceedings, and it is equally true that they must of necessity be so; for if the government were necessitated to take the cautious and tedious steps of the common law, in giving personal notice, making up regular proceedings and having a trial by jury, judgment and execution, it would cease to exist for want of money to carry on its necessary operations. Loss of credit and the total extinction of the national faith—the basis of all regular government—must be the inevitable consequences."

In our own case of the State v. Allen, 2 McCord, 56, the court says: "We think that any legal process which was originally founded in necessity, has been consecrated by time, and approved and acquiesced in by universal consent, must be an exception to the right of trial by jury, and is embraced in the alternative 'law of the land.'" And in

Harris v. Wood, 6 Mon. 643, *the Court of Appeals of Kentucky remark that "taxes were always recoverable (before the adoption of the constitution), not only without a jury, but even without a judge; and the assessment of ministerial officers has been made to operate as an execution on the citizen, and the collector could distrain," &c. The same general doctrine has been asserted in other cases. See Blackw. Tax T. 31.

It is urged, however, that the fifty per cent. is not really a tax regulation, but in the nature of a penalty for default, and, therefore, cannot be imposed by the mere act of the auditor, without judicial proceeding and verdict of a jury. It is called "a penalty" in the act itself, but its nature is not necessarily changed by the name given. The provision lacks some of the characteristics of a penalty. It differs very materially from the law of 1820, which was construed in the case of the State v. Allen, supra, to be a penalty, pure and simple. That act imposed a punishment of $10,000 upon any person who should sell lottery tickets in the State, and, as substantially declared, for the purpose of suppressing vice; while the provision under consideration imposes no round sum of money upon the person, but only relates to the assessment of property and in strict regard to its value. The object manifestly was not so much to punish as to prevent defaults in making returns, and in that way to facilitate the collection of taxes. Such provisions have appeared in the tax acts of this State for a long series of years, and we are not aware that the courts have ever enjoined their enforcement. In the case of the State v. Hodges, 14 Rich. 277, Judge Wardlaw, after reviewing all the acts upon the subject, in his learned note, says: "A summary execution against defaulters has prevailed from the earliest period. At first (1701) it was issued by a justice of the peace (2 Stat. 182), afterwards by the chief justice (1716–1723). In 1734 (3 Stat. 388), and ever since, by the enquirers and collectors. * * In these cases, and in others, where double tax executions are spoken of, it seems plain that the legislature has considered it competent for a tax collector to adapt his execution to the exigencies of the case," &c.

As to the admitted necessity for an equal and uniform rate of taxation, it is sufficient to say that the assessment is upon the *property, according to its value, and applies equally to all defaulters. The State v. Railroad Corporations, 4 S. C. 376; United States v. Singer, 15 Wall. 121 [21 L. Ed. 49].

But, if in all this we should be in error, it has not been made to appear that what is required of the comptroller-general is his plain ministerial duty under the law. We have been referred to Section 66 of the act of 1874, as showing his ministerial duty in the premises. That section is in these words: "The comptroller-general shall, from time to time, prepare and transmit to the several county auditors, all such forms and instructions as he may deem necessary to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and decide all questions that may arise as to the true construction of the same, or in relation to the duty of any officer under the same, and the forms thus transmitted shall be used by all county, town and municipal officers. The instructions thus given shall be obeyed by, and the decisions thus made shall be binding upon, all county, town and municipal officers." We do not see that this section imposes any plain ministerial duty on the comptroller-general, in case of alleged error on the part of a county auditor.

"To be entitled to a writ of mandamus, the relator must show that the respondent is bound to the performance of some certain, specific duty, of a ministerial character, imposed by law. It is certain when it must be absolutely performed, and the officer has no discretion. It is ministerial where an individual has such legal interest in its performance, that neglect becomes a wrong to him." Morton, Bliss & Co. v. Comptroller-General, 4 S. C. 431.

To have corrected an alleged error in a tax duplicate, is not a plain ministerial duty, but requires the exercise of discretion and judgment, especially when, according to the terms of the law, there has been no error. As the law reads, it was the duty of the auditor to add, and of the comptroller-general to have enforced, the fifty per cent.; but, in the face of the provision, we are asked to compel the comptroller to strike it off, on the ground that the law is unconstitutional. That can hardly be considered a duty "certain" and allowing of "no discretion," which can only be made to appear by ignoring the law as it stands. It is not the province of the comptroller-general to *decide upon the constitutionality of laws, under which it is his duty to act in supervising the collection of taxes. Besides, the comptroller has already rendered his judgment in the matter, and it has passed beyond his control.

Mr. High says: "As regards the duty of officers entrusted by law with the equalization of taxes and assessments, the courts may properly interfere by the writ (mandamus) to set such officers in motion, and compel them to act, upon an application properly presented by a taxpayer dissatisfied with the tax assessed against him. * * * But mandamus will not go to a board of supervisors, requiring them to make corrections in the assessment of taxes for their county, after the assessments have been completed and warrants have been issued to the receiver of taxes, and the matter has passed beyond the control of the supervisors. * * * The courts will not interfere with or control the action of such officers, when they have actually passed upon such application. The abatement or reduction of taxes improperly assessed is, in such cases, essentially a judicial rather than a ministerial act. * * * Nor, in such cases, can the ministerial officer object that the act of the legislature authorizing the tax is unconstitutional, since it is not in the province of such officers to determine the constitutionality of laws; nor will the courts, upon summary proceedings in mandamus, determine as to the constitutionality of statutes affecting the rights of third persons." High Extr. Rem. § 140.

The petition for a writ of mandamus is refused.

PRATER v. WHITTLE.

[1. Wills ⇦194.]

Where a testator by will disposed of his entire estate, and subsequently sold all of his lands and part of his personalty, and then died possessed of some personal property, the will is not revoked and should be admitted to probate. How revocation is effected, expressly or by implication, considered.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇦1094.]

*Upon the issue of will or no will on appeal from the Probate Court, the trial is had de novo in the Circuit Court, and, therefore, a finding of facts by the Probate judge is not a matter to be considered by this court on appeal.

The probate of a will settles all questions as to its proper execution, but does not determine its construction, nor the validity of its clauses. Therefore, on application to prove a will, a revocation which does not wholly defeat it presents no question for the Probate Court to determine.

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Apeler, 35 S. C. 420, 14 S. E. 931, as to the right of trial by jury on actions appealed from probate courts.]

Before Townsend, J., Edgefield, October, 1877.

Milton A. Prater, executor of James M. Whittle, deceased, against Rebecca Whittle, the widow of testator, and his other heirs; application to prove will in solemn form, after demand by the widow that it should be so proven. The trial was had in the Court of Probate for Edgefield, in 1872. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Ernest Gary, for appellants.

Messrs. A. J. Norris, and Youmans, attorney-general, contra.

September 24th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. On March 9th, 1870, James M. Whittle executed his will, by which he gave to his son-in-law, Milton A. Prater, almost his entire estate, either immediately upon the death of the testator or in remainder after the death of the defendant Rebecca Whittle, and appointed the said Prater executor.

On April 3d, 1871, the said Whittle executed two other papers—a deed, whereby he conveyed his entire real estate, and a bill of sale, whereby he transferred certain personal property to the said Prater, and received for the said property Prater's note for $4,900.

In 1871 James M. Whittle died, and Prater, as executor, proposed to prove the will. The widow (Rebecca) and others *objected, and an issue was made in the Probate Court for Edgefield county to test the validity of the will. The Judge of Probate heard the case, took the testimony and decided that James M. Whittle was competent to make a will; that the paper propounded had been executed without fraud or undue influence and with all legal formalities as his last will and testament, but he refused to admit it to probate upon the ground that the deed and bill of sale of his property, executed by testator subsequently, operated as an implied revocation of the will. The plaintiff, Prater, appealed to the Circuit Court. By consent, it seems, Judge Townsend heard the case without a jury, upon the testimony taken by the Probate judge, and reversed the judgment of the Probate judge. The defendants appeal to this court upon the ground that "His Honor erred in deciding that the deed and bill of sale from James M. Whittle to Milton A. Prater did not wholly revoke the will of the said James M. Whittle."

The single question in the case is whether the execution of the deed and bill of sale by the testator, after he executed his will, operated as a revocation of the will so entirely as to exclude it from probate and leave the estate intestate. This is simply a question of probate, not in the least affected by the provisions of the paper as being just or unjust, or by the proper construction thereof in consequence of changes in the property. Where it appears that a will has been properly executed by a person of sufficient capacity, exercising volition, no matter how it may disappoint just expectations, or how unequal it may be, it is the testator's will, and will be so declared. The law allows a person to declare in his life-time what disposition shall be made of his property after his death, only provided he is of sound mind and makes the declaration according to formalities carefully prescribed. Such declaration so made is his will, which, for many reasons, is regarded an instrument of a solemn character, and not to be lightly revoked or set aside. There is no doubt here of the execution of the paper by a person competent and according to all the required formalities. The only question is whether it was afterwards revoked. The statute declares that "no will or testament in writing of any real or *personal property, or any clause thereof, shall be revocable but by some other will or codicil in writing, or other writing declaring the same, attested and subscribed by three witnesses as aforesaid, or by destroying or obliterating the same by the testator himself or some other person in his presence and by his direction and consent." Sec. 7, ch. 86, Gen. Stat. 443. This informs a testator who desires to revoke his will what is necessary to be done. As we understand it, this provision not only prescribes the necessary formalities for the revocation of a will duly executed, but declares that nothing else shall have that effect.

Our courts have held in accordance with this view. In Floyd v. Floyd, 3 Strob. 54 [49 Am. Dec. 626], it is said: "A will executed according to our acts of 1789 and 1824 can only be revoked in three ways: 1. By an instrument in writing, executed with the same solemnities as the will. 2. By obliteration. 3. By burning and destroying; and, 4, impliedly by marriage and birth of issue."

In Watkins v. Watkins, 13 Rich. 66, it is said: "By the act of 1789 no devise is revocable except by another will or writing, attested by three witnesses, declaring the revocation, or by the destruction or obliteration of the will by the testator himself, or by some other in his presence and by his direction and consent." It is clear that this case was not brought within either of the requirements of the statute by the mere execution of the deed and bill of sale, and it follows that there was certainly no express revocation.

It is urged, however, that, notwithstanding the statute, a revocation may be implied from such facts as show a total change in the intentions of the testator. It is true that there is one state of facts which the law expressly declares shall be taken to be a revocation. Section 8, chapter 86, of the Gen. Stat. provides that "if any person making a will shall afterwards marry and die, leaving his widow or having issue, unless the will shall have been made in contemplation of marriage, expressed on its face, and shall contain a provision for future wife and children, if any, it shall be deemed and taken to be a revocation to all intents and purposes," &c.

*But, excepting this case, specially provided for, it would seem that revocations to be implied from facts supposed to show a change of intention on the part of testator—always uncertain and doubtful— are excluded by the express words of the statute, which positively declares that "no will or testament in writing shall be revocable but by some other will," &c. If the statute left the subject of implied revocations precisely as they stood before its passage, it is difficult to understand what was accomplished by it. Upon this subject we incline to agree with what was said in regard to a similar statute of the State of Vermont in the case of Graves v. Sheldon, reported in 15 Am. Dec. 657: "I cannot admit that an alteration in the circumstances of the devisor will, in any case, amount to a revocation in law, or that an intended alteration in his estate will have that effect. It is true that the intention of the testator is to be principally regarded, but that intention is to be inferred from such facts only as the statute authorizes us to notice. * * * Does the fact of a change in a man's circumstances afford a stronger presumption of an alteration of his intentions than the fact of his preserving his will unaltered and unrevoked does of his intentions remaining the same? I confess I am unable to see it in that light. The statute has secured the rights of widows, unprovided for, and of posthumous children. The necessity of the rule, if it exists in England, is thus far obviated here. The only implied revocations, therefore, known to the laws of this State are such as result ex necessitate rei. It is said by Justice Buller, in his argument in the case of Goodtitle v. Otway, 1 Bos. & P. 615, that there is not a maxim in our law better established than this: that all implications are ex necessitate; that upon any other ground they would be capricious and arbitrary."

In the very nature of the case there must be such a thing as a revocation from necessity. A will is ambulatory, and when the whole estate is disposed of in the life-time of the testator there is nothing left for the will to act upon when it speaks. "If A. devise all his estate to B., and afterwards alienates the whole of it to C., it is necessarily a total revocation, for there is nothing for the will to act upon. If he devise Blackacre to B. and Whitacre to C., and afterwards dispose of Blackacre, *it is a revocation pro tanto. Revocation pro tanto may operate either by altering the quality of the estate in abridging the interest or by diminishing the quantity of the thing demised." In the case before us, the whole estate was not disposed of by the deed and bill of sale. The Circuit judge found that all the land devised by the will was covered by the deed, but as to the personal property he held "that it does not appear that the bill of sale transferred all of it. For aught this court knows there may have been considerable personal property left for disposition under the will. Besides there was a sale of the real and personal property conveyed to Milton A. Prater for the price of $4,900, and at the time of the execution of the deed, a note for the purchase was taken to secure its payment."

It is true the argument was made here that this court should assume the fact to be as held by the Probate judge, and not as found by the Circuit judge, upon the ground that the testimony used having been taken by the Probate judge he must be assumed to have had a better opportunity to estimate its proper force. The relation of the Probate judge to the case was in no way analogous to that of a referee appointed to hear and determine issues referred. Upon appeal from the Probate Court, on a question of will or no will, issues of fact are tried de novo in the Circuit Court. The act allowing the appeal provides as follows: "When such certified copy shall have been filed in the Circuit Court, such court shall proceed to the trial and determination of the questions according to the rules of law; and if there shall be any questions of fact or title to land to be decided, issue may be joined thereon under the direction of the court, and a trial thereof had by jury." Code, § 62.

The act of 1839 required an issue to be made in the Circuit Court. 11 Stat. 47. In the case of Myers v. O'Hanlon, 12 Rich. Eq. 203, Chancellor Carroll said: "In truth, the validity of contested wills is tried and determined practically in the Court of Common Pleas. The primary decree of the ordinary in such controversies is regarded by the parties as comparatively immaterial. It is upon appeal to the law courts that the actual contest, the substantial trial, really occurs. In legal contemplation, the Court of Common Pleas has but appellate jurisdiction *in such cases. But by the express provision of the act of 1839, if an issue of fact is involved the cause is to be tried anew, as though it were an original cause in that court, and the parties are at liberty to raise new questions never considered by the ordinary, or even made before him." Peeples v. Smith, 8 Rich. 90. That the parties did not call for a jury and allowed the judge to decide the case on the testimony already taken, cannot alter the nature of the issue. The judgment of the Circuit Court alone is under appeal here.

The probate of a will settles all questions as to the formalities of its execution and the capacity of the testator, but does not affect the validity or invalidity of any particular clause or settle any question of construction. A revocation, therefore, which does not wholly defeat the will, presents no question for the Probate Court to determine. All questions as to the construction of the will must be settled by subsequent proceedings in the equity jurisdiction. So little has the Probate Court to do with the contents of a will or its construction, that it is laid down as an elementary principle that "the bare nomination of an executor, without giving any legacy or appointing anything to be done by him, is sufficient to make it a will, and as a will it is to be proved." 1 Wms. Ex. 185; Jolliffe v. Fanning & Phillips, 10 Rich. 200. In this case Judge Withers said: "If the paper be duly executed by one competent, agreeably to the forms prescribed and in the presence of the requisite number of credible witnesses, and contain the revocation of all prior wills and the appointment of an executor, (as the testamentary paper before us does,) and be silent in fact or for want of validity as to all other matters, it is a will, and must be admitted to probate accordingly."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the case remanded to the Probate Court of Edgefield county for such action as may be necessary to carry out the principles herein announced.

Before Pringle, Recorder, Charleston, January, 1881.

These were two actions in the City Court of Charleston, brought by the city council of Charleston against W. J. Oliver to recover license fees, in the one case for publishing a daily paper, and in the other for job printing, and, also, in both cases, the penalties for non-payment, the complaint also demanding *imprisonment for thirty days if the judgment was not paid. Defendant demurred and answered as follows:

First. The defendant above named demurs to this complaint, because:

1. It is a criminal action, and not cognizable by complaint; and,

2. Criminal and civil proceedings cannot be combined in the same form of action as are set forth in the complaint; and,

3. The plaintiff hath no right to pass the ordinance of 17th December, 1879; and,

4. No assessment or notification thereof has been or is alleged to have been given to defendant; and,

5. A license is not a tax in Charleston city; and,

6. There is no imprisonment for debt in this State.

Second. The defendant, for answer to said complaint, says:

That he never contracted with the plaintiff touching a license.

He prays to be hence dismissed with his costs, &c.

The judgment of the court, rendered by Hon. W. Alston Pringle, recorder, was as follows:

The following statement of the law and facts covers the ground taken in both demurrers and the answers:

The allegation that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiff is a sufficient allegation that neither the license nor the penalty has been paid.

The legislature, by the act of 1st March, 1870, authorized the city council of Charleston to require payment for licenses from persons engaged in business in the said city. By another act of the same date, the legislature authorized the city council to impose imprisonment in the alternative for all violations of the city ordinances.

The ordinance of the city council, under which the defendant is liable for the payment of the licenses and penalties for which these suits are brought, imposes an imprisonment of not more than thirty days as an alternative in default of payment. There is no provision in the ordinances limiting the requirement for a license to persons employing more than one hand.

It has been already decided that the licenses required by the *ordinances of the city council of Charleston are taxes. Cooley Tax. 13–14.

Under this authority the defendant is liable for the amount of the licenses and the penalties, and, in default of payment, to an imprisonment of thirty days in each case, and the judgment should be so entered up.

Defendant appealed, in both cases, to this court, upon the following grounds:

1. Because, the demurrer should have been sustained for the reasons set forth therein, which are re-asserted.

2. Because the act of 1870, authorizing the city to require payment for licenses for "all trades and professions," is unconstitutional under Sections 20 and 33 of Article II., and Section 12 of Article I. of the State constitution, and Section 10 of Article I., Articles I., VIII. and IX. of the United States constitution.

3. Because the ordinance of 17th of December, 1879, is ultra vires, in its prohibitory clause, of the act of 1870, which contains no prohibition; is illegal in its requirements for license for want of any prohibitory act, and is unconstitutional under the foregoing sections of the State and United States constitutions, as well as under Section 20, Article I., of the State constitution.

4. Because, "All taxes * * * shall be considered and held as a debt payable to the city," by the fifty-second section of the city ordinance of 1870, and the demand sued for is styled "a debt" in the complaint.

5. Because the demand is not for taxes, but for penalties, which are "monetary obligations."

6. Because the act of 1st March, 1870, relates to the police powers of the city, and not to taxation, and if it relates to the latter it is unconstitutional, under the foregoing sections of the State and United States constitutions.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Mr. G. D. Bryan, contra.

September 27th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*50

*McIVER, A. J. These were proceedings instituted in the City Court of Charleston, for alleged violations of one of the ordinances of that city: one for carrying on the business of publishing a daily newspaper without a license, and the other for carrying on the business of a job printer without a license. The recorder held that the defendant was liable in each of the cases "for the amount of the license and penalty, and, in default of payment, to an imprisonment of thirty days," and directed that judgment be so entered up. From these judgments the defendant appealed on various grounds, which are set out in the "case," by which questions are raised: 1st. As to the form of the action. 2d. As to the constitutionality of the act of 1st March, 1870, conferring power upon the city council to require the licenses in question. 3d. As to the power of the city council to pass the ordinance requiring the licenses. 4th. As to the right to impose imprisonment as a penalty for the non-payment of a license tax. 5th. As to the necessity for notice to the defendant of the imposition of the tax.

The constitution, Article IX., Section 8, provides that "the corporate authorities of counties, townships, school districts, cities, towns and villages, may be vested with power to assess and collect taxes for corporate purposes; such taxes to be uniform in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same."

By Section 7 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the assessment and taxation of personal property in the city of Charleston," approved 1st March, 1870, (14 Stat. 409,) it is provided that "the city council of Charleston is hereby authorized to require the payment of such sum or sums of money, not exceeding five hundred dollars, for license or licenses, as in their judgment be just and wise, by any person engaged or intending to be engaged in any calling, business or profession," &c.

By another act entitled "An act relative to the power of the city council of Charleston, to impose punishment for the violation of city ordinances," approved March 1st, 1870, (14 Stat. 382), the city council of Charleston is "authorized to impose, for the violation of ordinances, imprisonment in the workhouse or jail, not exceeding thirty days, in addition or in the alterna*tive to penalties now authorized to be imposed by ordinances of said city." In pursuance of these acts, the city council of Charleston passed an ordinance on the 17th December, 1879, by which all persons engaged in the occupations therein named, among which are those of publishing a daily newspaper and job printing, are required to take out a license therefor, and providing that any person who shall exercise any of the callings, or carry on any of the occupations named, without taking out such license, "shall besides being liable to the payment for the license, be subject to a penalty of twenty per cent. of the amount of such license, to be sued for and collected in the City Court, or any other court of competent jurisdiction, or to imprisonment, not exceeding thirty days, as may be adjudged by the recorder."

The objection to the form of the proceeding, we regard as untenable. By Section 3 of Chapter 106, Gen. Stat. 498, the City Court is invested with jurisdiction of all causes arising under the ordinances of the city council of Charleston; and where, as in this case, no mode of enforcement is prescribed by the charter, we see no reason why the mode pursued in this case is not sufficient. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp., § 344.

The next inquiry is as to the constitutionality of the act of 1870. The general question of the power of the legislature to impose a license tax, has been conclusively settled in the case of the State v. Hayne, 4 S. C. 403, where most of the constitutional objections raised in this case were considered and disposed of. This case was followed by the case of the State v. Columbia, 6 S. C. 1, in which it was held that the legislature could empower a municipal corporation to impose a license tax on persons following particular callings, or pursuing particular occupations, within the corporate limits of such municipality. So that we consider that many of the constitutional questions raised by the appellant in these cases, have already been adjudicated, and it is only necessary for us to refer to the cases, as we have done, in which these questions have been determined.

There are, however, two constitutional questions raised here which are not determined in those cases, and which it will be necessary for us now to consider: 1st. Whether the provision subjecting the person, who fails or refuses to pay his license tax, *to imprisonment, is in violation of Section 20, Article I., of the constitution, which declares that "no person shall be imprisoned for debt, except in cases of fraud," and, 2d, whether the city council of Charleston have been constitutionally invested with power to impose a license tax.

To determine the first question, it is necessary to inquire whether a license tax is a "debt" in the sense of the word as used in the clause of the constitution above cited. We do not think it is. In determining the construction of words or phrases in a constitution or statute, we are not required to confine our attention to the abstract, technical meaning of the word or words employed, but must look to their ordinary and popular meaning also. The object being to ascertain the intention of the framers of the constitution, which must be gathered from the words used, we must necessarily give to those words the sense in which they are generally used by those who framed and those who adopted the constitution, unless there is something in that instrument showing that the words in question were used in a different sense.

Chief Justice Marshall, in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 332 [6 L. Ed. 606] declares the rule on this subject to be "that the intention of the instrument must prevail; that this intention must be collected from its words; that its words are to be understood in that sense in which they are generally used by those for whom the instrument was intended." We may also look to "the object to be accomplished, or the mischief designed to be remedied or guarded against, by the clause in which the ambiguity is met with. When we once know the reason which alone determined the will of the law-makers, we ought to interpret and apply the words used in a manner suitable and consonant to that reason, and as will be best calculated to effectuate the intent." Cooley Const. L. 65.

Guided by these principles we do not think that there can be any doubt that the framers of the constitution and the people who adopted it designed to use the word "debt," in the clause under consideration, in its ordinary sense, and did not intend that it should be held to embrace taxes levied for the support of the government or any of its agencies.

zen of the power to have his fellow-citizen imprisoned for non-payment of his debt. This power, in the hands of private individuals, had long been a subject of discussion, and had been previously circumscribed by the enactment of the Insolvent Debtors' and Prison Bounds acts, which had no application to taxes, and the object of the clause in question, undoubtedly, was still further to limit this power by confining its exercise to "cases of fraud."

This view is fully sustained by the authorities. In Cooley Tax. 13, it is said: "Taxes are not debts in the ordinary sense of that term, and their collection will in general depend on the remedies which are given by statute for their enforcement. * * * The law abolishing imprisonment for debt has no application to taxes, the remedy for the collection of which may include an arrest if the legislature shall so provide." Again, at page 414, the same writer says: "A municipal corporation, empowered to grant licenses and to impose a fee therefor, may lawfully make the failure to take out a license and pay the fee subject the offender to the penalty of fine and imprisonment."

The next inquiry is whether the city council of Charleston have been constitutionally invested with power to impose a license tax. Municipal corporations possess no powers except such as are conferred, either expressly or by necessary implication, by the legislature, either in their charters or in some subsequent act. It is contended here that the power to impose a license tax can be derived from the provisions of the original charter of the city of Charleston, (act of 1783, 7 Stat. 97,) and, also, that it is expressly conferred by the seventh section of the act of 1st March, 1870, 14 Stat. 409, which has been above cited.

By the fourth section of the original charter the city council is "vested with full power and authority to make such assessments on the inhabitants of Charleston, or those who hold taxable property within the same, for the safety, convenience, benefit and advantage of the said city, as shall appear to them expedient." The first question, therefore, is, do these words confer the power to impose a license tax, or do they simply *confer the power to impose a tax upon property? for it is very obvious that the two things are essentially different. One is a tax on persons, while the other is a tax on property. In the one case there must be an assessment of the value of the thing to be taxed before the tax can be levied, while in the other case there is not only no necessity for an assessment, but it would be impracticable.

In Section 33, of Article II., of the constitution, it is provided that "all taxes upon property, real or personal, shall be laid upon the actual value of the property taxed, as the same shall be ascertained by an assessment made for the purpose of laying such tax." Section 1, of Article IX., declares that "the general assembly shall provide by law for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation, and shall prescribe such regulations as shall secure a just valuation for taxation of all property," &c. Again, in Section 8, of Article IX., where provision is made for conferring the taxing power upon municipal corporations, it is declared that such taxes must be uniform "in respect to persons and property within the jurisdiction of the body imposing the same." These clauses contemplate two subjects of taxation—persons and property—in both of which the rule of equity or equality is required to be observed, but in only one—property—is such equity to be secured by an assessment of value, as that would not be applicable to the other. State v. Hayne, 4 S. C. 423.

Now the power conferred by the original charter upon the city council of Charleston was the power "to make such assessments on the inhabitants of Charleston, or those who hold property within the same," which plainly gave the power to tax property only and not persons, and therefore the power to impose a license tax cannot be derived from the original charter. This seems to have been the received opinion for many years, as otherwise there would have been no necessity for the seventh section of the act of 1st March, 1870, in which the legislature undertook to confer this power upon the city council. That this act does, in unmistakable terms, confer the power to impose a license tax, cannot be doubted; but it is contended that the seventh section *of the act of 1st March, 1870, is unconstitutional, and, therefore, has not the force of law.

Various objections have been urged to the constitutionality of this section, none of which are sustainable except the one based upon the provisions of Section 20, Article II., of the constitution, which provides that "every act or resolution having the force of law shall relate to but one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title." The section here in question is found in an act the title of which is "An act to regulate the assessment and taxation of personal property in the city of Charleston." It does not purport to be, and is not in fact, an act regulating taxation in the city of Charleston, but is confined, as its title imports, except in the section in question and one other, to the assessment and taxation of personal property. The question then is: Does this act relate "to but one subject?" and is that subject "expressed in the title?" and the practical inquiry is whether the subject—taxation of personal property—is the same as, or does it include, taxation of callings or occupations, usually denominated license taxes? That these two things are not the same, but, on the contrary, are essentially different in their nature, we have already seen, and we think it equally clear that the one does not include the other.

If the title of this act had been an act to regulate taxation in the city of Charleston, then it is very clear that anything relating to the general subject of taxation might properly have been included in the act, and provision might have been made for levying taxes upon any or all the different subjects of taxation contemplated by the constitution. Such, however, is not the title of the act, but it is restricted to one branch of the two general subjects of taxation contemplated by the constitution—personal property.

Again, it will be observed that the title of this act is, not to provide for, but to regulate the assessment and taxation of personal property. This word implies the previous existence of the power to impose taxes on one of the subjects of taxation—property—and only pointed to a purpose to provide certain regulations as to the mode of exercising such a power. It certainly cannot be regarded as indicating a purpose to confer a *new power of taxation, by authorizing the taxation of persons, and it was therefore well calculated to mislead.

In Cooley Const. Lim. 143–4, the purpose of this and other similar constitutional provisions is said to be: "1st, to prevent hodgepodge or 'log-rolling' legislation; 2d, to prevent surprise or fraud upon the legislature by means of provisions in bills of which the titles gave no intimation, and which might therefore be overlooked and carelessly and unintentionally adopted; and, 3d, to fairly apprise the people, through such publication of legislative proceedings as is usually made, of the subjects of legislation that are being considered, in order that they may have opportunity of being heard thereon, by petition or otherwise, if they shall so desire." This author, at page 149 of the same work, also says: "As the legislature may make the title to an act as restrictive as they please, it is obvious that they may sometimes so frame it as to preclude many matters being included in the act which might with entire propriety have been embraced in one enactment with the matters indicated by the title, but which must now be excluded because the title has been made unnecessarily restrictive. The courts cannot enlarge the scope of the title; they are vested with no dispensing power; the constitution has made the title the conclusive index to the legislative intent as to what shall have operation; it is no answer to say that the title might have been made more comprehensive, if, in fact, the legislature have not seen fit to make it so."

While, therefore, we think that there has been, and ought to be, a general disposition to give a liberal construction to constitutional provisions like this now under consideration, rather than to embarrass legislation by an unnecessary strictness of construction (Cooley Const. Lim. 146), and while we fully agree with the Supreme Court of the United States where, (San Antonio v. Mehaffy, 96 U. S. 315 [24 L. Ed. 816]) adopting the language of the Texas Court in San Antonio v. Lane, 32 Tex. 405, it holds that: "When an act of the legislature expresses in its title the object of the act, the title embraces and expresses any lawful means to achieve the object, thus fulfilling the constitutional injunction that every law shall embrace but one object and that *shall be expressed in its title," we cannot but regard the section of the act in question as being obnoxious to the constitutional objection which we have been considering.

The subject of the act, as expressed in the title, is the assessment and taxation of personal property, while the matter provided for by the seventh section is wholly different and has no relation to the subject expressed in the title. No one on reading the title of the act would for a moment suppose that the object was to confer a new and distinct power of taxation on the city council, by which a new and distinct subject of taxation was provided for, and it was very well calculated to mislead the people. It may be, when the people were informed by the title of the act that the object was merely to regulate the assessment and taxation of personal property, which had always been a subject of taxation, that they would have been content to leave that matter in the hands of their representatives; but if the title had informed them that the object was to confer an additional taxing power upon the corporation by creating a new and distinct subject of taxation, their apprehensions might have been aroused and they might have desired to be heard "by petition or otherwise." The power to impose a license tax was not at all necessary to the object expressed in the title, nor did it furnish any means by which such object could be best carried into effect. It was not even incidental to or in any way connected with it, but, on the contrary, was wholly distinct and independent. It is true that the legislature, under an act to regulate taxation in the city of Charleston, might have conferred the taxing power to the fullest extent authorized by the constitution, and might have provided any lawful means to render such power most effectual; but the legislature have not seen fit to adopt such a comprehensive title, and, on the contrary, have employed a much more restrictive one, and the court "cannot enlarge the scope of the title."

We are compelled, therefore, to declare that Section 7 of the act of 1st March, 1870, 14 Stat. 409, is in violation of Section 20, Article II., of the constitution of this State, and consequently there is no law authorizing the city council of Charleston *to impose the taxes which are sought to be enforced by these proceedings.

Under this view of the case the other questions suggested by the appeal cannot arise and need not therefore be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the court below, in each of the cases, be reversed, and that the proceedings be dismissed.

[1. Costs ⇐172.]

Under Section 337 of the Code of Procedure, attorneys are entitled to have their costs and disbursements inserted in the entry of judgment—the amount of costs which they are entitled to receive, and of disbursements paid to officers for fees, being regulated by the subsequent act of 1880 (17 Stat. 296).

Before Aldrich, J., Sumter, June, 1880.

*59

*Mr. Marion Moise, for appellant.

Mr. Jos. H. Earle, contra.

September 27th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This action was commenced before a trial justice in August, 1875, and the plaintiff, having obtained judgment for only one dollar, appealed. The case was heard in the Circuit Court at April Term, 1880, when a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $66.66.

On the 25th May, 1880, application was made to the clerk to insert in the judgment "the following items of costs and disbursements, to wit:

"To plaintiff's attorney's costs	$ 17 00
"To sheriff's costs	41 65
"To witnesses' fees	160 00"

The application was granted by the clerk, to which the defendant excepted on the following grounds:

1. Because there is no statute giving any costs to the plaintiff's attorney.

2. Because the sheriff's bill of costs was not itemized.

3. Because the sheriff has no right to tax any costs at all against the defendant, but must look to the plaintiff, who employed him, for his fees.

4. Because no costs could be taxed for the witnesses, as they must be paid by the party who summons them.

5. Because no costs could be taxed for the witnesses without producing the subpœna writs under which the witnesses were summoned.

The 6th is substantially the same ground as the 5th.

7. Because the right to have costs taxed in favor of the plaintiff, either for witness fees, or for the fees of officers of court, has been taken away by statute.

8. Because, in no event, can the plaintiff recover more costs than the amount of the verdict or recovery.

9. Because "the clerk decided that appeals from trial justices' *judgments rested upon different grounds from those cases brought originally in the Common Pleas, and, that in the former class of cases, costs, to any amount, could be taxed."

The Circuit judge sustained the taxation of costs as made by the clerk, and from his judgment this appeal has been taken, upon the same grounds as were relied upon in the Circuit Court.

The code, Section 329, does repeal all statutes establishing or regulating the costs or fees of attorneys, and leaves the measure of their compensation to be determined by the agreement of the parties; but, at the same time, and, as a substitute for the attorneys' costs, or, as it is expressed in the code, "by way of indemnity" for his expenses in the action, the prevailing party is allowed certain sums of money, which allowances are termed in the code "costs." The idea seemed to be that the attorney should not be allowed any longer to tax his costs against the losing party, but that he must look to his client for compensation, and, as this would throw an additional expense upon the party, provision was made to indemnify him against such additional expense by certain allowances termed "costs."

The code next proceeds, in Sections 330 and 331, to provide when costs shall be allowed as of course, and, in Section 332, when they shall be allowed in the discretion of the court, and then, in Section 333, 334 and 335, establishes the amounts to be allowed. And, after providing in Section 336 for the interest which may accrue between the date of the verdict or report and the time when final judgment shall be entered, it provides in Section 337 that "The clerk shall insert in the entry of judgment, on the application of the prevailing party, * * * the sum of the allowances for costs, as provided by this code; the necessary disbursements, including the fees of officers allowed by law; the fees of witnesses, the reasonable compensation of commissioners in taking depositions, the fees of referees, and the expense of printing the papers for any hearing when required by a rule of the court. The disbursements shall be stated in detail and verified by affidavit. A copy of the items of the costs and disbursements shall be served with a notice of adjustment." The next section provides for the amount of the fees to which the clerk shall be entitled, and the next, for the *amount of the fees of referees, but no provision is made for the amount of the fees to which a sheriff or a witness shall be entitled, and they are, therefore, left to be regulated by the previous statutes upon this subject.

It will thus be seen that in Section 337, a distinction is recognized between the sums allowed to the prevailing party, by way of indemnity for his expenses, which allowances are termed "costs," and which were designed as a substitute for the costs formerly allowed to the attorneys, and the "necessary disbursements" made by the prevailing party in paying the fees of officers and witnesses; for that section provides that the clerk shall insert in the judgment, not only the sum of the allowances for costs, as provided by this code, which, as we have seen, was designed as a substitute for attorneys' costs, but, also, "the necessary disbursements, including the fees of officers allowed by law, the fees of witnesses," &c.

The act of 22d March, 1878, 16 Stat. 624, while not referring in express terms to the provision of the code abolishing attorneys' costs, does, by implication, at least, restore the right of attorneys to charge costs, for it declares the amount of the costs which attorneys, as well as the other officers therein named, "shall be authorized to receive," and concludes with a general clause repealing all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with its provisions. While the law stood thus, it might have been a very serious question whether the prevailing party was not entitled to the costs allowed him by the code, and his attorney to the costs allowed him by act of 1878, for, while so much of Section 329 of the code as repealed the statutes establishing and regulating the costs of attorneys, was manifestly inconsistent with, and therefore repealed by, the act of 1878, yet there was no necessary inconsistency between the remainder of Section 329, and Sections 330, 331, 332, 333, 334 and 335, providing for costs to the prevailing party, and the act of 1878, providing for costs to the attorney.

Next, however, came the act of 20th February, 1880, 17 Stat. 296, amending the foregoing act as to the amount of fees to which the several officers therein mentioned shall be entitled, and expressly repealing Sections 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334 *and 335 of the code, which abolished the right to attorneys' costs, and regulated the amount of the allowances, termed costs, to which the prevailing party should be entitled; but it does not repeal Section 337 of the code, by which the prevailing party was not only entitled to have inserted in the judgment the sum of allowances, termed costs, but also his necessary disbursements, including the fees of officers and witnesses, as fixed by law.

It seems to us, therefore, that these acts do not deprive the prevailing party of the right originally secured to him by the code, of requiring the clerk to insert in the judgment his necessary disbursements, including therein the fees of officers (amongst whom now are the attorneys) and witnesses, as fixed by law, and that the only effect of these acts is to deprive the party of the amount previously allowed as costs, and give to his attorney the costs allowed by these acts, and to fix the amounts of the costs and fees of the officers therein named, and witnesses. We think, therefore, that the appellant's first ground cannot be sustained.

The second ground seems to have been taken under a misapprehension of the facts, as it is stated in a note to the "case" that the sheriff's bill of costs was itemized.

The third and fourth grounds may be considered together. It is quite true, that the theory of the law is that the fees of officers and witnesses are to be paid by the party who calls their services into requisition, but in itemizing the bill of disbursements to be inserted in the judgment, we do not see how the fact that these items are set down as sheriffs' or witnesses' fees, instead of being stated as cash paid sheriff or witnesses for their fees, can make any practical difference. The prevailing party is entitled to have the amount of such fees taxed, and if, as set down in the bill, they appear to be due to these officers and witnesses, rather than to the prevailing party, we do not see how the other party can be prejudiced thereby. These grounds cannot be sustained.

The fifth and sixth grounds depend upon the decision of questions of fact, upon which the finding below is conclusive, unless manifest error is shown. In the absence of any showing to the contrary, we would, of course, take it for granted that the clerk had satisfactory evidence before him that the witnesses had been *subpœnaed, and had attended court in obedience to such mandate. The production of the subpœna writ was not essential, as it may have been lost, and, if so, secondary evidence would have been competent and sufficient. Indeed, we are not prepared to say that it is necessary that a witness, who has attended court, should be able to show that he has been duly subpœnaed, in order to entitle him to charge the fees allowed by law; for if he attends voluntarily, we do not see why he should not be just as much entitled to his fees as if he had been compelled to attend.

The seventh ground has already been disposed of, inasmuch as we have seen that there is no statute which deprives the prevailing party of his right to require the clerk to insert in the judgment, the amount of costs now allowed attorneys, as well as the fees of the other officers of court, and of the witnesses, as a part of his necessary disbursements.

The eighth ground cannot be sustained. The act of 4th March, 1878, 16 Stat. 409, did amend Section 330 of the code, by inserting in it a proviso: "That in no case shall the plaintiff be allowed costs to an amount exceeding the amount of his verdict or recovery," but this section has been repealed by the act of 20th February, 1880, 17 Stat. 333, and the proviso, which had become a part of it, must also be regarded as repealed.

The ninth ground raises a question which does not seem to have been considered in the Circuit Court, and as we are merely called upon to correct the errors of that court, it is a matter of very little consequence what view the clerk took; for as it is quite certain that the Circuit judge did not commit the error assigned in that ground, it cannot avail the appellant here, even if sustainable at all. But under the view which we have taken of the case, it is not a practical question whether the clerk was right or wrong on this point.

It will be observed that we have confined ourselves to the questions raised by the exceptions, and have not undertaken to consider a question discussed in the argument—whether the sheriff should be allowed the fees, as fixed by law at the time the services were rendered, or as fixed at the time the case was heard and the verdict rendered—because no such question is presented by any of the exceptions. We may say, however, that while *the case of Kapp & Rothschild v. Loyns, 13 S. C. 288, does establish the proposition that "costs," under the code, are governed by the fee bill of force at the time of the verdict, and not at the time of the taxation, it does not touch the question presented in the argument here. For, as we have seen, there is a distinction between the costs allowed by the code to the prevailing party and "disbursements." The latter are presumed to have been made at the time the services were performed, and, therefore, should be taxed under the laws fixing their amount at that date, as the object is simply to re-imburse the prevailing party for the outlay, while the former were in the nature of damages, and "the rule of the statute prevailing at the time of the recovery of the verdict would be the proper measure of such damages as are ascertained by the court as matter of law, and included in the judgment." Kapp v. Loyns, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Lancaster, October, 1880.

This was an action commenced July 29th, 1873, by Dilla Small and Uriah Small, devisees of John B. Small, against Marion Small and others, heirs and devisees of the same John B. Small, and against Mary Small, his widow; and, upon the death of Mary Small, it was revived against her devisees. The Circuit decree, after a statement of the facts repeated in the opinion, was as follows:

At a previous hearing of this cause, Judge Thomson, in June, 1879, ordered that this question of title be submitted to a jury. This was, at a subsequent term of the court, done, whilst Judge Wallace presided, but no further hearing of the cause was had. The verdict of the jury was against the McAteers, and in favor of the children and grandchildren of John B. Small. But there is no record of the testimony submitted to the jury, nor of the questions of law raised before the court, nor have we any report of the case by the presiding judge by which we are to be enlightened. We are here without the aid which is usually to be derived from the verdict of a jury upon an issue of fact. From all that we can gather, it seems that the absence of the sheriff's deed to Mary Small was considered fatal to her claim of title, and decisive against the McAteers. It is clear that Mary Small, the execution creditor, became the purchaser at the sale and entitled to a deed, unless it appears that she either did not comply with the terms of sale, or that some other good cause prevented the sheriff from making titles. But, if the proceeds of sale were applicable to her fi. fa., Mary Small, by the purchase alone, without further compliance, became entitled to her deed. There is no evidence that she did not comply, nor that the money did not belong to her, and the presumptions are all in her favor—so much so, that it devolves *upon those resisting her title to show that she did not comply with her bid, and did not get titles; and nothing of the sort is shown, or attempted to be shown, so far as the court is informed. The verdict seems to be based upon the naked fact of the non-production of a deed.

Under the circumstances, we are not disposed to receive the verdict of the jury as a correct finding of the facts; and we find that, by virtue of the sale aforesaid, Mary Small became the lawful purchaser of this land, and either actually received titles from the sheriff, or became entitled to demand and receive the same, and that those claiming under her by devise are now entitled, in her stead, to receive titles. The fact that she devised the land is a strong circumstance in connection with the memorandum of levy and sale, going to show that she got titles. If the sale was valid, the McAteers must prevail in this action, and we are thus brought to the next and most interesting question submitted to us. It is contended by the plaintiffs that the lands of the testator, J. B. Small, devised or descended, cannot be submitted to the payment of a pecuniary legacy. That the devisees and heirs have an estate and a right which is superior to that of a mere pecuniary legacy, and the property of the one cannot be taken to pay the claim of the other, is a well-established general rule in law and equity. But, in the present case, the legacy is given in lieu of dower, and is regarded as standing in lieu of a debt due by the testator for the purchase-money of this estate, or inchoate right of the widow, which is highly favored in courts of justice, and in the eye of the law. Hence, a pecuniary provision in lieu of dower is regarded as standing on higher ground than a mere pecuniary legacy. It is an offer to buy the widow's estate in the husband's lands, and, when accepted by the widow, the contract of sale is complete, and the debt is due by the estate. If the personal assets be insufficient to pay other pecuniary legacies, this one does not abate ratably with them, but remains a charge upon the estate. See Stuart v. Carson, 1 Des. 500, and cases there cited; Heath v. Dendy, 1 Russ. 543; Isenhart v. Brown, 1 Edw. (N. Y.) 411. Now the McMullen tract of land has reverted to the estate of testator, and was distributable generally among his children. It *was no longer a specific devise, and hence was liable, in our judgment, to levy and sale to satisfy this claim of dower.

We find, therefore,

1. That it was sold lawfully, and that Mary Small became the purchaser thereof, and that her devise to the McAteers gave them a good title, as against the children and grandchildren of the testator, who, in this action, seek partition.

2. That if sold, but so as to give Mary Small no legal title, it is still liable to the lien of this fi. fa., and that her personal representatives can yet have the fi. fa. levied and the land sold.

But, as our finding is in favor of the McAteers in the first instance, it follows that the complaint must be dismissed, and that the children and grandchildren of J. B. Small, who are parties to this action, must pay the costs and disbursements thereof to the McAteers, and such is the judgment of the court.

The land described in the complaint having, by consent of parties, been previously sold, and the fund being in court, it was ordered to be paid over to the McAteers (defendants), or their attorneys.

The devisees of John B. Small, named in the complaint, appealed from the foregoing decree, and from the order of the court to carry out the same, on the exceptions stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. R. E. Allison, for appellants.
Mr. Ernest Moore, contra.

October 1st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action to partition a tract of land containing two hundred acres among "the children" of John B. Small, deceased, under a devise in his will. The land was claimed by Mary Small, the widow of the testator, and the question became one of title.

John B. Small died in 1856, possessed of a small unincumbered estate. He made provision by his will, (of which his sons, Uriah Small and John S. Small, were executors,) for his wife, Mary, and his children. Among other provisions he made the *following: He devised a tract of land, known as the "McMullen land," to his grandson, John Van Buren Tye, and if he should die without leaving wife or children, the same should revert and "be equally divided among his children." It does not appear that the said grandson ever had possession, as he died before he attained majority without wife or child. This proceeding was to partition this land among the children under the will.

The widow, Mary Small, claiming the land, was made a party, and died pending the litigation, having devised the land to her kinsmen, John and Richard McAteer, who were made parties, and claimed to set up her title.

The testator, by his will, gave to his widow, Mary, in lieu and bar of her right of dower five hundred dollars, "to be paid to her by my executors out of my estate all for the support of my wife, Mary, during her life, and, at her death, to be returned to my estate, to be equally divided amongst my children, whatever of my said legacy that may not be economically expended for the above purposes," &c. Mary, being dissatisfied with the amount allowed her for maintenance, filed a bill against the executors, Uriah Small and John S. Small, to compel assent to her legacy.

Chancellor Lesesne heard the case June 27th, 1867 and ordered the defendants to pay the plaintiffs, forthwith, one hundred dollars, and thirty dollars at the end of every three months, until the sum of $563.75 should be exhausted. This decree was not appealed from, but was enrolled and execution issued thereon, directing the sheriff "that of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements of said Uriah Small and John S. Small, defendants, you levy the same," &c. Under this execution, the land in question was sold as the property of the testator, John B. Small. At the sale, the plaintiff in execution, Mary Small, bid off the land for $40. It does not appear that she took a deed from the sheriff, but it is claimed that the land thereby became her property, passed under her will and now belongs to her devisees, the defendants.

This action was commenced in 1873. Judge Thomson, who first heard it, ordered an issue as to the title, which was tried *before Judge Wallace, 1879, and the jury found for the devisees, the actors in the issue. It was also referred to a referee, who took the testimony, and found that "the McAteers are entitled, if to anything, to the land herein sought to be partitioned," &c. The plaintiffs excepted to this report. The case was heard by Judge Hudson, who decided that the land belonged to the McAteers, and dismissed the complaint, and the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because the Circuit judge, contrary to the finding of the jury, has found, without any sufficient evidence, that the legal title to the land described in this complaint was vested in the McAteers, instead of the devisees of John B. Small, deceased.

2. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the onus of proving that Mary Small received from the sheriff no deed or title for the land in question, rested on the devisees of John B. Small, deceased.

3. "Because Mary Small and her devisees having claimed title to the land in question, it was incumbent on them to make out their chain of title, and the judge erred in ruling otherwise.

4. "Because the devisees of John B. Small, deceased, in the record of Mary Small against Uriah Small and John S. Small, as executors of John B. Small, deceased, to compel assent to the legacy of Mary Small, as offered in evidence in this cause, were not parties, and their rights as such devisees could, in no way, be affected by said record, and the sale of the land thereunder was a nullity so far as said devisees are concerned, and Mary Small could not, under said sale, take title even if she had received the deed from the sheriff.

5. "Because the Circuit judge erred in not sustaining the exceptions filed to the referee's report."

As to the first exception relating to the issue at law. This subject has lately been considered by the court, and it will not be necessary to do more than refer to the authority. This was an equity suit to be decided by a judge sitting as chancellor. Judge Thomson thought proper to order an issue to be tried by a jury. That was not to be final and decide the case, but to inform the conscience of the judge. "When a judge, sitting in what would have been called a suit in equity, orders an issue *upon any question of fact, it is an interlocutory order, made to enlighten his conscience, reserving the consideration of further questions in the cause until after the trial of the issue. * * * Judgment is not entered on the verdict, but it is reported, to be dealt with in connection with the whole case in which the issue was ordered. The judge who hears it finally, sitting as chancellor, is not required to regard the finding of the jury as conclusive of the fact submitted, any more than he would the report of a referee, but, on the contrary, is bound to consider all the evidence in the whole case, including the finding and the evidence to support it, and pronounce his judgment accordingly." Ivy v. Clawson, 14 S. C. 272.

The judge says: "There is no report of the testimony submitted to the jury, nor of the questions of law raised before the court, nor have we any report of the case by the presiding judge by which we are to be enlightened. Under these circumstances we are not disposed to receive the verdict of the jury as a correct finding of the facts," &c. The judge was not bound to consider the verdict as a correct finding of the facts, and, in refusing to do so, we cannot say that there was error.

The second and third exceptions relate to the absence of proof as to the execution of a deed by the sheriff to Mary Small. She was the plaintiff in execution, and not bound to pay her bid to the sheriff. He could not have recovered the money from her, as she was entitled to have it credited on her execution. Cobb v. Pressly, 2 McMull. 417. She had equitable title, which may be set up in this proceeding. McElmurray v. Ardis, 3 Strobh. 215. Equity regards that as done which ought to have been done.

The fourth exception raises a more difficult question. It is contended that when Mary Small sued Uriah Small and John S. Small, describing them as executors, not making the other devisees parties, their shares were not reached by the judgment, and did not pass under the sheriff's sale. It does not follow, necessarily, because the other devisees were not made parties to the suit against the executors, that the interest of such devisees could not be reached under a judgment and execution against the executors alone. This was manifestly not an action to make *land, in the possession of devisees, liable for a debt of the ancestor, but against the executors, as representatives of the estate. Whether the interest of devisees, not parties, was sold, depends upon two inquiries: First, whether the land was still in the hands of the executors, to be administered as assets of the estate of the testator, and, second, whether the claim was a debt of the estate, and the judgment pronounced thereon had the proper scope and form to give it a lien upon the property of the estate. It was held very early in our State, that, under the statute (5 Geo. II.) making land assets for the payment of debts, executors, whose duty it is to provide for debts, must, so far as creditors are concerned, have some qualified right to control lands devised, and in that view it was decided "that under a fi. fa. against an executor, lands in his possession, to be administered, might be sold, provided the fi. fa. directed levy of the lands, goods and chattels of the testator in the hands of the executor to be administered," &c. See Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C. 136, where the authorities are collected.

The above expresses the exact point ruled in the numerous cases from D'Urphey v. Nelson, 1 Brev. 289, down to the case above cited. Much that has been said in the cases as doctrine and dicta has been disapproved, and it has been frequently said that they are not to be extended one step further. Drayton v. Marshall, Rice Ch. 387 [33 Am. Dec. 84]; Jones v. Wightman, 2 Hill 579; Vernon v. Valk, 2 Hill Ch. 261; Bird v. Houze, Spears Eq. 250; Hull v. Hull, 3 Rich. Eq. 86.

Taking this as our guide, let us apply the principles to this case. We agree with the Circuit judge that the "McMullen land," being still undivided, was theoretically in the hands of the executors as assets to be administered, and might be sold under a judgment against the executor as such, without making the other devisees parties. We also agree with him that the claim of Mary Small, upon which she obtained judgment against the executors, being a provision in lieu and bar of dower, may be considered as a debt of the testator, but we think the judgment was only against the defendants named, and could sell nothing beyond their property. If it was Mary Small's purpose to recover against the executors, so as to bind the estate of *the testator "de bonis testatoris," the scope of the judgment was fatally defective in being against Uriah Small and John S. Small, individually, and in not ordering the money made "of the lands, goods and chattels of the testator in the hands of the executors to be administered." Both the judgment and execution ran against Uriah Small and John S. Small de bonis propriis, and Mary Small, the purchaser, acquired title to their individual shares, but she acquired no title to the other shares, which could only be legally sold under an execution running "de bonis testatoris."

It may be said that the form of the judgment and execution was a mere irregularity in the proceedings, which the purchaser at a sheriff's sale is not bound to look into. There is such a considerate rule, but we think this was more than a mere irregularity. Forms must be exact when the right is claimed to sell land without making the owner a party.

It does not appear from the proceedings that Mary Small sought to obtain a judgment which would bind the estate of her deceased husband. Her complaint was against the conduct of the executors. The character of her cause of action would seem to indicate that her purpose was to obtain precisely such a judgment as was rendered against Uriah Small and John S. Small as individuals; but, be that as it may, she cannot claim want of notice as an innocent purchaser. She was the plaintiff in execution, and is fairly chargeable with knowledge of the terms of her own process.

The children of John B. Small, except Uriah Small and John S. Small, have never been divested of their interest in the McMullen land. The defendants, John McAteer and Richard McAteer, are the owners of the shares of Uriah Small and John S. Small, and the said parties, as tenants in common, are entitled to partition the same.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified in accordance with the views herein expressed, and the case remanded for such orders as may be necessary to carry into effect this judgment.

Before Hudson, J., Chester, October, 1880.

Action was instituted in January, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant.

Mr. T. C. Gaston, contra.

October 1st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. On January 1st, 1872, the defendant, Abram H. Davega, gave to the plaintiff a sealed note in these words:

"$2,270.00. Chester, January 1st, 1872.

"Twelve months after date, I promise to pay Samuel W. Mobley, or order, twenty-two hundred and seventy dollars, with interest from date at twelve and a-half per cent. per annum, interest payable annually, for value received.

"Witness my hand and seal.

"A. H. Davega. [L. S.]"

On the same day, Davega executed a mortgage of a lot in the town of Chester to secure the payment of the note, the preamble *of which, describing the note, states "with interest thereon at the rate of twelve and a-half per cent. per annum from the first day of January, A. D. 1872, till paid, as in and by said sealed note and condition thereof, reference being thereunto had, will more fully appear," &c.

The interest on the note for one year was paid when it fell due, and sundry other payments were made at different times thereafter, but a large amount still remaining due, the plaintiff instituted these proceedings to foreclose the mortgage, and the question arose as to the manner in which interest should be calculated on the note—whether the note, after maturity, continued to bear interest at twelve and a-half per cent., according to its terms, or only the legal rate of seven per cent. per annum. The case came on to be heard before Judge Hudson, who referred it to the clerk of the court to compute the amount of interest due upon the note, who computed the interest up to date at twelve and a-half per cent., as indicated in the note, and reported that the sum of $2,696.71 was still due. Judge Hudson confirmed the report and decreed foreclosure for the sum stated, and the defendant appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in not holding that the special contract, as set forth in the sealed note mentioned in the pleadings, terminated at the expiration of the twelve months.

2. That he erred in not holding that after the termination of the special contract, interest could only be calculated at seven per cent. according to law.

3. Because his Honor erred in confirming the report of the referee, wherein interest was calculated on said sealed note at the rate of twelve and a-half per cent. per annum, with annual interest at that rate to the date of the decree.

The single question is: What was the contract of the parties—that is to say, what was their intention, as disclosed by the papers themselves? When this note and mortgage were executed, it was lawful for parties to agree in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, for any specific rate of interest. Did these parties intend that the note should bear interest at twelve and a-half per cent. after as well as before it fell due? The *usury law, subsequently passed, does not touch the inquiry. This court has declared that the rule is properly laid down in the case of Langston v. The S. C. Railroad Company, 2 S. C. 248, as follows: "If the debt bears a fixed rate of interest on its face higher or lower than that prescribed by law as the legal one, where the parties do not contract that it shall be the rate after the debt becomes due, the interest fixed by law attaches on it for the detention of the principal sum," &c.

Did these parties contract that twelve and a-half per cent. per annum "should be the rate after the debt became due?" The referee and Circuit judge both decided that they did. In cases of such concurrence upon a question of fact this court rarely disturbs the judgment. It is probable that the parties intended to make no contract as to the rate of interest beyond the time the note was to fall due, and if they did intend to provide for that period at all, is it not improbable that they would fix the interest at a lower rate after than before due? The use of money due, but still detained, is not less valuable than that which is detained by the terms of the contract.

In construing a paper, every word, if possible, should have its full effect. The terms of the note are "with interest from date at twelve and a-half per cent. per annum, interest payable annually." The word "annually" conveys a very distinct idea that the matter might not stop at the end of one year, but go into years beyond. It is defined as follows: "Yearly," "returning every year," "year by year." The use of the word indicates a mutual stipulation for an indefinite extension of credit, and annual payment of interest during the extension. Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341, and the authorities there cited.

Besides, in this case, the note and mortgage to secure it were executed at the same time, and the mortgage, a solemn deed of the defendant, described the note as bearing interest at twelve and a-half per cent. per annum from January 1st, 1872, "till paid." Mr. Jones, in his work on mortgages, says: "The note and mortgage, when made at the same time, and in relation to the same subject, are a part of one transaction, and constitute one contract, and must be construed together as if they were parts of one instrument. They explain each other so far as the indebted*ness is concerned. The mortgage usually describes the note, stating the date, amount, the makers of it, and the time when it is payable. Such description serves to identify the note. The mortgage may describe the debt as well, and thus may qualify the terms of the note. For instance, where a note was given, payable in five years from date, with interest at ten per cent., and, at the same time, a mortgage was given to secure the payment of the note, in which it was stipulated that the interest should be payable annually, the agreement was held to be that interest at ten per cent. was payable annually, and that foreclosure might be had for the non-payment of the interest." 1 Jones Mort. § 71.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

*Before Hudson, J., Lancaster, October, 1880.

These were actions by Walker & Trenholm against A. M. Kee and R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, assignees of Stevens & Cureton, and of Cureton, Ardrey & Co.; and by The Merchants' and Farmers' National Bank, of Charlotte, N. C., against the same defendants. The two actions were commenced in 1879, and were afterwards consolidated and heard together.

The object of the action, the contract of Kee, and other matters are stated in the opinion. From the testimony it appears that Walker & Trenholm received the notes assigned to them in consideration of moneys advanced by them to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and in ignorance of the consideration on which the endorsement of Stevens & Cureton was based. This endorsement was made by Cureton. They had knowledge of the contract with Kee which secured these notes, and relied upon it as security for the repayment of their advances.

The Charlotte Bank took the Kee note as collateral for notes then due them, and retained it by agreement to secure the payment of renewals of the bank notes. It was represented to them by Cureton at the time of its deposit that this Kee note was secured by the land for which it was, in part, given. The cashier of the bank saw Cureton endorse this note with the firm name of Stevens & Cureton, and at the same time with the firm name of Cureton, Ardrey & Co. The business of the two firms with the bank was done almost entirely by Cureton. The Massey note was as follows:

"$1,200.00.

"Fort Mills, S. C., Jan'y 4th, 1878.

"Sixty days after date we promise to pay to the order of B. H. Massey, twelve hundred dollars, negotiable and payable at Merchants' and Farmers' National Bank, Charlotte, N. C., with interest after maturity at eight per cent. per annum, value received.

(Signed) "Cureton, Ardrey & Co.

(Endorsed) "B. H. Massey."

This note was discounted by the Charlotte bank, having never before been in circulation. In North Carolina, interest at eight *per cent. by contract is not usurious. The president of the bank testified that the bank would not have received the notes but for the collaterals, and only valued the collaterals on Kee because of the supposed lien on the land; that "Stevens afterwards also explained the matters to us. * * * I am not sure that Stevens specially referred to the bond for titles, but certainly spoke to us of the Kee notes as good collaterals. Don't remember that he ever until lately told me that he was not aware that we had the Kee note."

*78

J. H. W. Stevens testified—

The notes of Mr. Kee belonged to Stevens & Cureton. Mr. Cureton endorsed them over to Cureton, Ardrey & Co.; but they were never the property of that firm. I was the managing partner of Stevens & Cureton. Cureton did much of the bank business, as he lived near the bank in Charlotte. After Cureton went to Fort Mills, I drew all the checks. Just before our firm made an assignment, I was, for the first time, made aware that the bank had the collaterals. I complained of Cureton for making the transfer. I turned the papers over to Cureton to allow him to raise money of Walker & Trenholm for Stevens & Cureton—T. J. Cureton was my partner, and often raised money for the firm. The note of A. M. Kee was never before pledged to raise money. Cureton had no instruction at all from me. I was dissatisfied as soon as I found out that he had transferred the notes to the bank of Charlotte for Cureton, Ardrey & Co.

T. J. Cureton testified—

I am a member of Stevens & Cureton and of Cureton, Ardrey & Co. The latter firm is largely indebted to the bank in Charlotte by the two notes in question. I pledged the note of A. M. Kee and the land contract upon which the note is based as collateral for the two $1,200. Stevens knew of the pledge only a short time before the assignment. At the time of the pledge the books of Stevens & Cureton show that Stevens & Cureton were largely indebted to Cureton, Ardrey & Co. I owned half interest in Stevens & Cureton, and one-third interest in Cureton, Ardrey & Co. I generally had to raise money from the bank. I did all the bank business, and would at no time have hesitated *to use collaterals of either firm. I never tried to conceal this transaction with the bank. Stevens often visited me.

Cross-examined—

I had many book-keepers. Sometimes kept books myself. Stevens had full opportunity to examine our books. He managed at Lancaster, and I at Fort Mills. The land sold to Kee was a good part of the assets of Stevens & Cureton, as it turned out. The bank of course knew when I endorsed and turned over the Kee note, that it was the property of Stevens & Cureton.

Re-direct examination—

The Kee notes belonged to Stevens & Cureton, and were by me transferred by endorsement to Walker & Trenholm and the bank, and before maturity.

The Circuit decree, after a statement of facts, was as follows:

In January, 1879, Walker & Trenholm brought suit against A. M. Kee, on the notes transferred to them, and recovered judgment. To this action the aforesaid assignees were co-defendants with Kee, and vigorously assailed the validity of the transfer of the notes upon the ground that T. J. Cureton negotiated the notes without authority from J. H. W. Stevens, and in fraud of the rights and interest of the firm of Stevens & Cureton. The defense failed, and upon appeal to the Supreme Court the judgment below was affirmed.

To the present suit, so far as the transfer to the bank is concerned, the same defense is interposed, and upon a similar state of facts.

It is scarcely necessary to say that the judgment of the Supreme Court so recently rendered as above stated, is decisive of this issue as to the title of the bank to the note aforesaid. We are thus brought to the consideration of the present case.

A. M. Kee, it is said, is insolvent, and neither Walker & Trenholm have been able to collect of him their judgment on the notes aforesaid, nor can the aforesaid bank collect the notes owned by it. Of Kee's insolvency, there is no question. Hence both parties have united in this action, the object of which is to subject the land purchased of

Stevens & Cureton, by Kee, to *the payment of the notes given for the purchase-money. The title to this land never passed from Stevens & Cureton until the assignment to Miller and Cureton, February 18th, 1878, and then the transfer was made subject to the contract of A. M. Kee, who makes no defense to this action, but who, if able to pay, only desires to know to whom he can rightfully make payment. The assignees claim said land, and deny plaintiff's right in any manner to subject it to the payment of the judgments and notes which they hold against Kee; and it is here that the real issue of the cause arises. I am clearly of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief demanded. Neither Stevens & Cureton, nor their assignees, have any interest in this land sold to Kee, except that the fee is in the assignees, subject to the contract with Kee. By the sale of the notes, every dollar of the money due for the land has been realized by the vendors. To the holders of the notes, Kee is alone responsible, and upon payment to them of these notes, could sue out titles from Stevens & Cureton (or rather their assignees), and no resistance could be raised to his demand for titles upon paying the notes. When the notes were traded, they were accompanied by copies of the contract with Kee, which was represented as a security strengthening the notes; and, although there was no written assignment of this contract to Walker & Trenholm, nor to the bank, yet the notes were represented as resting upon it as security, and were bought on the faith of this supposed security. The purchasers are accordingly, as against Kee, entitled to all the remedies for enforcing payment of the notes which Stevens & Cureton possessed. They had a right, on Kee's default, to have the land sold and proceeds applied to the payment of their notes, and to this remedy these vendees, the plaintiffs, are equally entitled, just as clearly as would be the purchaser of a note secured by a mortgage entitled to the foreclosure of the mortgage. The sale of a note carries with it all the liens, legal or equitable, given to secure it.

We deem it unnecessary to cite many of the numerous authorities bearing on this issue in support of the view. In 1 Jones on Mortgages, § 235 et sequentia, is to be found a full and clear exposition of this doctrine. The author says: "An *assignee of a note or bond, given for purchase-money by one who has taken a contract of sale, or who has taken a conveyance in which a lien on the land is expressly reserved, like the assignee of a note secured by mortgage, is entitled to the benefit of the security, and may enforce specific performance of the contract of sale, or may enforce the lien reserved." The lien is regarded as incident to the debt. The discussion is full and very forcible, and further extracts are unnecessary. I refer to this book for further information. The plaintiffs are entitled to demand of Kee a specific performance of his contract by a given day, and on his failure to comply, they are entitled to have the land sold by order of this court, and titles made to the purchaser so as to bar and foreclose the said Kee, Stevens & Cureton, and all persons claiming under them, of all right to redemption. In the application of proceeds of sale, Walker & Trenholm, being the oldest assignees, are entitled to be first paid, and then the Merchants' and Farmers' Bank, and it is so adjudged. Let the plaintiffs prepare the necessary order to carry this decree into effect—an order in the nature of a judgment of foreclosure and sale.

It was brought to the attention of the Circuit judge, that the clerk held an obligation of Kee for rent, described in the following receipt:

Received of R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton, a lien in their favor as assignees, signed by A. M. Kee, and two hundred dollars in cash; said lien being for $650, which lien and money is in controversy in the above action, and to be by me turned over to the parties who may be entitled by the judgment of the court. The depositing of said money is in no way to prejudice the rights of any of the parties, but is made only to prevent litigation, trouble, and expense, in an effort now being made to bind said Miller and Cureton to security for rent of the place on which A. M. Kee now resides, and is one of the objects of said suit.

D. A. Williams, Clerk C. C. P.

July 16th, 1880.

*Thereupon the following order was passed:

It is further ordered, that D. A. Williams, as clerk of this court, do proceed to enforce the collection of the rent due on the rental obligation or lien represented to have been placed in his hands by the said assignees of Stevens & Cureton, to secure rent for the same lands for the present year, the same having been deposited with said clerk as security—a security to said plaintiffs in case they finally succeed in this action, and that said clerk do hold the proceeds of rent until the further order of this court.

There was still another order directing details of sale, execution of papers, application of proceeds and that all the parties to this action be barred of any further right, title, &c., to the Kee land.

The exceptions are copied in the opinion.

Messrs. Wylie & Hough, for appellants.

The question of title to the notes held by Walker & Trenholm has been settled by the case in 14 S. C. 142. But the bank had knowledge of the misappropriation of the assets of Stevens & Cureton for the purposes of Cureton, Ardrey & Co.; the bank is therefore guilty of collusion, and has no title to the note. 3 Kent 41; 4 Johns. 251; 8 Ves. 542; Story Part. § 133.

The only evidence of indebtedness by Stevens & Cureton to Cureton, Ardrey & Co. is the testimony of Cureton in reply. It is not alleged in the pleadings, the notes were included in the general assignment, the assignees say nothing of any such indebtedness, and Stevens had no knowledge of the endorsement of the notes for such purpose.

The title to the notes gives no lien on the land. There was no deposit of the contract—only an exhibit of a copy. Story Eq. Jur. § 1020. Stevens & Cureton had no lien; they had title, and this they never transferred. There is no vendor's lien in this State. 2 Des. 509. The delivery of the notes would not pass the legal title, and the equitable title was in Kee. A partner has no right to assign real estate or a mortgage to *pay a creditor of the partnership. Story Part. §§ 92, 94, 101. Walker & Trenholm have paid less than the amount of the Kee notes; how then can they enforce a conveyance? The question of usury will not be discussed. The assignees are certainly entitled to the rents until sale of the land. This whole doctrine of equitable mortgages has been regarded by some English judges as in violation of the statute of frauds.

Messrs. Allison & Connors, contra.

October 1st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. The firm of "Stevens & Cureton," consisting of J. H. W. Stevens and Thomas J. Cureton, were in business at Lancaster Court House, and that of "Cureton, Ardrey & Co.," consisting of the same partners and one J. W. Ardrey, at Fort Mills, York county.

On December 18th, 1876, Stevens & Cureton, being the owners of several tracts of land, contracted to sell the same to A. M. Kee for the sum of $9,025. The contract was in writing, signed by all the parties, and, among other things, contained this provision: "For the payment of the purchase-money the party of the second part is to execute to the parties of the first part, at this signing, a warranted right and title to the house and lot in Fort Mills, S. C., known as the 'Kee house,' upon which the said Kee now resides, valued at fifteen hundred dollars in this trade, and four promissory notes of this date [describing them in amounts, and payable in 1877–78 and '79]. Now, should the party of the second part pay, or cause to be paid, all the said notes, &c., at maturity, then, when the last note is paid, the parties of the first part bind themselves to make to the party of the second part a warranted deed of right and title to the lands above described; but, should the party of the second part fail to pay, or cause to be paid, either or any of the above described notes, as they shall mature, then this contract becomes null and void and of none effect, and the parties of the first part shall have the right to peaceable possession to said above described lands, with a forfeiture on the part of the party of the *second part of all payments, &c., which may have been made previously, &c." Four notes were executed in accordance with the agreement. The "Kee house" was conveyed and Kee went into possession of the lands sold.

During the year 1877, T. J. Cureton endorsed the second and third of the notes to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and they transferred them for value to Walker & Trenholm, of Charleston. Prior to February 18th, 1878, the said T. J. Cureton also endorsed the fourth and last note to the firm of Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and they, being indebted to the Merchants' and Farmers' National Bank of Charlotte, N. C., to an amount exceeding $2,400, transferred and delivered to said bank the aforesaid last note for $2,325, collateral security for their debt. These transfers respectively were made before the notes fell due. T. J. Cureton was the actor in both transactions, and made the transfers first by Stevens & Cureton to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and then by Cureton, Ardrey & Co. to the parties.

On February 18th, 1878, each firm made an assignment for the benefit of creditors to the same assignees—R. M. Miller and T. G. Cureton. In the assignment of Stevens & Cureton was included the lands which had been sold as aforesaid, "subject to a contract of sale to A. M. Kee."

In January, 1879, Walker & Trenholm sued A. M. Kee on the note transferred to them and recovered judgment. To that action the aforesaid assignees were parties, and denied the title of plaintiffs to the notes on the ground that T. J. Cureton negotiated the notes without authority from Stevens, and in fraud of the rights of Stevens & Cureton. The defense failed, and, upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the judgment below was affirmed.

A. M. Kee being insolvent, Walker & Trenholm holding their note with judgment on it, and the bank holding the note transferred to them, have united and instituted this action to compel specific performance of the land agreement, and, as incidental thereto, to sell the land in payment of their debts. Judge Hudson heard the case and decreed for the plaintiffs, and ordered the land sold.

It seems that Kee, the purchaser, upon failure to comply with *the terms of sale, acknowledged his liability to pay rent, and gave an obligation to pay it, which, under some agreement, had been deposited with the clerk of the court, "to be turned over to the parties who may be entitled by the judgment of the court." In a supplemental order Judge Hudson directed the clerk to collect this obligation and hold the proceeds subject to the future order of the court. From these orders the defendants appeal to this court on the following exceptions:

1. "Because his Honor erred in finding as fact that T. J. Cureton endorsed the fourth and last note to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., being a note made by A. M. Kee to Stevens & Cureton for $2,325, when the evidence established the fact that it never was endorsed to them and never belonged to them.

2. "Because the evidence established the fact, and his Honor should have so found, that the said note was in the hands of T. J. Cureton for the purpose of raising money for Stevens & Cureton, and that T. J. Cureton, without the knowledge and consent of J. H. W. Stevens, transferred the said note to Merchants' and Farmers' National Bank, one of the plaintiffs, for the debt of Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and that said bank knew the note belonged to Stevens & Cureton, and, at the time of said transfer, the said T. J. Cureton, in presence of J. R. Holland, cashier of the bank, endorsed the firm name of Stevens & Cureton thereon.

3. "Because the transfer and endorsement of the said note of $2,325 by T. J. Cureton, under the facts and circumstances, was a fraud on J. H. W. Stevens, and Stevens & Cureton, and their creditors, and said bank, having knowledge of said facts and circumstances, had no right to receive the same, and was guilty of fraud in so doing, and his Honor should have so held, or, at least, that the bank acquired no title to the note, but that it belonged to defendants as assignees of Stevens & Cureton.

4. "Because his Honor erred in finding, as fact, that copies of the contract for purchase of the land by Kee accompanied the delivery of the notes to plaintiffs, when, from the evidence, such copy accompanied only the notes delivered to Walker & Trenholm, and none accompanied the one delivered to the bank, and because his Honor failed to find, when plaintiffs' evidence *established the fact, that the copy so furnished to Walker & Trenholm by Cureton, Ardrey & Co., or T. J. Cureton, was by them returned.

5. "Because neither the plaintiffs, Walker & Trenholm, nor the Merchants' and Farmers' Bank, have any lien, equitable or otherwise, on the said Kee lands, and his Honor should have so held.

6. "Because there was no assignment of said land, equitable or otherwise, by Stevens & Cureton to plaintiffs, or either of them, or to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., or by them to plaintiffs, or any right or interest in said land, or charge created on the same to pay plaintiffs' claims, and his Honor should have so held.

7. "Because Kee, under the terms of the contract for purchase, having forfeited all right to the land before this action, and having surrendered the same to the assignees, his Honor erred in holding 'that no resistance could be raised to his demand for titles upon payment of the notes, and that plaintiffs are entitled to demand of him specific performance, and upon his failure so to do, to have the land sold and titles made to purchasers so as to bar and foreclose said assignees, and Stevens & Cureton, and those claiming under them.'

8. "Because, if plaintiffs stand in the place of Kee, they are not entitled to the land, or to have it sold for their claims, unless they pay to these defendants the balance of notes in their hands over and above their claims respectively against Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and his Honor should have so held.

9. "Because the note of $1,200, by Cureton, Ardrey & Co., to B. H. Massey, and by him endorsed to said bank, partly to secure which the Kee note of $2,325 was deposited, as it is alleged, as collateral, bears on its face interest at eight per cent., and is, therefore, usurious, and his Honor should have so found, and allowed no interest or costs to said bank.

10. "Because his Honor, by an order after the decree, to wit, on October 8th, 1[illegible] erred in directing D. A. Williams, clerk, to take possession of and hold the rents of the said land, which plaintiffs are not entitled to, but which belong to these defendants.

*11. "Because the decrees and orders thereon are contrary to the law and evidence."

The first four exceptions relate to a question of fact, viz., whether Stevens & Cureton endorsed bona fide the fourth note to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and they transferred the same for valuable consideration to the bank. It is insisted by the assignees that the bank has no title to the note they hold, for the reason that it was given to Stevens & Cureton, and could not be assigned by one of the firm to secure a debt due by himself or another person or firm; that T. J. Cureton could not assign a note of Stevens & Cureton to secure a debt due by Cureton, Ardrey & Co. It has been already decided that the plaintiffs, Walker & Trenholm, have title to the notes assigned to them, and judgment has been rendered upon them in their favor against Kee. See opinion in former case of Walker & Trenholm v. Kee, 14 S. C. 142. The same question substantially, which was then decided, is now renewed as to the note transferred to the bank. The steps taken in the assignment to the bank were identical with those which were taken in the assignment to Walker & Trenholm. We do not see any particular in which the testimony in one case differs essentially from that in the other. In both, T. J. Cureton, for the firm of Stevens & Cureton, first assigned to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and then in their name assigned as collateral security for debts of Cureton, Ardrey & Co. T. J. Cureton was a partner of both firms, and, as such, was the agent of each as to all transactions within the scope of its business. Stevens & Cureton were indebted to Cureton, Ardrey & Co., and it was within the authority of either of the partners of the firm of Stevens & Cureton to assign a note belonging to them to secure that debt. So Cureton, Ardrey & Co. were indebted to the bank, and it was within the scope of T. J. Cureton's agency, as partner of that firm, to transfer a note belonging to it as collateral security for that debt, whether such note was originally given to them, or they had acquired it by assignment. Cureton cannot, and does not, object to the transfer, and it seems, from the testimony, that Stevens, the other partner, some time after the transfer, confirmed it, or at least informed the president of the bank that *"the Kee note was a good collateral." The bank certainly has possession of the note, and we concur with the Circuit judge that there was no proof of fraud in the transfers by which it reached the plaintiffs, and that they have title to the same.

The other exceptions make a question of law. It is insisted that even if the transfer of the notes to the plaintiffs respectively were valid, and gave them the legal title thereto, that the transfer alone did not operate as an assignment of the land or any charge upon it, the legal title to which is still in the defendants as assignees of Stevens & Cureton, and, consequently, the plaintiffs are not entitled to have it sold towards payment of the notes.

It is true that Kee executed no mortgage to secure the purchase-money of the land. It is also true that, according to our decided cases, we have not, in this State, what is known technically as "the vendor's lien," as declared and enforced in the English Chancery—that is, a lien upon land sold to secure the purchase-money, whether the vendor has, or has not, executed titles to the vendee. But as to all executory contracts for the sale of land in which the title-deed is not executed, but the vendor gives a bond for titles, we have what is equivalent to the vendor's lien in the well-recognized equity doctrine of specific performance of contracts for the sale of land. In reference to the doctrine of specific performance, equity makes a difference in contracts concerning land and those about personalty. As to the latter, specific performance will not generally be decreed, for the reason that no particular or peculiar value is attached to any one thing over another of the same kind, and compensation in damages given by a law court will meet the full merits as well as the full object of the complaint. "But in contracts respecting a specific messuage or parcel of land, the same considerations do not ordinarily apply. The locality, character, vicinage, soil, easements or accommodations of the land generally, may give it a peculiar and special value in the eyes of a purchaser. * * * and, therefore, compensation in damages would not be adequate relief," &c. Story Eq. § 146.

After some controversy upon the subject, this principle is well established in this State as applying both to the vendor and *vendee of lands. The leading case upon the subject is that of Gregorie v. Bulow, reported in Richardson's Equity Cases, 235, which, overruling the case of Bacon v. Roche, previously decided, held that "a vendor may sustain a bill against a vendee for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of the land." In that case Judge O'Neall laid down the principle which has ever since been followed. He said: "It is conceded that the vendee may come into equity to compel the vendor to perform by executing titles, and that upon this bill the court will decree him to pay or secure the money, according to his contract, before they decree the execution of titles. If the court has the power to relieve one of the parties in the same contract, must it not, of necessity, possess the same power as to the other? Contracts for the sale of land in equity are regarded as dependent; the vendor cannot be compelled to part with his land until the vendee pays or secures to be paid the purchase-money, and the vendee cannot be compelled to pay until he receives a good and sufficient title in law," &c.

Although we do not recognize what is known as "the vendor's lien," we regard the doctrine of specific performance as to executory contracts for land as settled beyond controversy in this State. The contract in this case was executory, and the vendors, Stevens & Cureton, had the right to require specific performance, and the only question is whether the assignees of the notes have the same right.

Some confusion seems to have arisen from regarding the notes as nothing more than promissory notes, pure and simple. The fact is, they sprung out of the agreement for the sale of the land and are only a part of it. They were executed at the same time with the agreement, and have on their face the statement that they were given "in part payment for a tract of land," &c. They must be considered in connection with the agreement, and, thus considered, the papers constitute, both in form and substance, an executory contract for the sale of land. The transfer of these notes, accompanied with the agreement or with knowledge of its existence and contents, carried to those who acquired title to them all the rights which attached to them in the hands of Stevens & Cureton. The transfer was in fact, as it was *intended to be, not merely an endorsement of the paper as promissory notes, but a sale and transfer of the land trade and all rights incident thereto. The plaintiffs, before they accepted the notes, were informed of the nature of the land trade and the connection of the notes therewith; indeed, the notes, upon their face, gave such information, and the plaintiffs have now the same rights which Stevens & Cureton had originally to ask specific performance. 1 Jones Mort. § 235; Muller v. Wadlington, 5 S. C. 346.

Judge Story says: "It may also be stated that, in general, where the specific execution of a contract respecting lands will be decreed between the parties, it will be decreed between all persons claiming under them in privity of estate, or of representation, or of title, unless other controlling equities are interposed. If a person purchases lands with knowledge of a prior contract to convey them, he is, as we have seen, affected by all the equities which affected the lands in the hands of the vendor. The lien of the vendor for the purchase-money attaches to them, and such purchaser may be compelled either to pay the purchase-money, or to surrender up the land, or to have it sold for the benefit of the vendor. * * * On the other hand, if the vendee, under such a contract, conveys the same to a third person, the latter, upon paying the purchase-money, may compel the vendor, and any person claiming under him in privity, or as a purchaser with notice, to complete the contract and convey the title to him. The general principle upon which this doctrine proceeds is, that from the time of the contract for the sale of the land, the vendor as to the land becomes a trustee for the vendee, and the vendee as to the purchase-money a trustee for the vendor, who has a lien upon the land therefor. And every subsequent purchaser from either, with notice, becomes subject to the same equities as the party would from whom he purchased." Story Eq. §§ 788, 789.

We are not called upon to decide whether A. M. Kee, who entered upon the land under a contract to purchase, and paid part of the purchase-money, would be liable, in an action for specific performance, to account for rents and profits of the lands before judgment. It seems that under the provision in *the agreement as to forfeiture, or for some other reason, the purchaser admitted his liability to pay rent after a certain time, and gave a rent obligation, which is now in the hands of the clerk, "to be turned over to the parties who may be entitled by the judgment of the court." Having determined that all the rights of Stevens & Cureton, quoad the notes, were transferred to the respondents and that they have the right to ask specific performance of the agreement as to the land for their payment, it would seem to follow that the rents, an incident of the land, should go with it. In the view we take, Stevens & Cureton have been paid in full for the land, and they have no further interest in it or its products. In the beginning they got the "Kee lot," and, as we suppose, the first note when it fell due, and then they transferred, in payment of their debts, the remaining notes. True, their assignees have still the legal title to the land, but they hold it as trustees for the payment of the notes still due, and, surely, they cannot claim the rents by any higher right. The notes having been transferred only as collateral to secure debts to the plaintiffs, respectively, the rights of plaintiffs, as herein determined, must, of course, cease as soon as their debts are paid.

The question of usury was properly abandoned.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

*The purpose of Section 8, of Article XIV., of the Constitution of 1868, was to protect the property of a married woman from liability for her husband's debts, and to release it from his control, but not to confer new powers by a change of her legal status. This section, therefore, has no application to the wife's right of dower.

Before Fraser, J., Barnwell, September, 1879.

The case is stated in the brief as H. F. Townsend against Simon Brown and others, In re M. M. Duncan, demandant, against Simon Brown, defendant. The only point of the case stated in the brief, or noticed in the Circuit decree, is the question of Mrs. Duncan's right to dower in a tract of land known as the Philip Walker tract, conveyed to Brown by J. G. W. Duncan for value in 1870. In 1872, J. Allen Duncan executed a deed wherein, after reciting the deed of J. G. W. Duncan, his father, and stating that it was made under the belief that his father was owner in fee of the land, (whereas he was only entitled to a life-estate, with remainder to J. A. Duncan,) he, in consideration of the premises and five dollars, remised, released and quit-claimed unto Simon Brown, his heirs and assigns, this same tract of land, then in Brown's possession. Mrs. Duncan's name appears only in the conclusion which is stated in the opinion of this court.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

It seems never to have been questioned that a woman, by an ante-nuptial contract, could bar herself of the right of dower, and the statutes prescribing the mode of release by a married *woman were passed merely to remove a disability growing out of her condition as a married woman. The general power of alienation conferred by the present constitution cannot be restricted to any one mode which may be prescribed by an act of the legislature, even if it should be held that such was the proper construction of the act on the subject of release of dower. If the words used were only an agreement to release dower, a very serious question might arise as to the constitutionality of the act which enlarges the powers of a married woman so as to make her a feme sole in all matters of contract. In the view which I take of the words used in the deed of her husband by Mrs. Duncan, they amount to a confirmation of his deed by a release of her right of dower, and are an alienation in the sense of the constitution, and she is thereby barred of her right of dower.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that Mrs. Madeline M. Duncan is barred of her right of dower in "the Philip Walker tract," and that the other parties to the action have leave to apply for such further orders as may be necessary for the protection of their interests in the progress of the case for the adjustment of the rights of parties to the action.

From this decree, Mrs. Duncan appealed. Her exceptions are not stated.

Messrs. J. C. Davant and F. W. Fickling, for appellant.

Her separate examination was required because she was under the power and authority of her husband, not for want of reason and discretion. 3 Atk. 695; 2 Kent 149. The private examination in this State took the place of fines. 3 Stat. 302; 7 Stat. 196, 233; 5 Id. 256; 14 Rich. Eq. 290. Under the law, prior to 1868, this deed would be ineffectual to bar dower; but not since the constitution of that year. That statutes in derogation of common law are to be construed strictly is a rule not applicable to a constitution. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L., notes 267, 268; Cooley Const. Lim. 60. This rule is now applied with much discrimination, even in the construction of statutes, which are often remedial, and such are the statutes removing the disabilities of married women. Sedgw., note 271; 2 N. & McC. 147; 1 Bl. Com. 445; 6 Am. L. Rev. 57. A liberal construction obtained in Witsell v. Charleston, 7 S. C. 88. A literal interpretation would not remedy the evils which resulted in 1 Brev. 486; 2 N. & McC. 147; 5 Rich. Eq. 531; 9 Rich. Eq. 119. The constitutional provision conferred upon the woman absolute power over all her property, whether formerly subject to the husband's marital rights or not. The intention was to put married women on same footing with all other persons sui juris. Separate property was not used in its technical sense. She is now recognized as able to think and act for herself. A privy examination would be a badge of former inferiority. If she has power to dispose of property in possession, she has the same power as others to dispose of expectant and contingent interests, and even of an inchoate right of dower. 7 S. C. 88; Spears Eq. 49; 12 Rich. Eq. 376; 2 Jarm. 181; 9 Ind. 202; 21 Ill. 171; 10 S. C. 428; 12 S. C. 465; 2 Hill Ch. 564; 3 Paige 440; 13 Pet. 107; 2 Scrib. Dow. 8; Park Dow. 237; 3 Strobh. 81. These authorities show that the inchoate right of dower is property. But for the wife's disability, it would always have been alienable by release, and this disability was for her own protection against her husband's influence; but now she is sui juris.

The act of 1870, repealed by implication the act of 1795. The re-enactment of the two acts, in the General Statutes, *enables the wife to relinquish her dower under the act of 1795, before an officer, or to release it under the act of 1870 by formal deed.

October 3d, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. On the 4th of October, 1872, J. Allen Duncan made a quit-claim deed to respondent, Simon Brown, for a certain tract of land, which deed concluded as follows: "In testimony whereof, I, the said J. Allen Duncan, and my wife, Madeline M. Duncan, in token of her renunciation and release of all right of dower in the premises, hereunto set our hands and seals, the day and year hereunto written, to wit, 4th October, 1872." The deed was signed and sealed, and purports to have been delivered by Mr. and Mrs. Duncan in the presence of two witnesses, and was duly proved and recorded. After the death of J. Allen Duncan, his widow, the said Madeline M. Duncan, set up a claim for dower in the premises described in the deed. The Circuit judge held that under the provisions of the constitution of 1868, the execution of the deed by Mrs. Duncan was effectual to bar her of her dower, and from his judgment this appeal has been taken. So that the only question raised here is whether Mrs. Duncan is barred of her dower by reason of having executed the above-mentioned deed.

It is conceded that prior to the adoption of the present constitution the appellant would not have been barred of her dower, and the inquiry, therefore, is whether there is anything in the constitution of 1868, or any act passed in pursuance of its provisions, which will render the execution of said deed effectual to bar her of her dower. The portion of the constitution relied on for the purpose is Section 8, Article XIV., which is in the following words: "The real and personal property of a woman, held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may thereafter acquire, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts, but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried; provided, that no gift or grant from the husband to the wife shall be detrimental to the just claims of his creditors."

*The leading object of the section just quoted appears to have been to relieve the property of the wife from liability for the husband's debts, and to release it from any control by the husband; for the first provision is to exempt the wife's property from levy and sale for the debts of the husband, and the second is to authorize the wife to dispose of her property without, or even against, the consent of the husband. The real purpose, therefore, does not appear to have been to confer any new powers upon a married woman by changing her legal status, but simply to protect her property from liability for her husband's debts, and to release it even from the partial control of the husband by dispensing with the necessity which had previously existed of obtaining his assent and concurrence before her property could be disposed of. These seem to have been the sole purposes of the clause in question, and as they can be fully accomplished without, in any manner, affecting any of the other relations between husband and wife growing out of marriage, we think we are bound to confine the operation of this clause of the constitution to its declared and manifest objects. If it be so confined, then, it is obvious that the clause in no way applies to the wife's right of dower—a right which the law has always regarded as an object of watchful solicitude and jealous care—for it is not, and could not, in any way be made liable for the husband's debts, nor could it in any way be made subject to the marital rights of the husband, and thus render necessary his assent to and concurrence in any disposition of it. We think it clear, therefore, that the abovementioned section of the constitution was never designed to apply to the wife's right of dower, and that it cannot have the effect of rendering valid, as a renunciation of dower, the deed of October 4th, 1872.

But even if it should be conceded that the object and effect of this clause of the constitution was to make a married woman sui juris in all respects, we see no reason why the legislature might not require a privy examination of the wife as evidence of the fact that she had really signed the deed, just as it might require the deed of a corporation or a partnership to be executed with certain particular formalities, as the only conclu*sive evidence of the fact that such deed was, in fact, the deed of the corporation or partnership.

It is contended, however, that if the constitution does not render the conveyance effectual as a renunciation of dower, the act of January 27th, 1870, (14 Stat. 325, incorporated in the Gen. Stat., Chap. C., p. 482,) does.

Without stopping now to consider whether this act, in so far as it purports to go beyond the constitution and confer upon married women other powers than those specially provided for in that instrument, can be regarded as constitutional—a question which has been made the subject of grave argument in another case now before us†—and without intending now to indicate any opinion upon that question, but assuming, for the present, the constitutionality of the act, we will proceed to examine the act with a view to ascertain whether it contains any provision which will give it the effect contended for. The particular section of the act relied upon for this purpose is the second, which is in the following words: "A married woman shall have power to bequeath, devise or convey her separate property in the same manner and to the same extent as if she were unmarried; and if, dying intestate, her property shall descend in the same manner as the law provides for the descent of the property of husbands; and all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind shall be executed by her in the same manner, and have the same legal force and effect as if she were unmarried." These last words of the section by which it is provided that all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind shall be executed by a married woman, in the same manner as if she were single, it is contended, dispenses with the necessity for the privy examination required, in case of a renunciation of dower, by the act of 1795, incorporated in Gen. Stat., Chap. 83, p. 429. To give such an effect to these words would violate fundamental rules of construction. It will be observed that the act of 1870, as originally passed, does not, in terms, repeal the provisions of the act of 1795 in reference to the mode by which a married woman could renounce her dower, *nor does it, in any way, refer to that act, but, on the contrary, its provisions seem to be confined to the kind of property therein spoken of—that is, such property as could be levied on and sold for the debts of the husband, from which it is declared exempted and is designated as the wife's "separate property." Then, in the second section, provision is made for the manner in which such property—that which had just been designated as the wife's "separate property"—may be disposed of. Hence, the proper reading of this section would be that "all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind," pertaining to the property just spoken of, "shall be executed in the same manner and have the same legal force and effect as if she were unmarried."

Again: after the passage of the act of 1870, it, as well as the act of 1795, by which the privy examination of the wife was required to render a renunciation of dower effectual, was incorporated in the General Statutes, and, therefore, by well-settled rules of construction, we must, if possible, so construe the provisions of each as to make them both effectual, and this can be done by giving to the act of 1870 the construction which we have placed upon it, by which both acts are given full force and effect in the sphere within which each was designed to operate.

It will not do to say, as has been said, that these two acts thus incorporated into the General Statutes may be harmonized by construing them both as merely permissive, and that a married woman is not restricted to the mode of relinquishment provided for in either of these acts, but may, at her option, adopt either mode, and the one so adopted shall be effectual; for, besides the fact that such a construction would practically emasculate the act of 1795, and render its provisions wholly ineffectual and nugatory, it is sufficient to say that the provisions of the act of 1870 are mandatory—"shall be executed by her in the same manner," &c.—and could not, therefore, be disregarded with impunity.

There not only never has been any intimation of a design to repeal or annul the provisions of the act of 1795 in regard to the mode by which a married woman could release her right of dower, but exactly the contrary appears. In less than one year after the adoption of the General Statutes, the legislature, by the act of 29th January, 1873,

(15 Stat. 324,) repealed those *sections of Chapter 83 of the General Statutes, providing a mode by which a married woman might convey any real estate in which she had an estate of inheritance, doubtless for the reason that the mode by which a married woman could convey her real estate was sufficiently provided for by the constitution and the act of 1870, but they left untouched those sections of the same chapter providing the mode by which a married woman might release her inchoate right of dower in lands of which her husband might be seized during coverture, thus plainly showing, not only that the legislature did not regard the provisions of the act of 1795, in reference to dower, as affected by the constitution, but, what is more important, exhibiting an unmistakable purpose not to repeal the provisions in reference to dower, and an intention that the provisions of the act of 1870 were not to apply in cases of renunciation of dower.

We see nothing in the constitution or in the act of 1870 which can have the effect of depriving a married woman of the safeguard which the law has, from time immemorial, thrown around her highly favored right of dower by requiring a privy examination as a condition precedent to an effectual renunciation of dower, and we are, therefore, of opinion that the conveyance executed by Mrs. Duncan cannot have the effect of barring her of her right to dower in the premises described in such conveyance.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, July, 1879.

Action by the State of South Carolina on the relation of A. Detheridge against Perry D. Gilreath, sheriff of Greenville county, and the sureties on his bond. The opinion states the case. Verdict was for defendants.

Mr. E. F. Stokes, for appellant.

Messrs. T. Q. Donaldson and W. H. Perry, contra.

October 3d, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The action in this case, which was commenced on October 1st, 1878, was brought against the defendant, Gilreath, as sheriff, and the sureties on his official bond, to *recover damages for a breach of official duty in failing and refusing to enforce an execution in favor of the plaintiff, Detheridge, against R. H. Earle.

For a proper understanding of the questions made by this appeal, it will be necessary to make a brief statement of facts gathered from the record in this case, and other records used in the argument here of other branches of the multiform proceedings which have been had in the case of Detheridge v. Earle.

On September 11th, 1873, A. Detheridge recovered a verdict against R. H. Earle for the sum of three hundred and seventy-four dollars and two cents, but for some reason, not disclosed by these proceedings, no judgment was entered upon this verdict until April 27th, 1878, when judgment was entered for the amount of the verdict as above stated, with interest from the date of the verdict, and also for five hundred and ninety dollars and ten cents costs, and an execution issued to enforce the same. On May 7th, 1878, notice was given that the defendant excepted to the adjustment of costs as entered in the judgment, and of a motion to re-adjust the same, and, also, of a motion to set aside the judgment as illegally entered. These motions were heard at July term, 1878, as well as a rule on the sheriff, for failing to enforce the above-mentioned execution. On July 30th, 1878, Judge Kershaw granted two orders, one setting aside the taxation of costs, directing a re-adjustment of the same, and ordering the execution stayed in the meantime, but refusing to set aside the judgment; the other discharging the rule on the sheriff upon the ground that, though the sheriff was in default, yet as an order had just been granted directing a re-adjustment of costs, no further proceedings should be had, but requiring the sheriff to pay ten dollars costs of the motion. The defendant gave notice of appeal from so much of the first-mentioned order as refused to set aside the judgment as illegally entered, but the plaintiff acquiescing in so much of that order as required a readjustment of the costs, proceeded to have the costs re-adjusted, and, as so re-adjusted, entered in the judgment, and on August 20th, 1878, issued a new execution to enforce the same. On November 6th, 1878, pending the defendant's appeal from the order of July 30th, 1878, he paid to the sheriff the full amount *of the execution, who entered satisfaction on the same, and, subsequently, to wit, on June 11th, 1879, paid this amount to the plaintiff's attorney.

At the trial of the case, the plaintiff's attorney examined the defendant, Gilreath, as a witness, and, in the course of his testimony, he stated that he had offered plaintiff's attorney to enforce the execution if the plaintiff would give him a bond of indemnity. The plaintiff's attorney then offered himself as a witness to prove that Gilreath never made any such offer to him, which testimony, upon objection, was ruled out, the Circuit judge holding that a party could not contradict his own witness, all of which was duly excepted to and constitutes the basis of appellant's first ground of appeal. This exception was well taken. The rule upon this subject is, that a party cannot discredit his own witness by impeaching his general character, or by proving that he has made statements inconsistent with those made by him while on the stand as a witness, but a party may introduce witnesses to prove that the fact is not as one of his witnesses may have testified, even although this may indirectly have the effect of bringing in question the credit of such witness. Perry v. Massey, 1 Bail. 32; Farr v. Thompson, Cheves 44; Bank v. Shier, 4 Rich. 240. But although this exception was well taken, it does not necessarily follow that the appellant is entitled to a new trial, for it is not sufficient to show error in the rulings below, but it must be an error in some material point. Susong v. Vaiden, 10 S. C. 247 [30 Am. Rep. 50]. We confess that we are unable to see how the fact that the sheriff had, or had not, offered to enforce the execution, provided a bond of indemnity was given him by the plaintiff, could affect the case. If his official duty required him to execute the mandate of the court, addressed to him in the form of this execution, his offer to perform such duty, provided the plaintiff would give him a bond of indemnity, would furnish no excuse for his refusal to perform such duty without such bond. The error, therefore, in excluding the testimony offered, was not material, and is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to a new trial.

The appellant also gave notice of sundry exceptions to the judge's charge, which will next be considered. The judge's *charge, it seems, was in writing, and so much of it as relates to the matters excepted to is in the following words: "It is the duty of the sheriff to obey the mandate of the writ, and he is liable for willful neglect, ignorance or an oppressive use of his office. The verdict in the case, in which this action is founded, was rendered April 11th, 1873, judgment and execution, September 27th, [a clerical error, should be April,] 1878. No proceedings were had to set aside the judgment, nor have they been instituted yet. I cannot go behind the record, and must presume that the execution has been properly issued. Is the sheriff liable in damages? He received notice of appeal, but declined to enforce the execution until the bond required by law was given. If the plaintiff had given the bond, the money would have been collected and paid up. The plaintiff's attorney receipted to the sheriff in his execution book for the debt and costs in full. Now, if you are satisfied that the sheriff has been guilty of laches, or has arbitrarily refused to do what the law commanded him to do, he is liable. But if, in good faith, he said to Mr. Stokes [the plaintiff's attorney], 'I cannot levy and sell under the execution because an appeal is pending, unless you give the bond required by law,' and the plaintiff's attorney refused so to do, whose fault was it that the money was not collected? If you conclude that the sheriff is in fault, what is the measure of damages? What was the plaintiff entitled to recover from the sheriff? His debt, interest and costs. His attorney has receipted for that in full; of course, he cannot have interest on that amount. When the debt was paid, his cause of action was gone. But, as I have already said, if there was any willful neglect, and you can see that the plaintiff has thereby been injured, the sheriff is liable, and you can fix your damages upon any basis you may be able to find in the evidence before you, of which you are the sole judges."

The first error imputed to the Circuit judge in this charge, constituting the basis for the second ground of appeal, is "in instructing the jury that when the sheriff received notice of appeal from taxation of costs by defendant, in case of A. Detheridge against R. H. Earle, his hand was stayed, and that it was not required of him to judge of what was the ground of *appeal on its merits." A careful examination of the charge of the Circuit judge, as set out above, will show that he did not use the language imputed to him in this exception—"that when the sheriff received notice of appeal from taxation of costs, * * * his hand was stayed," &c. What he did say, was this: "He (the sheriff) received notice of appeal, but declined to enforce the execution until the bond required by law was given. * * But if, in good faith, he said to Mr. Stokes, 'I cannot levy and sell under the execution because an appeal is pending, unless you give the bond required by law,' and the plaintiff's attorney refused so to do, whose fault was it that the money was not collected?" Whether these remarks had reference to the notice of the motion to have the costs retaxed, improperly called an appeal from the taxation of costs, or to the notice of appeal from the order of July 30th, 1878, refusing to set aside the judgment, has not been made to appear, and we are, therefore, bound to refer them to the latter, and to construe the charge as meaning that after notice of appeal from the refusal to set aside the judgment, the plaintiff could not require a sale of defendant's property without giving the bond required by Section 360 of the code, as amended by the act of November 25th, 1873, (15 Stat. 501,) which provides that "after notice of appeal, the plaintiff shall not enforce the sale of property without giving an undertaking or bond to the defendant, with two good sureties in double the appraised value of the property, or double the amount of the judgment, conditioned to pay all damages which the defendant may sustain by reason of such sale, in case the judgment is reversed."

The next error complained of in the charge, constituting the basis of the third ground of appeal, is that the Circuit judge stated "that he did not see upon what grounds the jury could bring in a verdict for plaintiffs." We are unable to find that the judge made any such statement to the jury, and, therefore, this ground has no foundation upon which to rest.

The error assigned in the fourth ground of appeal is that the judge said to the jury "that he could not see how the jury could find a verdict against the defendants, as there was nothing upon which to base a verdict against the defendants." An examina*tion of the judge's charge, as recited above, not only fails to show that any such remark was made to the jury, but, on the contrary, it does show that all the facts were, as they should have been, left for the jury to pass upon. This ground, therefore, cannot be sustained.

The error complained of in the fifth ground of appeal is one of omission, and, although it does not appear in the "case" what the judge was requested to charge, yet, assuming that the request to charge was as stated in this ground of appeal—"that the plaintiffs having proved their case, and the defendants having offered no evidence in reply, were entitled to recover"—it is manifest that there was no error in refusing so to charge, as it would have required the judge to invade the province of the jury by instructing them what was proved in the case—that being a question exclusively for the jury.

The errors assigned in the sixth ground of appeal—"because his Honor erred throughout his whole charge, thereby causing the jury to bring in a verdict for the defendants, contrary to the law and the testimony"—are of too general and indefinite a character to be considered by this court.

It is quite manifest, from a consideration of the whole case, that the plaintiff failed to show that he was entitled to recover anything in this action, and, therefore, notwithstanding any immaterial error which may have occurred in the progress of the trial, the judgment below must stand. The object of the action was to recover damages from the sheriff and his sureties for failing and refusing to enforce an execution lodged with him for collection, and, to maintain the action, the plaintiff must not only show that there has been a breach of official duty upon the part of the sheriff, but, also, that he has sustained certain damages by reason of such default. The execution was originally entered in the sheriff's office on April 27th, 1878, and the sheriff could not have enforced it, by a sale of property, before the first Monday in July, following. On May 7th, 1878, the defendant served the plaintiff with a notice of exception to the taxation of costs which had been inserted in the judgment upon which this execution was issued, and, also, with a notice of a motion to set aside said judgment as improperly entered. These *motions were heard at July Term, 1878, when the Circuit Court granted the motion to reform the taxation of costs, but refused the motion to set aside the judgment, and directed a stay of proceedings under the execution until the costs were re-adjusted. The plaintiff acquiesced in the order requiring a re-adjustment of the costs, and, having had the same re-adjusted, issued a new execution on August 20th, 1878, but the defendant appealed from the order refusing to set aside the judgment as illegally entered, which appeal was not heard until April Term, 1879, when it was dismissed by an opinion filed May 8th, 1879.

On the 1st October, 1878, this action was commenced on the sheriff's bond, in which the only breach assigned was the failure to enforce the said execution. On November 6th, 1878, the defendant, Earle, paid the full amount of the said execution to the sheriff, who entered satisfaction on the same, and on June 11th, 1879, this amount was paid to the plaintiff's attorney. The only default, therefore, of which the sheriff could, by any possibility, be said to have been guilty, was in not enforcing the execution between April 27th, 1878, and July 30th, 1878, and for this default, manifestly only technical, inasmuch as the exception to the taxation of costs, though not of itself sufficient to stay the execution, has proved to be well founded, the judge, who heard the rule, mulcted him in costs, but declined to make the rule absolute: for, by the order of July 30th, 1878, the execution was stayed until the costs were re-adjusted, and, by the notice of appeal from so much of that order as refused to set aside the judgment, the sheriff was prevented from enforcing the execution by a sale of the defendant's property, unless the plaintiff had given the bond required by Section 360 of the code, above cited. But, to enable the plaintiff to recover in this action, he must show not only a breach of the bond, but that he has been damaged thereby, and the measure of his damages for such a breach as that assigned would be the amount of the execution, and this the plaintiff had already voluntarily received. Granting, therefore, that the plaintiff in this case has shown a breach of the bond by the failure to enforce the execution between April 27th, 1878, and July 30th, 1878, he has utterly failed to show any damages which he has sustained *by reason of such default, and, therefore, has failed to show his right to recover anything from the defendants.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

Action commenced October 1st, 1879, by Tabitha A. Campbell against Nancy Moon and John S. Moon, for the recovery of real property. The opinion states the case. The charge of the presiding judge is not stated in the brief.

Mr. J. J. Norton, for appellant.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, contra.

October 8th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action to recover a tract of land in Newberry county.

The plaintiff, when a married woman, *owned the land, and she and her then husband, Robert E. Campbell, sold it to Peter Moon and B. F. Griffin, and on January 10th, 1860, joined in a regular and formal conveyance to them by name, and eight days after, viz., on January 18th, Mrs. Campbell, residing in Laurens county, went before Henry O'Neall, a magistrate of that county, and executed, as her relinquishment of inheritance, the following paper, which was endorsed on the deed:

"State of South Carolina, Laurens district. —I, Henry O'Neall, one of the magistrates of the district aforesaid, do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern: T. A. Campbell, wife of the within-named R. E. Campbell, did, this day, personally appear before me, and, upon being privately and separately examined by me, did declare that she did, more than seven days previous, join in the execution, with her husband, of the foregoing deed of conveyance, and that she still does now freely and voluntarily, without any compulsion, dread or fear of any person or persons whomsoever, renounce, release and forever relinquish unto the within-named Peter Moon, heirs and assigns forever, all her interest and estate, and also all her right and claim of inheritance and dower, of, in and to all and singular the premises within mentioned and released.

"T. F. A. Campbell.

"Given under my hand and seal this 18th day of January, A. D. 1860.

"Henry O'Neall, M. L. D. [L. S.]"

The purchasers went into possession. The deed, with relinquishment endorsed, was recorded in the office of the register of mesne conveyance for Newberry county, April 6th, 1864. The land was several times sold, and finally came into the possession of the defendants. After the death of her husband, Robert E., in 1875, his widow, Tabitha A. Campbell, brought this action for the land, and the question is whether, by the facts above set forth, Mrs. Campbell is barred of her title to the land.

The case came on to be heard before Judge

Kershaw. Under *his rulings, the jury found for the defendants, and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the plaintiff's relinquishment of her inheritance in the land in controversy was valid and sufficient, although it was made to but one of the two grantees named in the deed wherein she had joined her husband, Robert E. Campbell, to wit, to Peter Moon, when it is submitted the relinquishment of her inheritance should have been made also to B. F. Griffin, the other grantee named in said deed.

2. "Because his Honor erred in holding that the said relinquishment was sufficient, though couched in words variant from the form prescribed in the act of assembly regulating the relinquishment of their inheritance by married women.

3. "Because his Honor erred in holding the said relinquishment valid and sufficient, although not recorded as required by law.

4. "Because his Honor erred in holding the said relinquishment of inheritance good and sufficient, although the same was taken before a magistrate, as was in proof, of Laurens district, when the land was located in Newberry district."

This transaction took place before the adoption of our present constitution, and must be determined by the law as it then existed.

The fourth exception makes the point that the relinquishment was made before an officer of Laurens, while the land lay in Newberry county. The act of 1795 (5 Stat. 257), provides that "a married woman may bar herself of her inheritance, provided she will go before some one of the judges or justices in the second clause of this act mentioned," which second section names the following officers: "Any judge of the Court of Common Pleas, or justice of the quorum, or any judge of the court of the county wherein she may reside, or the land may be." The husband and his wife, and the officer, O'Neall, all lived in Laurens county. It is true, the officer who took the relinquishment was not a justice of the quorum, but an officer then styled a "magistrate." But it must be remembered that the act of 1839 had conferred all the powers and authority before that *time given to justices of the quorum, upon justices of the peace or magistrates. "Every magistrate shall have civil and criminal jurisdiction throughout the judicial district in which he resides, and shall execute all the powers and duties heretofore lawfully exercised by a justice of the quorum." 11 Stat. 21. We think a magistrate of Laurens county could legally take the relinquishment in that county where the parties resided, although the land lay in Newberry.

The third exception makes the objection that the relinquishment was not valid for the reason that it was not recorded as required by law. It was executed January 18th, 1860, and was not recorded until April 6th, 1864, but at that time both the husband and wife were still alive. We do not propose to open again the question whether the relinquishment of a married woman was good between the parties, although it was not recorded in six months, or was utterly void. We regard that question as finally settled in this State. It was decided in the case of Hillegas v. Hartley, 1 Hill Eq. 106, that the failure to record a renunciation of inheritance within six months under the act, rendered it void; but the case has been expressly overruled by that of Kottman and Wife v. Ayer, 1 Strobh. 553, in the late Court of Errors, which, upon this point, decided that "if a wife join her husband in a conveyance of land, and renounce her inheritance according to the act of 1795, and the deed be recorded in the life-time of both husband and wife, though not within six months after the renunciation, it will effectually bar the wife's inheritance. We are satisfied to rest upon this case, both for its unanswerable reasoning and because it is authority binding upon us.

The second exception objects that the relinquishment, in form, was not in accordance with the act before cited, and was, therefore, null and void. The precise form of the renunciation was not prescribed by the act. It was enough if it was to the same "effect or to the purport" of the one set forth. Judge Evans, speaking for the Court of Errors, in the case of Kottman and Wife v. Ayer, supra, says: "I conclude, therefore, that the words 'positively and bona fide' can have no other application than as to the fact that the deed was executed at least seven *days before her examination. The act does not require that the words 'positively and bona fide' should be used, but that the certificate should be to the effect that the woman did declare," &c. In the case in which he was speaking the word "actually" was held to be equivalent to the words "positively and bona fide," and fulfilled the requirements of the act. In this case the words are: "Did declare that she did, more than seven days previous, join in the execution with her husband of the foregoing deed of conveyance, and that she still does now, freely and voluntarily, without any compulsion, dread or fear of any person or persons whomsoever, renounce, release and forever relinquish," &c. Is there any real and substantial difference between declaring that "she did join" and that she "did actually join?" One expression may be supposed to be somewhat more emphatic than the other, but they both refer, as Judge Evans says, "to the fact that the deed was executed," &c. We do not think that the relinquishment was so defective in form as to make it void.

The first exception makes the point principally relied on—that the relinquishment was insufficient because it was to one of the grantees, Peter Moon, instead of being to both Peter Moon and B. F. Griffin. The conveyance was to both, but the relinquishment, endorsed on the back, was only to one of them. It will be noticed that the act makes no reference to the case of two grantees, but says: "In the premises mentioned in the release unto the grantee."—Either was "a grantee." The deed was the instrument by which the inheritance was conveyed, and the certificate was required only by way of authenticating, without the possibility of a doubt, as she was a married woman, the fact of its execution, and that it was done freely and voluntarily, without any compulsion, dread or fear of any one, meaning, especially, no doubt, her husband. That purpose was accomplished as fully by the relinquishment to one as it would have been if the name of the other grantee, also, had been inserted in the certificate. The omission to insert the other name was manifestly an accident in filling a blank, for there is in the relinquishment itself distinct reference to "the foregoing deed of conveyance," and to "the premises within mentioned and released." The appellant conveyed away all the estate she ever had. She conveyed to *two grantees, and, by accident, relinquished to one of them. Possibly some question might arise between the grantees as to the effect of such action, but we do not see how she can claim that on that account the whole conveyance, as to her, is absolutely void.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

(Case No. 1099.)

STRIBLING v. JOHNS.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐117.]

A refusal by the Circuit judge of a motion to extend the time, under the act of 1878, for preparing a case on appeal, so far as such refusal is a decision on questions of fact, is not appealable to this court, it being exclusively within his province to determine whether the cause shown was sufficient and reasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 805–812; Dec. Dig. ⇐ 117.]

[2. Appeal and Error ⇐564.]

No such extension of time was allowable, unless a motion therefor had been made before the expiration of thirty days after service of notice of appeal. Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 166, approved.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Tribble v. Poore, 28 S. C. 570, 6 S. E. 577; Brown v. Easterling, 59 S. C. 479, 38 S. E. 118.

Before Aldrich, J., at Chambers, September, 1879.

Action by John V. Stribling against James A. Johns, in Oconee county. The opinion states the case. The order appealed from was as follows:

This is a motion to extend the time in which to perfect an appeal.

Appeal is not a right; it is a privilege of which the party desiring to avail himself can take advantage by complying with certain conditions. The judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction is prima facie supposed to be correct. It is always, however, subject to review by the appellate tribunal. To entitle the party failing in the action to this review

he must comply with *certain prerequisites

prescribed by the law and the rules of court. Nor can these be lightly regarded, for, it must be remembered, appeal operates to delay and hinder the prevailing party in the cause. In practice it too often happens that appeal is resorted to for the mere purpose of delay, a practice not to be encouraged.

While, therefore, every opportunity should be afforded to correct error, still, the rights of the successful suitor are to be considered. He should not be subjected to delay—perhaps the entire fruits of his successful litigation—unless the rules regulating the appeal have been complied with, or sufficient and satisfactory reasons shown why they have not been complied with. The affidavits, submitted to support the motion, show that the notice of appeal was served in time on the proper parties; that the defendant, Johns, supposed his attorney had perfected the appeal, and that he had "no intention of abandoning said appeal."

Mr. Norton states, in his affidavit, that he was too unwell to attend to business for several days after the court; that his law partner, Mr. Stribling, has been ill with typhoid fever for five weeks, and unable to attend to his business; that the change in the law as to appeals had escaped his notice; that he is satisfied the appeal would have been perfected, "but for his own and his partner's sickness, and that the plaintiff will not be injured by delay, as the appeal will be docketed as soon as if it had been perfected in the prescribed time."

The affidavit of defendant's attorney, Mr. Verner, negatives the statement of Mr. Norton. Without attempting to reconcile this conflict of statement, it is sufficient to say, that, in my judgment, the application comes too late. The party asking the extension, must, under the act and the rules, seek relief, if he be entitled thereto, from a justice of the Supreme Court. I may add, this legislation, as it appears to me, was intended to prevent appeals for mere delay, to which I have hereinbefore alluded.

Let the motion be dismissed, with ten dollars costs to the plaintiff.

Defendant appealed, upon the ground that "his Honor erred in the law applicable to the case, in holding that the application *came too late." Plaintiff moved to dismiss the appeal because the return in the appeal from Judge Aldrich's order at chambers had not been filed in time.

Mr. J. J. Norton, for appellant.

Messrs. Keith & Verner, contra.

October 8th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. It appears that the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant for $200, for backing water and overflowing his land, and entered judgment and execution for the verdict with $92 costs taxed by the clerk. After the execution had been paid, April 18th, 1879, the plaintiff's attorney moved to tax certain costs which had been omitted in the first taxation, and the clerk taxed $64.80 additional costs. The defendant made a motion to reverse the decision of the clerk in allowing the additional costs, before Judge Aldrich, who sustained the clerk's taxation and refused the motion. From this order notice of appeal was given within ten days, but the case was not prepared and served within the "thirty days" allowed for that purpose. On September 12th, 1879, nearly three months after the order appealed from was granted, a motion was made before Judge Aldrich, at chambers, for an extension of time within which to perfect this appeal. Upon this motion, affidavits and counter-affidavits were submitted. Judge Aldrich, without undertaking to decide between the conflicting statements of the affidavits, refused the application for the extension of time principally on the ground that it "came too late." The defendant appeals to this court, and the plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal.

It does not appear that the items of costs taxed by the clerk were improper. The objection, it seems, was that the plaintiff was in default in not having them included in the first taxation. Judge Aldrich decided otherwise, and in perfecting his appeal from that order, the defendant, in his turn, fell into default. The judge refused to grant further time to perfect the appeal.

*Was that refusal error of law reviewable on appeal to this court?

The second section of the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 698) provides as follows: "Within thirty days after such notice, the appellant, or his attorney, shall prepare a case or exceptions, and serve them, unless the judge before whom the cause was heard last, on ten days' notice to the opposite party, upon sufficient and reasonable cause shown, shall extend the time," &c.

It will be observed that the act gives the power to extend the time only to the judge "before whom the cause was last heard." It was exclusively within his province to decide whether the cause shown was "sufficient and reasonable." The case was not difficult to prepare, and could not require much time or labor. The defendant having failed to prepare and serve a case within the time prescribed, was in default, and his application was based, not upon any right upon his part that he had lost, but was addressed solely to the judicial discretion of that officer. So far as he decided the application upon the facts stated in the affidavits, his decision was final, and there can be no appeal. To say that a matter is in the discretion of the judge is but another way of saying that it is beyond control. It is analogous to an order refusing a new trial on the facts. This court has no right, in cases of this kind, to consider any question except alleged errors of law.

In regard to the jurisdiction of the judge to hear the application after the expiration of the thirty days allowed, we concur with him that the act which grants the privilege to make the application contemplated that it should be done within the thirty days. The object, manifestly, was to prevent unnecessary delay in the prosecution of appeals. If the application for further time could be made three months after the appeal was taken, what could prevent its being done three years after? It could not be known certainly when an appeal was ended. The act clearly indicates that if, at the expiration of the time fixed, the appellant is in default, having neither perfected his appeal nor made application for further time to do so, his appeal should be considered waived. The last section declares that "when the appellant shall fail to perfect his appeal according to the provi*sions of either of the foregoing sections, his failure to do so shall amount to a waiver of his appeal." Rogers v. Nash, 12 S. C. 560; Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 166. We can add nothing to what was said by the court in the last case: "There was a failure in this case to perfect the appeal according to the provisions of the act, and the extension of time was not granted in the manner pointed out by the act. * * The provisions of the act are mandatory and must be enforced. The court has no right to consider the hardships of the case, but is bound to announce the law."

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit judge be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

[This case is also cited and followed in Covington v. Covington, 47 S. C. 263, 25 S. E. 193.]

Before Mackey, J., Pickens, September, 1880.

*Motion by E. H. Lawrence and J. L. Gravely, in action by Olin L. Durant, Probate judge for Pickens county, against I. H. Philpot and these relators. The facts are substantially stated in the opinion of this court. The grounds of Judge Mackey's decision are given in his Circuit decree, which, after stating the facts of the case, and reaching the conclusion that the receipt was signed by W. G. Field, with full knowledge of its contents, proceeds as follows:

It being established by the receipt adduced herein that prior to the assignment of the mortgage in question, the original mortgagee did agree to assign the same to the defendant, E. H. Lawrence, upon the said E. H. Lawrence paying the balance due on the bond of I. H. Philpot, which the said mortgage was given to secure, I am next to inquire as to the value of such proof in its bearing upon the finding of fact as set forth in the decree of the Circuit judge. The well-settled rule in such case is, that the newly-discovered evidence should be of some material fact, ranking so high in the scale of proof as to enforce the conclusion that, had it been adduced at the trial, it would have produced a different verdict or judgment. Bunn v. Hoyt, 3 Johns. 255.

It is necessary, therefore, to recur to the decree of the presiding judge (Hon. Thomas Thomson), in order to ascertain the facts deduced by him from the testimony, and which moulded his judgment adverse to the defendant.

I cite from the decree as follows:

"W. G. Field says: 'At the time the assignment was made I had been paid up in full, except $100: I took the Carlisle note as money, and the only thing due was the $100.'

"The payment of money, or receipt of a note accepted as money, discharged the debt, and, consequently, the mortgage. Writings or receipts are but evidences of the transaction. The mortgage had performed its duty and lost its lien on the land.

"Had the money been paid by E. H. Lawrence to W. G. Field, a presumption might be raised that it was for the use of the payer, and that he expected an interest in the mortgage. A party not a defendant, paying money upon an execution in the sheriff's office and stipulating at the time that the execution *should be kept open for his benefit, is allowed to explain the transaction, though the execution be returned satisfied.

"The money was in this case paid by the mortgagor, and no inference could be made that it was for the benefit of any one but himself. * * * W. G. Field was the owner of the mortgage. Whatever may have been the agreement between I. H. Philpot and E. H. Lawrence, W. G. Field was not a party to it. Yet, he was the most important party, and the first to be consulted if an assignment from him were desired. W. G. Field was under no obligation to assign to a stranger upon payment of the amount due."

The foregoing citations make it evident that the conclusion of the Circuit judge as to the mortgage "having been extinguished before its alleged assignment by Field to Lawrence, is based upon the testimony of Field, to the effect that the mortgagor, Philpot, paid his own money in satisfaction of the mortgage, and that he (Field) had no transaction or agreement with the said Lawrence in the premises." The Circuit judge manifestly upon this point adopted the finding of the referee, who reports: "That there never was any agreement by the said W. G. Field to assign the said mortgage, and he never heard anything said about assigning it until a few minutes before he did assign it, when the said Philpot made the request, and he immediately assigned it."

Assuming as a proved fact that the mortgagor paid his own money in liquidation of his bond, it followed that there was no resulting trust to the subsequent assignee of the mortgage, and that he could take no title to the land described in the complaint under foreclosure of such mortgage, even though the said assignee had acted, in perfect good faith as a creditor of the mortgagor, since the said mortgage, before its assignment, had ceased to be a legal entity, and had become as to the mortgagor as if it never had existed. As said by the Court of Appeals of Maryland, in a recent case involving this question, "The principle is well settled that payment of an encumbrance by one whose duty is to pay, extinguishes it." Boyd v. Parker & Co., 43 Md. 202. The decree for the plaintiff is based upon the application of that principle to the facts in testimony, but the newly-discovered evi*dence effectually negatives the only fact which rendered the principle at all applicable to the case.

I am now to consider whether the failure of the defendant to submit at the hearing of the cause the evidence which he now adduces as the ground of his motion, was the result of his own improvidence and want of due diligence. Upon the question as to what constitutes due diligence and the requisite proof of its exercise on the part of one moving for a new trial, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, I have carefully considered the long line of authorities and the very able argument submitted by the learned counsel (W. E. Earle, Esq.,) on behalf of the plaintiff, and applying the test prescribed, I am satisfied that the defendant, E. H. Lawrence, is not chargeable with insufficient diligence.

It is true that it does not appear where or when he made diligent search or inquiry for the "receipt" which he now exhibits. But the sufficiency of his search or the extent of his inquiry cannot enter into the case, since it appears from the testimony that the receipt was never delivered to him in person, and he declares, in his affidavit, that he became aware of its existence too late to produce it at the trial. He could scarcely be expected to have made search for a paper, the very existence of which was unknown to him.

The language of the Supreme Court of the State of New York in granting a new trial, on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, in the case of Jackson v. Crosby, appears to me to embody the true rule that should govern the decision upon applications of this class. 12 Johns. 354. See, also, to the same effect, the opinion by Lord Mansfield in Fabrilius v. Cock, 3 Burr. 1771.

The objections that the defendant should have proceeded by summons and complaint herein, and not by petition and motion, and that the motion for a new trial should have been made during the term at which the cause was heard, and before the Circuit judge who rendered the decree, appear to be untenable, and were not insisted on by counsel for plaintiff.

It is sufficient to observe, as to the last objection, that it was not possible to give notice of the motion for a new trial during *the term, as the decision was reserved, and the decree was filed after the term had expired.

Nor, is it necessary that a motion for a new trial should be made before the judge who heard the cause. On this point, the Supreme Court says, in Elmore v. Scurry, 1 S. C. 139: "The power to grant new trials is vested in the Circuit Court, and is neither limited in terms to the judge who tried the case, nor to causes that have originated or been tried in the court as now constituted. It is an important power of a remedial nature, and ought not to be encumbered with limitations and conditions not in terms, or by necessary implication, imposed by legislative authority."

I am also satisfied that the correct form of procedure has been adopted herein.

It is, therefore, ordered that the judgment entered up in the above-entitled cause be vacated, and that a new trial be granted therein on payment of costs by the defendant, E. H. Lawrence.

The plaintiff appealed upon eight exceptions to this decree.

The first four are sufficiently stated in the opinion. The fifth and seventh were abandoned. The other two were as follows:

6. Because it is respectfully submitted that a new trial cannot be granted after final judgment where the trial is by the court.

8. Because the form of procedure adopted by the defendants, Lawrence and Gravely, in their efforts to obtain a rehearing, is neither recognized nor authorized by the laws of this State.

Messrs. Earle, Wells & Taylor, for appellants.

This being a case in chancery, errors of the Circuit judge, either of law or fact, may be corrected. 3 S. C. 531. In jury cases, motions for new trial need not be made before the judge who heard the cause. 1 S. C. 139. For error of law, appeal must be taken to this court. 14 S. C. 324. But in chancery cases, while a Circuit judge may grant a petition to institute proceedings in the nature of a bill of review, in a case heard by another Circuit judge, he cannot do what has been done here. Judge Mackey transposes the language of Judge Thomson's decree and ascribes to the latter language not used.
There was *no evidence of due diligence to produce at the former trial this receipt, which must have been in the possession of some of the defendants. This is fatal to the application. 6 Rich. Eq. 364; 3 Id. 465; 16 Ves. 350; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1638. The evidence is merely cumulative, and, therefore, not sufficient to gain a new trial. 1 Story (U. S.) 218, cited in 11 Rich. Eq. 52; 2 Paige 24; 3 Story (U. S.) 299, 311; 3 Rich. Eq. 536. Jackson v. Crosby and Fabrilius v. Cock, cited in the Circuit decree, do not fully sustain it. The evidence here would impeach a witness who testified at the first hearing; the motion should, therefore, be refused. 3 Johns. Ch. 124. The fifth and seventh grounds of appeal are not sustained by the brief. The mode adopted here has no sanction in this State. See 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1626; Bailey Eq. 284; 1 Hill Ch. 35; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 78, 81; 5 Rich. Eq. 422; 2 Har. & J. 230; Story Eq. Pl. § 634a. There should have been a petition for leave to file a complaint in the nature of a bill of review. 5 Mas. (U. S.) 303.

Mr. M. F. Ansel, contra.

October 12th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The object of this action was to subject a certain tract of land to the payment of judgments held by the plaintiff against the defendant, Philpot, and, for this purpose, to set aside a sale of the same, under a judgment of foreclosure, to the defendant, Lawrence, and a deed made by him to his co-defendant, Gravely.

The facts, out of which the controversy grew, are, in brief, as follows: The defendant, Philpot, bought a tract of land from one W. G. Field, paying part cash, and giving his note, secured by a mortgage of the premises, for the balance. The allegation on the part of the defendants is, that Philpot borrowed the money from Lawrence with which to pay the note, and paid it to Field, with the understanding that when the note was fully paid to Field, it and the mortgage should be assigned to Lawrence, as a security for the money advanced by him. Accordingly, when Field received the balance due him on the note, the *mortgage, with the note, was assigned by Field to Lawrence. An action was then brought by Lawrence, as assignee of the mortgage, to foreclose the same, under which Lawrence bid off the land, and, subsequently, conveyed the same to the defendant, Gravely. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contends that the arrangement for the transfer of the mortgage to Lawrence was fraudulent and designed to defeat the creditors of Philpot, some of whom had reduced their claims to judgment, and that there was no agreement on the part of Field to assign the mortgage before the debt, secured by it, was paid, and, consequently, when the note was paid by Philpot, the mortgage was satisfied, and the assignment of it was a nullity. The case was heard by Judge Thomson at March Term, 1880, and, on May 3d thereafter, his decision was filed, in which he held that the evidence showed that there was no agreement for the assignment of the mortgage before the debt, secured by it, was paid, and, therefore, that the assignment was a nullity, and that the purchaser under the suit for foreclosure took nothing. He, therefore, ordered the land sold, and the proceeds disposed of as the court might thereafter order. Within ten days after this decision was filed, the defendants, Lawrence and Gravely, gave notice that, at the next term of the Court of Common Pleas, they would move for a new trial, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, and, also, filed a petition, accompanied with affidavits, setting forth fully the grounds of their motion. The newly-discovered evidence relied upon is in the form of a receipt, which reads as follows:

"Received of E. H. Lawrence four hundred dollars, to be credited on note I hold against I. H. Philpot. When the said Lawrence shall raise said note I agree to assign said mortgage to him.

(Signed) "W. G. Field,

"January 12th, 1876."

At the next term of the court the motion for a new trial was heard by Judge Mackey and granted, whereupon the plaintiff appealed on various grounds, which will be considered in their order:

*123

*1. Because "one Circuit judge has no authority to reverse and nullify the decision or decree of another Circuit judge, as was done by the order granting a new trial in this instance."

It is quite manifest that Judge Mackey, in granting the motion for a new trial, does not undertake to reverse or nullify the decision or decree of Judge Thomson. The latter rested his decision solely upon the ground that the evidence, as presented to him, satisfied his mind that there was no agreement to assign the mortgage until after the debt, secured by it, had been paid by the mortgagor, and, therefore, that the assignment was a nullity, there being then nothing to assign. Judge Mackey, without pretending to controvert or question the correctness of this conclusion of fact on the testimony before Judge Thomson, and without questioning the conclusion of law deduced therefrom —indeed, admitting the correctness of the law laid down, simply holds that the newly-discovered evidence would have a very important bearing upon the question of fact, which was made the basis of the former decision, and would, probably, tend to induce a different conclusion, and grants the motion for a new trial, in order that the parties may have the opportunity of introducing this newly-discovered evidence. He does not grant the motion because of any error committed by Judge Thomson, but solely because of the discovery, since the former trial, of certain evidence, which, in his judgment, was well calculated to influence the result and show that the former decision was erroneous; not because of any fault or error in the judge who rendered the former decision, but because of the absence of that full light which subsequent discoveries have enabled the parties to shed upon the questions of fact involved. This ground of appeal cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The second ground of appeal is based upon the allegation that there was no evidence whatever tending to show that the parties could not, by the use of due diligence, have discovered the new evidence in time for the former trial. There is no doubt that, in order to entitle a party to a new trial, upon the ground of subsequently-discovered evidence, he must show not only that the evidence has been discovered since the former trial, but that he could not, by the use of due diligence, have acquired *a knowledge of the fact in time to use it at the former trial. As is said by Lord Eldon, in Young v. Keightley, 16 Ves. 350, the question is not what the petitioner knew, but what, by using due diligence, he might have known. If, therefore, the Circuit judge had ignored or disgarded this rule, that would have been such an error of law as would furnish ground for the reversal of his judgment. But he seems distinctly to have recognized this rule, and to have found as matter of fact "that the defendant, Lawrence, is not chargeable with insufficient diligence." The question of diligence is one of fact, and, as it has been found by the Circuit judge against the appellant, we see no ground, under the well-established rule, to reverse that finding. Indeed, the showing here seems to be quite as strong as it was in the case of Ex parte Vandersmissen, 5 Rich. Eq. 519 [60 Am. Dec. 102], in which leave was granted to file a bill of review on the ground of newly-discovered evidence.

The third ground of appeal alleges error in granting the motion because the newly-discovered evidence was merely cumulative. It is not to be denied that appellant is sustained by expressions of opinion on the part of more than one chancellor in some of our reported cases, but we are not aware of any case in this State in which the abstract proposition has been involved and decided. We know of no case in which a new trial or a rehearing has been refused simply because the alleged newly-discovered evidence was merely cumulative. And when, as in this case, the newly-discovered evidence is in writing, and is so directly applicable to the very point upon which the decision at the former hearing turned, we think it would amount to a denial of justice to refuse the motion because the newly-discovered evidence may, in one sense, be regarded as cumulative. That there are cases in which a new trial has been granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence which was merely cumulative, see Jackson v. Crosby, 12 Johns. 354. We may also remark that this evidence can scarcely be regarded as merely cumulative of that offered at the former hearing, for the real point in controversy then seemed to be whether the arrangement between Lawrence and Philpot was bona fide or collusive, and designed to defeat the creditors of Philpot, and Philpot did *not undertake to testify positively that there was any agreement between himself and Field, that the mortgage was to be assigned to Lawrence. His language was: "Think I told Field, in the spring of 1876, that when the $800 was paid, wanted him to assign the mortgage; think I must have told him so." We do not think that this ground of appeal should be sustained.

The fourth ground of appeal is based upon the proposition that a new trial should not be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, the effect of which is to impeach or contradict a witness examined at the former hearing. Whatever may be the rule elsewhere, it is quite certain that such is not the rule in this State, nor does it seem to be the rule in England. In Levingsworth ads. Fox, 2 Bay 520, a new trial was granted because evidence was discovered after the trial, showing that one Rountree, a witness who had testified at the former trial, was interested in the event of the suit, though he had stated, when examined on his voir dire, that he had no interest. In Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. 184, a new trial was granted on the ground of after-discovered written evidence, which might have affected the credit of a witness examined at the former trial. So, in Fabrilius v. Cock, 3 Burr. 1771, a new trial was granted because evidence was discovered after the former trial, going to show the subornation of witnesses who testified at the first trial.

The fifth and seventh grounds of appeal having been abandoned, the only remaining question is as to the propriety of the mode of proceeding adopted in this case.

Under the practice of the former Court of Equity it might, perhaps, have been difficult to sustain the mode of proceeding adopted in this case. Under that practice, a petition for rehearing and a bill of review were sustainable on similar grounds, one of which was newly-discovered evidence (Hunt v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 541); but a petition for rehearing was the proper mode of proceeding where the decree had not been signed and enrolled or filed, whereas, after the filing of the decree, the proper mode of proceeding would be by an application for leave to file a bill of review (Simpson v. Downs, 5 Rich. Eq. 425; Hinson v. Pickett, 2 Hill Eq. 353); and such *bill could not be filed without leave of the court. Simpson v. Smith or Watts, 6 Rich. Eq. 364 [62 Am. Dec. 392]. If, therefore, this should be regarded as a petition for rehearing, it is liable to two objections: First, because the decree had been filed, and, second, the petition is not certified by two counsel. Ex parte Terry, Rice Eq. 1; 3 Dan. Ch. Pr. 1623. On the other hand, if it be regarded as in the nature of a bill of review, no leave of the court to file it seems to have been obtained.

It seems to us, however, that since the abolition of the Court of Equity and the requirement of the constitution in Section 3, Article V., that justice shall be administered in a uniform mode of pleading, without distinction between law and equity, these modes of proceeding, by a petition for rehearing and by bill of review, have become inapplicable, and that now the same results can be obtained by motion under the provisions of Section 2, Chap. CV., Gen. Stat. 497. Hill v. Watson, 10 S. C. 277. See also remarks of Simpson, C. J., in State v. David, 14 S. C. 428. It is true that the section of the General Statutes just referred to has been repealed by the act of December 21st, 1880, 17 Stat. 341; but this act, by its express terms, does not apply to judgments then existing or to cases then in suit, and, therefore, does not affect this case. We think, therefore, that there is no valid objection to the mode of proceeding adopted in this case.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. ALEXANDER.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐339.]

Section 357 of the Code of Procedure was repealed by the act of December, 1878, which fixes the time within which every appeal to the Supreme Court must be taken; but such repeal did not affect cases where the right of appeal attached before this act went into operation.

*Decree was filed November 22d, 1878, and more than three months afterwards, but before written notice of such filing, notice of appeal was given; on motion, the appeal was dismissed.

Motion to dismiss appeal.

Susan B. Alexander, and another, against T. M. Alexander, administrator, and others. No papers have been furnished the reporter, except the opinion of this court.

October 17th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. The questions involved here arise upon a motion to dismiss the appeal in the above-entitled case.

On November 22d, 1878, a decree was pronounced by Judge Hudson, at chambers, in the above case, in favor of the plaintiff, respondent. The decree, on its face, purports to have been by consent of counsel on both sides. Judgment was entered, and the judgment roll filed on the same day of the decree in the clerk's office for Pickens county, the county of the action. On February 5th, 1880, over fourteen months after the judgment was perfected by filing the judgment roll, a notice of appeal was served on plaintiff's attorneys by other attorneys than those on the record for defendant, Sarah A. Alexander. This notice was endorsed by plaintiff's attorneys and returned.

Upon these facts the respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal on two grounds:

1. "Because the notice of appeal was not served within the time prescribed by the law.

2. "Because the decree was by consent, and is not, therefore, appealable."

At the time the decree of Judge Hudson was pronounced and the judgment entered, to wit, November 22d, 1878, the law regulating appeals as to time was contained in Section 357 of the code. That section provided "that appeals to the Supreme Court, under Subdivision 2, Section 11, of the code, must be taken within sixty days after written notice of the order shall *have been given to the party appealing. Every other appeal allowed by the second chapter of this title must be taken within three months after the judgment shall be perfected by filing the judgment roll." The decree or judgment appealed from in this case belonged to the second class above referred to, and the appealing party, therefore, had three months, and only three months, under Section 357 (supra) from the filing of the judgment roll, within which to appeal.

It is admitted that the notice was not given until after fourteen months had elapsed from that time. This, then, is fatal if Section 357 was applicable to the case. But the appellant contends that the appeal in this case is not governed by Section 357. She claims that Section 357 was repealed by the act of December, 1878, and this case is subject to the provisions of that act.

The act of 1878 provides "that in every appeal from an order, decree or judgment, or other matters from which an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court, the appellant or his attorney shall, within ten days after written notice that such order, decree or judgment has been granted at chambers, give notice to the opposite party of his intention to appeal, * * * and upon his failure to do so, his appeal shall be regarded as waived." It is admitted that no written notice has ever been given to the appellant of the granting of the decree in question, so that if the act of 1878 (supra) does apply, then her claim that she is within time is well founded. The question, then, in the case is: Under which of these two acts, Section 357 of the code, or the act of December, 1878, does this appeal fall?

The act of 1878, by its terms (Section 5), was not to go into operation until February 1st, 1879, and by Section 6 of the act it is provided "that all acts, and parts of acts, inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed." 16 Stat. 699.

The respondent contends that Section 357 of the code, or at least so much of it as limits absolutely the time of appeal to three months, or to a certain class of cases, is not inconsistent with the act of 1878, and, therefore, that this portion of this section is still of force, which, not having been complied with by the appellant, the appeal must be dismissed. His position is, *that under Section 357 of the code, and previous to the passage of the act of December, 1878, a losing party was entitled to three months from the filing of the judgment roll within which to give his notice of appeal, in cases like that before the court, and that the act of December, 1878, has neither taken away nor extended this right absolutely, but that it still stands as to orders, decrees or judgments granted at chambers, except in cases where the successful party shall give written notice of the granting of such order, decree or judgment to the other side or his attorney, in which case the right to appeal is lost, unless, within ten days after such written notice, the appellant shall give notice of his intention to appeal. The argument is, that while the act of December, 1878, is inconsistent with the other provisions of Section 357 as to the sixty days allowed to orders, &c., and to so much as allowed three months to rulings, orders, decrees or judgments pronounced in open court, yet, as to the orders, decrees and judgments granted at chambers, the two may stand together, and that in such cases the time for appeal is still limited to three months from the filing of the judgment roll, unless the successful party shall give notice in writing to the other side, or by attorney, within that time of the filing of the decree, when the time will be curtailed and cut down to ten days thereafter. And the three months having elapsed in this case without any notice of the filing of the decree, the appeal has been waived without remedy.

This argument is ingenious, but we do not think it sound. We think that Section 357 of the code is inconsistent, in all of its provisions, with the act of December, 1878, and was, therefore, repealed from February 1st, 1879, the time when this act took effect. Section 357 gave the right of appeal from matters embraced under Subdivision 2 of Section 11 of the code for sixty days after written notice of the passage of the order. By the act of December, 1878, this time has been reduced to ten days. These two provisions are certainly inconsistent. In every other appeal under this section three months were allowed from the filing of the judgment roll. This embraced rulings, orders, decrees and judgments pronounced in open court, as well as those *granted at chambers. In the act of December, 1878, the time for appealing from rulings, orders, decrees or judgments pronounced in open court is reduced to ten days after the rising of the court. In terms this is inconsistent with Section 357. As to such orders, decrees and judgments as are granted at chambers, it is provided in the act of 1878, that the appeal must be taken within ten days after written notice that such orders, decrees or judgments have been granted. Is this not inconsistent with the right which the losing party had unconditionally for three months after the filing of the judgment roll under Section 357 in such cases? A new event is fixed, to wit, written notice of the granting of the decree, which is to give currency to the time within which the appeal is to be taken or deemed waived, and a new time is specified, to wit, ten days, instead of three months. Even according to the construction contended for by appellant, the unconditional right of three months, which is allowed under Section 357, is taken away by the provision which authorizes the successful party to shorten this time by the notice provided in the act of 1878. Thus far, at least, the provisions of the two acts are inconsistent. This would leave but a small fragment of the Section 357 untouched. Can it be that the legislature intended to repeal all of this section, except this fragment? In our opinion it was the intention of the legislature, by the act of December, 1878, to place all appeals upon nearly the same plane as possible, and, having provided that all appeals from rulings, orders, decrees or judgments, made and pronounced in open court, should be taken by notice of intention, within ten days after the rising of the court, or deemed waived where the parties litigant or their attorneys must be supposed to have had notice, it made the same provision as to orders, decrees and judgments granted at chambers—substituting written notice of the filing of the decree in the place of the announcement in open court of those granted there.

In this view we think that Section 357 of the code, as a whole, is inconsistent with the act of December, 1878, and, therefore, falls under the repealing clause of that act.

But we do not see how this can help the appellant in this case. The repeal of Section 357 did not take place until February

*1st, 1879, when the act of 1878 took effect. The judgment in this case was rendered and the judgment roll filed some two months before this, to wit, November 22d, 1878. This even before the act of 1878 was passed. At that time Section 357 of the code was of force. The right of the appellant to his appeal then attached, and was subject both as to the right and as to its limitations to this section. The legislature did not intend that the act of 1878 should apply to such cases. It was intended to apply to and govern in cases where judgments, &c., should be rendered after the act took effect. The fifth section, providing that the act should not take effect until the first of February after its passage, is an unusual section to be found in an act, and can be explained in no other way but as indicating an intention that the act should have no retroactive effect, but, on the contrary, should apply only to orders, decrees and judgments obtained after it went into operation, leaving the law, as it then stood, to govern in cases already having passed into judgment. This view is sustained by authority. See the case of Warren, Wallace & Co. v. Jones, 9 S. C. 292, in which McIver, A. J., delivered the opinion of the court; Ex parte Graham, 13 Rich. L. 277; Cooley Const. Lim. 370.

Section 357 of the code, then, being of force at the time the right of appeal attached in this case, it must stand or fall, as that section may determine, and, it being admitted that no notice of appeal was given by the appellant within the three months after the filing of the judgment roll required by that section, it follows that the appeal must be dismissed.

The objection to the appeal being fatal on the first ground, it will be unnecessary to consider the second.

It is ordered that the appeal be dismissed.

Before Hudson, J., Marion, April, 1880.

Action commenced in September, 1879, by John H. Ellen, by Caroline M. Ellen, his guardian ad litem, against William B. Ellen, for the recovery of land. Verdict being for plaintiff, defendant moved for a new trial upon the same grounds, substantially, as were taken in his exceptions to the order of the Circuit judge overruling the motion. This order clearly states the case, and was as follows:

This was an action by John H. Ellen, the youngest son and only child of David Ellen by a second wife, against an elder half-brother, a son by the first wife, to recover the possession of a tract of about one hundred acres of land, of which the plaintiff had been ousted by the defendant, and forcibly kept out.

*David Ellen died at an advanced age in 1876, being about ninety years old.

The contest was a very bitter family quarrel, and gave rise to much testimony and a very animated contest in court. The land papers of old man David Ellen, as well as of W. B. Ellen, were lost and destroyed during the war by being carelessly buried during the passage of Gen. Sherman's forces through the country. Having not been recorded, much testimony was introduced to prove the existence and contents of deeds, and still more concerning the character of the very long possession of David Ellen of the territory in dispute—a fact which was conceded on both sides; the question being not as to the fact of his possession, but as to its character.

The plaintiff derived his title immediately from David Ellen, by deed, in 1871, in which the old man reserved a life-estate in the land to himself, and continued in possession up to his death, in 1876. This deed, coupled with possession of the land by his father for a period of about forty years anterior thereto, constituted the plaintiff's title. The defendant relied on an old grant to one Hyatt, a deed from Hyatt to Robert McKenzie, Sr., an alleged deed from said McKenzie to Zimri Ellen, which could not be produced, as it was alleged to be lost and had never been recorded, and the record copy of a deed from Z. Ellen to the defendant.

After a very tedious trial, lasting several days, and a very full argument of the case, the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff.

This motion is to set aside the verdict, and for a new trial upon the specified grounds.

The first ground rests in the misapprehension of counsel. I distinctly charged the jury that the existence of the alleged deed from R. McKenzie, Sr., to Zimri Ellen might be inferred by them from the testimony of Zimri Ellen, William B. Ellen, and the declarations of old man David Ellen; and it is a mistake in counsel when they say that the declarations of the old man, as testified to by witnesses, were withheld by me from the jury in my charge. These declarations were allowed to go to the jury as evidence against the plaintiff, his grantee.

*2. Upon the second exception I have to remark, that I did instruct the jury, that if they believed from the testimony that the old man Ellen did hold, occupy and possess the land adversely to the defendant and the world, from 1865 to 1876, that a title would accrue to him as against the defendant, notwithstanding the fact that he, in 1871, made a deed of the land to the plaintiff, in which he reserved to himself a life-estate. That until the death of his father, in 1876, the plaintiff had neither the possession nor right of possession, but the undisputed continuance of the old man's possession until his death inured to the benefit of his title against the defendant, and to the remainderman would pass a title thus perfected, however imperfect it might have been in 1871.

In this I do not think there was error. The conveyance of itself could not break the possession unless the life-tenant had surrendered to the remainderman; so long as he held possession adversely, still owning the life-estate, the possession would be for the benefit of that estate, and was still the old man's adverse possession (if the evidence showed it to be adverse); and the character of the possession was strictly left to the jury to determine.

3. On the main question in the case, to wit, the character of old man Ellen's possession, there was great conflict of testimony, and it was left to the jury to determine its weight and preponderance. On this question the battle was chiefly fought, and the jury having decided it in favor of the adverse possession of David Ellen, I do not think I should disturb the verdict.

4. The fourth exception questions the competency of declarations of David Ellen, deceased, as to the character of his possession, and his claim of title.

There was an earnest contest over the testimony on this point, and a strenuous effort on the part of the court to confine the contestants to the rule governing such evidence. In the evidence in chief for the plaintiff, he was confined to proof of acts of ownership alone; but frequently in bringing out this testimony, witnesses did, before they could be stopped, repeat declarations of David Ellen, accompanying his acts of ownership and posses*sion, amounting to a claim of the land. But the rule confining him to the naked acts of ownership without declarations was followed by him and enforced by the court as rigidly as possible.

The defendant, in developing his case, was given the unrestrained privilege of introducing against the plaintiff the declarations of David Ellen, while in possession, to qualify that possession, and to show it to be permissive and not adverse to the defendant. These ran through a long series of years, just as did the acts of ownership established by the plaintiff. When the plaintiff came to reply to this testimony, he was allowed to do so by additional proof of adverse possession, and assertions of title and claim of title accompanying and attending these acts of ownership, and during his actual possession, to show the same to be adverse to defendant and all others.

It is difficult to conceive how the character of a man's possession of land, whether in his own right or in right of another, whether adverse or permissive, could ever be proved unless it be by his acts and words accompanying such acts while in possession and occupancy. As explanatory of that possession, we think, as part of the res gestæ, they are as admissible for, as well as against, one claiming under and through the alleged adverse possession. Especially should such be admissible for the claimant in reply to alleged declarations of permissive possession; and it was only when the plaintiff came to reply that he was allowed to prove the declarations of David Ellen, accompanying possession and occupancy going to show it to be adverse and not permissive.

5. This ground is likewise based on a misapprehension. I allowed the plaintiff to prove that his father always, during his long possession, paid the taxes on the land, and for this purpose did allow tax receipts to be given in evidence of the fact of payment of taxes. On this point I told the jury that payment of taxes on land by one in possession was not evidence of title, but was a circumstance going to show a claim of ownership, but that it would amount to nothing if it were proved to have been done under contract with the real owner.

The first testimony, according to my recollection, as to payment of taxes by D. Ellen, came out (perhaps on cross-examination) while the defendant's witnesses were being examined.

*Upon mature consideration, I am constrained to deny the motion for a new trial on all the grounds, and the same is dismissed with costs.

Plaintiff deed of August 18th, 1871, was as follows:

Know all men by these presents, that I, David Ellen, of the county and State aforesaid, for and in consideration of the natural love and affection which I have and bear for my son, John Henry Ellen, have given and granted, and by these presents do give and grant unto my said son, John Henry Ellen, all my real estate as well as personal. The personal consisting of * * * The real consisting of a tract or parcel of land in said county containing two hundred acres more or less, on which I reside, bounded by lands of * * * Together with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments and appurtenances thereunto appertaining or in anywise incident; to have and to hold all and singular the said premises to the said John H. Ellen, his heirs and assigns forever. Nevertheless reserving to myself the use and occupation of the above-named premises and personal property during the term of my natural life.

In witness whereof, &c.

The case was brought to this court on five exceptions to the judge's rulings, and refusal to grant a new trial. The first two are stated in the opinion; the others were as follows:

3. The defendant excepts to the rulings of his Honor, the presiding judge, as to the fact of there being a conflict of testimony, whereas it is submitted that there was none, the witnesses for the plaintiff speaking of declarations of David Ellen at one time, and those for defendant of declarations at other times, and no one witness contradicted the other on these points; and it is insisted that the declarations of one in possession against his interest cannot be contradicted or rebutted by declarations at another time, and hence the weight of competent evidence was all on one side, and such declarations being objected to, were incompetent, and should have been ruled out by his Honor.

4. The defendant further excepts to the ruling of his Honor in admitting the declarations of David Ellen, under whom plaintiff claims, under objections as to their competency, especially those testified to as to the exchange of land with Z. Ellen, *in the testimony of plaintiff in reply, as the same were not strictly in reply to defendant's evidence, and were inadmissible.

5. And for a further exception and ground, that his Honor admitted the statement of the county auditor to prove the payment of taxes by David Ellen on the lands in dispute, when the same was objected to as incompetent, and when the same was not evidence of title or admissible in evidence as proof of title or adverse possession.

The cause was heard in this court on December 17th, 1880. The court ordered a reargument, which was heard May 5th, 1881.

October 17th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. This was an action to recover possession of a tract of land. The plaintiff, respondent, claimed through a deed from his father, David Ellen, executed in 1871, alleging that his father had been in the adverse possession of the land over ten years.

The appellant claimed by deed dated March 12th, 1861, from Zimri Ellen, a son of David, who, it was alleged, had received title from one Robert McKenzie, who derived title in 1804 from Israel Hyatt, a grantee of the State. The deed from Robert McKenzie to Zimri Ellen was not produced on the trial, having been lost during the passage of Sherman's army through the State, which involved the destruction of not only much valuable property, but the loss of many valuable papers. It was alleged, however, that David Ellen, through whom plaintiff claimed, during all the time that he was in possession, held possession subordinate to this deed, and in full recognition thereof. Consequently, appellant contends that the claim of respondent, through David Ellen on account of his supposed adverse possession, has no foundation.

The verdict was for the respondent, plaintiff. The appellant, *defendant, appeals, assigning error in the charge of the judge, as appears in the following grounds:

First. He excepts to the charge, because the judge did not instruct the jury "that as to the deed of Robert McKenzie to Zimri Ellen, the admissions of David Ellen, under whom respondent claimed, were conclusive against him, not only as to its existence, but as to its contents."

The presiding judge, in his order refusing the motion for a new trial, uses the following language in reference to this ground:

"The first ground rests in a mistake of counsel. I distinctly charged the jury that the existence of the alleged deed from Robert McKenzie to Zimri Ellen might be inferred by them from the testimony of Zimri Ellen, William B. Ellen, and of the old man Ellen, and it is a mistake of counsel when they say that the declarations of the old man, as testified to by witnesses, were withheld from the jury in my charge. These declarations were allowed to go to the jury as evidence against the plaintiff, his grantee."

It seems, then, that the judge did charge in accordance with the substance of this exception. He permitted the declarations of old man David Ellen, in reference to the deed, to go to the jury without restriction, and charged them that the alleged deed might be inferred from these declarations as well as from other testimony. If the appellant had desired that the effect of these declarations should have been more strongly put to the jury than was stated by the judge, he should have so requested, but, failing to do so, the omission of the judge to impress and intensify this point cannot now be assigned as error of law and be made a ground of appeal. Madsden v. Phœnix Ins. Co., 1 S. C. 24; Abrahams v. Kelly & Barrett, 2 S. C. 238.

The deed under which respondent claimed was executed in 1871, which, under our view of the case, was some four years before the statutory period of the adverse possession of David Ellen had expired. Upon this subject the judge instructed the jury: "That if they believed from the testimony that old man Ellen did hold, occupy and possess the land adversely to the defendant and the world from 1865 to 1876, that a title would *accrue to him as against the defendant, notwithstanding the fact that he, in 1871, made a deed of the land to the plaintiff, in which he reserved to himself a life-estate. That until the death of his father, in 1876, the plaintiff had neither the possession nor the right to possession, but the undisputed continuance of the old man's possession until his death inured to the benefit of his title against the defendant, and to the remainderman would pass a title thus perfected, however imperfect it might have been in 1871."

To this appellant excepted as follows: "Because the judge charged the jury that if David Ellen held the land adversely from December 8th, 1865, till June, 1876, when he died, that this adverse possession would give title to the land, notwithstanding he had conveyed the said land to the plaintiff in 1871." This presents an interesting question—one which involves the discussion of the theory of title to land when resting simply upon adverse possession as a foundation.

In this case, as it has been already stated, David Ellen, some four years before the statutory period of adverse possession—ten years—had expired, conveyed the land in dispute to the plaintiff, still holding possession, however, under the terms of his deed, until the ten years had expired, when he died.

Now the question is: Did his deed to plaintiff, under these circumstances, operate as a good conveyance, which entitles him to recover in this action? or, having been executed before the expiration of the ten years, did it convey any interest whatever, although he continued to hold adversely until the full statutory period ran out? The solution of this question will depend upon the further question: Does adverse possession give or create title which, by operation of law, is conferred upon a trespasser at the end of ten years? or is adverse possession for ten years simply the evidence of a title which the law presumes the party in possession of when he first entered?

There is no doubt that title to land growing out of long-continued possession—long enough to presume a grant, deed or other muniment of title—attaches at the beginning of possession on the presumption of law that a deed was executed at that time which has since been lost. Wadsworthville Poor School

v. *McCully, 11 Rich. 426; 1 Greenl. Evid. 23, § 17. So, too, as to those rights which arise by prescription. The law presumes a grant or deed in favor of the party claiming the right when he first began to enjoy it. 2 Greenl. Evid. 992.

Now, does the title, by adverse possession, rest upon this doctrine? If so, the deed of David Ellen to the plaintiff, although executed before the statutory period of ten years expired, would be a good deed; his continuing to hold for the ten years affording the evidence that when he entered he entered with title, which had subsequently been lost. I was disposd at first to take this view of the subject, and to believe that this doctrine applied as well to adverse possession as to titles arising by presumption of grant or prescription. This seemed to me to be most philosophic and more in harmony with the rights of the parties in such cases than any other; but upon the re-argument of this case, when special attention was directed to this point, it seems clear, upon the authority of the decided cases in this State, that the true doctrine is the other way. According to these decisions, an adverse possessor is a trespasser from the beginning to the end. His possession begins in trespass, and so continues until it ripens into a right at the end of the statutory period of ten years. During this time he has nothing that he can convey; nor can his possession be tacked with that of his grantee so as to defeat the title of the true owner.

He who claims under the presumption of a grant, it is true, is entitled to stand on the same ground as if he produced the grant. Such a case, however, is wholly unlike a title under the Statute of Limitations. McLeod v. Rogers & Gardner, 2 Rich. 21; see, also, King v. Smith, Rice 12; Williams v. McAliley, Cheves 200. The Statute of Limitations does not rest upon the presumption of a previous deed. It simply operates as a bar to the plaintiff's action; and, as a general rule, no one can interpose this bar except such as may have held for the period prescribed by the statute. Under the authorities settling this doctrine, in the opinion of the court,

David Ellen's deed to plaintiff having been executed before the statutory period expired, and before his trespass had ripened into a right, conveyed *no title. The second exception of appellant is, therefore, sustained.

Neither is there any ground to hold that this deed can stand as a covenant to stand seized. In the first place, as we have just seen, David Ellen had no title himself at the time he executed this deed. He was not seized, and, if he had been, his deed conveyed the fee to his grantee at the moment of its execution, reserving only a usufruct to himself for life, which would negative the idea of a covenant to stand seized. Cribb v. Rogers, 12 S. C. 564 [32 Am. Rep. 511]; Jenkins v. Jenkins, 1 Mill Con. R. 48; see, also, Singleton v. Bremar, 4 McC. 15 [17 Am. Dec. 699].

The third and fourth exceptions question the competency of certain declarations of David Ellen while he was in possession, sustaining his title to the land. It is a general rule that declarations of persons in possession of land explanatory of the character of their possession will be admitted when in disparagement of their title as original evidence; and Mr. Greenleaf says: "That there can be no reason why every declaration accompanying the act of possession, whether in disparagement of the claimant's title or otherwise qualifying his possession, if made in good faith, should not be received as part of the res gestæ, leaving its effect to be governed by other rules of evidence." 1 Greenl. Evid., § 109.

In Turpin v. Brannon, 3 McC. 261, such declarations were admitted. In Martin v. Simpson, 4 McC. 262, a case of trespass to try title, such declarations were admitted on the ground that the character of every act must be determined by the circumstances attending it. The words and actions of the actor constitute a part of the thing done, and is necessary to its explanation, said the court. The same doctrine is held in several other cases in our own State not necessary now to be referred to.

The presiding judge below says that the plaintiff was confined to proof of acts of ownership; but, frequently, in bringing out the testimony, witnesses did, before they could be stopped, repeat declarations of David Ellen accompanying his acts of ownership and possession amounting to a claim of the land. But the rule of confining him to the naked acts of ownership, without declarations, was followed by him and enforced by the court as rigidly *as possible. We see no error as to the rulings of the judge in this respect.

There seems to be some misapprehension as to the fifth exception. The plaintiff, respondent, was allowed to prove that his father paid taxes, and the tax receipts were admitted, but the judge says: "That he explained to the jury that these were admitted as circumstances going to show claim of ownership which would, however, amount to nothing if it were proved to have been done under contract with the real owner." Under these circumstances we do not see that the judge erred in his rulings as to this matter.

Although we have sustained the presiding judge as to several of the exceptions of the appellant, yet one of the main grounds involved in the case, and that upon which the verdict, no doubt, in a great measure turned, is that presented in the second exception. In this we think the judge was in error, and this will necessitate a reversal of the judgment below.

It is, therefore, the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded.

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, March, 1880.

*Petition by Albert Gray against E. C. Walker, to enforce mechanics' lien, filed June 25th, 1879.

To the statement of facts in the opinion of this court, the following extracts from the testimony may be properly added:

W. E. Walker testified for plaintiff: Am husband for defendant: Hughes authorized me to look after the building; if I had seen building going on wrong I should have notified Hughes; think I called attention of Gray to plastering off in large room, and asked him to replaster it; I spoke to Gray just as I would to any other employé of Howerton.

Albert Gray recalled: W. E. Walker was about the house a good deal while I was at work on it; looked over the work going on; spoke to me about plastering; knew I was there at work; never heard of any objection to my working there, nor ever received any notice that I could not have lien on work for my pay; Hughes was there once or twice; saw me at work.

This is all the testimony bearing on the question of consent or acknowledge. Neither Hughes nor Mrs. Walker were examined.

October 17th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. There is but one question in this case, to wit: Whether the respondent is entitled to the mechanics' lien, which he is here attempting to set up and enforce against the defendant, appellant.

The facts of the case are as follows: The appellant owned a lot of land in the town of Spartanburg, upon which her father, as a gift to his daughter, had determined to have erected for her use a small dwelling-house. To this end a contract was made by the defendant and her father, W. H. Hughes, with one Howerton, who was to furnish all the materials and build the house. After this contract was made with Howerton, he (Howerton) *contracted with the respondent for certain plastering and brick work to be done by him. For this work Howerton agreed to pay respondent fifty dollars.

The house was completed in due time, and Howerton was paid off in full, according to the contract. Shortly after this, and within the time specified in the act, the respondent, not having been paid in full for his work by Howerton, filed in the clerk's office for Spartanburg county a statement of the balance which he claimed to be due him, which, after allowing all credits, he alleged amounted to $30.85. The proceeding below was a petition to enforce this claim under the act in reference to liens of this character. Gen. Stat. 550.

The case below was referred to a referee, who reported substantially as stated above. He also reported that on several occasions during the progress of the work, Hughes, the father of defendant, saw the respondent at work on the house and made no objection, but there was no evidence before him showing any consent of defendant or that she ever knew or saw him at work.

Upon these facts the referee found as matter of law that the petitioner was not entitled to establish a lien on the building and land of defendant, and he recommended that defendant have judgment for her costs. Exceptions were duly taken. Upon the hearing Judge Wallace passed an order overruling this report, adjudging that the petitioner was entitled to recover from the defendant the sum of $30.70, with his costs; also, that he had a lien on the land and building, which he ordered to be sold by the sheriff, the proceeds first to be applied to the satisfaction of the debt, costs and sheriff's fees, and, if any balance, this to be paid to defendant. The defendant has appealed, claiming that his Honor erred in not sustaining the conclusions of law and fact as reported by the referee.

There seems to be no controversy as to the facts. It is agreed that Howerton was the party with whom alone the defendant contracted, and that this contract was an entire contract, embracing not only the building of the house, but the furnishing of all materials —all to be done for a specified sum. It is also agreed that upon the completion of the house Howerton was fully paid. It is further agreed that respondent was employed by Howerton; *that Howerton paid him in part, leaving $30.70 due; that Hughes saw him at work and made no objection; but there was no evidence that defendant ever saw or knew that he had done any work on the house. The question then before the court is whether the facts of the case bring it under any of the provisions of the act of 1869, (14 Stat. 220, Gen. Stat. 550,) creating what is generally known as the mechanics' lien.

This act embraces in its terms two classes of persons who may, under certain circumstances, become entitled to the lien therein provided for: First, persons who furnish and perform labor on the building; and, second, those who furnish material actually used in the structure. The first section of the act defines the conditions upon which this lien may attach as to these parties. It provides that for any debt due for labor performed or furnished, or for materials furnished and actually used in erecting the building, by virtue of an agreement with or by consent of the owner or of any person having authority from or rightfully acting for such owner in procuring or furnishing such labor or materials, there shall be a lien both on the structure and the land upon which it is situated, to the extent of the interest of the owner.

The petitioner here belongs to the first class—those who furnish or perform labor. To entitle him, then, to the lien which he claims, it must appear that he performed the work by virtue of an agreement with or by the consent of the appellant, either personally or through some one having authority from her or rightfully acting for her in furnishing this labor. Has this been shown?

There is, certainly, nothing in the facts which show that the respondent did this work by virtue of any express agreement with the defendant; on the contrary, the evidence is that the only express contract which defendant made was with Howerton, and this covered the entire building, including the erection and all materials. Did the defendant consent to plaintiff doing the work? There is no evidence of any express consent, either personally or through any authorized agent. It is true that Hughes, her father, who had agreed to pay for the building, and who, no doubt, gave some attention to its erection, did, on several occasions, while the work was in *progress, see respondent doing the work which he now seeks to shelter under this act. Does this amount to a consent by "one having authority from or rightfully acting for the owner in furnishing this labor," such as is contemplated in the act of 1869? We think not. It may be that Hughes had authority to act for defendant, but this is doubtful, at least as to all matters occurring after the contract with Howerton. Howerton had contracted to furnish all labor and materials. These things, then, had passed out of the hands of both the defendant and Hughes, and had been delivered over to Howerton. After this the defendant had no right to contract for either labor or materials with another, and having no such power herself, she could not delegate it to an agent. Hughes, therefore, could not have consented as one authorized to furnish labor for defendant.

Let it be admitted, however, that Hughes had authority, and could rightfully act for defendant in furnishing labor in such way that his consent would bind the defendant. Did he consent?

The contract with the respondent was made by Howerton. Neither the defendant nor Hughes seem to have been consulted. There is no evidence that either one of them knew anything of the character of the work to be done by respondent, or the price to be paid, or anything whatever of the terms of his contract. Now, does the bare knowledge of Hughes that respondent was employed on the house amount to a consent by the defendant, in the sense of the act, which will impose a lien upon her property and subject it to the stringent provisions therein declared? Consent, here, we think, implies something more than a mere acquiescence in a state of things already in existence. It implies an agreement to that which, but for the consent, could not exist, and which the party consenting has the right to forbid. Here Howerton had contracted to build this house, furnishing all labor and material. He was under no obligation to consult with or obtain the consent of defendant as to his employés.

In our opinion the facts do not show such consent on the part of defendant as entitles the respondent to the lien which he seeks to establish, either by her own act or by that of one authorized *from, or rightfully acting for, her in procuring the labor in question, and, therefore, the lien has not been established. See the case of Murray v. Earle, 13 S. C. 87. True, that case did not turn upon the point involved here, but the question was discussed by Mr. Justice McIver, who delivered the opinion of the court, and the views presented by him there are pertinent here.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded.

Action by Sallie Howard against John W. Wofford and others. Messrs. Wofford & Jennings and J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

Messrs. S. T. McCravy and Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

October 17th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. This case has grown out of the will of S. W. Tucker, late of Spartanburg county. The plaintiff, respondent, claims to be entitled to a support under the second and third clauses of this will, and this action has been instituted to obtain this support.

These clauses are as follows:

"Item 2 I give devise and Bequeath to my Beloved wife Laodicia Tucker the lower part of my plantation the part that I now Live on including the house and other building which part contains Three Hundred and Twelve acres to have for her own use during her natural Life also one negro man Jo and one negro woman Rachel and one negro man Jack also one negro woman and her child Tom during her natural life also one wagon and Harness and four mules she to choose them also my riding carriage also my Buggy and Harness also all my household and kitching furniture also all my cows hogs sheep and all my Books also all my Farming tools and gearing also my horse Charley and one years provisions also the interest that may *accrue on Twenty five Hundred dollars worth of Confederate State Bonds the same to be paid her six months after my death and hence annually during her natural life every six months as it may fall due.

"Item 3 I give devise & bequeath to my Grand Children Children of Dr. F. M. Tucker dect the tract of land that their Mother now lives on containing Two hundred & fifty one acres To wit Laodicia Tucker & J. Nesbit Tucker also at the death of my wife the tract of land that I have willed to my wife when they arrive at the age of Twenty one years they to have all the rents or other profits arising on the same after retaining a Support for my Sister in law Sally Howard to be paid hir during the minority of my said grand children & it is my will if one of my said grand children dies before attaining to the age of Twenty one years the survivor is to have all. If they both should die not being twenty one years old my will is then that my executor sell the same & the proceeds to be divided amongst my legal heirs it is my will that they are not to have any part of the residue of my estate as I regard my lands as their full share of my estate with what I have heretofore given their Father."

S. W. Tucker died in 1871, his will bearing date in 1863. Harvey Wofford was appointed executor, who qualified in 1871 and died in 1877, leaving a will, in which the defendants were appointed executors, all of whom qualified, thereby becoming, by operation of law, the executors of the will of S. W. Tucker. The plaintiff was the sister-in-law of S. W. Tucker, and, we infer, lived in his family until his death. After the death of S. W. Tucker, she lived with, and was supported by, his widow, on the land in which she had a life-estate, until the death of said widow in January, 1875. This action was instituted by her in October, 1878, claiming the support allowed her in the third clause of the will above.

The caption of the complaint was as follows: "Sallie Howard, plaintiff, against J. W. Wofford, Joseph L. Wofford and Benjamin Wofford, Jr., defendants, executors of the will of Harvey Wofford, deceased, who was executor of the will of Samuel W. Tucker, deceased."

*The caption of the summons was against these defendants as individuals, without the addition of the term "executor." The plaintiff claimed support from January, 1875, to the beginning of this action, at the rate of one hundred dollars per annum.

The answer alleged an agreement by plaintiff with one H. J. Kinard, and their testator, Harvey Wofford, by which plaintiff was to look to Kinard for her support—Kinard having rented the land chargeable with her support. It further alleged payment by Kinard, which, with the taxes, amounted to some sixty or seventy dollars per annum.

It was testified on the trial that plaintiff's support was worth one hundred dollars per annum, and that the annual rent of each of the tracts of land was worth that sum.

During the progress of the trial, on motion of plaintiff's counsel, the summons was amended so as to conform to the complaint, and the complaint was amended so as to allege a cause of action against the defendants as executors of the last will and testament of Samuel W. Tucker, deceased, by virtue of their office as executors of the will of Harvey Wofford, who was executor of the first testator.

The appellants requested the judge to charge that only the tract of land first mentioned in S. W. Tucker's will, that devised to his wife for life, was chargeable with plaintiff's support, and that the devisees, and not the executors of S. W. Tucker, were liable to plaintiff.

His Honor declined to charge as thus requested. He instructed the jury that, under the will of S. W. Tucker, both tracts were chargeable with plaintiff's support, and that the executors of S. W. Tucker were liable to the extent of the rents and profits of both tracts.

He further charged that he had heard no agreement made by the plaintiff which would estop her from recovering.

The jury returned a verdict of two hundred dollars for the plaintiff. After verdict the judge passed the following order:

"Ordered, that the plaintiff be allowed to amend her summons and complaint so that the summons shall state the cause of action to be against the defendants as executors of the last will *and testament of Harvey Wofford, deceased, who was the executor of the last will and testament of Samuel W. Tucker, deceased, and so that the complaint shall contain allegations against the said defendants as executors of the said Harvey Wofford, deceased, as also against them as executors of the last will and testament of Samuel W. Tucker, deceased, by virtue of their office as executors of the executor of the said Samuel W. Tucker, who was the first testator, and that the prayer of the complaint be amended so as to conform to the allegations of the amended complaint."

Upon this order and verdict, judgment was entered against the defendants as executors of the will of Harvey Wofford, deceased, and, also, as executors of the will of Samuel W. Tucker, for the full amount of the verdict. The appellants' exceptions question the correctness of the judge's charge as to both tracts of land being chargeable with the plaintiff's support, and as to the amendments whereby the action was allowed to proceed against both estates, and judgment entered up against both: also, that part of the charge in which the judge stated to the jury that he had heard no evidence of an agreement which would operate as an estoppel against the plaintiff.

Whether both tracts of land mentioned in S. W. Tucker's will are chargeable with plaintiff's support is a question of intention, and depends upon the construction which shall be given to the two clauses thereof herein above. The will bears internal evidence that it was written by the testator himself. It is badly punctuated, inartistically drawn, and, certainly, not free from doubt as to its proper interpretation.

In our opinion, however, the judge was in error in charging that both the tracts of land were chargeable with plaintiff's support. We think that the testator intended to confine this support to the tract first mentioned —that devised to his wife for life. The other tract had been in the possession of his son, Dr. F. M. Tucker, during his life, and, at the time of the execution of the will and at the death of the testator, was still in the possession of the widow of Dr. Tucker, the mother of the two grandchildren, Laodicia and J. Nesbit. These two grandchildren, we must *suppose, were especially the objects of the testator's bounty. They were much nearer to him in blood than the plaintiff, and it is hardly to be supposed that he intended to charge the entire estate devised to them with her support. She was living with him at the time of his death, and as he gave the tract of land upon which he lived to his wife during her life, no doubt he supposed that his wife would afford the plaintiff a support during her life, and when this life-estate fell in he intended that this tract should continue to support the plaintiff during the minority of his grandchildren.

It seems that the widow of the testator, during her life, up to 1875, when she died, did support the plaintiff. The plaintiff's claim commences at that date.

This, it appears, was the construction upon which the parties interested acted up to that time, and is in accordance with what we think is the true intent of the will. Any other construction, or, at least, that claimed by the respondent and charged by the judge, would result in depriving the daughter-in-law, the widow of his son, Dr. Tucker, and her two children, the testator's grandchildren, of all support during the minority of these two children for the benefit of his sister-in-law. This is unnatural, and we do not think that the testator could have intended this.

Next, as to the amendments permitted by the judge. It is difficult to determine from the statements in the brief whether the action at the beginning was against the defendants as individuals, or the estate of Harvey Wofford, or against the estate of S. W. Tucker.

The judge, however, by his order after the verdict, allowed it to stand as an action against both estates, and judgment was entered up against both, having, during the trial, allowed an amendment, so that the summons should conform to the complaint, and so that the "complaint should allege the cause of action to be against the defendants as executors of the last will and testament of S. W. Tucker, deceased."

If the respondent had any claim against the estate of Harvey Wofford it was because he, during his executorship from 1875 to 1877, when he died, had received the rents and profits of the *land chargeable with her support, or should have received them, and had failed to apply them as the will directed, and had also failed to account for these rents to the executors of S. W. Tucker, thereby committing a devastavit. This would probably have made the estate of Harvey Wofford liable to her as for so much money had and received to her use, but Harvey Wofford's estate could in no event be made liable for the support to which plaintiff was entitled after his death and after his executorship ceased. This action was begun in 1878, a year after the death of Harvey Wofford. The plaintiff recovered support up to the commencement of the action.

If she had a claim against the estate of S. W. Tucker, after the death of Harvey Wofford, running from 1875 to 1878, the commencement of the action, it must have been because the subsequent executors had received from the estate of Harvey Wofford the amounts which he had received during his life-time as belonging to plaintiff, and had failed to pay it over to her, or because after they had become executors they had failed to pay over to her the annual support accruing after that time. Both of these estates could not be liable for these claims at the same time.

They depend upon different facts, and require different defenses, and, yet, under the amendments allowed, they were united in one action, and each estate was held responsible. The code, in "furtherance of justice," is exceedingly liberal as to amendments, and in Section 196 very wide latitude is allowed on this subject, both before and after judgment. Irregularities, defects, mistakes as to the names of parties, in the statement of the cause of action, in the pleadings, in the evidence, or otherwise affecting the action really instituted, may generally be cured by amendments; but two actions against different parties and founded upon different facts and for different causes cannot be incorporated into one and be allowed to proceed together and result in a general judgment against both parties. This, is seems, has been the effect of the amendments in the case, and we think that the judge erred in the order which he passed after verdict.

The last exception assigns error to the judge, in that he *charged the jury that he had heard no evidence of an agreement which would estop the plaintiff from recovering. Whether any agreement had been made between the parties, as alleged in the answer, was a question of fact for the jury. The legal construction of such agreement, if made, would have been a question of law for the judge.

It does not fully appear whether the judge, in this instance, intended to say that the agreement proved was, in law, no estoppel, or that there was no evidence proving any agreement.

His language, as stated in the brief, was, "that he had heard no evidence of an agreement which would operate as an estoppel to the plaintiff."

This was, however, in his charge to the jury, and whatever may have been his precise meaning it was calculated to withdraw from them the question of fact as to the existence of any agreement at all between the parties, and to that extent it had the effect of a charge upon the facts of the case, which the constitution forbids. Article IV., Section 26.

We see no error in the judge in declining to charge, as requested by the appellant, that the devisees and not the executors were responsible. The tract of land chargeable with plaintiff's support was under the control of the executors until the majority of the grandchildren, and it was their duty, as executors, to see to the application of the rents and profits.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

*Under the first section of the act of 1865 (13 Stat. 345), statements in a bill between two tenants in common are admissible in evidence against others not parties to such bill, to show that certain former proceedings, in part destroyed during the war, made disposition of the property here in dispute.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐209.]

In an action brought by certain persons claiming, as devisees, under a will, which treated certain children named as illegitimate, no question was made before the referee, or Circuit judge, as to the fact of illegitimacy, and they so found. Held, that it was too late, in this court, to raise the point that the illegitimacy was not proven.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1290–1298, 1300, 1303; Dec. Dig. ⇐209.]

[5. Wills ⇐683.]

A testator devised one-fourth of his estate to his illegitimate children, a part to a legitimate son, and the residue to three friends, in "the confident hope," &c., that they would permit his illegitimate children to have the use of such property, the part to S., a daughter, to be conveyed to trustees for her use during her life, and after her death, in trust for such children as she may leave alive. If this expression of a wish to his three friends made such devise void, the residue was to pass to the three friends absolutely; and if efforts were made to impeach any part of his will, the property devised to the legitimate son was to vest absolutely in the three friends. Afterwards, there was filed, in the Court of Equity, a bill, which was lost during the war, but decretal and final orders, writ of partition, return of commissioners (one of whom was one of the three friends), and other papers in the cause, were preserved, and they sufficiently indicated that the action was instituted to confirm certain arrangements between the several parties, made because of the desire on the part of the legitimate son to set aside the excessive provisions for the illegitimate children, with the probable consent of the three friends of testator. By this arrangement, certain land, other than that devised to S. and her children, was vested in S. and her husband, and their heirs, they being ordered to pay sums of money to other parties to that cause. Held, that the children of S., afterwards born, could not, after the death of S., claim this land from S.'s vendees, as it was not that which was devised to them in remainder, nor was it impressed with the trusts and remainders charged upon the devise to them, but was a purchase by S. for valuable consideration.

[6. Wills ⇐792.]

Held, further, that the devise to the friends in the "confident hope," &c., was intended, by the testator, as a trust for the benefit of his illegitimate children, and was, therefore, void under the act of 1795. 5 Stat. 271.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, July, 1879.

Action by Caleb Bouknight and Sarah W. Poole against John P. Brown.

*157

*The exceptions to the referee's report, the Circuit decree, and the opinion of this court constitute a sufficient statement of the case.

The exceptions were as follows:

The plaintiffs except to the report of Francis W. Fickling, referee herein—

1. In that the said report does not contain a statement of the facts found and the conclusions of law separately.

2. In that the referee admitted in evidence the record of the suit in equity, Nathaniel Bynum v. John Gray Bynum.

3. In that said report finds that the proceedings by William Bynum were instituted for the purpose of setting aside the will of Drury Bynum, on account of the third clause thereof, and that the will was set aside by a court of competent jurisdiction.

4. In this, that the report finds:

a. That Drury Bynum, by conditional devise to his executors, defeated his gift for the benefit of the issue of his illegitimate daughter.

b. And that this gift was a contingent remainder, and fell with the precedent particular estate in Sarah upon which it is found to have depended.

c. That the gift to Sarah was void.

d. That the Statute of Limitation is a bar to the action.

e. That the legal estate remains in the trustees.

5. In this that the report orders and adjudges the complaint to be dismissed, and the costs and disbursements to be paid by plaintiffs.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

As regards the plaintiffs' first exception to the report of the referee, it is proper to say that the report was filed in the early part of the year 1878, and sets out facts and matters of law with sufficient distinctness to convey clearly what the findings of fact and law by the referee are.

The plaintiffs' second exception is also overruled. Section 13, Gen. Stat. 346.

The third exception relates to the finding by the referee that the will of Drury Bynum was set aside.

*There is no doubt that the will of Drury Bynum was a valid instrument as to all persons except his legitimate son, William Bynum. It was competent for him to avoid it. Hull v. Hull, 2 Strobh. Eq. 192; Breithaupt v. Bauskett, 1 Rich. Eq. 465. How was this to be done? He is put to his election, either to take under the will, or to avoid the will. When his election is made, his right accrues and vests. Ch. Harper says, in Breithaupt v. Bauskett, "I will not say but that, by possibility, if the will had contained no provision for the wife, or only an illusory one, there might be ground to conclude that she had elected, during her life-time, to take against the will, and that her representatives came, not for the purpose of avoiding it, but to enforce rights already vested by her election;" of course, any positive act of election would be stronger evidence of election than the possible effect of the provisions of the will upon the mind of the wife. Then, if Wm. Bynum elected to avoid the will, his right to avoid it accrued, and, if contested, would be enforced by the court. The bringing a bill to set aside the will would be one mode of indicating an election; but not the only one. It is clearly deducible from the evidence that he did elect to avoid the will. It appears from that part of the record of the case of Wm. Bynum et al. v. James Bynum and others, which we have, that by the consent and acquiescence of all the parties in interest, who were living at the time, an arrangement was made by which the estate of Drury Bynum was divided without reference to the provisions of his will. This agreement amounted to an election, by Wm. Bynum, to avoid the will, and a recognition by those whose rights, under the will, were adverse to his, of his right to avoid it, or of its actual avoidance as to all the parties who were sui juris. And this suit of William Bynum et al. v. James Bynum et al. could have been brought for no other purpose than to bind those who were not sui juris, and not in esse, by the election of William Bynum to avoid the will. The court, in that case, after instituting inquiry according to its customary methods, pronounces a decree which necessarily implies an avoidance of the will, this avoidance made up by the acts of the parties and the decree of the court. All the parties before the court are concluded by that decree. Are the plaintiffs *in this action—the representatives of R. C. Shiver and Sarah W. Evans—concluded also? R. C. Shiver and Sarah W. were not in esse at the time of the decree. They were the children of Sarah Shiver, unborn at the time of the decree, to whom an estate was limited over after the death of Sarah Shiver, by the will. They were contingent remaindermen. If the will was in operation at the time they were born, the estate opened and their interest became vested. But the will, by acts of parties and decree of the court, was absolutely set aside and avoided, and the rights of contingent remaindermen under it barred. In support of this view, it will not be necessary to do more than to refer to the opinion of Ch. Dunkin, concurred in by Harper, O'Neall and Wardlaw, in Van Lew v. Parr, in which this point is elaborately discussed. In that opinion, on page 346 of 2 Rich. Eq., the following language is used: "Unless this court had authority to dispose of the fee-simple of the estate for the payment of debts, it is quite clear that it could not be reached. If it had the authority, not having the contingent remaindermen before the court, the validity of the title, executed by the officer of the court, is not open to objection. But if the court can make a good title for the payment of debts, if it has authority in any case to dispose of the fee, not having those in remainder before it, the exercise of that authority in cases of partition, or for the change of property, becomes a question of discretion, and not of jurisdiction." In this a case of partition, the court has exercised its discretion, and has expressly disposed of the fee, and the remaindermen are barred.

According to the conclusions of this decree, the complainants have no right of action, and the remaining questions raised by the decree need not be discussed. The complaint is dismissed, with costs for defendant.

Messrs. W. S. Monteith and Youmans, Attorney-General, for appellant.

Mr. J. D. Pope, contra.

*160

*McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action for the possession of a tract of land lying in Richland county, latterly known as the "Shiver Place," and ten thousand dollars damages, besides rents and profits to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars.

Drury Bynum, owning a large estate, consisting of several tracts of land, slaves, &c., died about January, 1837, leaving no widow and only one legitimate son, William Bynum. He left a will, by which he disposed of his property as follows:

By the first clause he gave to his four children, Nathaniel, Sarah, James and John Gray, "whom he had begotten by Sally Bryson," one-fourth part of the clear value of his estate.

By the second clause he gave to his son, William [who was legitimate], his mill tract of land; confirmed certain gifts previously made to him, to be in lieu and bar of all claim said William might have against him on any account whatever.

By the third clause he disposed as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath the whole of the rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, to my friends, John Scott, William Weston and Wade Hampton, Sr., for life, and the survivor of them, his heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, in fee-simple, absolutely and forever. It is my wish that my said friends shall hold the property thus devised to them free from all trust whatever. Nevertheless, I have devised and bequeathed the same to them, in the confident expectation and hope that they will permit my children by Sally Bryson, to wit: Nathaniel, Sarah, James and Gray, for whom I am under a sacred obligation to provide, to have the use of the whole of the estate, real and personal, absolutely and forever, in the manner following: that is to say, that my friends will permit the said James and Gray to have, &c., * * * The balance of my swamp and bluff lands I wish to be divided equally among my children, Nathaniel and Sarah. And it is my earnest hope and expectation that my friends, John Scott, William Weston and Wade Hampton, Sr., will permit the balance of my lands to be equally divided between Nathaniel and Sarah, my children by Sally Bryson. * * * And it is my hope and confident expectation that my said friends will carry into effect these my wishes, by conveyances proper to that end, after my death, and, especially, in relation to my daughter, *Sarah, aforesaid, that they would convey to some person in trust for her, during her life, all that portion of said rest and residue of my estate, real and personal, which I have devised above, that she should enjoy for her sole and separate use, free from the debts, contracts and control of any husband she may marry, and after her death in trust for such children as she may leave alive, and the descendants of any that may be dead at such period, they taking among them their parents' share; but if" (here providing for the event of Sarah dying without issue.)

By the fourth clause he declared that if the foregoing provision was void, he gave the whole residuum of his estate to John Scott, William Weston and Wade Hampton, Sr., for life, and to the survivor forever, without any expression of his wishes, hopes or expectations.

By the fifth clause he directed that if any attempt should be made "to impair his will or any part thereof," the second clause of his will should be void, and the property therein given to his son William should also go to John Scott, William Weston and Wade Hampton, Sr., their heirs and assigns forever. And these same gentlemen were nominated executors of the will.

The will was proved, but the gentlemen named as executors never qualified or accepted the devises given or trusts imposed, and they are all now dead.

It appears that soon after the death of his father, the legitimate son, William Bynum, filed a bill in equity against all the illegitimate children entitled William Bynum et al. v. James Bynum and others, "for settlement and partition." The pleadings in the cause have been lost or destroyed, and the precise scope of the bill cannot be known, except so far as it may be gathered from certain orders in the case, which, in some way, have escaped the fate of the general record and are in existence. By these orders, copies of which can be found in the case, it appears that the children, legitimate and illegitimate, all of whom were of age except James and Gray, entered into an agreement to disregard the will entirely, and have a new division of the whole estate upon certain settled terms. Certain property was allotted to William, the legitimate son, and the remainder to the four illegitimate children. To confirm and ratify this *agreement, division and assignment appears to have been the object of the bill. September 25th, 1837, Chancellor Harper granted an order of reference to inquire "whether it would be to the interest of the minors, James Bynum and John Gray Bynum, to ratify and confirm the said agreement and deed of assignment set forth in complainants' said Exhibit D. and E., together with the partition contained in Exhibit A. and B., purporting to have been made in conformity to said agreement and deed of assignment," &c.

The commissioner reported favorably, and on November 7th, 1837, Chancellor DeSaussure confirmed the report, ordered that the property contained in Exhibit A. and B., be vested in William Bynum, his heirs and assigns forever; "and further ordered that the remaining estate, real and personal, be vested in the said Nathaniel Bynum, Sarah Shiver, James Bynum and John Gray Bynum, upon their payment to the said William Bynum, the said bond of six thousand and sixty-three dollars, that the said estate, real and personal, herein vested in them, do stand pledged for the payment thereof according to the condition of the said bond, and that they also pay the said Sarah Bryson the said annual annuity of $350," &c. He further ordered that "a writ of partition should issue to make partition of the remaining estate, real and personal, equally between Nathaniel Bynum, Sarah Shiver, James Bynum and John Gray Bynum. All of which is in pursuance of the agreement of the parties, and to carry the same into effect." &c.

The commissioner reported that the property assigned as aforesaid to the four illegitimate children, consisted of 110 slaves, horses, mules, &c., and 3,133 acres of land, valued at the aggregate price of $63,774.50. The commissioner allotted all the lands to the two children who were then of age, Nathaniel and Sarah, and recommended that they should pay to the other two children half the value of the lands in money, viz., $11,356.-25. This return was confirmed by Chancellor David Johnson, January 12th, 1838, who ordered that the lands allotted in said return to Nathaniel Bynum and Sarah Shiver and William Shiver, her husband, be vested in them and their heirs as tenants in common forever, &c. It was further ordered *that the two plantations on Towe's creek, now in the respective possession and cultivation of Nathaniel Bynum and William Shiver, being a part of the foregoing premises, &c., * * "be and stand pledged for the payment of the said two sums of $5,678.12 to the said James Bynum and John Gray Bynum, with interest," &c.

It does not appear when or how Mrs. Shiver and her brother Nathaniel made division of their joint estate in these lands, but it does appear that they paid their brother for their interest in the same.

Some time prior to April, 1842, Sarah and her husband, William Shiver, sold and conveyed the land in dispute, since known as the "Shiver Place," to Richard Singleton, trustee, for the price of $14,450. Singleton paid the purchase-money, took conveyance of Shiver and wife, went into possession, and he, or those claiming under him, have been in possession ever since—a period of nearly forty years.

In 1844, Nathaniel Bynum, who had become the guardian of his infant brother, John Gray, filed a bill connected with his guardianship, which, among other things, contained the following recital: "That his father, Drury Bynum, departed this life January 15th, 1837, leaving a large estate, both real and personal, and also leaving his last will and testament, disposing of the same among his five children—that is to say, your orator, Nathaniel Bynum, William Bynum and Sarah Bynum, adults, and James Bynum and John Bynum, minors, which last will and testament, however, was by agreement of all parties interested therein set aside and abandoned, and proceedings for partition of the said estate were instituted in the Court of Equity for Richland district, in pursuance of said agreement on September —, 1837, in which proceeding the said William Bynum and others were the complainants, and James Bynum and others were the defendants," &c.

Sarah Shiver died January 9th, 1850, leaving two children surviving her, Robert C. Shiver and Sarah W. Shiver, both born after the proceedings in partition. Robert C. died, leaving Caleb Bouknight his sole executor and devisee, and Sarah W. intermarried with one Poole, and they are the plaintiffs who *brought this action March 5th, 1875, to recover the tract of land described. The answer denies every allegation in the complaint, and pleads the Statute of Limitations.

F. W. Fickling, Esq., was appointed special referee "to hear and determine all the issues of law and of fact." He decided all the issues of law for the defendant, and recommended that the complaint be dismissed. Judge Wallace confirmed the report, and the plaintiffs appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. To his Honor's ruling in the first exception made to the referee's report.

2. To his Honor's ruling on the second exception to the referee's report.

3. To his Honor's ruling as to the third, fourth and fifth exceptions to the referee's report.

4. Because all the exceptions to the referee's report should have been sustained.

These exceptions are not in the best form. They do not state the matter objected to, but refer to other exceptions to the report of the referee, which tends to confusion and makes it necessary to go back through the record to find out what points those exceptions made. "Exceptions should point out the particulars in which the errors complained of consist." †

As we understand it, the first exception intended to make the point that the referee's report did "not contain a statement of the facts found and conclusions of law separately." Section 296 of the code declares that "they [referees] must state the facts found and the conclusions of law separately." The object of this requirement is to promote clearness and prevent confusion. If the Circuit judge had considered it necessary, he might have required the report put in form, but he did not. The remedy in such case is to move that the proceedings be referred back for correction. Waite's An. Code 498. The report does not, in the usual way, state the facts and the law under different heads, but we concur with the judge that they are stated "separately" and with unusual clearness and ability. See Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 329; State ex rel. Cathcart v. Columbia, 12 Id. 393.

*The second exception objects to the judge's ruling in that "the record of the suit in equity, Nathaniel Bynum v. John Gray Bynum, was admitted in evidence." The statements of this bill were admissible under the first section of the act of 1865, "to provide a mode by which to perpetuate testimony," &c., (13 Stat. 345,) which, among other things, declares that "statements in the record of any suit in any of the courts, produced from the proper place of custody, although such statements be in cases not between the parties to the suit in which the evidence is offered, or those under whom they claim, shall be admissible for the consideration of the court or jury," &c. The statement was merely in corroboration of what may be fairly gathered from the fragments preserved of the case of William Bynum et al. v. James Bynum et al.

The other exceptions make the question of title. No exception was taken below to the report finding that Nathaniel Bynum, Sarah Bynum, James Bynum and John Bynum were the illegitimate children of Drury Bynum "by Sally Bryson," but it has been seriously argued here, that there is no proof of such illegitimacy. That is the most important fact of the case. The will itself, in its terms and in its whole structure, affords at least prima facie evidence of the fact, which has never been denied. It was taken to be shown before the referee and the Circuit judge. The referee reported it as a fact, and the Circuit judge concurred with him without objection.

† See rule No. 5 of the Supreme Court, as amended since the filing of this opinion.—REPORTER.

At that time the matter could have been conclusively settled in a moment. It is now too late to raise the question for the first time. We are judicially satisfied of the fact.

The plaintiffs claim as the children of Sarah Shiver, remaindermen under the third clause of Drury Bynum's will, which, as they insist, is legal and binding in all its parts. There is no other limitation in the will except that claimed to exist in that clause. Even assuming the plaintiffs' view of the case, there are difficulties in the way of their recovery. The action is to recover the possession of a particular tract of land; and before that can be done, it is necessary, not only that they should show legal title, but also that their title connects with and covers the particular land sued for, the "locus in quo."

*Now, all the land that the testator, in the third clause of his will, "hoped" would be conveyed in trust to Sarah with limitation over, was "the balance of the swamp and bluff lands," to be equally divided between Nathaniel and Sarah. It has not been shown that the Shiver place sued for is any part of the "swamp or bluff lands." On the contrary, the referee reports "it was asserted by the defendant, and not denied by the plaintiffs, but as I understood admitted, that the lands in dispute in this action are not the lands assigned to Sarah in testator's will," &c. This would seem to be conclusive against the plaintiffs, without going into the question of title.

But they urge that, although the Shiver tract is no part of the lands indicated in the will, with limitation over to them, there was a proceeding in equity to divide these lands among the parties, and in doing so the lands got mixed, and the Shiver place was assigned to Sarah in lieu of "swamp or bluff lands," and that thereupon the trusts claimed in the third clause attached upon the land received in lieu of those given by that clause. To sustain this view it is necessary that the partition should have been under and by authority of that clause, and in subordination to it. That is not supported by the proceedings in partition. We look in vain for an order to sell and re-invest, or to make an exchange upon the same trusts. It cannot fairly be claimed that these proceedings were intended to carry out the provisions of the third clause of the will.

There are other facts in the record which show that the Shiver tract is not in the place of any lands intended for Sarah under the will. The lands assigned in the partition to Sarah, including the Shiver place, were in part of her interest in the fourth of the estate given by the first clause of the will without limitation; also in part for her proportion of the bond of $6,063 to William in the division with him, and of the annuity of $300 to "Sally Bryson," and still further in part for $5,678.12, which she was to pay to James and John in the second partition between her and her brother; so that the evidence does not show that the Shiver place was assigned to Sarah in lieu of lands intended for her in the will. The exact contrary is true. The proceedings in equity were inconsistent with the *existence of the third clause and manifestly intended to supersede it. The referee says on this point: "It is, in fact, manifest, that in the partition no regard was had to the will inasmuch as the entire lands were allotted to Nathaniel and Sarah, including the lands assigned James and John Gray in the will." The plaintiffs, therefore, cannot receive aid from the partition proceedings to make out a case under the third clause of the will, when those proceedings were inconsistent with that clause and antagonistic to it. They cannot hold under that proceeding and against it at the same time. So many elements entered as consideration into that partition, under which the Shiver tract was assigned to Sarah, that it cannot be affirmed with truth that said land was simply substituted for that indicated in the will for her. It was to a large, possibly to the whole, extent purchased for valuable consideration by Sarah, and by the order of court assigned to her and her heirs forever.

If there was no difficulty as to the identity of the land, how would the matter stand? The defendant insists that the whole third clause of the will, including the alleged limitation in it, was illegal and void, and no rights growing out of it can be recognized and enforced by the courts. The act of 1795 declares void any gift or provision beyond one-fourth of a man's estate in favor of a woman with whom he lives in adultery, or of his illegitimate child or children, he having a wife or lawful children of his own living. The gift is rendered void by the act only to the extent of the excess. The testator had already given one-fourth of his estate to his illegitimate children by the first clause of his will, and, therefore, any interest intended to be given to them by the third clause was in violation of the law and void. It is true that the terms of that clause were to John Scott, William Weston and Wade Hampton, Sr., but coupled with the "confident hope and expectation" that they would permit his children "by Sally Bryson" to enjoy it in the manner indicated. Considering the words of the act, which are "by deed of gift, legacy, devise, or by any other ways or means whatever," we cannot doubt that it was the intention of the testator to create a trust for the benefit of his illegitimate children, notwithstanding his disclaimer of such intention. It is true that *the provision was good against all the world but the legitimate son, William, and good against him until he elected to have it declared void, which was his exclusive personal privilege. Breithaupt v. Bauskett, 1

Rich. Eq. 466; Ford v. McElray, Id. 474; Hull v. Hull, 2 Strobh. Eq. 174; Taylor v. McRa, 3 Rich. Eq. 96. Did William Bynum elect to exercise this exclusive privilege and have the third clause declared void? He certainly did, soon after his father's death, file a bill in the Court of Equity in regard to the estate. Unfortunately the record of that case is lost, but some orders made in it have been preserved, from which we have a general idea of the proceeding. It appears that all the children, legitimate and illegitimate, agreed to divide the property in a manner entirely different from the division made by the will. That this agreement was ratified and confirmed by the court, and under its orders partition made to carry out the judgment of confirmation. In the fragments we have, it does not appear expressly that William sought to have the third clause declared void, but can it be doubted that he did so? He could have had the third clause set aside at a word. It was his interest to have it done and the new division adopted, by which he got largely more than was given to him by the will. The new arrangement could not be confirmed without the destruction of the third clause as being inconsistent with it. The agreement was confirmed by the court, which, doubtless, acted on the assumption that the third clause was avoided, and William received property under it, which itself was an election against the third clause. Under these circumstances, can it be doubted that he elected to set aside the third clause? Neither his conduct nor that of the court is intelligible upon any other assumption, but all is harmonious and consistent with the existence of that fact. It is said that his interest was against such election, as the effect would be to give the whole estate to Scott, Weston and Hampton, except the fourth given by the first clause. That is true, but we have no doubt these gentlemen allowed the children to make their own arrangements. Instead of setting up title for themselves, they generously and honorably facilitated a judicious family settlement. We think it improbable that William would have filed a bill for purposes inconsistent with *the third clause without making the claim to set it aside, which was absolutely necessary to sustain those very proceedings. It is adjudged that William Bynum elected to vacate the third clause of his father's will; that it was declared void and the property of the testator divided among his children according to an agreement made by them and ratified by the court. That was more than a "consent decree." it was not less a judgment of the court because it was in accordance with the wishes of the parties. The court took care of the rights of the minors, and ordered references for information, &c., &c. The successive orders of different chancellors were in the terms usual in judgments. "It is ordered and decreed," &c.

But it is ingeniously argued that, though the third clause was made void as to Sarah, it was good in so far as it made provision for her children, and that as to unborn children neither the parties nor the court could bar their rights. It is true that the act does not, in express terms reach to the interest of children of illegitimates, but it would seem a strange result if the devise, dead as to the first generation, should revive as to the second. That would certainly, to some extent, defeat the purpose of the act. In the case of Bradley v. Lowry, Speers Eq. 1 [39 Am. Dec. 142], it was held that the act is remedial and should be construed so as to suppress the mischief contemplated by it. In that case a father had given property to the husband of his natural daughter, and it was held to be a benefit conferred on the daughter within the meaning of the act, because the evident design was to confer a benefit on her through her husband in evasion of the statute. The case of Hull v. Hull, 2 Strobh. Eq. 192, was relied on to sustain the proposition that any interest given to the children of Sarah did not fall within the inhibition of the statute. That case was different from this. There, the gift was to Zulina, the illegitimate daughter, for life, with limitation over to her issue. The life-estate to Zulina was not declared void, for it was a part of the fourth of the estate, which was legal, but in estimating the value of her interest the question arose whether she was to be charged with the value of an absolute estate or only of a life-estate. It was held that she should be charged only with the value of the life-estate, *and from that it is sought to draw the inference that in all cases of gifts to the children of illegitimates, the destruction of the estate of the first taken leaves untouched the limitation over. In these broad and sweeping terms we do not think the proposition can be maintained. In the case of Hull, the judgment of the court was pronounced in very guarded terms: "That interests of the children of a bastard daughter, who take as purchasers (under the will of their grandfather), distinctly from their mother, and not through her or in connection with her, shall not be regarded as a gift to her" within the inhibition of the act of 1795. In the case before us the devise to the mother was declared void, and if the third clause gave a good limitation over to the unborn children, it was a contingent remainder, in which the interests of the tenant for life and the remaindermen were not "unconnected," but were parts of the same estate. A remainder is what is left of an entire estate after the preceding part of the same estate has been disposed of. But if the interest of the remaindermen was so "unconnected" with the freehold in the mother as to place it beyond the reach of the avoiding act, the Court of Equity had the power to partition the property, and in doing so to bar the remaindermen.

"When property is devised to tenants for life, with contingent remainders to persons not in esse, the Court of Equity has the power, for the purpose of partition, on the application of the tenants for life before the coming into existence of the remaindermen, to order a sale of the fee and thereby bar the remaindermen." Van Lew v. Parr, 2 Rich. Eq. 322; Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627]. It will be observed that as soon as the devise was made void by the election of William, the will itself expressly revoked the third clause and substituted therefor the fourth clause, which had no limitation. Besides, by the ordinary rules of construction, the limitation over could not be enforced after the life-estate had been declared void. If the future interest is so limited that it can take effect as a remainder, it cannot be an executory limitation. 2 Minor Inst. 369; Fearne Rem. 385. A contingent remainder may be destroyed at common law by fine or recovery, by merger of the particular estate, or by any displacement thereof, and this is the great and essential *difference between a contingent remainder and executory devise. "It is agreed that when a preceding freehold has once vested, no subsequent accident will make a contingent remainder inure as an executory devise, its character as a remainder having been then finally established." Fearne Rem. 525–6; 2 Washb. Real Prop. 348.

This will at the death of the testator was good, and Sarah's life-estate vested under it, but when William elected to invalidate it the life-estate of Sarah was destroyed, and that destruction included the contingent interest of the unborn children. As tersely stated by the referee, "the gift to the issue of the illegitimate daughter was contingent, and fell with the precedent particular estate, upon which it depended." The gift to Sarah being void, the gift to her unborn issue who survived her was also void.

This being an action at law, the costs, of course, follow the result.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

(Case No. 1106.)

ROBERTS v. JOHNS.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇐513.]

An administrator indebted to the estate to the amount of $1,365, by a pastdue sale note, for negroes purchased, obtained order from the Probate judge in November, 1869, to sell, for cash, all the choses in action of the estate, and, after posting at public places a notice of such sale, sold over seven thousand dollars of assets for less than sixty dollars, he being the purchaser, directly or indirectly, of nearly all the notes, including his own. Soon, thereafter, the administrator obtained his discharge from the Probate judge on an ex parte application, properly published, but not otherwise served, and paid to a distributee, resident in Georgia, upon her receipt delivered by her husband, the amount due her as appeared by the final return, and as ordered in the final discharge. Afterwards, the administrator realized a considerable amount on the notes purchased by him. This distributee had made several visits to the administrator—had received *some of these notes for collection, and, failing to realize anything, had urged a sale of them, but she had no notice of the sale, and was not fully informed of its details when she signed the receipt. Held, that the conduct of the administrator operated as a fraud upon the rights of the distributee, and that she was entitled to have the accounting re-opened.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2289; Dec. Dig. ⇐513.]

[2. Limitation of Actions ⇐102.]

Intestate died in 1863; administration was granted in 1865; assets were sold in December, 1869, and final discharge obtained in March, 1870; action was instituted in September, 1875. Held, that the Statute of Limitations did not commence to run in the administrator's favor until his final discharge, and that, therefore, this action was not barred.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 494–505; Dec. Dig. ⇐102.]

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇐515.]

As the receipt was obtained by the administrator by the exercise of tact, while the distributee was ignorant of important facts and not fully informed of her legal rights, it does not estop the distributee, and must be disregarded as a settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2293–2296; Dec. Dig. ⇐515.]

[4. Executors and Administrators ⇐471.]

The act of 1869 (14 Stat. 263; Gen. Stat. Ch. XXIV., § 4), is an additional prerequisite to the discharge of an administrator, but does not dispense with the other formalities necessary to a final accounting required by previous law. The letters dismissory in this case, therefore, had not the force of a final judgment.

[This case is also cited in Montgomery v. Cloud, 27 S. C. 192, 3 S. E. 196, as to the distinction between the bar of the statute of limitations and presumption of payment from lapse of time.]

Before Pressley, J., Oconee, October, 1879.

Hon. J. H. Hudson, judge of the Fourth Circuit, sat at the hearing of this appeal, in the place of Associate Justice McGowan, who had been of counsel in the case.

Action by M. J. Roberts and W. O. Johns, as administrators of John B. Johns, deceased, and by Lila B. Johns against James A. Johns, administrator of James Johns, deceased, and Samuel H. Johns. On demurrer, it was held that Lila B. Johns was improperly joined. See Roberts v. Johns, 10 S. C. 101. The opinion states the case.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

James Johns died intestate in 1863, and the defendant, James A. Johns, is his administrator. On February 13th, 1865, he sold the personal estate, including slaves, on credit, the price payable in gold, and he himself purchased some of the slaves, giving his note for same, amounting to $1,365. This and other notes remained unpaid, when our new constitution was adopted in 1868, and then, by reason of the provision concerning notes for the purchase-money of slaves, and the homestead law, it was *supposed that said notes could not be collected. Plaintiff is administratrix of John B. Johns, who was a distributee of James Johns, deceased. She removed to Georgia in 1865, and has ever since resided there, making occasional visits to this State. During a visit in 1869, she urged a settlement of said estate, and the defendant, James A. Johns, offered to divide the notes. That not being done, he delivered some of them to her for collection. She failed to collect any and returned them, then urging that the notes be sold and the estate divided. This request was repeated by letter after she went home to Georgia. In November, 1869, the administrator applied to the judge of Probate for leave, which was granted, to sell said notes. There is some uncertainty about the dates. The order for sale seems to direct it to be made in November, but it was not made until December 17th, 1869. At that sale, the administrator, for a mere nominal sum, purchased his own note of $1,365. Most of the other notes were purchased by Sloan Dickson, who afterwards sold them to said administrator at the same price, but there is no evidence of any previous collusion or understanding between them; the proof is to the contrary of that. The administrator has made profit by collections on the notes so purchased. After the sale, his account was filed in the Probate office. Plaintiff was duly informed thereof, and of the balance due to her by said account out of proceeds of said sale. She signed a receipt in Georgia for said balance, and sent it by her husband to this State. He examined the accounts, inquired into the matters, and on April 19th, 1870, received the said balance, and delivered plaintiff's said receipt to the administrator. The balance so paid by him has been fixed by a decree of the Probate judge, made on March 7th, 1870, on the ex parte application of the administrator for a final discharge. The referee reports that said discharge was obtained without fraud, but is irregular and void.

The date of the commencement of this suit does not appear in any paper before me. The report says it was less than six years after March 7th, 1870, and defendant's first pleading or demurrer was served on November 13th, 1875. I assume that the case commenced more than five years after March 7th, 1870. The complaint alleges fraud in the sale of said assets, and the referee *finds that there was no fraud therein. I concur with him. There is no allegation as to when the alleged fraud was first discovered, or that plaintiff was ignorant of it, when she received payment of the balance found due to her by the said decree. The administrator claims the benefit of said payment and settlement, and pleads the Statute of Limitations.

As to the claims of the defendant, S. H. Johns, the facts are, that he knew of the said sale and the said decree of March 7th, 1870, and by it a balance was found due by him to the administrator, who sued for that balance before a trial justice, and obtained judgment, which S. H. Johns paid without appeal.

My judgment as to S. H. Johns is, that his failure to raise before the trial justice the question of fraud raised in this case, and his payment of the balance found due by him in that case, forever bars him from litigating again any issue which would have been proper in that case. He, therefore, can recover nothing in this case.

As to the plaintiff, my judgment is, that her settlement in April, 1870, is binding upon her. She cannot now claim that the sale of the assets was without authority of law and void, because she previously assented to and requested it. Nor can she claim that said settlement was made upon the erroneous supposition that the provisions of the constitution, concerning the purchase-money of slaves, and the homestead, made the said notes worthless. That was a mistake of law or rather ignorance of law, and she preferred the sacrifice, rather than risk the expense of having the notes sued.

On the plea of the Statute of Limitations, the plaintiff claims that she is not a resident of this State, and that the running of the statute does not begin until the said decree of March 7th, 1870. I hold that the statute began to run when the act was done which she avers to be fraudulent, to wit, the sale of the assets, which was on December 17th, 1869. I fix this date, because of there being neither allegation nor proof fixing a subsequent date when the supposed fraud was discovered by the plaintiff. The sole cause of action is the supposed fraudulent sale; it therefore occurred at the time of the sale. At that time the Statute of Limitations, as settled by the case of Lavasseur *v. Ligniez, 1 Strobh. 328, allowed five years to a nonresident, and this having been commenced more than five years after either date fixed by me or the referee, the statute is a complete bar to plaintiff's claim, if even the confused state of law when said settlement was made, would justify me in setting it aside.

It is, therefore, adjudged and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed, each party to pay his own or her own costs, and each to pay one-third of the costs of the referee and the officers of the court.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed on the following exceptions:

1. That it was error to hold that the claim of plaintiffs against the defendant for an account was barred by the Statute of Limitations, which does not run in favor of an administrator trustee against the distributees of the estate he represents, until such trustee does some act which imports to be a termination of his trust, and the pretended sale of the choses in December, 1869, was not such an act, nor under any view was such an act done until the pretended settlement on March 7th, 1870, counting from which time the plaintiffs would not be barred.

2. That as the plaintiff, M. J. Roberts, resided beyond the limits of this State, and was ignorant of the actings of the administrator and the condition and value of the estate of defendant's intestate, except from such information as she derived from the defendant administrator, no act in the course of administration, whether fraudulent or not, assented to or not, which inured solely to the benefit of the administrator trustee, at the expense of the distributees, could give currency to the Statute of Limitations, and certainly not before the effort at settlement in the Probate office, March 7th, 1870, from which date the plaintiff was not barred.

3. That it was error to strain the law to give the administrator, the protection of the Statute of Limitations from the hour of his own private fraud in the administration of the estate unknown to plaintiffs, and which, not done in a public office, and done without authority of law, it was not the duty of plaintiffs to know. The statute does not run in favor of a *trustee from the hour of his committing an act of fraud to his own advantage, if not done in a public office in throwing off his trust.

4. That under the facts, as found by the referee, and not controverted by the judge, showing that the sale of the notes and purchase of them by the administrator, out of which he made profit, and the pretended settlement and discharge were irregular, illegal and void, which was a series of acts of personal wrong and of injurious consequence to the plaintiffs and those whom they represent, it was error of law to hold that the plaintiffs were estopped by the receipt which the plaintiff, M. J. Roberts, signed, which receipt was prepared by the defendant, J. A. Johns, administrator trustee, and based on the fraudulent settlement of March 7th, 1870, which was founded on an ex parte settlement between defendants, J. A. and S. H. Johns, and the illegal sale of the notes and purchase of them by said administrator, and thus prepared was forwarded to the plaintiff, a married woman living in Georgia, and signed by her in entire ignorance of the facts of the case, except such information as she derived from the administrator, who, under the decree of Judge Pressley, if sustained, pockets his intestate's personal estate to the exclusion of other distributees.

5. Because it was error to sustain the report of the referee that there was no fraud, when the sale of a large debt due by the administrator to the estate of his intestate for a nominal sum, was a fraud in law, if not in fact; and the sale of other notes, some of which were on parties owning good real estate, and the consideration of which was not negroes, for a nominal sum, on a day different from that specified in the order of sale, without appraisement and without authority of law, and but few bidders being present, was a fraud in law, if not of fact. From sale of these notes the administrator has collected several hundred dollars, and will realize much more.

6. Because it was error to hold that the Statute of Limitations began to run from the sale of the notes in December, 1869, and that plaintiffs were barred certainly in four years, or, as non-residents, in five years from that date, when the statute *did not run until March 7th, 1870; and six years from that date had not elapsed before suit brought.

7. Because the effect of the decree is to hold that the administrator, whom the referee finds was a purchaser at his own sale of a large amount of the notes sold, at a mere nominal price, can make profit out of his trusts to the injury of his cestuis que trust, which is error.

8. Because the sale of the choses in action was upon a day and at a place other than that specified in the order of sale; and the notes were thus sold without appraisement and without authority of law. The law authorizing such sale was not passed until January 14th, 1870; the sale having been made on the 17th day of December, 1869, the sale is therefore void.

9. Because the decree is erroneous and unjust, and will have the effect, if not reversed, of covering an unbroken series of illegal, injurious and fraudulent acts perpetrated by a trustee for his own advantage, and the confiscation of the estate which it was his duty to protect.

10. Because the decree is in other respects contrary to the law, the evidence and justice of the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 24 S. C. 580.]

November 11th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

HUDSON, A. A. J. In 1865, James A. Johns received letters of administration on the personal estate of James Johns, who died intestate in 1863, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his three sons, Samuel H. Johns, James A. Johns and John B. Johns. In 1864, John B. Johns died intestate, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his widow, M. Jane Johns, and infant daughter, Lila B. Johns. In 1865, this widow became administratrix of his estate, and subsequently W. O. Johns joined her in the administration, to wit, in June, 1878, and has been joined as party plaintiff since the institution of this action, which was begun September 27th, A. D. 1875. In 1866, M. Jane Johns intermarried with John Roberts. Lila B. Johns was at first joined as party plaintiff, but on demurrer the complaint was dismissed as to her on the ground that she was an improper party.

The purpose of the action is to compel

James A. Johns to *account to the plaintiffs for his administration of the estate of James Johns, and various acts of maladministration are specifically alleged against him.

These are all denied by him, and he further claims that he has long since fully administered the personal estate; rendered his final account to the Probate Court; was, by that court, finally discharged in due course of law, and holds the receipt, in full, of M. Jane Roberts for the distributive share of her deceased intestate. This receipt is urged in bar of this action, and the Statute of Limitations is also interposed as a defense.

The cause was referred to S. P. Dendy, Esq., as special referee, who found, among other facts, that on February 13th, A. D. 1865, James A. Johns, as administrator, sold, by order of the ordinary of Pickens (then embracing Oconee) district, all the personal estate of James Johns, including negro slaves, on a credit of twelve months, for gold or its equivalent, for the sum $3,862.29, of which $2,665 were for negroes; and of these negro slaves the administrator purchased to the amount of $1,365, and seems to have (like other purchasers) given his note on the usual terms, made payable, we presume, to himself, as we find him in possession of it along with the other sales notes.

Early in November, A. D. 1869, James A. Johns applied to the Probate judge of Oconee for leave to sell the choses in action belonging to the estate of James Johns, and among them these sales notes, none of which seem to have been collected, nor even put in suit. He was allowed, on fifteen days' posted notice, to sell at or near a place called Bachelors' Retreat. After posting, and without advertising in a newspaper (that mode being specially dispensed with), the sale was made at McWhorter's store, in Bachelors' Retreat, in the presence of a very small number of people, but seems to have been made on December 17th instead of November, as was ordered. There is some confusion and uncertainty about these two dates.

At this very quiet sale, the administrator purchased, for fifty cents, the note of $1,365 against himself, and a number of others at the sum, in the aggregate, of $1.67. Sloan Dickson, a friend of the administrator, purchased the balance of the notes for $55.75, and soon thereafter turned them over at said price to *the administrator, who thus became the owner of notes calling for over $7,000 for the pitiful sum of less than $60. Sloan Dickson retained one note, but which one, and for what amount, the referee is unable to report. Prompt return of this sale of choses in action was made to the judge of Probate during the month of December, 1869, and a new annual return of accounts was filed, modified by the striking results of this sale.

On November 2d, A. D. 1869, the administrator, James A. Johns, published in the Keowee Courier, a weekly paper, published in the town of Walhalla, that on December 1st then next ensuing, he would apply to the judge of Probate of the county of Oconee for his final discharge. The application, however, was not made until March 7th, 1870, but no other notice than the above was published. On this application, the judge of Probate, without special citation of the parties in interest, who had no notice other than by the aforesaid publication, proceeded to examine the administration accounts of James A. Johns and adjust the same. He decreed that he be finally discharged upon the payment to M. Jane Roberts, then sole administratrix of the personal estate of John B. Johns, deceased, the sum of $179.08, as the balance, less advancements, decreed to be due to the estate of the said John B. Johns. On April 19th following, the payment was made and a receipt taken over the signatures of M. Jane Roberts and her husband, John Roberts. On March 7th, when the accounts were audited by the judge of Probate as aforesaid, he granted to James A. Johns his final discharge.

Mrs. M. Jane Johns had removed to the State of Georgia in 1865, and in 1866 she intermarried with John Roberts. She has resided in Georgia since 1865, but made several visits to South Carolina, and whilst here talked much with her brother-in-law, James A. Johns, about his administration and the condition of the estate. He represented to her the difficulty of collecting the notes, and on more than one occasion offered to divide them with her. He went so far as to place some of them in her hands for collection, but failing in her efforts to induce the makers to pay, she returned them to him. After her return to Georgia she wrote to James A. Johns, urging a settlement, and suggested a sale of the notes. The homestead exemption *and the supposed invalidity of contracts for the purchase of negro slaves were among the difficulties assigned by the administrator as impeding the collection of the notes, and, perhaps, rendering them worthless. Suits, however, were not instituted by him to enforce payment.

It was after the receipt of her letter that the administrator sold the assets and obtained his discharge as aforesaid.

In the testimony reported by the referee it appears that since the sale of these assets and their purchase by the administrator he has realized a considerable amount of money from collections thereof—perhaps ten times the amount which he paid for these notes—and has a fair prospect of realizing still greater amounts.

As matter of fact, the referee finds further that the administrator, James A. Johns, was not guilty of fraud in procuring his final discharge, but that the proceedings were irregular and do not estop her.

He concludes, as matters of law, that the Statute of Limitations began to run from March 7th, 1870, when the final discharge was rendered, and that, having six years to run, the plaintiff is not barred, she having commenced her action September 27th, 1875; that the letters dismissory cannot act as an estoppel within the period fixed by the statute against allegations of fraud and mistake, and that the same are void for irregularity in procuring the final decree and discharge; that the defendant, Samuel H. Johns, is concluded by the arbitration and settlement with the administrator; that the sale of the choses in action, December 17th, 1869, whilst not fraudulent, was irregular, without authority of law and void, and, finally, that the administrator, James A. Johns, is liable to account to the plaintiffs, M. Jane Roberts and W. O. Johns, for the share of John B. Johns, deceased, in the personal estate of his father, James Johns.

On reviewing this judgment of the referee, the Circuit judge, agreeing with him in his findings of fact, overrules the referee in his conclusions of law. He holds with the referee that S. H. Johns is bound by the settlement made by him with the administrator upon an arbitration had between them, and duly accepted and carried out. As S. H.

Johns does not appeal, this *judgment of the court below must stand as to him, and excludes him from further claim to an accounting.

As to Mrs. M. Jane Roberts, the Circuit judge holds that she is bound by the settlement of April, 1870, when she acknowledged to have received payment in full of the share of the personal estate of James Johns to which her deceased husband, John B. Johns, was entitled. He says that "she cannot now claim that the sale of the assets was without authority of law and void, because she previously assented to and requested it." He further holds that the Statute of Limitations began to run against her, not from the date of the alleged final discharge of the administrator, nor from the date of the receipt which she gave him, but from December 17th, A. D. 1869, when the assets were sold by him; this being, as he says, the only fraudulent act alleged by her against him.

For these reasons the complaint is dismissed. From this judgment the appeal of the plaintiffs brings the cause to this court.

The Circuit judge does not pretend to vindicate the conduct of the administrator, James A. Johns, nor to uphold his settlement with M. Jane Roberts as fair and just.

This cannot be successfully done. The facts as stated above, if they do not shock our sense of fair dealing and good faith, certainly do show a maladministration and mismanagement of a high trust at variance with the fundamental rules of law by which a fiduciary must be controlled in the performance of duty. And whilst both referee and judge concur in exonerating James A. Johns from fraud in his administration, it is evident from the testimony that it is charity to the administrator to discharge him from actual or positive fraud. But from the charge of that constructive fraud arising from neglect of duty and mismanagement of his trust, he cannot escape. Whether intentionally or not, he has, under the pretended forms of judicial proceedings, so administered his trust as to derive very great profit to himself and to inflict serious injury upon the estate of John B. Johns. Under no circumstances will the law sanction this, but will readily grant relief to the losing party, unless that party has, by imprudent conduct, willfully closed the doors of justice, *or is shut out by severe but necessary rules of law of a technical character. Taking the most indulgent view of the conduct of this administration in the light of the then surrounding circumstances, we are unable to discover facts justifying the extraordinary course of this administrator. The sale of the choses in action of the estate, a large part of which consisted of sales notes in the hands of the administrator, and one of them evidencing a large purchase made by himself at his own sale, and which at maturity became cash in his hands by operation of law, was certainly a most extraordinary method of administering assets. It was sanctioned by no statute, and neither the alleged requests and suggestion of Mrs. Roberts, nor the order of the Probate Court, can, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, be set up as a justification of the event, nor be interposed as a bar to the plaintiffs' demand for an accounting.

The application for the order of sale was ex parte and furnishes no such protection to him at whose instance alone it was procured as will shield him from the claim of those who were not parties to it to have its good faith investigated. He was at that time clearly chargeable with the $1,365 and interest—the amount of his purchase of negro slaves at his own sale—and no request of Mrs. Roberts to sell the notes, nor order of the Probate judge, can be construed to authorize or to contemplate the sale of this debt.

So far as this administration is concerned, it is manifest that, in the opinion of the administrator at least, it was to his personal advantage that contracts for the sale of negro slaves should be deemed invalid. He had an interest and a motive, therefore, not to urge other purchasers to pay such claims, and to this motive may be referred his utter failure to use diligence in striving to enforce payment by suits. Nor can his apparent frankness in placing some of these claims in the hands of Mrs. Roberts for collection be advanced in his defense when we consider that she was without authority to collect, and her foreseen failure in her efforts to do so was well calculated to elicit from her a request to sell, or, in any manner available, to realize whatever might be from them.

In the eye of the law this administration was conducted in a *manner for which good faith finds no apology; and because of its profitable eventuation to the administrator and inequitable result to the plaintiffs, coupled with the abuse of confidence legally reposed betwixt persons standing in a fiduciary relation, the accounting must be opened in behalf of the plaintiffs, unless Mrs. Roberts is, as the Circuit judge has decided, estopped by her own conduct or concluded by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction or barred by the Statute of Limitations. In our opinion she is not so estopped, concluded nor barred.

The Statute of Limitations did not begin to run against the plaintiffs' right to an accounting until the administrator had done some positive act manifesting a clear intention to terminate his trust. This was never done until March 7th, 1870, when he obtained from the Court of Probate his final discharge, and within the statutory period from that date this action was begun, as is admitted by counsel for both plaintiffs and defendant.

It is error to hold that the statute began to run from the date of the alleged fraudulent sale of notes. That was but a single act of administration, and how the administrator himself would deal with it, and what position in regard thereto any of the parties in interest would take, could not be certainly known, nor need be made known until the attempted putting off the trust. Then, and not till then, are parties in interest presumed to have knowledge of the claim of the administrator as to any and all items of his account and special acts of administration. Any other rule would subject cestuis que trust to serious hazards in suffering administrations to progress to maturity before demanding a general and full accounting.

We are likewise of opinion that Mrs. Roberts is not concluded by her receipt of April 19th, 1870. A receipt and release are always open to explanation and impeachable for fraud or mistake.

This receipt, covering the share due to the estate of John B. Johns, as ascertained in the ex parte accounting of March 7th, 1870, was prepared by the administrator and forwarded to Mrs. Roberts at her home in Georgia. She was greatly in need of money, and had, for some time, been importuning James A. Johns for a settlement. She sent her husband with the receipt, signed by her and him, to Walhalla. On his arrival there,

*James A. Johns furnished him with $5 to employ a lawyer to examine the accounts. Some examination was made, and the money received, and the receipt delivered.

Upon a careful review of the testimony, we do not think that this settlement, so disadvantageous to the plaintiffs, and so favorable to the administrator, James A. Johns, was made upon a fair disclosure of the facts, nor can we avoid the conclusion that much tact was exercised by the administrator in effecting a settlement known by him to be profitable to himself at the expense of his cestui que trust, whom he well knew to be ignorant of important facts and not informed of her full legal rights.

To put aside such a settlement, it is not necessary that there should be actual fraud or intended wrong where the parties occupy a fiduciary relation. The advantage reaped by the trustee at the expense of an uninformed beneficiary is sufficient ground to justify the opening of the accounts. Under the circumstances of this case, this receipt is not an estoppel, and must be disregarded as a settlement.

But it is urged that the final discharge by the Court of Probate, after the required statutory notice, has the force of a final judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and, unappealed from, is binding upon the plaintiff, M. Jane Roberts. She resided in the State of Georgia, and it is not pretended that she was cited, or in any other way, actually or constructively, notified to appear and show cause, except by this publication.

The language of the act is as follows: "It shall not be lawful for any of the judges of Probate in this State to grant a final discharge to any executor or executrix, administrator or administratrix, trustee, guardian or committee, without he, she or they first giving notice in some county newspaper, (if there should be no newspaper published in the county, then in some public journal having the greatest circulation therein,) for the space of at least one month, that on a day certain, he, she or they will apply to the judge of Probate of the county wherein his, her or their bond is filed, for a final discharge." Gen. Stat., Ch. XXIV., § 4.

It is contended by the defendant's counsel that this notice is all the citation of parties in interest necessary to be given, and *that thereafter a final discharge granted upon an account stated has the force and effect of a final judgment, and is binding on all parties interested.

This is not the construction proper to be given to this act. Such an interpretation would evidently lead to mischief, whereas the purpose of the act is to guard against hasty and premature discharges from the serious office of a trustee.

The act makes this publication of notice a condition precedent to such discharge, but in no way dispenses with the important proceedings on final accounting required by law before this act. It does not dispense with any formalities previously required, but prescribes this one in addition to existing prerequisites. Persons, to be bound by the judgment of the Probate Court upon the final accounts of a fiduciary, must be made parties thereto by proper proceedings and established forms of citation or summons. At the end of such proceedings, a final discharge is still not to be granted by this court of limited jurisdiction unless this prescribed notice, by publication, shall be or shall have been given. That legislation would be open to grave objection which should provide that any persons, but especially infants, lunatics and non-residents, may be made parties to an action in a court, and bound by its judgment, by the simple publication for one month of a notice in a newspaper requiring them to appear and show cause. Yet this act makes no exception in favor of infants, lunatics, parties under disabilities and non-residents.

An act will not be so construed as to increase rather than correct an evil intended to be remedied, unless the words of the act, in plain language, or by necessary implication, exclude a more reasonable interpretation. There is no such difficulty here, because the words of this act, their implication, as well as the mischief to be remedied, all concur in leading to the construction we have given it. The law here is evidently intended as an additional protection to cestuis que trust, instead of a deprivation of the protection they already enjoyed against trustees, under well-considered acts of legislation, and under the wise rules by which the practice of our courts were and are and ought to be regulated.

*We conclude, therefore, that these proceedings in the Probate Court, by which James A. Johns sued out his final discharge, do not bind Mrs. M. Jane Roberts, who was not made a party thereto by sufficient legal process. And for the reasons above given, we hold that by reason of nothing which appears in the brief and argument is she estopped or barred of her right to demand of James A. Johns an account of his actings and doings as administrator of the personal estate of the intestate, James Johns. The plaintiffs are entitled to demand and receive of him the unpaid balance of the share of said estate due to their intestate, John B. Johns.

It is not intended, however, that this judgment shall do more than determine the liability of the defendant, James A. Johns, to account to the plaintiffs. The principles by which the details of that accounting are to be governed are all left open for adjudication by the court below in passing upon the itemized account.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded to that court for such orders and proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect this judgment.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

*Before Aldrich, J., Edgefield, March, 1881.

Indictment against Hughes Johnson for carrying a pistol concealed about his person on January 30th, 1881. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to imprisonment in the penitentiary at hard labor for six months.

Mr. J. C. Sheppard, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Bonham, contra.

November 15th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an indictment under the act of December 24th, 1880, (17 Stat. 447,) entitled "An act to provide a punishment for carrying any deadly weapon concealed about the person." In the first section the act declares "that any person carrying a pistol * * * concealed about his person shall be guilty of a misdemeanor," &c. The charge in this case was that the defendant "carried concealed about his person a certain deadly weapon, to wit, a pistol." One of the witnesses testified that the defendant "had his pistol under his coat, but I saw it," while other witnesses testified that the pistol was carried in the waistband of his pantaloons. "The handle was sticking out so that any one could see it." "Anybody could see it who could see him." The report of the Circuit judge is very brief, and is in the following words: "It was argued that if the weapon could be seen it was not concealed. The proof was that the defendant had a pistol in his waistband, the butt sticking out in part. I charged the jury that the purpose of the legislature was to prevent this pernicious habit; that when one had a weapon on his person which could be seen in his pocket or in his waistband, he came within the meaning of the act, otherwise there could be no conviction under the law, for whenever a weapon was seen that would be an end of the case. It was for the jury to say if the defendant had a concealed weapon on his person in the meaning of the act. They found a verdict of guilty. I was asked to charge that the weapon 'must be concealed about the person,' and charged as I have here reported."

*The defendant appeals on two grounds: First—Because there was error in charging "that the purpose of the legislature was to prevent this pernicious habit; that when one had a weapon on his person which could be seen in his pocket or waistband, he came within the meaning of the act." Second—"Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge, as requested by defendant's counsel, that in order to convict the defendant it was necessary for the State to prove that the weapon charged in the indictment was concealed about his person."

It will be observed that to constitute the offense charged it is necessary to show not only that the defendant carried about his person a weapon of the kind mentioned in the statute, but such weapon must be "concealed about his person." Hence, we think that the Circuit judge erred in declining, or, at least, omitting to charge as requested. It may be, and doubtless is, the fact that the Circuit judge considered that he had sufficiently covered this point by the charge which he gave, but in this we cannot agree with him, for we think that the defendant had a right to have the jury explicitly instructed upon this point, as the fact of carrying a weapon concealed about the person constitutes the gist of the offence, inasmuch as merely carrying the weapon constitutes no violation of the statute, unless it is concealed about the person.

Whether the first ground of appeal can be sustained depends upon the construction which should be given to the word "concealed," as used in the statute. It is contended in the argument here that unless the weapon is entirely concealed from observation there is no violation of the law, and that when it is only partially concealed the statute is not violated. It is very true that the rule is that penal statutes must be construed strictly, but they are not to be so strictly construed as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature. United States v. Wiltberger, 5 Wheat. 95 [5 L. Ed. 37]; American Fur Co. v. United States, 2 Pet. 367 [7 L. Ed. 450]; United States v. Morris, 14 Pet. 475 [10 L. Ed. 543]. Now, in this case, if the word "concealed" should be construed to mean entirely or completely hidden from observation, then the manifest object of the legislature would be defeated, and the statute would, to a great extent, at least, be nugatory. For if a person could not be con*victed unless the proof showed that the weapon was entirely and completely concealed, then it is difficult to perceive how in any case the act could be made effective, unless the person charged should furnish evidence against himself. It seems to us clear, therefore, that such cannot be the proper construction, but, on the other hand, that the true construction is that if the weapon is so concealed as to be hidden from ordinary observation, even though it may not be entirely concealed and might be seen on closer examination, the offense is complete, and that it is for the jury to determine from all the evidence whether the weapon is so concealed. Again, if the weapon is so carried as not to be at all times exposed to the ordinary observation of the bystanders, the offense would be complete, even though at times it might be exposed to such observation. For example, if the weapon is carried under the coat, not exposed to view except when the coat is removed or thrown back by the wind or other cause, this would be a concealment in the sense of the statute.

This being a recent statute, we are without the aid of authority here as to its proper construction, and the authorities elsewhere being cases construing special statutes, the terms of which are, perhaps, different from ours, do not throw much light upon the proper construction of our statute. We have, however, collected three cases which appear to be somewhat analogous to the case under consideration, in two of which the view which we have presented seems to have been adopted, while in the other an adverse view appears to have been taken.

In Sutton v. The State, 12 Fla. 135, the evidence was that the butt of the pistol was seen sticking out of the pants, sometimes covered by the coat, and the court held that the carrying of arms on the person, partially concealed, was a violation of the statute, which provides that "it shall not be lawful for any person in this State to carry arms of any kind secretly on or about their persons * * * provided that this law shall not be so construed as to prevent any person from carrying arms openly outside of all their clothes."

In Jones v. The State, 51 Ala. 16, it was held that to constitute concealment it is sufficient if the weapon be hidden from ordinary observation, although it may be seen on closer examina*tion. In this case, however, a new trial was granted because the Circuit judge refused to charge the jury that they must acquit the defendant unless they were convinced, from all the evidence, that he did carry the pistol concealed about his person.

In Stockdale v. The State, 32 Ga. 225, a case cited and much relied upon by the appellant, it was held that where one carried a pistol in such a way as, though partially concealed, yet with enough of it to be seen to enable any one to see and know that it was a pistol, he could not be convicted under the act, the provisions of which are not stated in the case. The court argued that it was impossible for one to have and bear about his person a pistol without having some part of the weapon concealed from view; for even if he held it in his hand a part of the weapon would be hidden from view by the hand, and if, therefore, partial concealment should be held sufficient to constitute the offense, the practical result would be to prohibit the carrying of weapons at all, which manifestly was not the object of the legislature. This, however, seems to us to be an extreme view, and one which does not recommend itself for our adoption. The court goes on to say that the object of the (Georgia) act was "to compel persons who carried these weapons to so wear them about their persons that others who might come in contact with them might see that they were armed and dangerous persons, who were to be avoided in consequence." We, however, cannot regard this as the object of our act, but, on the contrary, we think that the purpose was, as far as may be consistent with the right of the citizen to bear arms, absolutely to prohibit the carrying of deadly weapons, with a view to prevent acts of violence and bloodshed, which are too apt to be committed by persons under excitement when they have at hand such effectual means of perpetrating such acts.

We think that portion of the charge excepted to by the first ground of appeal cannot be sustained without the qualification hereinbefore indicated, for, under such an instruction as that, a person might be convicted who carried a weapon in such a way that it could be readily seen by the ordinary bystander. So, too, as we have said, we think the defendant had a right to have the jury explicitly instructed that they could not convict unless the *weapon was concealed about the person, to which, of course, should be added an instruction as to the proper construction of the term "concealed" as used in the act, and that, taking the charge and the refusal or omission to charge as requested together, there is at least ground to apprehend that the jury may have been misled.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

[This case is also cited in Dunsford v. Brown, 19 S. C. 567, as to amendment of pleadings after trial begun.]

Before Thomson, J., Beaufort, November, 1880.

Action commenced June 6th, 1877, for the recovery of $750 for the inspection of phosphates at Port Royal, in 1875 and 1876. According to the proof, $40.35 for inspection, and $25 for the chemist, of Georgia, had been paid to the plaintiff. There was no proof whatever, in the case, of the value of plaintiff's services. The testimony was directed to the number of tons *inspected, the contract between the plaintiff and defendant, as to whether plaintiff was to be paid for the number of tons inspected, or only for the number sold in Georgia, how much was shipped to Georgia, and the custom of Augusta merchants in paying for guano inspected outside of their own State. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

The exceptions, quoting the language of the requests to charge, and the charge to the jury, allege errors in the particulars considered in the opinion.

[For subsequent opinion, see 21 S. C. 599.]

Mr. William Elliott, for appellant.

Messrs. W. J. Verdier and J. D. Pope, contra.

November 15th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. This is an action by O. P. Fitzsimons, plaintiff, respondent, claiming of defendant, appellant, the sum of $750 for services rendered in the inspection of 1,500 tons of fertilizers for defendant.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff was an inspector of fertilizers for the county of Richmond, in the State of Georgia, duly appointed and qualified under the laws of that State. That he was employed by defendant to proceed to Port Royal, in this State, to inspect and analyze a quantity of fertilizers at that place, which defendant expected and desired to sell and distribute in the State of Georgia. That he complied with request of defendant, and did inspect and analyze some 1,500 tons of Guanahani guano for defendant. That the compensation provided by the laws of Georgia to be paid inspectors for the service rendered was fifty cents per ton, which defendant promised to pay. That no part had been paid, and he demanded judgment on that basis.

The answer admitted that plaintiff did, at the request of defendant, proceed to Port Royal to inspect certain fertilizers which they desired to distribute in the State of Georgia, but it denied that 1,500 tons had been inspected. It also admitted that, under the laws of Georgia, the compensation allowed in*spectors was fifty cents per ton, but it denied that defendant had agreed to pay this sum to plaintiff, except as to so much as should actually be shipped and sold in Georgia; and it claimed that only eighty and one-seventh tons had been thus shipped and sold, for which the plaintiff had been paid in full.

Upon the trial, Judge Thomson presiding, the defendant requested the judge to charge:

1. "That, under the laws of Georgia, an inspector of phosphates cannot inspect fertilizers, intended for sale and distribution in that State, at any place outside of that State, and that plaintiff cannot recover in this action if said fertilizers were inspected outside of the State of Georgia.

2. "That, under the laws of Georgia, each bag, barrel or other package of fertilizers intended for sale or distribution in Georgia must be stamped with the brand of the inspector, and that unless the jury find in this case that the fertilizers were so branded, they cannot find for plaintiff."

His Honor charged the jury as follows:

"As regards the defendant's requests to charge, I charge you that all that is law, but that there was nothing to prevent defendant from employing the plaintiff to come here and perform the service. Of course, when Mr. Fitzsimons came here, he did not come under the laws of Georgia. If you find that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to perform this service, then you must consider, in this case, what would be reasonable compensation for the plaintiff; and you are not to determine the compensation upon any ordinary standard. In some cases compensation is based upon the actual labor performed, as in case of a day's labor. In other cases, for instance, in cases of surgeons and lawyers, compensation is based upon the amount of skill and the time spent in acquiring the profession. I suppose it would take me ten years of hard study to qualify myself to perform the duties required of an inspector of phosphates."

The jury found for the plaintiff for $750. A motion was made for new trial, on the judge's minutes, on the ground of excessive damages. The judge entered an order: That a remittitur of $65.75 be entered on the verdict, the amount paid by the defendant, within ten days, or a new trial be granted. The *remittitur was entered by plaintiff and judgment was entered up for $684.25 and costs.

The defendant has appealed, alleging error in the judge's charge as above, after ruling as requested, and also because the judge charged on matters of fact by saying to the jury: "Gentlemen, I suppose it would take me ten years of hard study to qualify myself to perform the duties required of the plaintiff."

Under an act of the State of Georgia providing for inspection of fertilizers, inspectors duly appointed and qualified are allowed fifty cents per ton for all fertilizers inspected and analyzed, &c., by them, provided the services are rendered within the territorial limits of the State. When thus rendered, the act itself raises a contract between the employer and the inspector, that the employer shall pay fifty cents per ton in cash on every ton so inspected and analyzed.

This act in itself has no force in South Carolina upon a contract made here, but upon a contract made in the State of Georgia, and attempted to be enforced here because of the residence of defendant in this State, our courts would assume jurisdiction, and, upon the principle that in the construction of contracts the lex loci contractus governs, would enforce the contract, according to the terms and meaning of the act of Georgia, under which it was made. But in such case it should appear that the requirements of the act have been complied with on the part of the plaintiff.

Now, the plaintiff, in his complaint, bases his right to sue on the ground that he is an inspector in the county of Richmond, in the State of Georgia, duly appointed and qualified, and he states his compensation of the amount allowed inspectors by that act, to wit, fifty cents per ton, and he introduces no other testimony as to the value of his services. The action, then, has been instituted under the statute of the State of Georgia. But, as we have already said, this statute applies only to services rendered by inspectors within the limits of the State; it has no application to services performed outside of the State.

It being admitted, then, in this case that the plaintiff's claim is founded entirely upon inspection and analysis made at Port Royal in South Carolina, it follows, necessarily, that the statute *of Georgia has no application to it either in this State or in Georgia, and the judge below properly charged the jury that plaintiff could not recover by virtue of the statute of Georgia.

The judge, however, also charged that there was nothing to prevent the defendant from employing the plaintiff to come here and perform the services rendered, saying to the jury: "Of course, when Mr. Fitzsimons came here he did not come under the laws of Georgia."

There can be no doubt but that the defendant had the right to employ Mr. Fitzsimons or any one else to inspect his fertilizers either at Port Royal or at any other place, and in such case, if no special contract was made between the parties as to compensation, that matter would be governed by the character and value of the services rendered, to be determined by the jury on the facts proved, and the amount of skill displayed and the time spent by the inspector in fitting himself for such work would enter largely into that question.

The propositions of law then laid down by the judge we think were entirely correct in the abstract, and would have been correct here if this action had been founded upon a quantum meruit. But the action was not founded upon a claim of that kind; it was brought on a special contract alleged to have arisen under the provisions of the statute of Georgia referred to. This being so, the effect of the judge's charge was to change the nature of the action, during the progress of the trial, from an action on a special contract, which the pleadings prescribed and which the parties had met to have adjudicated, to an action on a quantum meruit, which did not appear in the pleadings and which, therefore, was calculated to take the defendant by surprise.

Under the liberal provisions of the code as to amendments, it may be that all this might have been done on motion, by leave of the court, either before or after verdict, if, in the judgment of the court, the facts proved had warranted such an amendment; but there should have been a motion to that effect so as to have given the defendant an opportunity to be on hand, especially in this case, where, from the statements in the brief, it appears that no testimony whatever was offered as to the value *of plaintiff's services, as to his skill, or of the time which he had spent in preparing himself to perform the duties of an inspector.

As far as we can see, the jury must have applied the statute of Georgia in measuring plaintiff's compensation. No other testimony appears in the case on that subject, and they must have relied upon this act.

We think it was error on the part of the judge thus, in the midst of the conflict, to change the whole character of the action from the cause upon which it was originally established, to a new basis not appearing in the pleadings, and without opportunity on the part of defendant to meet and resist it. The first exception of appellant is therefore sustained.

The second exception, as to the charge of the judge upon the facts, cannot be sustained. We find nothing obnoxious to Article IV., Section 26, of the constitution in what he said to the jury upon the facts.

His statement "that it would take him ten years' hard study to qualify himself to perform the duties required of the plaintiff" does not appear to have been charged upon the facts in the sense of the inhibition of the constitution. There was no intimation in this as to what had been proved; but what he said was intended rather to illustrate the principle of law which he had laid down: That the measure of compensation which should be applied to a case of this sort was different from an ordinary case of claim for daily labor. We see no error in this.

This case, however, must be sent back upon the first ground.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded.

The Court of Equity is bound to apply the bar of the statute to a legal demand in the same manner as a Court of Equity would apply it.

Before Wallace, J., Union, April, 1880.

*Action by Charles Bolt, as administrator of the estate of Joshua P. Dawkins, deceased, against Sarah A. Dawkins (widow), B. F. Dawkins and Nannie E. Tench (children), and Sarah A. Stringfellow and others, creditors of Joshua P. Dawkins' estate. The action was commenced January 10th, 1878, and was in the nature of a bill for sale of land in aid of assets, the personalty received by the administrator not exceeding $200. The complaint alleged "that the indebtedness of said estate is very large; that the personal estate is wholly insufficient to satisfy the same, and that it will be necessary to sell the lands in order to pay and discharge the debts." And again, "That the defendants * * * and Sarah A. Stringfellow * * * are creditors of said intestate, and there are none others."

An order was passed directing the sale of the intestate's lands, and appointing Joseph F. Gist, referee, to call in creditors, and take proof of claims. The lands were sold in January, 1879, for $12,535, exclusive of one tract sold at private sale, by order of the court, for $5,500, on credit, secured by bond and mortgage.

The referee, by his report, filed April 14th, 1880, disallowed the claim of James B. Dawkins (as having been fully paid), the claim of Mrs. Stringfellow and of one other (because barred by the Statute of Limitations). The note held by Mrs. Stringfellow was made in Florida, where both she and J. B. Dawkins resided. The facts connected with these two claims are fully stated in the opinion. The only claims against the estate, allowed by the referee, were those of Lyons, administrator, for $301.57, assignees of Choice for $2,782, and S. F. Dawkins for $435.48, making the aggregate indebtedness of the estate on April 14th, 1880, $3,519.05.

During the progress of the reference, the following paper was filed with the referee:

Charles Bolt, adm'r, v. Sarah Dawkins and others.

I, Sarah A. Stringfellow, a defendant in the above-stated case, do hereby authorize and empower Messrs. Steedman and Rawls, my attorneys herein, to file with the record, and to enter upon the proceedings, my consent and agreement that all claims that may herein be established against the estate of

*200

Joshua P. Daw*kins, deceased, whether simple contract or specialty debts, and all expenses of administration, and all costs in this case, shall take precedence in the marshaling of said estate, and in the administration thereof, of the claim against said estate presented in my favor, viz., promissory note of J. P. Dawkins in favor of J. B. Dawkins for $5,200, transferred to and now owned and held by me, and the judgment thereon obtained by me against John W. Tench and B. F. Dawkins, as executors of J. P. Dawkins, deceased, so that no part of said estate shall be applied to the payment of said claim until all other demands against the said estate shall have been fully satisfied.

April 4th, 1879. Sarah A. Stringfellow.

I also consent to the above.

James B. Dawkins.

By virtue of the within authority, we do hereby enter consent of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow that the debts of and demands against the estate of J. P. Dawkins, deceased, within referred to, shall take precedence in the administration of said estate over the demand and debt set up by me.

Steedman & Rawls,
Attorneys for Mrs. Stringfellow.

April 7th, 1880. There were several judgments proven against B. F. Dawkins, Mrs. Tench and Mrs. S. A. Dawkins, who were distributees of the intestate, upon their personal indebtedness.

Upon the note held by Mrs. Stringfellow, there was a payment of $1,000 on January 7th, 1875, "by sight draft of Tench and Dawkins on L. D. Mowry & Son." This draft was paid, and Tench testified that Mr. L. D. Mowry knew that it was a payment on this note. Mrs. Stringfellow obtained judgment by default on this note in October, 1877, against John W. Tench and B. F. Dawkins, as executors of J. P. Dawkins, deceased.

Assignees of William Choice and S. F. Dawkins, and the judgment creditors of the distributees desired the statute to be pleaded to Mrs. Stringfellow's claim; Lyons, administrator, and the distributees, did not so desire. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This proceeding is instituted by the plaintiff for the purpose of having the land of J. P. Dawkins sold in aid of assets to *pay debts. By an order of court, creditors of J. P. Dawkins were called on to prove their demands, and Mrs. Stringfellow offers as proof of her debt the judgment obtained by her against Tench and Dawkins. Is this proof against the administrator here? After some hesitation it has been held in this State that judgments against administrators would bind the lands of intestates, but not that a judgment against an executor de son tort would so bind. On the contrary, such executors are held to be mere trespassers, as there can be no privity between such trespassers and subsequent personal representatives; nor are heirs in any way affected by a judgment against executors de son tort; nor is the estate itself bound by such a judgment beyond the assets that went into the hands of such executors. He is a trespasser, and the measure of his liability is the assets that went into his hands if he properly pleads to the action. If he does not plead at all to the action, the judgment is against assets in his hands, and for the balance against him personally. The fact that Tench and B. F. Dawkins were in possession of the land cannot alter or enlarge the effect of the judgment. Tench was husband of one of the heirs; B. F. Dawkins was himself one of the heirs, and Mrs. S. A. Dawkins the other heir. These were all in possession of the land, and rightfully and legally so; and their possession will be referred, of course, to their legal right. In no sense, therefore, did they hold the land as executors de son tort. A judgment against them as such, therefore, could not bind the land. I am of the opinion, therefore, that Mrs. Stringfellow's judgment cannot rank as a judgment against any part of the estate of J. P. Dawkins, except what Tench and Dawkins took into their possession wrongfully, and is not proof of Mrs. Stringfellow's claim in this action. To the note upon which the judgment is founded the plaintiff interposes the plea of the Statute of Limitations. As to the right of the administrator to interpose the plea I think there can be no doubt. He is the personal representative of the maker, and as to the right to plead the statute, he stands in his place. A case might occur in which the court would compel him to plead the statute, but it is hardly possible to conceive a case in which the court would strike out such a plea, or prevent its interposition, or dis*regard it when there were facts to support it. The note is dated February 1st, 1870, and is payable one day after date.

This action was commenced in 1877, more than seven years after the maturity of the note, and more than sufficient to bar the right of action on the note if the statute was running all that time. The maker died on August 8th, 1870. Certainly the holder had his right of action after the maturity of the note and before the death of the maker. The statute then began to run before the death of the maker. It can be collected from several of our cases that when the right to sue was perfect the currency of the statute is not arrested by the death of the maker. Where the right to sue is not perfect before the death of the maker, the statute does not begin to run until there is somebody to sue. Nicks v. Martindale, Harp. 135 [18 Am. Dec. 647]; McCollough v. Speed, 3 McCord 455; Moses v. Jones, 2 Nott & M. 259. Some of the heirs promised to pay the note within the time necessary to save the bar of the statute, and a payment was made on the note by Tench and Dawkins. For the same reasons that the judgment against Tench and Dawkins does not bind the estate, a payment upon the note by them would not prevent the running of the statute in favor of the estate. Neither would a promise by Tench and Dawkins have any more effect than the payment of a part of the debt. The promise of an heir to pay the debt of the ancestor is a promise to pay the debt of another, for in this case it is not the debt of the heir. Under certain circumstances, property of the ancestor in the hands of the heir can be made available to pay the debt of the ancestor, but it is still the debt of the ancestor to which the administrator has the legal right to plead the statute, and such plea cannot be defeated by proof of the promise of the heir to pay the debt. It might be that the heir himself, if the promise was made upon sufficient consideration, would be bound, but not the personal representative of the estate.

I am constrained, therefore, to hold that Mrs. Stringfellow's claim against the estate is barred.

James B. Dawkins held a sealed note on J. P. Dawkins for $8,100, and dated October 11th, 1869, payable one day after date. The note transferred by J. B. Dawkins to Mrs.

*203

String*fellow, previously referred to, was given for this note. The Stringfellow note was for $5,200. It is claimed by James B.

Dawkins that the sealed note for $8,100 is not extinguished by the promissory note of $5,200.

It is a familiar rule that a note is not paid by the acceptance of a smaller sum than the amount due upon the note in payment. The rule does not apply to cases where something other than money is received in satisfaction. In such cases the effect of the transaction is to be determined by the intention of the parties. In this case a promissory negotiable note was given and received for a sealed note, at the instance and request of the holder. The larger and sealed note was delivered to obligor—the words "canceled by another note, J. B. Dawkins," written across its face, with lines of cancellation across the face and signature. The negotiable note transferred by J. B. Dawkins to Mrs. Stringfellow as a collateral is now held by her. A letter is produced in evidence from J. B. Dawkins to J. P. Dawkins, bearing date November 14th, 1869, before the exchange of notes, proposing to take a note for a smaller amount, and in which, among other things, he says he cannot reconcile it to his feelings to exact that amount, referring to the larger note. All these facts satisfy me that it was the intention of the parties that the smaller note should operate as payment and extinguishment of the larger note, and that the larger note is extinguished. I need not, then, in this case discuss the question whether or not the acceptance of a negotiable note in payment of a sealed unnegotiable note for a larger amount would operate an extinguishment of the larger note.

The last exception of Mrs. Stringfellow relates to the basis upon which the calculation was made on the note held against J. P. Dawkins by W. Choice and assigned to Mowry. I am of the opinion that the referee properly admitted proof of the note, notwithstanding judgment had been recovered upon it against the executor de son tort.

All exceptions to the report of the referee are overruled and the report confirmed.

It is ordered and decreed, that funds in the hands of the clerk of this court, and such funds as may be hereafter realized from *securities in his hands belonging to the estate of J. P. Dawkins, be paid first to the costs of this action: next, to the debts of the intestate as ascertained and allowed by the referee: next, to the mortgage debt of L. D. Mowry & Son, and, if there be any residue after these payments, that such residue be held by the clerk until the further order of this court.

The defendant, Sarah A. Stringfellow, gave notice of appeal from this decree upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor decides that a judgment obtained against an heir in possession of the land of an intestate, in a suit brought against the heir, as executor, does not bind the land, it appearing that the heir is also executor de son tort.

2. Because his Honor decides that such a judgment does not affect heirs or subsequent personal representatives, or the estate of the intestate.

3. Because his Honor should have decided that, as J. W. Tench and B. F. Dawkins represented and managed the estate of J. P. Dawkins by the consent and acquiescence of all the heirs and creditors of the said J. P. Dawkins, the judgment of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow, fairly obtained against them as executors, found the real estate in their possession and managed by them, so far as heirs, creditors and subsequent personal representatives are interested therein.

4. Because his Honor should have decided that the administrator, in seeking the aid of this court to reach the real estate of J. P. Dawkins, deceased, in aid of assets, must do equity, and will not be permitted, by pleading the Statute of Limitations, to defeat the just claim of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow, which had been continually assented to and recognized as a subsisting debt of the estate by all parties interested in the same.

5. Because his Honor should have decided that, as the heirs of J. P. Dawkins refused to plead the Statute of Limitations, and all the creditors of J. P. Dawkins and others interested in his estate were protected by the agreement of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow to give precedence to all other claims against said estate over her own, the administrator will not be permitted to plead the bar of the Statute of Limitations to defeat a just claim, con*tinually recognized by all interested in the estate since the death of J. P. Dawkins.

6. Because his Honor should have decided that the administrator of J. P. Dawkins, deceased, was equitably estopped from pleading the bar of the Statute of Limitations to the claim of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow.

7. Because his Honor decided that the Statute of Limitations continued to run after the death of J. P. Dawkins, and was not arrested thereby until letters of administration were granted in respect to a debt owned and held by parties living "beyond seas."

8. Because his Honor should have decided that J. W. Tench and B. F. Dawkins were the agents of all parties interested in the estate of J. P. Dawkins and of the estate itself, and their continual recognition of the debt in question, and their promises to pay the same, arrested the Statute of Limitations and prevented it from barring the debt.

9. Because his Honor should have decided that the payment made in behalf of the estate upon the claim of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow, by parties rightfully in possession of the estate and legally representing the intestate, made with the knowledge and assent of all parties interested in the estate, arrested the Statute of Limitations from running in their favor.

10. Because his Honor should have decided that the payment made in behalf of the estate upon the claim held by Mrs. Stringfellow, by an heir of the intestate in possession of the estate, there being no administrator or other representative of the estate, arrested the Statute of Limitations.

11. Because his Honor should have decided that the promises and payments of the heirs in possession of the land of the intestate prevented the bar of the Statute of Limitations from arising in respect to the land against the claim of Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow.

12. Because his Honor should have decided that Mrs. S. A. Stringfellow was entitled to establish her claim against the estate of Joshua P. Dawkins by producing the sealed note of Joshua P. Dawkins given as evidence of the debt, which sealed note has not been paid.

*13. Because his Honor should have decided that, as L. D. Mowry & Son took a mortgage upon the land in question, with notice of Mrs. Stringfellow's claim, their lien should be postponed to hers.

14. Because his Honor should have decided that, as the debt established against the estate of J. P. Dawkins by L. D. Mowry & Son was held by them as cumulative collateral security for the payment of the debt represented by the bond and mortgage of S. A. Dawkins, B. F. Dawkins, N. E. Tench and J. W. Tench, any payment made upon the said debt from the estate of J. P. Dawkins will discharge the same pro tanto; and his Honor has erred in directing the debt established by said creditors against said estate to be paid from the fund in court, and, also, the bond and mortgage referred to, instead of directing the amount received by said creditors from said estate to be applied as a credit upon the bond and mortgage debt.

The defendant, James B. Dawkins, appealed from this decree upon the grounds:

1. For that his Honor, Judge Wallace, overruled the exceptions of this defendant to the referee's report.

2. For that his Honor, Judge Wallace, held that the promissory note for $5,200 acted as payment and extinguishment of the sealed note for $8,100.

Mr. J. B. Steedman, for Mrs. Stringfellow.

Did the admissions, promises and payment of the heirs, in possession of the land, sustain the subsisting legal obligation of the debt and prevent the bar of the statute as to the real estate of the intestate? The acknowledgment of the heir should, therefore, continue the liability of the real estate to the payment of the debt. Heirs in possession are trustees for the benefit of creditors. 6 S. It would seem, therefore, that as the admission of the administrator before action barred, prevents the bar of the statute as to personalty (Bailey Eq. 311), so the admission of the heir would prevent the bar as to the lands. In neither case should the promise or admission of the one bind the property represented by the other. Tench and Dawkins, under the agreement with intestate, were trustees for creditors. 14 S. The heirs, here, could not plead the statute, therefore the administrator should not be allowed to do so in this action. The Court of Equity will sometimes refuse to allow the statute to be pleaded. 1 Eq. Cas. Ab. 303; 2 Williams Ex. *1283, *1454; 2 Hill Ch. 91; Rich. Eq. Cas. 261; 3 Barr. 161. After their demands are satisfied, creditors are strangers.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for J. B. Dawkins.

Messrs. Munro & Munro and S. Lord, Jr., for the administrator.

November 16th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. Some time in August, 1870, J. P. Dawkins died intestate, possessed of a small personal but a very considerable real estate, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his widow, Sarah A., and his two children, B. F. Dawkins and Nannie E. Tench, the wife of John W. Tench.

It seems that, during the latter part of his life, the intestate had turned over the management of his property to his son, B. F. Dawkins, and his son-at-law, John W. Tench, and that after *his death they continued the management and control of the same without taking out letters of administration—their purpose, as expressed by them, being to pay up the debts of the intestate, provide for the support of the widow, and divide the estate between them, in pursuance of the "verbal will," as they termed it, of the said J. P. Dawkins. These expectations were, however, never realized, and, on the contrary, Tench and Dawkins not only failed to pay the debts of the intestate, but contracted a large liability to the defendants, Mowry & Son, principally for advances made to them to carry on the planting operations which they undertook to carry on with the property of the estate and to pay debts due by the intestate. To secure this liability to Mowry & Son, all the heirs of J. P. Dawkins, on April 13th, 1875, united in a bond, secured by a mortgage of the real estate left by the intestate, duly recorded, to the said Mowry & Son, who, as a further security, took an assignment of a judgment which one William Choice had recovered against Tench and Dawkins, as executors of J. P. Dawkins, on a note under seal given by the intestate to said Choice, the said Mowry & Son having furnished the money to pay Choice the amount due to him.

Subsequently, to wit, on October 6th, 1877, the plaintiff, who was clerk of the court, upon the demand of some of the creditors of J. P. Dawkins, obtained letters of administration on his estate, and on January 10th, 1878, commenced this action in the nature of a creditor's bill. The creditors were called in to prove their demands before a referee appointed for that purpose, and various claims were presented; but it is only necessary to direct our attention to two of these claims—one presented by Mrs. Sarah A. Stringfellow, and the other by James B. Dawkins, as the questions presented by this appeal arise out of these claims.

The Stringfellow claim was in the form of a promissory note of the intestate, payable to James B. Dawkins, or bearer, for $5,200, dated February 1st, 1870, payable one day after date, and transferred to Mrs. Stringfellow by James B. Dawkins on February 12th, 1872, as collateral security for a debt due by him to her. The claim of James B. Dawkins was in the form of a note under seal, executed by the intestate to said James B. *Dawkins on October 11th, 1869, payable one day after date, for the sum of $8,100. On February 1st, 1870, James B. Dawkins voluntarily accepted the above-mentioned promissory note for this note under seal, and, at the same time, canceled the sealed note by pen and ink marks drawn across the face of the note and the signature, and by the words "canceled by another note, (signed) J. B. Dawkins," written across its face, and delivered the same to the intestate, among whose papers it was found after his death and delivered to the attorney of James B. Dawkins by B. F. Dawkins after this action was commenced.

To the Stringfellow note, the Statute of Limitations was pleaded by the plaintiff, and to the sealed note for $8,100 the plea of payment and satisfaction was interposed. Both of these pleas were sustained by the referee, and, upon exceptions to his report, the Circuit judge overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report of the referee. From his judgment this appeal comes up, by which the questions raised are: 1. Whether the Stringfellow note is barred by the Statute of Limitations. 2. Whether the sealed note presented by James B. Dawkins has been paid or satisfied. The Stringfellow note became payable on February 5th, 1870, so that, allowing five instead of four years on account of the payee and holder being "beyond seas," and adding thereto the nine months allowed by the act of 1789, the bar would have been complete on November 5th, 1875, unless something had occurred to arrest the operation of the statute. It will be observed that, inasmuch as the right of action upon this note had accrued before the adoption of the Code of Procedure, the question must be determined by the old law and cannot be affected by the provisions of Section 125 of the code. Bratton v. Guy, 12 S. C. 42.

Under the law as it stood prior to the code, there can be no doubt that, as the right of action had accrued during the lifetime of the maker of the note, the currency of the statute was not suspended during the time that there was no administration upon his estate. Nicks v. Martindale, Harp, 135 [18 Am. Dec. 647]; McCollough v. Speed, 3 McC. 455; Bugg v. Summer, 1 McM. 333.

It is contended that the bar of the statute is prevented: 1. By the admissions, promises and payment made by the heirs of *the intestate while in possession of his land. Under the view which we take of this matter it will not be necessary to inquire particularly when these admissions, promises and payment were made, because, even if made before the statutory bar was complete, we do not think they could have the effect of reviving or continuing the legal obligation which the intestate incurred when he executed the note. Executors of Blake v. Executors of Quash, 3 McCord 340. The persons who made these admissions, promises and payment did not stand in such a relation to the intestate as to entitle them either to create, revive or continue an obligation of the intestate. They did not represent the intestate, and nothing that they said or did can be allowed to have the effect of fixing a debt upon the estate. They cannot be regarded as legal administrators, because the law prescribes the only mode in which such a relation can be created, and, as they have not seen fit to adopt that mode, we are unable to perceive by what authority such a position can be claimed for them. They cannot be regarded, so far as this question is concerned, as standing in any other relation to the estate than that of executors de son tort, and, as such, no promise, admission or payment made by them can be allowed to have the effect of creating, reviving or continuing any legal obligation binding upon the estate, and for this doctrine express authority may be found in the case of Haselden v. Whitesides, 2 Strobh. 353. The fact that they were heirs of the intestate cannot affect the question, for, as such, they have no more authority to create or revive a debt against their ancestor than any other person would have. The question here is whether the legal obligation of the intestate still subsists or has been destroyed. They may create obligations binding upon themselves and upon their interests in the estate, but we are at a loss to discover any authority by which they can fix a debt upon their ancestor or upon his estate.

For like reasons we do not think that the judgment recovered by Mrs. Stringfellow on her note against Tench and Dawkins, as executors, so called, can help the appellant. Such a judgment would not bind the estate, inasmuch as it was obtained against persons who had no authority to represent the intestate, and it *cannot have the effect of arresting the operation of the Statute of Limitations when pleaded by the lawfully appointed administrator, the legal representative of the intestate.

Next, it is contended that the administrator having invoked the aid of the Court of Equity to reach the real estate for the payment of the debts of his intestate, that court will not permit him to plead the statute to this claim, which has always been and still is acknowledged to be justly due by the heirs. The authorities cited by the appellant to sustain this position are, in our judgment, far from establishing it, and, on the contrary, we think that the true rule is, as stated in Cumming v. Berry, 1 Rich. Eq. 114, that a Court of Equity is bound to apply the bar of the Statute of Limitations to a legal demand in the same manner as a court of law would apply it. Here, the demand is undoubtedly a legal demand, and if an action were brought upon it on the law side of the court, there cannot be a doubt that the plea of the statute would prevail.

Again, it is contended that the administrator is estopped from pleading the statute by reason of the fact that he has recognized the claim in his complaint as an existing demand against the estate. The foundation of this position is that the plaintiff in his complaint alleges that the indebtedness of the estate is very large, and that he names Mrs. Stringfellow as one of the creditors of the intestate, and that, without her claim is established, the indebtedness would be small. Without stopping to inquire whether such loose allegations would amount to an admission of the debt and an implied promise to pay it, and assuming, for the present, that the administrator had in the most positive and unqualified terms admitted the validity of the claim, we still do not think that this would prevent the bar of the statute. This so-called admission, it will be observed, was made after the claim was barred, for, as we have seen, the bar was complete on November 5th, 1875, and the action was not commenced, and, of course, the complaint was not filed until January 10th, 1878. Whether this was such a positive and unqualified admission of the debt as would imply a promise to pay it, even if made by the debtor himself, might well be questioned, but, waiving that question, the point now presented is whether a promise to pay a *debt of his intestate made by an administrator, after the bar of the statute is complete, would revive the debt, or, more properly speaking, would constitute a valid cause of action against the estate; for the rule as established by the case of Smith v. Caldwell, 15 Rich. 373, and recognized recently in Hayes v. Clinkscales, 9 S. C. 450, is that a promise to pay a debt already barred by the statute constitutes a new contract and a new cause of action, the right of action upon the original obligation being absolutely gone. The question, then, is narrowed down to the inquiry whether an administrator can create a new debt against the estate of his intestate. To the question thus stated there can be but one answer. It is clear, therefore, that even if the administrator had in the most unqualified manner acknowledged this debt, and promised to pay it, after the bar of the statute was complete, it could not have the effect of either reviving the original debt or creating a new debt against the estate.

We are unable to see how the doctrine of estoppel applies to the case. This statement made by the administrator in the complaint cannot be said to have had the effect of inducing Mrs. Stringfellow to delay action until after the statutory period had elapsed, because, as we have seen, the bar of the statute was complete long before the complaint was filed and before such statement was made. There is no foundation, therefore, for the idea that Mrs. Stringfellow has, by this statement on the part of the administrator, been induced to alter her condition to the prejudice of her rights.

We are unable to perceive the force of the objection that the plea of the statute was interposed only by the administrator. As a matter of fact, we understand that the plea was insisted upon before the referee by some of the creditors, also. But, according to our view, this is not material, for the administrator was the proper party to set up the plea, and, indeed, according to some of the authorities, it was his duty to do so. Bird v. Houze, Speers Eq. 255. See, also, remarks of Carroll, Ch., in Hinton v. Kennedy, 3 S. C. 478; and see, also, the case of Shewen v. Vanderhorst, 1 Russ. & M. 349, 2 Russ. & M. 75, as stated in 2 Wms. Ex. 1283, in these words: "Under the common decree in an administration suit, a creditor applied to prove *a debt which was barred by lapse of time, and, the executor refusing to interfere, the plaintiff, a residuary legatee, insisted upon setting up the objection of the statute. Sir John Leach, M. R., held that it was competent for the plaintiff or any other person interested in the fund to take advantage of the statute before the master, notwithstanding the refusal of the executor, and this decision was confirmed by Lord Brougham on appeal."

The next question raised by the appeal is whether the sealed note presented by James B. Dawkins has been satisfied by his acceptance of the promissory note now held by Mrs. Stringfellow, and by his canceling and surrendering the sealed note to the intestate. The question whether one security is taken in satisfaction or as a mere substitute for another is a question of fact dependent upon the proof of the intention of the parties. If the intention is that the new security shall operate as a payment or extinguishment of the other, then such will be the effect of the transaction. Here both the referee and the Circuit judge have found the fact to be that the intention was to extinguish the larger note by the smaller, and we think their finding is fully supported by the evidence. The larger note was canceled and surrendered to the maker and remained in his possession up to the time of his death, and, in fact, should now be regarded as legally in possession of the administrator, for the return of it to the attorney of the payee by one of the family of the intestate after his death, and after this action was commenced, was altogether unwarranted and cannot be allowed to affect this question. The canceling and surrendering the note to the payee was the same in effect as if the payee had, upon the receipt of the smaller note, burnt or otherwise destroyed the larger note as a means of utterly extinguishing the debt secured by it.

The fact that the new security was a smaller amount and of inferior rank does not alter the result. The old artificial rule, which has no foundation in reason and ought not to be extended, but which has prevailed ever since Pinnell's Case (5 Co. 117), that the payment of a less sum than the whole amount due, on the day when the debt matures or afterwards, cannot be a satisfaction of the debt, applies only to a payment in money, and, therefore, when something other than money is accepted in *satisfaction of the debt it will be discharged, even though the value of the thing so accepted should be far less than the amount of the debt. Here the thing received in satisfaction of the debt was not money, and the rule does not apply, but the effect of the transaction must be determined by the intention of the parties.

So, too, the fact that the note received in satisfaction was a promissory note, and, therefore, inferior in rank, cannot affect the result. In Peters v. Barnhill, 1 Hill 236, a sealed note was allowed to operate as payment of a judgment. In Dogan v. Ashbey, 1 Rich. 36, a promissory note was held to be payment of a judgment. In Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 398 [7 Am. Rep. 26], confederate treasury notes, which were never money in any legal sense, but simply promises to pay, having been accepted, even by a trustee, in payment of a bond secured by a mortgage, by the legal owner of the bond, it was held that the bond was extinguished and the mortgage satisfied. So in numerous cases of a like character the same doctrine was held. It is clear, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in holding that the sealed note to James B. Dawkins was extinguished by his acceptance of the note now held by Mrs. Stringfellow in satisfaction thereof.

It is also urged by the appellants that the claim in favor of Choice against the estate of J. P. Dawkins, assigned to Mowry & Son, is embraced in the mortgage debt held by them, and that any payment made on the Choice debt out of the assets of the estate should operate as a payment on the said bond and mortgage, and that the Circuit judge erred in not so ordering. We do not understand that anything is adjudged upon this point by the Circuit decree, as there was no exception to the referee's report bringing the question before the Circuit judge. All that is there adjudged is that the proceeds of the sales of the real estate shall be applied: 1. To the costs of the case. 2. To the debts of the intestate, as ascertained and allowed by the referee, amongst which is the Choice claim assigned to Mowry & Son. 3. To the mortgage debt due to Mowry & Son. 4. That the residue, if any, be held by the clerk until the further order of the court. If, therefore, it be true, as alleged by appellants, that the amount due on the mortgage debt to Mowry & Son has *never been judicially ascertained, that, of course, will have to be done before the Circuit decree can be fully carried out, and in doing this the appellants may then raise the question whether the amount applied to the Choice debt, now held by Mowry & Son, out of the assets of the intestate, should operate as a payment pro tanto on the mortgage debt to Mowry & Son.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited and affirmed in Sartor v. Beaty, 25 S. C. 294.]

Before Hudson, J., Kershaw, June, 1880.

This was an action for the settlement of the estate of Wiley Kelly, who died intestate in 1873, instituted by his daughter, Emily C. Wilson, against Jane K. Kelly, Geo. W. Kelly, J. F. Kelly, W. D. F. Kelly and other distributees of the intestate, and John R. Shaw, administrator, and others. Upon the single point brought by the appeal to this court the case is fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. D. Kennedy, for appellant.

Mr. W. D. Trantham, contra.

*November 16th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. Wiley Kelly died intestate in 1873, and this action was instituted by the plaintiff, as one of his heirs-at-law and distributees, against the administrator and the other heirs-at-law and distributees, for account and partition. A note, under seal, executed by the appellant, W. D. F. Kelly, dated November 24th, 1858, and payable January 1st, 1860, to the intestate for $6,600, with sundry credits endorsed, was found among the papers of the intestate. The proof was that this note was given to secure the payment of the purchase-money of seven slaves, bought by W. D. F. Kelly from his father, the intestate, Wiley Kelly. On February 4th, 1868, W. D. F. Kelly filed his petition in the District Court of the United States, praying to be adjudged a bankrupt, and in March, 1871, he was duly discharged in bankruptcy. This, he claimed, released him from the debt to the intestate, secured by the above-stated note, and that he is, therefore, now entitled to receive from his father's estate his full distributive share, without accounting for the balance due on the note. The master reported otherwise, holding that W. D. F. Kelly still owed the note, though he was discharged from any liability to suit thereon, and that he must account for the balance due on the note before he could receive his distributive share of the estate. To this report, exceptions were filed, which were overruled by the Circuit judge, who sustained the view taken by the master, and from his judgment this appeal has been taken. Under the view which we take of this case we do not think that the question of advancement or the question of legal set-off, discussed with much ability in the argument here, can properly arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

We think it quite clear that a discharge in bankruptcy operates, like a successful plea of the Statute of Limitations, not as a payment or extinguishment of the debt, but only as a bar to an action thereon. Hence, where a debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy, while the legal obligation to pay the debt is gone, the moral obligation remains, because the debt is still unpaid, and it constitutes a sufficient consideration to sup*port a promise to pay the debt, just as in the case of a debt barred by the Statute of Limitations; for, if the debt was paid, or otherwise extinguished, there could be no moral obligation to pay it which would serve as a consideration for a new promise. That these views are fully supported by authority may be seen by reference to the cases collected in Bump Bankr. Pr. 644, seventh edition.

The effect of these principles, when applied to this case, is that the appellant still owes the debt to his father's estate, although the right to enforce its payment by an action has been destroyed by the discharge in bankruptcy. This being the case, the result is that the debt thus due by the appellant constitutes a part of the assets of the estate which is now in the hands of the appellant; and, if this be so, then nothing would seem to be plainer or more strictly in accordance with equitable principles than that the appellant should account for these assets before he can be entitled to receive anything out of the other assets of the estate. The practical result is that the assets for distribution consist of the amount due by the appellant added to the other assets belonging to the estate, and he having already received the amount now in his hands, in the form of the debt due by him, cannot be allowed to receive anything more until the other distributees have received out of the other assets an amount equal to that which he has already received.

These views are fully supported by authority. In Courtenay v. Williams, 25 Eng. Ch. R., 3 Hare 539, it was held that in a suit by a legatee to obtain payment of the legacy out of the assets of the testator, in a due course of administration, the executor might retain so much of the legacy as was sufficient to satisfy a debt due from the legatee to the testator, although the legal remedy for the recovery of such debt was, at the time of the death of the testator, barred by the Statute of Limitations. The remarks of Sir James Wigram, Vice Chancellor, in discussing this question, appear to be so appropriate to the case now under consideration that we cannot do better than to adopt his language. In speaking of a debt upon which the right of action has been lost or destroyed, leaving, however, the debt unpaid, he says that "it has been repeatedly decided, and is settled law, *that if a creditor, by means of a lien or other lawful means, can pay himself, without resorting to an action against the person of the debtor, he may lawfully do so." And, after reviewing the cases, he says this "is a suit to recover a legacy out of assets—that is, claiming a portion of the assets in the hands of the executor, and the claim is not made in any other way. The case is the same as if the assets were in the hands of the accountant-general. Now, to say that the right remains and the remedy only is barred, is, in a case like this, the same thing as saying that the legatee has already in his hands, to the amount of the debt, those assets of the testator which he seeks by his suit. Several ways of putting the case may be suggested in support of the argument on the part of the executors. They may say to the legatee, 'We admit your right to the legacy; you have assets of the testator in your hands; pay your legacy pro tanto out of those assets,' as in Jeffs v. Wood, 2 P. Wms. 128, and Campbell v. Graham, 1 Russ. & M. 453. Again, the executor might say: 'You ask for a portion of the assets of the testator, but you, yourself, are a debtor to the testator's estate, and his assets are diminished pro tanto by your default; it is against conscience that you should take anything out of the estate until you have made good what you owe to it;' and the equity of a trustee to impound the interest of a cestui que trust in the trust fund under such circumstances is clear [citing various cases]. To such a case, the rule that he who would have equity must do equity, would apply, by way of rebutter, to the plaintiff's demand."

This, as was held by Chancellor Walworth in Smith v. Kearney, 2 Barb. Ch. 533, is not a mere question of legal set-off, but of equitable right of retainer, which depends upon the principle that the legatee or distributee is not entitled to his legacy or distributive share while he retains in his own hands a part of the fund out of which that and other legacies or distributive shares ought to be paid. In other words, as that distinguished chancellor, in substance, said, the legatee or distributee in such a case seeks to obtain a portion of the fund which the testator or the letters of administration placed in the hand of the executor or administrator for the purpose of paying debts and legacies or *distributive shares, while such legatee or distributee by withholding payment of the debt due by him diminishes the fund to that extent. It is, therefore, manifestly against conscience that he should receive anything out of the fund without deducting therefrom the portion of that fund already in his hands in the form of a debt due by him to the estate.

These principles apply as well to a case in which the debtor has been discharged in bankruptcy as to a case where the debt is barred by the Statute of Limitations, for, as we have seen, the effect in both cases is the same—merely to bar the right of action—leaving the debt unpaid, but without any legal remedy on the part of the creditor to enforce its payment. This seems to have been the view taken in Jeffs v. Wood, supra, and in several cases cited in 2 Wms. Ex. 936, to which cases, however, we have not been able to obtain access.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Orangeburg, January, 1881.

Action commenced September 6th, 1879, by Martha J. Bannister and Edward F. Reese against William H. Bull, William Fogle, Stephen Bannister, A. Z. Bannister and C. U. Bannister, for the recovery of a tract of land.

The plaintiffs and the defendant, W. H. Bull, both claimed title under the residuary clause of the will of Adam Shuler. It read as follows:

"The balance of my estate, both real and personal, I will and desire after my death to be equally divided among my ten children, viz., to my son Charles P., one equal share; my son Alexander, one equal part; my son Jacob F., one equal part; to my son Bennet, one equal part; my son Edward Y., one equal part; my son Willis, one equal part; my daughter Eliza, one equal part; my daughter Jennet, one equal part during her natural life, after her death to be equally divided among her children: my daughter Relvey, one equal part during her natural life, after her death to be equally divided among her children; my daughter Mahalah, one equal part. I have loaned to my son, Charles P., two negroes, namely, William and Birty, and to my son, Bennet, one negro named Gabriel. These negroes I will and desire to be divided among ten children above-mentioned and in the above-mentioned manner."

*Jennet (Mrs. Reese) died in 1874 or 1875. Her husband, John Reese, died in 1857. Other facts are stated in the opinion of this court.

The exceptions correctly state so much of the requests to charge and of the charge to the jury, as is necessary to a full understanding of the points decided. They were as follows:

The defendant, William H. Bull, hereby gives notice that he excepts to the rulings of his Honor, T. J. Mackey, presiding judge of the said court, at the session thereof holden in January, 1881, made in the action above entitled, as follows:

1. Because he overruled the demurrer of the said William H. Bull.

2. Because, being requested by this defendant's counsel to charge "that under the will of Adam Shuler, his daughter Jennet Reese took a fee-conditional and not a life-estate, and that the children of Jennet Reese would take by limitation and not by purchase," he declined so to charge.

3. Because, being requested in like manner to charge "that if the jury believe from the evidence that Bennet Shuler occupied the tract in dispute adversely to Jennet Reese for more than ten years, their verdict must be for the defendant, William H. Bull," he declined so to charge.

4. Because, being requested in like manner to charge "that if the jury believe from the evidence that the plaintiffs, as heirs of John U. Reese, received estates greater in value than the land in dispute from him as his heirs-at-law, then they are estopped by his deed, and the verdict must be for the defendant, William H. Bull," he declined so to charge.

5. Because, being in like manner requested to charge "that a verdict cannot be found in favor of the defendants, Stephen Bannister, Charles U. Bannister and Altamont Z. Bannister," he declined so to charge.

6. Because, being in like manner requested to charge "that if a verdict be found in favor of the plaintiffs, it can only be for their aliquot part of the lands, not exceeding two-thirds thereof," he declined so to charge.

7. Because, being in like manner requested to charge "that as *to damages, if the verdict be for only two-thirds, the remaining one-third remaining in the defendant, William H. Bull, because not demanded by action, no damages can be recovered, except rents actually received and not rental value, and then only if W. H. Bull occupied all the land," he refused so to charge, and, on the contrary, charged the jury that the measure of damages is the rental value of the land in all cases.

8. Because, being in like manner requested to charge "that there is no testimony as to the rent actually received," he declined so to charge.

9. Because, being in like manner requested to charge "that if the jury believe from the evidence that the defendant, William H. Bull, has never occupied the part of the land in dispute, assigned and admeasured to the widow of Bennet Shuler as her dower, verdict cannot be found for the plaintiffs for that portion, as no trespass was proven," he declined so to charge.

10. Because, being requested in like manner to charge "that if the court holds that the estate of Martha Jane Bannister, as a child of Jennet Reese, vested at the death of Adam Shuler, then Rousam Bannister, her husband, has an estate in the land and is a necessary party and entitled to the rents and profits in her share for at least her coverture with him as tenant by the courtesy," he declined so to charge, and, on the contrary, charged that Section 137 of the code settled this question; she died six years ago, which was after the adoption of the constitution, and under Section 8, Article XIV., thereof, she has the right to bring an action and be sued as a married woman.

11. Because, being requested in like manner to charge "that if the court holds that the estate of Martha Jane Bannister was devised directly under the will of Adam Shuler, then Rousam Bannister has an estate in the land, and is a necessary party, during coverture being entitled to her share of rents and profits," he declined so to charge, and, on the contrary, charged "that Martha Jane Bannister could bring this action without joining with her husband."

12. Because he instructed the jury that Jennet Reese took a life-estate under the residuary clause of Adam Shuler's will, and not a fee-conditional.

*13. Because he declined to instruct the jury that the plaintiffs, as heirs of John U. Reese, receiving assets by descent, were estopped from disputing the title of Bennet Shuler and his assigns by their ancestor's deed to said Bennet Shuler.

14. Because he instructed the jury that they could find for the plaintiffs the whole of the land in dispute.

15. Because he instructed the jury that Jennet Reese could not divest the plaintiffs, her children, of their rights under the will of Adam Shuler.

16. Because he instructed the jury that if the will of Adam Shuler was recorded, such recording is ample notice to every party who proposes to deal with any portion of the estate to which the will relates.

17. Because his Honor refused the motion made by the defendant, William H. Bull, for a new trial of the said action.

November 17th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action to recover a tract of land. Adam Shuler died in 1848, leaving a will, which contained the following residuary clause: "The balance of my estate, both real and personal, I will and desire after my death to be equally divided among my ten children, viz.: To my son, Charles P., one equal share" [naming them all in the same way. And as to his daughter, Jennet, the words are]: "My daughter, Jennet, one equal part during her natural life; after her death to be equally divided among her children," &c. After the death of the testator his residuary estate was divided and the land in dispute was allotted to Jennet, who was then the wife of John Reese, and she and her husband duly conveyed it (1849) to her brother, Bennet Shuler, and Reese, the husband, in addi*tion, gave Shuler a bond of indemnity to secure him as to title. Shuler held possession until he died, during the late war (about 1863). The assets of his estate were marshalled, and in 1870 the land was sold subject to the claim of his widow, Mary E., in a part of it for her dower. At that sale the land was purchased by the defendant, W. H. Bull, who claims the same. The defendant, Fogle, is his tenant.

Jennet Reese died about six years ago, leaving surviving her two children, Martha Jane Bannister, wife of Rousam Bannister, and Edward F. Reese, the plaintiffs, and two grandchildren, Altamont Z. Bannister and Charles U. Bannister, children of a deceased daughter, Margaret, who died after the death of the testator but before the death of Jennet, leaving also a husband, Stephen Bannister. These heirs of Margaret refused to join in the action as plaintiffs, and were made defendants. Stephen Bannister answered, echoing the prayer of the plaintiffs for relief, but the sons, Altamont and Charles, did not answer at all.

The defendant, Bull, demurred for want of necessary parties plaintiff: First, because Stephen, Altamont and Charles Bannister were not made plaintiffs, and, second, because Rousam Bannister, the husband of Martha Jane, should have been joined with her as plaintiff, and without him she had not capacity to sue. The demurrers were overruled, and Bull answered, claiming title to the land, and that he had made improvements upon it. The case was heard on the merits, and, under the rulings of the judge, the jury found for the plaintiffs the whole land in dispute. The defendant, Bull, appeals to this court. The exceptions are long and numerous, being seventeen in number, and we will not attempt to follow them seriatim, but to consider all the points which should properly be decided at this time.

The leading question in the case, made by exceptions 2, 3, 12, 13 and 15, is as to the rights of the parties under the will of Adam Shuler. The plaintiffs claim that the will gave a fee-simple to "the children" of Jennet, who were in esse at the time the will took effect, subject to a life-estate which was carved out for Jennet. That at the time of testator's death she had three *children, viz., Martha Jane Bannister, Edward F. Reese and Margaret Bannister, (the latter of whom died before the life-estate fell in six years ago, leaving surviving her a husband, Stephen, and two children, Altamont and Charles,) in whom the remainder vested, and upon the death of the life-tenant, each of the living children was entitled to one-third of the land, and the heirs of Margaret together were entitled to the other third. The defendant, Bull, insists that the terms of the will gave a fee-conditional to Jennet; that upon the performance of the condition in having children, the title of the land became absolute in her so far as to authorize her to alienate, which she did to him, and he has good title.

In the construction of wills, the first and great object of inquiry should be, What was the intention of the testator? That intention must be gathered from the paper itself, and sometimes, from the inaccurate use of words which have a technical as distinguished from the ordinary meaning, there is difficulty in ascertaining the intention; but no such difficulty exists in this case. The word "estate" in the phrase "balance of my estate, both real and personal," manifestly referred to what still remained of his own property which he was about to give, and not to any of the parts to be given out of that residuum. So, too, in regard to the words "to be equally divided," reference was had to the size of the shares, and not to the terms or conditions which he might attach to any one of them. The word "equally," in its context, does not mean that the shares of the ten children were to be given and held in the same manner, but to be equal in quantity.

There is as little difficulty in regard to the word "children," the legal construction of which accords with its signification, namely, as designating the immediate offspring; for in all the cases in which it has been extended to a wider range of objects it was used synonymously with a word of larger import, as issue. 2 Jarm. 690, 5th Am. ed. The word indicates a class of persons, and not a line of indefinite descent, like "issue" or "heirs of the body." This is not a fee-conditional, for the reason that the land is not given to Jennet and the heirs of her body, but to her expressly for life. It is true that the rule in *Shelley's Case does apply in cases where the first taker has only an estate for life, but this is not a case for its application, for the reason that the land is given over to the "children," and not to her issue or heirs of her body. We understand that the rule in Shelley's Case applies only where the limitation over is to issue or heirs of the body. Chancellor Harper expressed it very clearly in the case of Williams v. Foster, 3 Hill 194, as follows: "By the rule in Shelley's Case, which has been an admitted and established rule of law for centuries, and the wisdom of which is more approved as it is better understood, it was determined that if an estate of freehold be given to the ancestor, and a remainder be therein limited to his heirs or to the heirs of his body, such remainder is immediately executed in possession in the ancestor so taking the freehold, and he takes an estate in fee or in tail, according to the terms of the limitation," &c. In this case an estate of freehold was given to the ancestor, but the remainder was not limited over to her issue or heirs of her body, but to "her children." There is nothing in the will which requires us to construe "children" as being equivalent to issue or "heirs of the body." It is a word of purchase, and they take per formam doni, and not by descent. Shearman v. Angel, Bailey Eq. 351 [23 Am. Dec. 166]; McLure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq. 559.

It is true Jennet conveyed the land to Bennet Shuler, but she could convey no more than her life-estate, and her donee could not hold adversely to the remaindermen until their right to possession accrued at the death of the life-tenant. The children are not estopped by having received shares of the estate of their father, John Reese, whose bond of indemnity may, by possibility, make his estate liable over, but cannot affect their rights in the land. It was not error in the Circuit judge to hold that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover.

It is insisted, however, that the judge erred in overruling the demurrers for lack of necessary parties as plaintiffs. The heirs of Margaret, to whom her vested third had descended, refused to join in the action as plaintiffs, and were thereupon made defendants. The demurrers made the point that such omission was fatal. That is to say, the proposition is that one tenant in common cannot sue for his interest in land without joining with *him in the action, as plaintiff or defendant, all who have a similar interest, and Section 142 of the Code of Procedure is relied upon to sustain it. That section is as follows: "Of the parties to the action, those who are united in interest must be joined as plaintiffs or defendants; but if the consent of any who should have been joined as plaintiff cannot be obtained, he may be made a defendant, the reason thereof being stated in the complaint; and where the question is one of a common or general interest of many persons, or where the parties are very numerous, and it may be impracticable to bring them all before the court, one or more may sue or defend for the whole."

The case before us does not fall within the operation of this section. This is not a suit to partition land among tenants in common, in which it might be necessary to have all the co-tenants before the court as plaintiffs or defendants in order to have a complete determination of the questions involved. But this is purely a legal action for the recovery of land—an action of trespass to try titles against a stranger. The last paragraph of the section cited, allowing "one or more to sue for the benefit of others," does not apply to such a case, but was manifestly intended for creditors of an insolvent estate and cases of that character where the interest is in common. So, also, as to the first paragraph in regard to making all parties who are united in interest. That does not control this case, for the reason that the interests of co-tenants are not united. They may be said, in one sense, to have a common interest, but according to our decided cases they are not, as against a stranger, united in interest in the sense of this section of the code. They have interests in the same property while it remains undivided, but such interests are distinct. Each has a right to the extent of his share. Indulgence is extended in allowing tenants-in-common to join in an action against a stranger, but they are not required to do so. "Tenants-in-common may sever, and any one of them may bring ejectment for his share, and, upon proof, recover it, or may bring ejectment for the whole, and, upon proof, recover his share." Dorn v. Beasley, 6 Rich. Eq. 420, in the late Court of Errors, where the authorities are cited.

The heirs of Margaret refused to join in the action, and we *know of no rule of law which authorizes the court to make parties sue for what may be supposed to be their rights, or to withhold their rights from those who do sue, only for the reason that others having similar interests in the same property do not join. They had the right to refuse to sue. They may wish to have a separate suit for their interest or they may not intend to set up their rights at all. It was not necessary that they should be joined either as plaintiffs or defendants to enable Martha Jane Bannister and Edward F. Reese, who did sue, to recover to the extent of their shares.

But we think Rousam Bannister should have joined his wife, Martha Jane, in bringing the action. At the time the constitution was adopted the interest of Martha Jane, under the will of Adam Shuler, had vested, and her husband's rights had attached, although she was not entitled to the possession until the death of the life-tenant, which occurred after the adoption of the constitution. That instrument did not operate retrospectively so as to divest the interest of the husband, which still remains and might be levied for his debts. Bouknight v. Epting, 11 S. C. 72.

The fifth and sixth exceptions state that the Circuit judge, upon being requested, refused to charge the following proposition, viz.: "That a verdict cannot be found in favor of the defendants, Stephen Bannister, Charles U. Bannister and Altamont Z. Bannister, and, if a verdict be found in favor of the plaintiffs, it can only be for their aliquot parts of the land, not exceeding two-thirds thereof."

We think the refusal of the judge so to charge was error. We have already seen that the parties named as defendants were not necessary parties in order to determine the rights of those who were plaintiffs, and those rights were in no way enlarged by the fact that these parties were named as defendants.

This was an action at law tried by a jury, and the plaintiffs could not recover more than they, in their own right, were entitled to, only because those who owned the remaining share were before the court as defendants. Nor, could these defendants, whose position was antagonistic, have an interest in the verdict recovered against the defendants, including themselves.

*Sometimes a judge, sitting as a chancellor, under the flexible rules of equity, may decide the rights of all parties, plaintiffs and defendants, but, under the rigid rules of law, no such course is possible in reference to the verdict of a jury. The general verdict of a jury for the plaintiff must be taken to be what it purports to be, and not partly for some of the defendants. So far as it regards rights of property, the verdict is a unity, and the court cannot declare that it is in part for the plaintiffs and in part for the defendants. If the verdict were in money, in favor of the right party and against the proper defendants, the court might indirectly reduce the amount by granting a new trial nisi. But we do not see how anything of that kind can be done in this case. This is not a special verdict under Section 285 of the code, but a general verdict in behalf of the plaintiffs for the land in dispute, and, as it stands, is an entirety, either right or wrong. We cannot change its terms by ordering it to read two-thirds or one-third, instead of the whole land in dispute; nor, have we the right to declare that one-third of it is for those who were called in as defendants and do not ask it. Such practice, if followed, would make the record speak falsely and introduce confusion as to the rights of parties.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial, with leave to apply to the Circuit Court for an order to amend by making Rousam Bannister a co-plaintiff with his wife, Martha Jane Bannister.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

Before Thomson, J., Abbeville, February, 1880.

The reporter has not been furnished with a brief in this case, but the opinion seems to state the case fully. The title of the case is M. M. Tarrant against I. Gittelson.

Mr. M. P. DeBruhl, for appellant.

Mr. T. P. Cothran, contra.

November 19th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action by the plaintiff, alleging that "the defendant is indebted to him in the sum of $100 for work, labor and services done and performed by the plaintiff for the defendant, at the request of the said defendant, at Abbeville Court House, S. C." The services were rendered by plaintiff as a clerk in defendant's store. The defense was a denial of each and every allegation of the complaint. The plaintiff offered to prove that the defendant was to pay him $25 for the first month, and, if he was pleased with his services, $50 per month after the first. Exception was taken that this proof could not be received, as no special contract was alleged in the complaint. The judge allowed the plaintiff to amend his complaint alleging a special contract and received the evidence.

Both parties alleged and relied on a special contract. The dispute was as to the sum to be paid the plaintiff, who gave testimony in reply; and a merchant swore that a clerk's services were more valuable in the latter months of the year, and gener*ally worth more than $25 per month; that plaintiff worked for defendant at the close of the year and until January. The Judge refused a non-suit, and, under his charge, the jury found for the plaintiff $48.75. The defendant appealed.

Upon motion of the defendant, the hearing in this court was suspended at November Term, 1880, to enable defendant, appellant, to make application to the Circuit Court (notwithstanding the pendency of the appeal) for a rehearing of the case on the ground of after-discovered evidence. 14 S. C. 620. Whether such application was ever made, this court is not informed. The parties now move for judgment on the original record.

The defendant filed the following exceptions:

1. "Because his Honor erred in allowing the plaintiff to amend his complaint without giving the defendant time to answer such amended complaint.

2. "Because the action was brought for a quantum meruit for services rendered by the plaintiff, and the amendment was in effect to allow the plaintiff to abandon the suit which he had brought, and to have an action upon the contract without the issuing of and service of a summons and complaint.

3. "Because it was an error in his Honor to refuse the motion for a non-suit, when the plaintiff, in his testimony, admitted there was a contract.

4. "Because it was an error in his Honor to admit testimony to show the value of plaintiff's services after a contract had been proved.

5. "Because it was an error in his Honor to forbid the defendant's attorney to comment upon such testimony in arguing the case to the jury, and afterwards to allow the plaintiff's attorney to comment fully upon such testimony, and then charge the jury to take such testimony into consideration in making up their verdict.

6. "Because it was error in his Honor to charge the jury that the certificate of character which the defendant had given the plaintiff was the best evidence of plaintiff's services, when said certificate fixed no value upon plaintiff's services at all, thus determining the quantity and sufficiency of the evidence, which *was solely the province of the jury." The sixth exception has not been pressed in this court.

The fourth and fifth complain of the admission of testimony as to the value of plaintiff's services. Upon an issue as to the existence or non-existence of a special contract to pay for services at a specified price, testimony generally as to the value of such services was not directly pertinent, but we can see that it might have some small bearing upon the credibility of witnesses as tending to prove or disprove the reasonableness of their testimony. The report of the judge makes a different case from that indicated by the exceptions. He says: "Inasmuch as both parties relied upon a special contract, the court endeavored to narrow the argument of counsel to the issue, What contract was made by the parties? This effort may not have been wholly successful; but if the jury listened to the instructions of the court, any argument not strictly upon the issue could have had no weight with them. The jury were instructed to exclude from their consideration the question of the value of plaintiff's services as the ground for a recovery. * * * That all the testimony was before them, and, in coming to a conclusion, such parts of the testimony as would support the statements of the one or the other of the parties as to the contract made should be weighed, and in this connection the wages of clerks generally, or the value of their services, might be considered."

Thus explained, and the jury carefully guarded as to the issue, and how the testimony should be considered, we cannot say that there was a material error in admitting it.

As to the first, second and third exceptions: Upon the proof of a special contract being offered, the court allowed the plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to cover the case made. Was that error? The Code of Procedure favors amendments. Its great object, as declared, was to prevent a failure of justice arising out of mere technicalities in the forms of pleading. All that it requires is that the complaint shall contain "a plain and concise statement of facts constituting a cause of action without unnecessary repetition." The complaint in this case alleged that the defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for "work, labor and services," but did not state that these services were rendered *under a special contract per month. The complaint certainly informed the defendant of the general nature of the claim, so that he was not taken by surprise. If it was necessary to amend the complaint so as to make it conform to the exact state of facts, (Pom. Rem., § 542,) the Circuit judge had the right, "in furtherance of justice," to order it made under Section 196 of the code, which provides that "the court may, before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice, and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting the name of a party or a mistake in any other respect, or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or, when the amendment does not change, substantially, the claim or defense, by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved." Gen. Stat. 611–12; S. C. Railroad Co. v. Barrett, 12 S. C. 174.

The defendant objected to the order allowing the amendment on the ground that "he would be surprised and was not ready to meet the new complaint by proof;" but it does not appear in "the case," that when the amendment was made, he moved for further time to answer, as was done in the case of Coleman v. Heller, 13 S. C. 491. The judge says: "The amendment, however, did not seem so great as to be a surprise, and plaintiff was allowed to proceed." We cannot say that this was error. The Circuit judge in such matters must have large discretion. The amendment was germane to the matter. It was really more formal than substantial. It made no new case between new parties, but only put in particular form the claim for compensation already made in the original complaint. Under the old system of pleading it would have been styled the addition of a special to the common counts of the declaration.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Richland, November, 1880.

Action commenced in May, 1878, by the county of Richland against Daniel B. Miller, as clerk of the board of county commissioners for Richland county.

The facts are sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court. The case seems to have been referred to the master, upon whose report the case was heard by the Circuit judge, without a jury. His findings of fact and conclusions of law were as follows:

Findings of Fact. 1. That the defendant was clerk of the board of county commissioners for Richland county from January 1st, 1874, to January 1st, 1877.

2. That during that period he rendered accounts against the county which contained illegal charges, as alleged in the complaint, amounting to the sum of $2,091.

3. That the said charges were audited, and the sum of $796.62 paid thereon to said defendant out of the county funds, at the times alleged in the complaint and exhibit.

4. That $57 of said sum so illegally charged and paid were for certain days' services which the defendant had previously *been paid for, and the remaining $739.62 were for days on which he did not render any service required of him by law as clerk of the board, and it is proved by the minute books of the board that the board did not meet on those days.

5. That the accounts of defendant themselves do not state what were the services charged for.

Conclusions of Law. 1. The words, "The County of Richland," used in the complaint, are a proper designation of the plaintiff.

2. The board of county commissioners were not acting as a court, but merely as an auditing board in passing upon the accounts in question, and their proceedings were ex parte as regards the county; therefore, the county is not concluded by their decision.

3. The defendant should have stated in his accounts what were the services he charged for on each particular day.

4. It having been proved that the board of county commissioners was not in session on the days for which the illegal charges sued on were made the burden of proof was on the defendant to prove that those days were actually and necessarily employed by him, as clerk of the board, in the discharge of his duties under the statute. On the contrary, he does not prove that he rendered any particular service upon any particular day of any week in the year; and the services he testified to as having been rendered by him, such as superintending the building of the court house, examining, approving and reporting on claims, &c., were not such services as devolved upon the clerk under the statute. But, in fact, in so doing he was assuming to himself the functions of the entire board. Still less should he receive pay for the entire day, when he examined, as he states, only one account.

It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged, that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $796.62, with interest thereon from the dates when the several payments aggregating that sum were made to said clerk.

And it is further ordered and adjudged, that the said illegal *charges named in the above findings of fact be canceled, and that the said accounts of the defendant be corrected accordingly. And the defendant is hereby enjoined from collecting, and the county treasurer of Richland county is enjoined from paying the unpaid pro rata portion of said illegal charges. And the county commissioners are enjoined from drawing any order or orders therefor.

It is further ordered, that all moneys now in the hands of the county commissioners or the county treasurer for Richland county, to the credit of said D. B. Miller, or which may hereafter be in their hands or in the hands of either of them to his credit, be applied to the payment of this judgment, and that said county commissioners and said county treasurer are enjoined from paying any of the accounts of said D. B. Miller against said county, which he holds either as the original payee, or as assignee, or otherwise, until this judgment is satisfied.

The defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

First. The defendant, Daniel B. Miller, excepts to the findings of fact numbered 2, 4, 5.

Second. The defendant excepts to the conclusions of law numbered 1, 2, 3 and 4.

Third. The defendant further excepts to the said judgment, and submits the following grounds therefor:

1. Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging, "That the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the sum of $796.62, with interest thereon from the dates when the several payments aggregating that sum were made to said clerk."

2. Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging, "That the said illegal charges named in the above findings of fact be canceled, and that the said accounts of the defendant be corrected accordingly. And the defendant is hereby enjoined from collecting, and the county treasurer of Richland county is enjoined from paying the unpaid pro rata portion of said illegal charges. And the county commissioners are enjoined from drawing any order or orders therefor."

3. Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging further, "That all moneys now in the hands of the county commissioners or the county treasurer for Richland county, to the credit of *said D. B. Miller, or which may hereafter be in their hands or in the hands of either of them to his credit, be applied to the payment of this judgment, and that the said county commissioners and the said county treasurer are enjoined from paying any of the accounts of the said D. B. Miller, which he holds either as the original payee, or as assignee, or otherwise, until this judgment is satisfied."

Messrs. Melton & Clark and Youmans, attorney-general, for appellant.

Messrs. Bacon & Moore, contra.

November 19th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. Daniel B. Miller, the defendant, was clerk of the board of county commissioners for Richland county from January 1st, 1872, until 1876. During that period, from time to time, he rendered his account for services as clerk of the board, which were audited, approved and ordered to be paid by the board. Some of the accounts have been paid in full, others in part, and the remainder are still outstanding as unpaid county claims.

In the year 1877, a commission was appointed by the Governor to investigate the indebtedness of the county of Richland under the "Act to investigate and ascertain the actual bona fide indebtedness of the various counties in the State, and to regulate the manner of paying the same." 16 Stat. 312. The duty of the commission was to report, in writing, a statement of said bona fide indebtedness to the board of county commissioners and to the general assembly at its next session thereafter. This commission, after laborious and careful inquiry, rejected the claims of the defendant as clerk of the board of county commissioners, in so far as the same contained charges for services rendered upon days on which the board did not meet for the transaction of business. They ascertained that for the whole period the defendant was clerk, he charged for six hundred and seventy-eight days on which the board did not meet, amounting, *at $3 per day, to the sum of $2,034, of which the defendant had received, at various times, in part, $739.62. Besides it was admitted that there was a mistake of nineteen days, which amounted to $57, wrongfully charged.

This report was placed in the hands of the grand jury of the county, which recommended "that the solicitor be ordered to take such legal steps as may be necessary for the protection and good of the county as suggested by the said report of the said commission."

Accordingly, this action was brought in the name of "The County of Richland," under the recommendation of the grand jury, for the purpose of recovering back from the defendant so much of said accounts alleged to be illegal as had been paid to him, and also for the purpose of enjoining the payment of the remainder. The defendant made defense that the county could not sue by the designation "The County of Richland," denied that the claims were illegal, and insisted that, the county commissioners having audited and allowed the claims, the county was concluded by that action until reversed or set aside.

The cause came on to be heard before Judge Mackey without a jury, who held: 1. That "The County of Richland" was the proper designation of plaintiff. 2. That the county was not concluded by the action of the board of county commissioners upon the claims of the defendant. 3. That certain of the charges contained in defendant's accounts were illegal, as they were for services rendered upon days on which the board did not meet. The judge gave judgment for said alleged illegal charges, which had been paid by the county, viz., $796.62, and for the cancellation of the remainder, and enjoined Miller from collecting, and the county commissioners and county treasurer from paying any accounts held by the defendant against the county. From this judgment the defendant appeals to this court.

This case was heard in connection with that of "The County of Richland v. Daniel B. Miller, as Clerk of the Court of Common Pleas,"† which is to be re-argued, but, as this case does not involve the difficulties which made a re-argument of the other necessary, we will now deliver the judgment in the case.

*We will consider the exceptions of defendant:

First. As to the capacity of plaintiff to sue. Section 28 of Chapter XVIII., Gen. Stat., under the head of "Counties and their Corporate Powers," declares that "Richland county is bounded as follows," &c., and in Section 34 declares that "Each county shall be a body politic and corporate for the following purposes: To sue and be sued," &c., but neither this act nor the constitution anywhere declares in express terms what shall be the title of Richland county as a corporation. The meaning of the phrase, "The County of Richland," seems to us to be precisely equivalent to that of "Richland County." It appears that the two forms of expression are used indifferently in the constitution and laws, and we cannot say that the expression, "The County of Richland," is not a proper designation of the plaintiff. The question is really one only of words. A corporate body is merely ideal and does not move until put in motion. In some of the States where counties have such bodies as our board, the practice is to sue in the name of such board. In New York, the county is required by law to sue in the name of its board of supervisors. There is no such provision in this State, but this is substantially an action by the present board of county commissioners of Richland county; for, if a recovery should be had, the money could only be received by the treasurer, the financial agent of the county, under the direction and control of the county commissioners.

Second. The defendant further insists that the complaint to recover back money paid does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. He denies that any of the items were illegal, but, if so, as they were regularly audited and ordered to be paid by the board of county commissioners for Richland county for the time being, he insists that the plaintiff is estopped from recovering back money which has been paid upon claims so audited, and that it was error in the Circuit judge to rule that "The board of county commissioners were not acting as a court in passing upon the accounts in question, but merely as an auditing board, and their proceedings were ex parte as regards the county, and, therefore, the plaintiff is not concluded by their decision." We believe the point is new in this State, and cer*tainly it is one of importance. We will not now enter into the inquiry whether the particular items of the accounts indicated in the complaint were, as alleged, illegal or overcharges, but confine ourselves to the question whether the board of county commissioners, who were in office at the time, and audited and paid the claims, had the power to consider and decide that question, so as to preclude the county of Richland from now disregarding that audit and recovering back the money paid thereon.

The question is purely legal, and cannot, in any way, be affected by the report of the commissioners appointed by Governor Hampton to investigate the indebtedness, or the presentment of the grand jury of the county. This is not a suit to set aside the action of the board of county commissioners for fraud in officials or for other cause, nor is it an effort by the present board of county commissioners to revise the audit of their predecessors, but, ignoring that action as if it had never taken place, it is an action at law in the nature of an action of assumpsit for money had and received by the defendant, which he ought not to retain, but which ex equo et bono belongs to the plaintiff.

This case rests upon peculiar grounds, and it will not be necessary here to consider the character of the organization and the jurisdiction of the board of county commissioners in auditing accounts generally.

In reference to the compensation of the clerk of the board, the law provided as follows: "Each board of county commissioners shall appoint some proper person to be their clerk whenever necessary, and may remove him at pleasure, whose general duties it shall be, &c. * * * Said clerk shall take the oath prescribed by the constitution. He shall receive a reasonable compensation for his services, to be fixed by the board, not to exceed three dollars per day for the time actually and necessarily employed," &c.

This was the law during the whole time in which these services were rendered. By the act of 1877, "to reduce the pay of county commissioners and their clerks," (16 Stat. 235,) the pay of county commissioners was reduced from three to two dollars per day for each day actually consumed in the service of their respective counties, and the pay of clerks was reduced to *two dollars per day "for each day employed and allowed by their respective boards, but not in excess thereof; provided, that not more than one hundred days shall be allowed to any clerk for any one year," &c. In 1880 (17 Stat. 509) the law was again amended so as to allow the county commissioners for Richland county pay for one hundred days, and their clerk "not in excess of two hundred days in any one year."

†See next case, post.

But, at the time the accounts of the defendant were rendered and allowed, there was no limit to the number of days in any one year in which the clerk might be employed and be paid for. We are unable to see anything which made it unlawful for the clerk to charge for more days that the board was in session, provided he was actually and necessarily employed. The law fixed no limit, and it is not perceived that the nature of the clerk's duties were confined to days when the board was in session. The last act upon the subject (1880) provides pay for the county commissioners for one hundred, and for their clerk two hundred days in the year, which would seem to indicate that, in the view of the legislature, the duties of the clerk could not be performed in the same time in which the commissioners could discharge theirs. It may be that the defendant was required to perform services for an ignorant and inexperienced board which were beyond the range of his appropriate duties as clerk. It may be possible, although the proof seems to be to the contrary, that the county commissioners for the time being, allowed their clerk, who did most of their business for them, pay for more days than he was "actually and necessarily employed," but the law made them the exclusive judges of the matter. The clerk was entitled to reasonable compensation, "to be fixed by the board," and the action of the board in auditing and ordering paid the accounts of defendant cannot now be disregarded by the present authorities of the county, and the money paid recovered back, except in case of mistake or fraudulent collusion. "So, when it is necessary for county supervisors, in passing upon an account presented against the county for services rendered, to determine the number of days of actual service, their decision as to this matter will be regarded as a judicial decision, and not subject to revision by proceedings *in mandamus." High Extr. Rem. § 345; People v. Supervisors of Livingston County, 26 Barb. 118.

The clerk of the board of county commissioners is not one of the officers upon whom the law imposes a penalty for charging excessive fees, and the complaint in this case contains no cause of action for a penalty.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial, unless the plaintiff shall, within ten days after written notice of this judgment, remit upon the record of the Circuit Court all of the amount recovered in excess of the sum of $57, admitted by the defendant in his answer to have been overpaid him by mistake.

COUNTY OF RICHLAND v. MILLER, CLERK OF COURT.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Counties ⇐217.]

"The County of Richland" and "Richland County" are equivalent phrases, and in an action by that county, either designation may be used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 348; Dec. Dig. ⇐217.]

[2. Judgment ⇐547.]

The board of county commissioners is not a court in such sense that its record may be pleaded in bar as evidence of a former recovery, or as res judicata in respect to a claim against the county allowed by the board.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 992; Dec. Dig. ⇐547.]

[3. Counties ⇐206.]

While not a court, it is the agent of the county in regard to all matters within the scope of its agency. As to all such matters requiring discretion and determination, their acts are quasi-judicial and binding upon the county until set aside for fraud or collusion in a direct proceeding brought for that purpose; but those involving the exercise of no judgment, are ministerial, and, if erroneous, are void.

[4. Counties ⇐207.]

Where the board acts upon claims fixed in character and amount by law, as salaries, tax costs, &c., their action involves no discretion, but is purely ministerial.

[5. Counties ⇐94.]

The county may recover, from a clerk of court, moneys illegally or excessively charged by him for fees in State cases, even where his accounts have been audited by the board of county commissioners, approved by the Circuit judge, and warrants issued for their payment, and payment received from the county treasurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 132; Dec. Dig. ⇐94.]

[6. Counties ⇐89.]

*An action to recover the penalty for fees illegally charged, may be instituted by any party injured by the charge, and is not confined to parties to the cause in which the fees were taxed. Therefore, for illegal and excessive fees charged against a county, or collected from it, by a clerk of court, the county may bring action for the penalty prescribed by law, and their right to recover cannot be affected either by the action of the board of county commissioners in approving the account, or by the payment of the money by the county treasurer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. § 135; Dec. Dig. ⇐89.]

[7. Pleading ⇐80.]

In action to recover, on a first cause of action, a sum of money, for fees illegally collected, made up of several items, and on a second cause of action for a penalty for such illegal charges, the answer interposed a plea "that in respect to many of the items constituting the said alleged cause of action, they are barred by the Statute of Limitations in such case made and provided." Held, that this plea was not separately stated so as to make it intelligibly distinguished as a defense to the second cause of action, and was, therefore, insufficiently pleaded.

McIver, A. J., dissenting.

Before Mackey, J., Richland, October, 1879.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. John E. Bacon, A. C. Moore and John R. Abney, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Melton & Clark, and Youmans, attorney-general, contra.

August 19th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This cause was heard at April Term, 1881, and as it involved questions of importance and difficulty, the court ex mero motu ordered it re-argued at November Term, 1881. The court has now reached a conclusion, which I am directed to pronounce.

Daniel B. Miller was clerk of the court of Richland county from January 1st, 1870, to January 1st, 1877. During that period, from time to time, he rendered his accounts against the county for costs alleged to be due him in certain cases prosecuted *in the sessions, in which the defendants had been discharged from inability to pay costs, &c. These accounts, as to form, were regular, approved by the presiding judge of the Circuit, and audited for payment by the board of county commissioners then in office. Some of these accounts were paid in full, and others in part, leaving balances which are still held as outstanding claims against the county of Richland.

In the year 1877, a commission was appointed by the governor to investigate the indebtedness of the county under the "Act to investigate and ascertain the actual bona fide indebtedness of the various counties in the State, and to regulate the manner of paying the same." 16 Stat. 312. This commission reported that in the accounts of the defendant, as clerk of the court, before referred to as allowed, he had made overcharges to the amount of $2,127.55, and recommended that the penalty of ten times the amount overcharged provided by law be enforced. The legislature adopted no plan for settling the indebtedness of the county of Richland as they did in regard to the indebtedness of the county of Charleston in the "Act to provide for the funding the debt of Charleston county" (16 Stat. 695; see Holmes & Calder v. Charleston, 14 S. C. 146); but the grand jury of the county of Richland recommended that the solicitor be ordered to take such legal steps as might be necessary for the protection of the county as suggested by the said report.

This action was brought, setting forth two causes of action—the first, to recover back $1,309.82, alleged to have been paid on the illegal charges, and to cancel those claims so far as they had not been paid; and the second, to recover $21,275.50, being the penalty of ten times the amount of the alleged overcharges. The defendant put in several defenses: That the plaintiff, as styled "The County of Richland," had not capacity to sue; denied that he had made any charges not authorized by law, and averred "that in respect to many of the items constituting the said alleged cause of action, they are barred by the Statute of Limitations in such case made and provided." The case was heard by Judge Mackey, without a jury, who held that the county could sue in the style of "The County of Richland," overruled the *demurrers in the answer, and gave judgment for the defendant on the second cause of action, but for the plaintiff on the first, for the money paid on the audited accounts held by him to be illegal, $1,309.82, and the judgment went on to order the audited accounts, held to be illegal, and not yet paid, to be canceled; and to enjoin the county commissioners and the county treasurer from paying the same, or any accounts held by the defendant in his own right, or as assignee, until the judgment was paid. Both parties appealed—

The defendant upon the following exceptions:

Third. "The defendant further excepts to said judgment, and submits the following grounds therefor:

1. "Because the court erred in deciding that 'from these findings of fact, and conclusions of law, it appears that the charges as set forth in the complaint and exhibits are illegal.'

2. "Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging 'that the plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for the sum of thirteen hundred and nine dollars and eighty-two cents, with interest thereon from the dates when the several payments aggregating the sum were made to the said clerk.'

3. "Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging 'that the said illegal charges named in the above finding of facts be canceled, and that the said account of the defendant be canceled accordingly; and the defendant is hereby enjoined from collecting, and the county treasurer of Richland county is enjoined from paying the unpaid pro rata portion of the said illegal charges, and the county commissioners are enjoined from drawing any order or orders therefor.'

4. "Because the court erred in ordering and adjudging further 'that all moneys now in the hands of the county commissioners or the county treasurer for Richland county, to the credit of said Daniel B. Miller, or which may hereafter be in the hands of either of them, to his credit, be applied to this judgment; and that the said county commissioners and said county treasurer are enjoined from paying any of the accounts of the said Daniel B. Miller against said county, which he holds, either as original payee, or as assignee or otherwise, until this judgment is satisfied.'"

*First as to the capacity of the plaintiff to sue. This court has held in a case lately decided, ante page 236, in which the defendant, Miller, was a party, that the plaintiff could sue by the designation of "The County of Richland," which is equivalent to the phrase "Richland County."

The defendant further insists that the first count does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. He denies that any of the items were illegal, but if so, as they were regularly audited by the board of county commissioners, the county cannot recover back money paid upon claims so audited, and that it was error in the Circuit judge to rule that the "board of county commissioners were not acting as a court in passing upon the accounts in question, but merely as an auditing board, and their proceedings were ex parte as regards the county."

We will not now enter into the inquiry whether the particular items of the accounts were, as alleged, illegal, or overcharges, but confine ourselves to the question whether the board of county commissioners who were in office at the time and audited the claims, had the power to consider and decide the different items so as to preclude the county of Richland from disregarding that audit. This is not an action to set aside the audit of the board for fraud or collusion with the defendant, nor to revise it; but ignoring that, it is in the nature of an action of assumpsit to recover money which ex equo et bono belongs to the county; and, therefore, the solution of the question depends, to a large extent, upon the jurisdiction of the board of county commissioners.

The constitution in Section 19, Article IV., provides that "the qualified electors of each county shall elect three persons for the term of two years, who shall constitute a board of county commissioners, which shall have jurisdiction over roads, highways, ferries, bridges, and in all matters relating to taxes, disbursements of money for county purposes, and in every other case that may be necessary to the internal improvement and local concerns of the respective counties; provided, that in all cases there shall be the right of appeal to the State courts."

The Legislature has passed acts defining the powers and duties of county commissioners, which acts provide that county commissioners elected under the constitution shall have jurisdiction *in all matters relating to taxes and disbursements of money for county purposes, "To examine, settle and allow all accounts chargeable against such county, and draw orders on the county treasurer for the same, but no allowance beyond legal claims shall ever be allowed," &c. 15 Stat. 985.

The board of county commissioners is an important body. As was said in the case of Ostendorff v. Charleston, 14 S. C. 308, "It is the local administrative body of the county. The powers and duties of all the county boards (previously existing) were united in the board of county commissioners, and others, no less important, were added, including the payment of contingent accounts formerly paid by the State." The Circuit judge held that the board, in passing upon the accounts, was not acting "as a court," but merely as an auditing board, and, therefore, its action might be disregarded, and money paid under its order recovered back.

It is not easy to give an exact definition of a court, or to state what is indispensably necessary to constitute one. There are various kinds of courts, classified from the nature and extent of their jurisdiction, as courts martial, superior and inferior courts, and courts of general jurisdictional and local courts. The term seems to be general, without any well defined signification. In the case of Ex parte Childs, 12 S. C. 118, it was held that "The Court of Claims," established by the act of March 22d, 1878, (16 Stat. 555,) was not a court in the sense of the term as used in the constitution, so that the Supreme Court could issue to it a writ of certiorari. It is there said that the question must be tested, not by the nature of the instrumentalities employed, "but rather from the objects which the legislature had in view in creating it, and the scope and extent of its powers."

Some of the powers incident to a court have undoubtedly been conferred on the county commissioners, but they are styled a board and not a court; its members are called commissioners, not judges; it was not created by the legislature under the judicial section (Article IV., § 1,) of the constitution, giving the power "to establish such municipal and other inferior courts as may be deemed necessary," but by the constitution itself. It does not proceed according to the forms generally deemed *essential to a court with parties before it as plaintiff and defendant, but in a summary way, without formal pleadings, evidence or record. It has no process to enforce its judgment, except the very efficient one of giving orders on the county treasurer for their payment. The right of appeal generally indicates judgment pronounced between parties, but the right of appeal here given could not have been intended for the benefit of the county, as one of the parties before a court, but for the persons presenting county claims. The commissioners for the time, being the only medium through which the county acts, it could not have been foreseen that an occasion would arise when the county or the people of the county, as distinguished from the commissioners, would be under the necessity of appealing as a suitor. Chicot County v. Tilghman, 26 Ark. 462.

In that case the party presented against the county a note. The commissioners ordered it paid by the county. The county attorney and other citizens made an effort to appeal in behalf of the county, and the court dismissed the appeal, saying: "As we have seen, the county court was vested by law with the power 'to audit, settle and direct the payment of all demands against the county.' From the judgment of the county court, in auditing, settling and directing the payment of demands against the county, an appeal is given, but this appeal only extends to such persons as may have an interest in the claim, and who feel aggrieved by the allowance or rejection of their demand; it has no reference to the citizens of a county, who are not interested in the allowance of the claim. The idea of a county appealing from the allowance of a claim made by its own county court is simply ridiculous. The county courts represent the county," &c.

We do not think that the board of county commissioners is a court in such sense that its record may be pleaded in bar as evidence of a former recovery, or res adjudicata in respect to a claim against the county allowed by the commissioners.

It does not, however, follow that the action of the board in auditing accounts is, in all respects, a mere nullity and may be entirely disregarded by the successors. The board is not a court, but it is the agent of the county in regard to all matters embraced *within the scope of its agency. While there may be successive boards composed of different individuals, the county remains the same, and the action of each board, upon matters fairly within its jurisdiction and submitted for the exercise of its judgment, is so far binding upon the county that it cannot, in a collateral manner, without the charge of fraud, ignore or disregard that action.

The commissioners are elected to decide between the county and those having claims against it, and it is not reasonable to regard their action as entirely without force, but, at the same time, there is some difficulty in determining the precise extent of that force. Several of the States have county boards similar to ours, called indifferently, "county courts," "boards of supervisors" and "county commissioners;" notably, New York, Illinois, Missouri and Arkansas; and in these States the extent of the powers and the precise effect of the action of such boards have been much discussed. Different views have been taken, and the cases are far from being in accord. The better opinion seems to be that, as to matters which require discretion, judgment, their acts within their jurisdiction are quasi-judicial, and binding upon the county something like the award of a board of arbitrators, unless they are assailed for fraud or collusion in a direct proceeding for that purpose; but their acts, which involve the exercise of no discretion or judgment, but are purely ministerial, if erroneous or against law, are void.

The case recently decided by this court against the defendant, Miller, as clerk of the board of county commissioners, is an example of the former class. In that case the law then of force did not fix the value of the clerk's services, but declared that he was entitled to reasonable compensation, to be fixed by the board, and in doing so it was necessary for them to determine the number of days he was actually and necessarily employed. High Extr. Rem. § 345; People v. Supervisors of Livingston County, 26 Barb. 118; Big. Estop. 173.

But in respect to the effect of the action of the board, there is a difference between acts quasi-judicial and those which are purely ministerial. In regard to the latter, nothing is submitted for the exercise of their judgment, and they are not the agents *of the county to hear and determine, but simply its ministerial officers. As to all claims against the county which are liquidated by law, determined in character and fixed in amount, such as salaries, tax costs, &c., the commissioners are entrusted with no duty but to put them in proper form and have them paid as the law directs—the amount fixed by law—nothing more and nothing less. If they refuse they may be compelled to do so by mandamus. The State ex rel. Marshall v. Starling, 13 S. C. 266. In that case it is said: "The county commissioners have no discretion to allow or reject this claim. It is for a salary, and need not be audited. It is fixed by law and ordered to be paid. It is the duty of the county commissioners to check for a salary fixed in amount and ordered to be paid by the county, as a ministerial act positively required by law."

Suppose, in that case, the commissioners had undertaken to double the salary, and had issued their check for $1,200 instead of $600, can there be any doubt that the action, as against the county, would have been beyond the scope of their agency, and void? "Counties are political corporations, and, as such, their powers are strictly construed. The power to audit and settle claims against the county must be confined to such claims as the county had authority to contract." English v. Chicot County, 26 Ark. 454.

In the State of Missouri, it seems that the County Court performs the duties usually performed by courts of Probate, and also that of auditing county claims. In that State, the distinction we are considering was very clearly made in the case of Carroll County v. Roberts, 60 Mo. 404. The court says: "A distinction was, however, made in the cases of Marion County v. Philips, 45 Mo. 79, and Owens v. Andrew County, 49 Mo. 372, which, we think, a sound one. Settlements made with the County Court in regard to administrators, guardians, &c., may properly be considered as judicial acts, since they are judgments of a court on proceedings inter partes in which there is notice required, and in which the county and the court are not interested. In settlements with collectors, it is a mere accounting between principal and agent, or between a supervisory agent and the subordinate. I refer to the opinion of Judge Bliss, in 45 *Mo. 171, where the learned judge has fully discussed the point and established this discrimination with the sanction of all the court."

In this State the county commissioners are authorized "to examine, approve and order paid all county claims, and to draw orders upon the county treasurer for the payment of the same; but no allowance or payment beyond legal claims shall ever be allowed." The costs allowed the clerk of the court are fixed by law, and as to these items of tax costs, the duty of the commissioners was purely ministerial. In respect to them, neither their allowance nor their amount is left or committed to the commissioners, whose duty is to put them in form, vouch them, and draw checks for them upon the treasurer. Whenever the county commissioners undertake to approve such accounts for sums larger than those fixed by law, they act beyond the scope of their agency, and such acts are not binding upon the county.

Our conclusion is as to plaintiff's first cause of action, that it does not matter whether the commissioners, in passing upon the accounts, were acting as a court, or merely as an auditing board, such action, until set aside, should have been respected, in so far as it was judicial, or quasi-judicial, in its character, the result of hearing and determining matters submitted to their judgment, but that it could not stand in the way of recovering back the erroneous excess, in so far as it related to tax costs fixed by law, as to which their duty was purely ministerial.

The plaintiff also excepts upon the ground that it was error to hold—"That the penalty of ten times the amount of fees sued for in the second cause of action is intended by the acts to be given to a party to a cause who has been charged an excessive fee; and the county, not having been a party to any of the causes in which these illegal charges and overcharges were made, is not entitled to recover the said penalty."

We think this was error. The acts which prescribe the penalty are as follows: "If any officer herein named shall charge any other fees, or for any other services than those herein recited, such officer shall be liable to forfeit to the party injured ten times the amount of excess of fees so improperly charged, to be recovered by suit in the Court of Common Pleas, *in which no imparlance shall be allowed," &c. Act 1839, 11 Stat. 14.

In 1872, this was re-enacted substantially, (Gen. Stat. 186,) and also in 1874 (15 Stat. 608). The right to sue for the penalty is "to the party injured," which means the real or artificial person injured by the excessive fees, and not necessarily a party to a cause. The services, for which the clerk is allowed to charge fees are often required to be done when no regular cause has been instituted, such as taking renunciation of dower, recording deeds, &c., &c. The county, as we have seen, practically, has no appeal from the action of its own officers, the county commissioners, which may result in depriving it of redress as to the allowance of excessive claims by those who are merely citizens, but as to certain officers, the law has prescribed a penalty for making excessive charges, and as to these, it is particularly important that the county, as a corporate body, should not be deprived of the right which all other injured parties have to sue for such penalty. It was held in the case of Greenville County v. Runion, 9 S. C. 1, that "the county of Greenville was a 'person aggrieved'" by the defalcation of the county treasurer, and, as such, could maintain an action on his official bond.

This action, for the penalty, is a distinct and separate remedy, independent of all agency of the board of county commissioners. As to this action, the audit of the accounts by the board with a view to payment, and even their actual payment, works no estoppel to the county, the party injured. The wrong intended to be punished was the charging of excessive fees, an act alone of the officer who makes such charges. The claim, so far as tax costs were concerned, needed no audit, the amount was fixed by law, and for charging excessive fees the penalty was also fixed by law, to be recovered in the Court of Common Pleas. If illegal charges have been made, the fact that they were allowed by the county commissioners cannot sanctify them or make legal that which was illegal, for the board of audit may have acted ignorantly or corruptly, and by allowing illegal claims only aggravated the wrong.

Upon the issue as to charging excessive fees, the fact that such *fees had been allowed by the board, would not be conclusive as matter adjudged, but, as we suppose, like any other pertinent fact, would be admissible only for what it was worth. Nor should the fact that such accounts have been partly paid, affect the action for the penalty, which is given to the party injured as satisfaction for the wrong done, which wrong was certainly not diminished but rather aggravated by enforced payment. Palmer v. Conly, 4 Denio 374; Tinsley v. Kirby, 8 S. C. 113.

The fifth defense is in these words: "This defendant avers that in respect to many of the items constituting the said alleged cause of action, they are barred by the Statute of Limitations in such case made and provided." As a plea of the Statute of Limitations, this is certainly very indefinite and informal. The objection that the action was not commenced within the time prescribed can only be taken by answer. Jones v. Massey, 9 S. C. 391. The defendant has the right to set forth in his answer as many defenses as he may have, "but each must be separately stated and refer to the cause of action which it is intended to answer, in such manner that they may be intelligibly distinguished." Code, § 173.

This defense does not purport to refer to any but one cause of action. If it were entirely regular in form, both by its terms and as explained in argument, it only refers to some of the items—those of 1870 and 1871—sued for in the first cause of action. We think, as a plea, it is not "separately stated so as to make it intelligibly distinguished" as a plea to the plaintiff's second cause of action for the penalty. It was error in the Circuit Court to overrule the second cause of action for the penalty.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial, according to the principles herein indicated.

SIMPSON, C. J., concurred.

McIVER, A. J., dissenting.

As I cannot concur in the conclusions reached by a majority of *the court, I propose to state, as briefly as possible, the grounds of my dissent.

The board of county commissioners are the representatives or agents of the county for certain specified purposes, one of which is to examine and allow or disallow all claims against the county, and, therefore, their action, within the scope of their powers, is the action of the county itself, and, in the absence of any charge of mistake or fraud, absolutely conclusive against it. For, while the constitution does provide for the right of appeal, yet this must be regarded as a right secured to those presenting claims against the county, as it would be anomalous—not to use any stronger term—to say that the county could appeal from the act of its own agent. Hence, when the board has acted upon any matter within its jurisdiction, such action, even though erroneous, is final so far as the county is concerned, and the only remedy is that to which all other persons, natural as well as artificial, must resort, who are so unfortunate as to employ faithless or incompetent agents, viz.: To discharge those who have proved themselves to be inefficient or unworthy of trust, and employ others who are more honest and efficient.

It seems to me, therefore, that when the accounts of the appellant against the county of Richland were audited and approved by the board of county commissioners, such action of its own agents was conclusive against the county, and could only be assailed for fraud or mistake in a direct proceeding for that purpose

New trial granted.

WITTE v. WOLFE.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Husband and Wife ⇐159.]

*A married woman, independently of the constitution of 1868 and the act of 1871, may execute a valid mortgage of a tract of land conveyed to a trustee in trust for the sole and separate use of such married woman, and "subject in all respects to her use, disposition, charge and control by deed or will, by her made, in all respects and to the same extent as though she were discovert and sole."

[4. Trusts ⇐79.]

Where lands are purchased by A., upon his individual credit, for the benefit of B., to be conveyed to B. when the purchase-money has been fully paid, there is a resulting trust in favor of B., and a mortgage of such lands executed by B. is valid and binding, subject to the right of A. to have the balance due on the purchase-money paid out of the proceeds of sale.

For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 111; Dec. Dig. ⇐79.]

[5. Bonds ⇐62.]

In February, 1874, a bond was given by A. and B. to C., in the penal sum of $12,000, conditioned that A. and B. would pay to C. the "sum of $6,000 on the first day of January next, with interest * * * and ship to C. for sale, on commissions of two and one-half per cent. 375 bales of cotton before said January 1st next, and pay, also, any balance that may then be due C. on any transactions in buying and selling cotton or otherwise on said January 1st next." This bond was secured by mortgage of lands of A. and of B. On the day before the maturity of this bond A. and B. gave their second bond to C., in the penal sum of $16,000, conditioned that A. would pay the sum of $8,000 * * * and ship 500 bales of cotton * * * and also pay to the said C. on the first day of January, 1876, any balance that may be due C. by A. on any transactions in buying or selling cotton or otherwise prior to said date last given," and this bond was in like manner secured by a mortgage of the same property. Held, that the first bond and mortgage were not satisfied upon the shipment of 375 bales of cotton, but that they also secured a balance of $5,567.62, due on the operations of 1874, although there were over 1,500 bales of cotton shipped, and this balance resulted from transactions in buying and selling cotton to an amount largely in excess of the penalty of the bond.

[6. Principal and Surety ⟸97.]

If B. was a surety she was not discharged from her liability on the first bond by an allowance of one per cent. return commissions, credited to A. on all the cotton shipped after the receipt of the first 375 bales, in compliance with a promise made by C. to A. at the time this covenanted number were delivered, such return commissions being according to the custom of cotton factors.

[7. Principal and Surety ⟸109.]

Nor, is she released from her liability on the second bond by a mortgage accepted by C. from B., calling for the delivery, at a future day, of thirty bales of cotton of a growing crop, as further security for a balance then due on such bond, there being no agreement for further indulgence on such indebtedness.

[8. Payment ⟸41.]

Where a debtor ships cotton to his creditor to be credited on a security which proves to have been already satisfied, the court, at the request of the creditor, may make application of the proceeds to any other indebtedness of such debtor to this same creditor.

*Before Hudson, J., Fairfield, September, 1880.

Action by George W. Witte and Arnim F. Witte, doing business as partners in a cotton factorage business under the firm name of Witte Brothers, against Saling Wolfe, Sarah S. Wolfe, Simon Baruch and other defendants, who were lien creditors of the two defendants first named. The several securities and demands, upon which this action was founded, and the balances due thereon, together with other facts explaining the case, are stated in the opinion of this court.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement of the pleadings and order of sale, was as follows:

After hearing the elaborate arguments of the counsel upon these points, I am of the opinion that the mortgages are valid liens upon the separate estate of Mrs. Wolfe. The first bond is dated February 23d, 1874. This bond is secured by a mortgage of the lands of husband and wife, or of other persons held for her. The second bond is dated December 31st, 1874. This bond matured on January 1st, 1876, and is secured by a mortgage upon the same real estate as secures the first-mentioned bond. Both these bonds and mortgages are signed by the defendants, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe. Now, these cotton transactions were very extensive; large balances are due thereon, and the language of the condition of the bonds is very broad, and certainly covers whatever balances might be due thereon up to January 1st, 1876.

Subsequent to January 1st, 1876, a lien for advances during the year was given plaintiffs by the defendants, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe. It appears that in 1876, fifty-two bales of cotton were shipped by Saling Wolfe to the plaintiffs. The proceeds of this cotton must be applied as a credit on the indebtedness secured by this lien. The fifty-two bales netted $2,099.86.

There is no conflict as to the balance due by Mr. Wolfe; and for these balances, as reported by the referee, both he and his property, mortgaged to secure the same, are liable. But the principal contest is as to the liability under the mortgage of Mrs. Wolfe's separate property.

It was the well-established rule in South Carolina, prior to *the adoption of the constitution of 1868, that a married woman had no power to bind or charge her separate estate unless such power was expressly given her in the instrument by which such separate estate was created. Ewing v. Smith, 3 Desaus. 417. But in 1868, under the constitution, all this was exploded, and full power has been given her by the constitution and the act of January 27th, 1870, (14 Stat. 325,) to devise, bequeath and convey her separate estate; and she has also been authorized, in express terms, to make deeds, mortgages and other legal instruments. The act goes a bow-shot beyond the statutes of other States. In New York, under the New York statutes, the courts uphold the doctrine that a married woman cannot bind her separate estate by contract, unless her intention so to do be expressed in the instrument creating the charge, or may be presumed from the nature of the contract itself. But in South Carolina, a married woman has been almost if not completely emancipated. But even in other States this contract would bind her, for her intention to bind her separate estate is therein stated in express terms, and cannot be disputed. What separate estate, then, has she? Certainly the tract conveyed by F. Copes to her directly is her separate estate and in fee.

The deed from Manus Baum to Simon Baruch, trustee, contains the following clause: "But subject, in all respects, to the use, disposition, charges and control of the said Sarah S. Wolfe, by deed or will by her made, in all respects and to the same extent as though she were discovert and sole." Under this clause she has the right to mortgage the property named in this deed. She can make a valid deed thereof and a valid mortgage, and it is bound by the mortgage.

Now, as to the deed from Shaw and McCants to Dr. Baruch, individually. Dr. Baruch has testified: "I do not know from what source the money [for the cash portion of the purchase-money and the credit portion of the purchase-money of the Shaw place] was derived. Mr. Wolfe induced me to enter into the purchase as a good thing, and I left him to attend to it for me. I always felt myself bound for the money until the bond was paid. Witness did not furnish the money himself. So far as his information goes, it was derived by Mr. Wolfe *from working the places. The place purchased from James B. McCants has been paid for in the same way, but I hold my titles to the Shaw place and the McCants place, though not by any agreement with anybody, still, as security, to protect myself against the balance due on the bond of James B. McCants." Dr. Baruch also testified that "It is witness' intention, after the money is paid, to convey these lands to Mrs. Wolfe and her children."

This testimony conclusively shows that, although the titles to these lands were taken by Dr. Baruch in his own name, the property was not paid for by him; but that, as he was and is liable for the credit portion of the purchase-money, he retained the titles in his own name as an indemnity against this liability. This creates in Baruch a resulting trust in favor of either Mr. Wolfe or Mrs. Wolfe (for which we need not consider; these latter have shown the light in which they regarded these lands, by including the tracts in the mortgages, and they cannot now say that they had no right to do so). These mortgages by husband and wife create valid liens on these premises. They had a right and a power to mortgage them, and the plaintiffs have a right to have the interest of Mr. and Mrs. Wolfe sold, and when sold the purchaser will take an absolute fee-simple estate. But Dr. Baruch must be indemnified, and whatever amount he may be liable for, on account of the purchase-money of these lands, must be first provided for out of the proceeds of their sale, that the lands may be resold free from all encumbrance.

The report of the referee as to the accounting is approved, except in so far as the same is modified by this opinion, from which the following will result:

The $4,000 bond, dated February 15th, 1875, has been adjudged satisfied in the case of Sarah S. Wolfe v. George W. Witte and Arnim F. Witte. The proceeds of twenty bales of cotton, sold in 1879, and directed to be applied to said bond in the mortgage of crop of 1878, and which were applied thereto by the referee in the account by him, are no longer applicable, the said bond having been satisfied before said cotton was raised and sold. The proceeds of this cotton should, therefore, be applied as a credit to the account contracted in 1877, between *the plaintiffs and Saling Wolfe alone. Applying them, therefore, as credits of proper dates, this account becomes extinguished on October 29th, 1879. The credits subsequently applied to this account by the referee (being $79.14 overplus of payment of October 29th, 1879, and $540.27 paid on November 26th, 1879,) should be applied to the mortgage debts. So, applying them as credits of proper dates, the balance due on September 15th, 1880, upon the bonds secured by the mortgages of real estate, is $12,091.73, of which $7,743.82 is secured by the bond and mortgage dated February 23d, 1874, and $4,347.91 is secured by the bond and mortgage dated December 31st, 1874, alone.

On the account secured by the lien of Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, dated January 7th, 1876, after applying the proceeds of the fifty-two bales of cotton hereinbefore directed to be applied thereto, there remains a balance of $1,232.85, and for this sum a judgment must go against Mr. Wolfe and Mrs. Wolfe.

I have thus disposed of the various points made before me in this case, and will now sum up my conclusions of law and fact in the manner directed by the Code of Procedure.

I find as matters of fact:

1. That the bonds and mortgages sought to be foreclosed in this action were duly executed and delivered to the plaintiffs by the defendants, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, at the times and upon the considerations mentioned in the complaint.

2. That said mortgages have been duly recorded.

3. That the bond, chattel mortgage and agricultural lien dated February 15th, 1875, and sued on herein, are satisfied and discharged.

4. That the balance of $7,743.82, reported by the referee as due under the security of the bond and mortgage of date February 23d, 1874, is correct.

5. That the balance due on September 15th, 1880, under the security of the bond and mortgage of date December 31st, 1874, is $4,347.90, and that said balance is secured by said bond alone.

6. That the balance due on the account secured by the lien given by Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, dated January 7th, 1876, and now unsecured, is $1,232.85.

*7. That there is nothing due upon the account between plaintiffs and Saling Wolfe alone.

8. That the deed from Manus Baum to Simon Baruch, trustee, contains a clause in words following: "But subject, in all respects, to the use, disposition, charge and control of the said Sarah S. Wolfe, by deed or will by her made, in all respects and to the same extent as though she were discovert and sole."

9. That the Shaw place has been fully, and the Vann place partially paid for with moneys derived from Saling Wolfe, or from the income and profits of land cultivated by him, either individually or as agent for Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe.

10. That Dr. Simon Baruch is individually liable for the unpaid balance of the purchase-money of the Vann place.

11. That Dr. Simon Baruch holds in his own name the titles to the Shaw place and the Vann place, to indemnify him against loss by reason of his liability on either place.

Upon the foregoing facts I hold as matter of law as follows:

1. That under the constitution and laws of South Carolina, the bonds and mortgages and lien given by Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe bind her and her separate estate as amply and to the same extent and in like manner as if she were sole.

2. That the trust deed from Manus Baum to Simon Baruch, trustee, gave Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe a legal and valid power to pledge, by way of mortgage, the property therein mentioned.

3. That the transactions of Dr. Baruch, in the purchase of the Shaw and Vann places, create a resulting trust as to those places in favor of Saling Wolfe or Sarah S. Wolfe, as the case may be, which it is unnecessary and immaterial now to inquire.

4. That the interest and estate of Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe in the Shaw place and the Vann place were legally mortgaged by them.

5. That such mortgage is that of the fee, subject to Dr. Baruch's right to be indemnified out of the proceeds of the sale of said places, against his liability for the purchase-money thereof.

6. That the mortgages mentioned in the pleadings are valid and subsisting liens on all the premises therein mentioned and *described, except that of February 15th, 1875, upon the personal property of Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe.

7. That as between Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe and her husband, she may be regarded as his surety, and she is entitled to have his property first sold in exoneration of her separate estate.

8. That the mortgages given in 1878 and 1879 by Saling Wolfe were merely additional securities to the bonds referred to by said mortgages, and, as they did not extend the time of payment, Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe, even had she been, as to Witte Brothers, a surety, was not released from her liability upon the bonds and mortgages by her given jointly with her husband.

9. That the plaintiffs allowing Saling Wolfe a return commission on the cotton shipped in excess of that stipulated in the bonds and mortgages constitued in no respect a new contract quoad those bonds and mortgages, and, hence, could not have the effect of releasing Mrs. Sarah S. Wolfe, even if regarded as the surety of Saling Wolfe.

I am, therefore, of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to a judgment of foreclosure of said mortgages, and a sale of the tracts of land embraced in the same, and a judgment against the defendants, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, for the unpaid balance of the lien account of 1876.

The exceptions of Sarah S. Wolfe are copied into the opinion. The exceptions of Saling Wolfe are substantially the same as those of his wife. The defendant, Baruch, filed three exceptions. The third is the same as the eighth of Mrs. Wolfe. The others were as follows:

1. Because his Honor erred in finding as matter of law that the defendant holds the Shaw place and the Vann place under a resulting trust in favor of Mr. or Mrs. Wolfe, and that said property, standing in his own name, and held by him as his individual property, could be mortgaged by Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe for the debt of the former.

2. Because his Honor erred in permitting any such question to be made in this action.

Mr. S. P. Hamilton, for appellant.

*November 19th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. On February 23d, 1874, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, his wife, of Winnsboro, Fairfield county, executed to the plaintiffs their joint and several bond in the penalty of $12,000, conditioned for the performance of covenants, viz.: To pay $6,000 on the first of January then next, with interest thereon from date of advancement at the rate of one per cent. per month, "and ship to them for sale, on commissions of two and one-half per cent., 375 bales of cotton before said first day of January next, and pay also to said Witte Brothers any balance that may be due to them on any transaction in buying and selling cotton or otherwise on said first day of January next, without fraud or further delay," &c. This bond, which, in the case, is called Exhibit A., was secured by a mortgage of real estate belonging to both Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, as follows: The Avick place, containing 100 acres; the Shurley place, containing 317 acres; the Weston place, containing 850 acres, and the Delleney place, containing 940 acres, belonging to Saling Wolfe; and the following four parcels, viz.: The Shaw place, containing 237 acres; the Vann place, containing 140 acres; the Leitner place, containing 100 acres, and the town lots in Winnsboro, belonging to the separate estate of Sarah S. Wolfe. The business did not stop at the amount secured by the bond, but during the year 1874 the plaintiffs advanced the sum $97,342.97, and they sold cotton for defendants which amounted to $87,097.37; this left a balance due at the maturity of the bond of $10,245.60. But reducing this by the sales of cotton, up to February 15th, 1875, there was then due $5,567.62, which was admitted by Saling Wolfe.

On December 31st, 1874, the business of that year had not been closed up, but it was known there would be a balance against Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe, and on that day they executed to plaintiffs another joint and several bond in the penalty of $16,000, with the following conditions: "That if the above-bound Saling Wolfe, his heirs, executors and administrators, shall and do well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the above-named Witte Brothers * * * the full and *just sum of $8,000 on the first day of January A. D. 1876, with interest thereon, as the same may be advanced by the said Witte Brothers to the said Saling Wolfe, from the dates of the advancements respectively, at the rate of one per cent. per month, computed by way of discount; and shall ship during the year 1875 to the said Witte Brothers 500 bales of cotton, to be sold by them on commission of two and one-half per cent.; and shall also pay to the said Witte Brothers, on the said first day of January, 1876, any balance that may be due by him on any transactions in buying or selling cotton prior to said date last given, without fraud or further delay," &c. To secure this bond, which is known as Exhibit B., a mortgage was executed by them upon the same real estate as secured the first bond.

On February 15th, 1875, Saling and Sarah S. Wolfe executed to plaintiffs another joint and several bond conditioned for the payment of $4,000 and interest, and the shipment of 200 bales of cotton on or before January 1st, 1876. This bond was secured by a mortgage of certain chattels, horses, mules, wagons, &c., purporting to belong to both Saling and Sarah S. Wolfe, but which belonged alone to Sarah S. This bond, which is known as Exhibit C., was also secured by an agricultural lien of even date given by both Wolfe and his wife. Under the security of these two bonds and mortgages last named, and the agricultural lien of 1875, the plaintiffs advanced during that year to the amount of $21,635.35, and cotton was delivered which paid the amount, except the sum of $3,853.88. These sums, with interest, were claimed by the plaintiffs in their first cause of action to be covered by the mortgage of which they prayed foreclosure and sale of the property.

On January 7th, 1876, Saling Wolfe and Sarah S. Wolfe executed an agricultural lien to secure further advances, and on February 21st, 1877, Saling Wolfe alone executed another agricultural lien to secure further advances, and on May 13th, 1878, he executed a mortgage on his crops of that year, and April 30th, 1879, another mortgage on the crops of that year, the last expressly for the purpose of further securing the past indebtedness. The balance due on these securities was claimed in the *second cause of action as a debt against Saling Wolfe and wife, but not secured by mortgage.

An action was brought by Sarah S. Wolfe against Witte Brothers to cancel the bond and chattel mortgage C., upon the ground that cotton, to wit, 134 bales, shipped under lien of February 15th, which provided that cotton shipped under that lien was to be applied to the payment of the bond secured by the chattel mortgage, should be so applied to the extinguishment of said bond and mortgage.

The defendants, Saling Wolfe, Sarah S. Wolfe and Simon Baruch, trustee, resisted the recovery, and insisted that Mrs. Wolfe signed the several bonds and mortgages only as security for her husband, and that being a married woman she had not legal capacity to bind herself by such a contract, and, consequently, the bonds and mortgages, so far as she was concerned, were void and her separate property not liable. And even if she was originally bound as surety, that the course of dealing between the plaintiffs and her principal, especially in so largely exceeding the business indicated by the amounts of the bonds and mortgages, not only released her as surety, but, in effect, paid and discharged entirely the bonds and mortgages as securities. If not that, she was discharged by new agreements between her principal and plaintiffs, and, in any view, that the defendants were entitled to a credit for the $4,000 bond secured by the chattel mortgage, to which the cotton shipped should be first applied, and, if so applied, said bond was paid in full and should be eliminated from the account.

It was referred to a referee to take the testimony and state the accounts. He took much evidence, and stated the accounts substantially as related in the foregoing meagre outlines. He reported as due upon the several bonds secured by mortgage of Saling Wolfe and wife, the aggregate amount of $11,929.90; that there was due by them also upon the lien of 1876, $1,232.90, and by Saling Wolfe alone, on lien executed by him February 21st, 1877, the sum of $206.27.

The case came up before Judge Hudson on exceptions. At the same term of the court the case of Sarah S. Wolfe against Witte Brothers, to cancel the bond and chattel mortgage, was *tried. The judge decreed that the bond C. and chattel mortgage were, in effect, paid by the cotton which had been delivered by Saling Wolfe. In this case he confirmed the report of the referee in every respect, except as to the application of the proceeds of certain cotton, and as to that he made a small change, which he thought was made proper by the aforesaid decision in the matter of the bond and chattel mortgage, to which item more particular reference will be made hereafter. He held that the bonds and mortgages were not discharged; that Mrs. Wolfe, as well as her husband, was liable for the amount of $12,091.13, covered by the mortgages, for which he gave judgment, and ordered foreclosure by sale of all the lands embraced in them, and he also decreed against them both the sum of $1,232.85, due under lien of January 7th, 1876, but not secured. The defendants, Saling Wolfe, Sarah S. Wolfe and Simon Baruch, all appealed and filed exceptions, but the questions made can be considered under those of Mrs. Wolfe, which are as follows:

1. "That his Honor erred in finding that the bond and mortgage of February 23d, 1874, were not paid by the shipment of 375 bales of cotton, and the contract terminated on November 27th, 1874, as stated in the letter of Witte Brothers to Saling Wolfe.

2. "That his Honor erred in finding that this defendant is liable, under the bond and mortgage of February 23d, 1874, for balances against her husband, Saling Wolfe, incurred by the shipment to Witte Brothers of 1,209 bales of cotton after the termination of the contract stated in said bond.

3. "That his Honor having found that this defendant was surety for her husband, Saling Wolfe, on the bond for $6,000, dated February 23d, 1874, he erred in not finding that this defendant, as such surety, was discharged by the making of a new contract and agreement, without her consent, between Saling Wolfe, her principal, and Witte Brothers, the creditor, by the letter of the latter, dated November 27th, 1874, whereby the rate of commission allowed Saling Wolfe, of one per cent. return commission, was changed from that named in the bond.

4. "That his Honor having found that this defendant was the surety of her husband,

Saling Wolfe, on the bond dated *December 31st, 1874, he erred in not finding as matter of law that the mortgage on the crop made by Saling Wolfe to Witte Brothers, dated April 30th, 1879, was a new agreement between the creditor and principal, without her knowledge or consent, by which an extension of time was granted to Saling Wolfe for the payment of said bond, and thereby this defendant, his surety, was discharged.

5. Not urged.

6. "Because his Honor erred in finding the balances against Saling Wolfe, as reported by the referee, as correct, when his decree in the case of Sarah S. Wolfe v. Witte Brothers has decided the bond for $4,000 and chattel mortgage to be paid and satisfied, and that amount is eliminated from the account of the plaintiff, and the report of the referee should have been recommitted to him to be recast in conformity with the decree in this case.

7. "Because his Honor found, as matter of law, that the defendant could bind her separate estate as surety for her husband, and this was error.

8. "Because he found that she could bind the property in Winnsboro, held under the trust deed of August 8th, 1868, from Manus Baum to Simon Baruch, without consent of her trustee.

9. "Because his Honor granted to the plaintiffs a money judgment against Saling Wolfe and this defendant on a joint contract made on agricultural lien dated January 7th, 1876, and decreed that it was a lien on her separate estate."

For the sake of clearness we will not attempt to consider the exceptions in their order, but under general heads according to their subject-matter.

First. The seventh and eighth exceptions deny that Sarah S. Wolfe, being a married woman, had the legal capacity to make a contract as surety for her husband, so as to make herself, or her separate estate, liable for the different bonds, mortgages and agricultural liens signed by her with her husband. In the case of Pelzer, Rodgers & Co. v. Campbell & Co., 15 S. C. 581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], just decided, this court held that under our present constitution and laws, a married woman may make a contract "as if she were *unmarried," and that the contract of suretyship is no exception. It is not necessary to repeat here the reasoning of that judgment, to which reference is made. In that case the married woman did not sign as surety for her husband, but for a mercantile firm, of which her son was a member, but the law applies equally in the case of surety for her husband. In some of the States, limitations on this point have been imposed upon the wife's power to contract, but none have been imposed in our State. Here a wife can contract as surety for her husband as well as for any one else, only provided that the contract is upon sufficient consideration, and not made under circumstances which would avoid any contract for duress. Wright v. Remington, 12 Vroom (41 N. J.) 48. In that case it was held that "a threat by a husband, conveyed through a payee, that he will poison himself unless his wife signs a note as surety for him, does not amount to duress, such as will avoid her contract." In the case before us there is no evidence that improper means, undue influence or illegal persuasions, threats or solicitations were made use of for the purpose of inducing Mrs. Wolfe to sign the papers: certainly there is none intimating participation in or consent to such conduct on the part of the plaintiffs.

This question does not touch the tracts of land which belong to Saling Wolfe, viz., the Avick place, the Shurley place, the Weston place, and the Delleney place. As to the other tracts it will be necessary to consider further. The act of 1870 (14 Stat. 325) gives the power to a married woman to contract and be contracted with as if she were unmarried, and expressly declares that "all deeds, mortgages and legal instruments of whatever kind shall be executed by her (married woman) in the same manner and have the same legal force and effect as if she were unmarried." Under this act, Mrs. Wolfe had the right to mortgage the Leitner place, which, after the passage of the above act, March 9th, 1871, was conveyed by Frederick Copes "to Sarah S. Wolfe for her sole and separate use," &c.

Mrs. Wolfe had the right to mortgage the "town lots in Winnsboro," and all the land conveyed by the deed of Manus Baum to Simon Baruch, trustee, bearing date August 5th, 1868, after the adoption of the constitution but before the passage of *the act above cited. The trusts of that deed are: that the trustee should hold "subject in all respects to the use, disposition, charge and control of the said Sarah S. Wolfe by deed or will by her made, in all respects and to the same extent as though she was discovert and sole." Without reference to the effect of the constitution, under this power she could charge the property specifically by mortgage, even according to the principles which were applied in this State before the constitution. "What constituted a charge upon the estate was simply a rule of evidence. All agree that when the wife had expressly charged the payment of a debt upon her separate estate, whether it be her own debt or the debt of another, such charge was valid and would be enforced, provided the power to do so was given by the deed." 1 Bishop, § 812; Yale v. Dederer and Wife, 18 N. Y. 265; Reid v. Lamar, 1 Strobh. Eq. 27; Ewing v. Smith, 3 Desaus. 418 [5 Am. Dec. 557].

As to the Shaw and Vann places, the facts are as follows: Simon Baruch, at the instance of Saling Wolfe, purchased them and gave his bonds for the purchase-money, but Wolfe and wife took possession and have had the rents and profits. Baruch testified that he did not hold this property by any secret trust, but in his own name; that he took title in his own name; did not pay the cash or any other part of the purchase-money, but, as Mr. Wolfe had induced him to enter into the purchase as a good thing, he left him to attend to that; did not know from what source the money was derived, but, so far as his information goes, it was derived by Mr. Wolfe from working the place; that he holds the title to both places to secure his liability for the balance of the bond still due to McCants for the Vann place, and that as soon as all the money was paid it was his intention "to convey these lands to Mrs. Wolfe and children." Under these circumstances the Circuit Judge decided that the purchase-money was paid by Saling Wolfe from the proceeds of the crops, and that there was a resulting trust in favor of Mr. Wolfe or Mrs. Wolfe, depending upon the fact whether the money came from his or her plantations, and in either case this interest was bound by the mortgage which was executed by both, subject to the right of Baruch to have the remainder of the purchase money now due *paid out of the proceeds of sale. We cannot say that this was error either in law or fact.

Second. The first and second exceptions make the point that the first bond and mortgage of February 23d, 1874, were paid by the shipment of 375 bales of cotton, and the contract terminated on November 27th, 1874, and it was therefore error to decree any balance arising out of the operations of the year 1874.

The second bond and mortgage were executed on December 31st, 1874, the last day of the calendar year, but the cotton season was not then closed, and it could not be known precisely what would be the result. It was known, however, that there would be a balance against Wolfe and his wife. The referee reports as matter of fact that there was a balance due on the transactions of that year, and so far as Saling Wolfe is concerned he never denied that there was such a balance which was covered by the bond, but year after year, on various occasions and in different forms, acknowledged it.

But it is insisted that the business of 1874 went largely beyond the amount of the bond, and that as soon as it overflowed the bond and mortgage they were, in effect and by operation of law, paid, and should be canceled. This must depend upon the contract. Was it the intention of the parties that the advances should all be within $6,000, and the shipment of cotton stop at 375 bales? If so, the view that the bond and mortgage must be considered paid as soon as the business went beyond them in amount would be very strong. In that case, the debt, as a balance of account, might remain, but the security would be gone. That, however, does not seem to be the true construction of the bond. It was not a money bond, but a bond with a penalty to secure the performance of covenants. It was not given for so much money received at the time, but to cover advances to be made at future times. That is manifest, both from the nature of the transaction and the terms of the bond itself. There are no words expressly fixing a limit to the business, and there is none unless the mention of a particular amount in the bond amounted, by implication, to such limit, which is negatived by the terms of the covenant: "to pay, also, to said Witte Brothers any balance that may be due them on any transactions in buying *and selling cotton or otherwise," &c. Manifestly the business of buying and selling cotton was in contemplation, and the penalty of the bond seems to have been given, not to limit business to the amount therein stated, but to ensure it to that extent and to cover any balance which might be struck, without regard to the amount of business that produced that balance. That the bond, to the extent of its penalty, was intended as a general guaranty to Saling Wolfe in the business of buying and selling cotton.

This was certainly the understanding of Saling Wolfe himself, when, December 9th, 1874, he wrote to the plaintiffs, saying: "Now, gentlemen, if I remember correctly, when I gave the mortgage of our property to you it read in that way; if I draw more than $6,000, our property is responsible for it." Witte also testified that "all transactions were considered by plaintiffs as covered by the bonds in existence." This view is confirmed by the subsequent conduct of the parties. On December 29th, 1874, a new arrangement was entered into, and the idea that the first bond and mortgage were paid and discharged was not even suggested. On the contrary the new arrangement embraced the identical property covered by the first, and the covenant in the bond then executed was in the following words: "Also to pay the said Witte Brothers any balance that may be due them by him on any transactions in buying and selling cotton or otherwise prior to the date last given," &c. This covenant, by its terms, covers a balance then due, as well as one which might arise after its date and prior to maturity.

In respect to this very matter of the absence of limitation in the contract, this case is not analogous to that of Ryan v. Shawneetown, 14 Ill. 20, cited and relied upon by the defendants. In that case certain persons, as sureties, gave a mortgage to secure a loan to the trustees of Shawneetown, "not to exceed $20,000." The loan was to run ten years, and the money to be used for walling the banks of a river adjacent to the lots. The bank loaned $40,000 for that purpose and took their note for it, and brought a bill to foreclose the mortgage: Held, That the loan was not made in pursuance of the mortgage, and that the sureties were not liable even for $20,000. That case did not go on the ground of payment by exceeding the limits but of depart*ure from the contract. "For it may be that they would not have become responsible for any amount but for the assurance that the loan would be limited to the amount stipulated."

In this case, as we understand the contract, there was no assurance that the business should not go beyond $6,000, but, on the contrary, the covenant was to pay "any balance" that may then be due on "any transactions" in buying or selling cotton or otherwise. Conway v. Cunningham, 6 S. C. 351; Greer v. Bush, 57 Miss. 575; S. C., 9 Reporter 473.

Third. The third and fourth exceptions insist that if Mrs. Wolfe was liable, she was merely surety for her husband, and, as such surety, she was discharged by certain transactions of the plaintiffs with her principal, Saling Wolfe. It is not perfectly clear that Mrs. Wolfe was merely a surety and not a joint contractor. The bonds in form are joint and several. In the first the covenants were to be performed by both of them, and in the second by Saling Wolfe alone. At least part of the money advanced was to support the family and make crops on the different plantations, some of which, as well as some of the stock, belonged to Mr. and some to Mrs. Wolfe, and the crops followed the ownership of the property. But assume that she was only surety. We have already seen that a married woman may be surety for her husband, and how does it appear that she was discharged?

I. It is insisted that Mrs. Wolfe was released from liability on the first bond by a new agreement, without her consent, between Saling Wolfe, her principal, and the plaintiffs, "by the letter of November 27th, 1874, whereby the rate of commissions allowed Saling Wolfe, of one per cent. return commissions, was changed from that named in the bond." The letter referred to is in these words: "We would here mention that we have divided the lot I M I so as to render your account sales exactly for 375 bales cotton, on which full commissions are to be charged, after which a return commission will be credited to you." It is true that "any agreement between the creditor and principal which varies essentially the terms of the contract by which the surety is bound, without the consent of the surety, will relieve him from responsibility." But assuming that the letter as to *return commissions was an agreement, we fail to see that it touched the terms of the contract. The express contract only related to 375 bales, "and ship to them for sales, on commissions of two and one-half per cent., 375 bales of cotton." This contract was complied with to the very letter. Beyond that there was no express stipulation as to commissions, and it was no violation of the contract to make a reduction of commissions in accordance with what was proved to be the usual custom and practice in such cases.

II. It is also insisted that Mrs. Wolfe was relieved from liability on the second bond by the crop mortgage executed by Saling Wolfe to plaintiffs, April 30th, 1879, which it is alleged was "a new agreement, without her knowledge or consent, by which an extension of time was granted for the payment of said bond." Saling Wolfe and his wife had given to the plaintiffs a lien on their crop for the year 1876, and Saling Wolfe alone had executed a lien for the year 1877, and he also executed a crop mortgage for the year 1878, and on April 30th, 1879, executed the crop mortgage, which, it is alleged, extended the time of payment of the money due and covered by bond B. This paper was signed only by Saling Wolfe. It was given expressly as further security for the debt. It mentioned nothing about indulgence but it is insisted that such was the necessary effect of the following provision in it, viz.: "And it is the true intent and meaning of the parties to these presents that if the said Saling Wolfe do and shall well and truly deliver or cause to be delivered unto the said Witte Brothers thirty bales of cotton, or pay the said debts or sum of money aforesaid, with the interest thereon, if any shall be due, according to the true intent and meaning of said bond and these presents, then this deed of bargain and sale shall cease, determine, and be utterly void," &c. The defendant contends that the plaintiffs, by accepting this lien to deliver thirty bales of cotton in October, November and December, 1879, agreed to indulge on the debt, and, by implication, bound themselves not to sue until that time.

Mere indulgence will not discharge a surety. In order to have that effect there must be an agreement for indulgence between the creditor and principal debtor, obligatory on the *creditor, and for a certain or definite period. Parnell v. Price, 3 Rich. 121. We see here no evidence whatever of such agreement. It was only an effort to secure something on the debt. The plaintiffs could have sued at any moment.

Fourth. The sixth exception insists that the $4,000 bond, which was decreed paid in the case of Sarah S. Wolfe v. Witte Brothers, should have been eliminated from the account of the plaintiffs, and the report of the referee should have been recommitted and recast in conformity with that decree.

After the referee had made his report on the accounts, Judge Hudson decreed that the bond for $4,000 and the chattel mortgage to secure it had been discharged by the application to this bond of the proceeds of certain cotton which had been sent forward. At first view it would seem that this would necessarily change the account of the referee, so that the amount of the first bond should be set down as a credit to the defendants, or, as the defendants say, be "eliminated from the account:" but when we look to the manner in which the accounts are stated we will see that this is not the case.

The advances made on B. and C. were stated in one account in the view that the latter was cumulative security for the former. The bonds were not, as in the case of simple money bonds, the measure of the amount due, but the limit to the amount which could be recovered. The actual advancements were the debt, and the bonds were only the securities which covered it. The referee had stated all the advancements before bond C. was declared paid, and therefore the only effect of striking out that bond was to discharge one of the securities which covered the aggregated advances, leaving them as already stated.

That decree, however, did slightly affect the credits. The proceeds of twenty bales of cotton had been placed, by direction of defendants, under bond C., but that was observed after it appeared that said bond had been discharged long before, and as there was then no direction as to how the proceeds of that cotton should be applied, the plaintiffs claimed that they had the right to have it applied first to the extinguishment of the small amount found due by Saling Wolfe individually. The Circuit judge allowed the claim, decreed nothing against

Saling Wolfe indi*vidually, and increased thereby, to a small extent, the decree against Saling Wolfe and wife. We cannot say this was error. In the absence of direction by the debtor the creditor may direct the application of payments.

The decree for $1,232.85 against Saling Wolfe and wife upon the agricultural lien of 1876 is a simple judgment on money demand, and not covered by the mortgages. We see no reason why, under the code, that cause of action could not be united with one for the foreclosure of the mortgage against the same parties.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

[2. Judicial Sales ⇐53.]

A purchaser at a judicial sale is not affected by irregularities in the proceedings under which the sale was made, if the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and all proper parties were before it; and this rule applies as well to cases in which the purchaser objects to the title tendered, as where he defends his purchase. Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C. 323, approved.

[3. Mortgages ⇐422.]

An action for foreclosure of mortgage of lands, lying in Georgetown county, was instituted in the Court of Common Pleas for Charleston county, in October, 1879, and no demand was made by the defendants for a change of the place of trial. Held, that the court in Charleston, under the first paragraph of Section 149 of the Code of Procedure, had jurisdiction of the action, and such jurisdiction having attached, it was not affected by the repeal of this paragraph in December, 1879, before the hearing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. § 1260; Dec. Dig. ⇐422.]

[4. Mortgages ⇐422.]

But as to parties brought in by amendment after such repeal, one of whom was an infant, and the other—an adult—did not appear, the court in Charleston was without jurisdiction, for at that time the requirement of the law was that the action must be tried in the county where the lands lay. As to these parties, the order of foreclosure and sale was void.

[5. Executors and Administrators ⇐438.]

*In an action for foreclosure of mortgage of land, the personal representative of the mortgagor, who was dead, was not made a party, although the complaint demanded judgment for deficiency, if any. Held, that this nonjoinder could not be urged by the purchaser at the foreclosure sale, as an objection to the validity of the sale.

The administrator of a deceased heir-at-law of such mortgagor was not a proper party to the action.

[7. Infants ⇐80.]

Under the express authority conferred upon the Probate judge by Section 138 of the Code of Procedure, he may appoint a guardian ad litem to appear for infants who are parties to a cause in the Court of Common Pleas.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, April, 1881.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. W. St. J. Jervey, G. R. Walker, Rutledge & Young, C. R. Miles and T. W. Bacot, for appellants.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

November 19th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. Under proceedings in the case of Trapier v. Trapier, a rice plantation in Georgetown county, known as Windsor, was sold by order of court in 1870, and purchased by Mrs. Sarah C. H. Waldo, of New York, for $21,500, for which she gave five bonds, each for the sum of $4,300, and to secure the same, executed a mortgage of "that plantation or tract of land known as Windsor, on Black river, Georgetown county," consisting of several parcels, particularly described. The said Sarah died about 1873, leaving a paper purporting to be her last will and testament, executed in the State of New York, by which she undertook to devise Windsor to Horace Waldo and Francis Waldo, the latter of whom soon after died in New York, leaving as his heirs-at-law, his widow, Gertrude, and her infant son, Rhinelander Waldo, and two minor children by a former marriage, viz., Rosalie L. and Katherine L. Waldo. Horace Waldo was named executor of the will of the said Sarah. He qualified in the State of New York, and assumed to act as sole executor, *but the will was never lodged or proved in South Carolina, for the reason, as stated, that it was not executed in the presence of three witnesses, and, therefore, was not effective as a will in this State.

The bonds, secured by the mortgage aforesaid, were assigned and are owned by different parties—one by Mrs. Charlotte T. Trapier, one by Benjamin F. Trapier, one by Richard S. Trapier, one by Hannah H. Jervey, wife of Arthur P. Jervey, and the remaining one by the plaintiff, Alicia S. Trapier, who instituted these proceedings to foreclose the mortgage. Without objection, the complaint was filed in Charleston county, October 13th, 1879, and, besides the owners of the other bonds named above, and the tenant in possession, the following persons were made defendants, viz., Horace Waldo, as heir, and as executor of the will of Sarah C. H. Waldo, and Rosalie L. Waldo and Katherine L. Waldo, minor children of the first wife of Frank Waldo, deceased, being heirs-at-law of Sarah C. H. Waldo at the time of her death.

The complaint prayed that the mortgage be foreclosed by sale of the land, "and the proceeds applied to the payment of the debt, and execution awarded for the balance, if any." Notice of lis pendens was filed in Charleston and Georgetown counties, which described the land and stated that the action was for foreclosure of mortgage, &c. To this complaint, Horace Waldo answered, both as executor and heir, November 8th, 1879. On the same day, Laurens N. Chisolm was appointed by the Probate judge of Charleston county, guardian ad litem of the infant defendants, Rosalie L. and Katherine L. Waldo, and, as such guardian, answered.

On February 2d, 1880, leave was given to amend the complaint, and May 19th, 1880, an amended complaint was filed, making Mrs. Gertrude Waldo, the widow of Frank Waldo, and Rhinelander Waldo, her infant son, residents of the State of New York, defendants, which amended summons and complaint were duly served upon the said defendants on June 1st, 1880, under an order of publication of May 29th, 1880. No new notice of lis pendens, after amendment, was filed. Under a general order of reference, by consent of all the counsel engaged, the master *made a report recommending that the plantation be sold, and the proceeds held subject to the further order of court, and all questions raised by the pleadings be reserved. July 16th, 1880, Judge Thomson made an order confirming the report, and ordering the land sold on the third Tuesday of December (21st), 1880.

The land was not sold under this order for the reason that Rhinelander Waldo was not represented when the order was made. On December 30th, Judge Wallace appointed W. M. Bruns, guardian ad litem of the infant, Rhinelander. On the next day, December 31st, 1880, Bruns filed his answer as guardian ad litem, and the master reported that the land had not been sold under the order of Judge Thomson because the infant, Rhinelander, was not then represented in the cause, and again recommended that the mortgaged premises be sold, &c.

On January 1st, 1881, Judge Wallace, by consent of all the counsel, confirmed the report and ordered sale. Under this order, Windsor was sold at public auction in the town of Georgetown, on February 1st, 1881, and was knocked down to the respondent, Benjamin Allston, as the highest and last bidder, at the price of $17,800. Judgment by default was taken against Gertrude Waldo on February 21st, 1881, being the first day of the term. The case was not put on calendar 6, and the judgment was not endorsed on the complaint.

After the sale, Mr. Allston went upon the Windsor plantation and employed labor preparatory to planting the same, but soon after he refused to take the land, and the matter was again referred to Master Clancey, and, upon his report, Judge Mackey, February 25th, 1881, issued a rule against Allston to show cause why he did not, as purchaser, comply with the terms of sale. To this rule he made return, refusing compliance, and alleging that for numerous irregularities and violations of law in the proceedings under which the sale was made, "it was impossible for the master to make a legal conveyance of said plantation." The question thus raised was also referred to Master Clancey, who, after a careful examination, made an able report, stating that, in his opinion, good titles could be made to Mr. Allston, and recommending that the rule should be made *absolute. Judge Mackey overruled this report and discharged the rule. From this order the appeal comes to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the said respondent has shown reasonable grounds of objection to the title which it is the purpose of these proceedings to compel him to take, and that the rule be discharged with his costs allowed him.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the sale was void because the action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage of a plantation in Georgetown county, and that it was tried in Charleston county, contrary to the mandate of Section 146 of the Code of Procedure, Gen. Stat. 597.

3. Because his Honor erred in holding that Gertrude Waldo, widow, and Rhinelander, the infant child of Frank Waldo, were not properly before the court when the cause was at issue in July, 1880, or at the time when the account should have been taken and proof had preparatory to a decree for foreclosure and sale, and are not bound by the decree.

4. That his Honor erred in holding that Katherine L. Waldo and Rosalie L. Waldo, the other infant children of Frank Waldo, were not properly made parties to the cause by the appointment of Laurens N. Chisolm as guardian ad litem by the Probate judge of Charleston county, inasmuch as no jurisdiction has been granted by the statute to a Probate judge to appoint guardians ad litem to represent infants in suits pending in the Court of Common Pleas.

5. Because his Honor erred in holding that after order to amend the summons and complaint by making new parties, a new notice of lis pendens should have been filed in the cause, there being, it is submitted, no requirement of law to that effect.

6. That his Honor erred in holding "that this being an action against infants, ordering a sale of their inheritance in land, a reference should have been held to inquire specially whether it was for the interest of the infants or necessary that the land should be sold, and a report thereon should have been made to the court before decree."

7. Because his Honor erred in holding "that inquiry should have been had as against the defendant Horace Waldo, who *represented the personal estate of S. C. H. Waldo, as to the sufficiency thereof, and of the estate of Frank Waldo for payment of the debts of S. C. H. Waldo before resort was had to the real estate of infant defendants. And that the administrators of S. C. H. Waldo and of Frank Waldo were necessary parties to the suit which sought a decree against their heirs for payment of the debts."

8. Because his Honor erred in holding "that the rule of the Court of Equity in enforcing a contract of sale against a purchaser requires that the objections to the title raise a rational doubt as to its validity, and this the respondent has done."

9. That his Honor erred in not ruling that the purchaser, by his action in going on the land and exercising acts of ownership, waived his right to make objections to irregularities in the proceedings or defects which may be cured by subsequent orders in this cause.

This was what is known as a judicial sale by the court as vendor. From the nature of our institutions such sales are necessary and common with us, and it is the policy to sustain them when it can be done without violating principles or injuring any one. We were gratified when it was announced at the bar that in making this question the respondent was animated only by a desire to test the validity of the sale under which he holds and to get good titles. It has been said that at such sales the rule of caveat emptor applies, and it does seem to have been held in this State, "that by the falling of the auctioneer's hammer, and by the entry of the sale by the master in his book, the contract of sale is complete," yet the court confirms these sales, and in doing so exercises large powers. In most cases a referenee will be allowed to inquire into the validity of the title. By his bid the purchaser in some sense connects himself with the proceedings, and the rule is that if he refuse to take a conveyance and complete the purchase he may be ordered to do so. "But he cannot be compelled to take title if the same is incurably bad or of doubtful validity. If there is a defect in the title, and it is a curable one, and the purchaser is offered a confirmatory deed, which remedies the defect, he cannot refuse to complete the purchase." Ror. Jud. Sales § 155; 5 Wait Pr. 234.

*In this case it is not alleged that there were any defects in the title of the mortgagor, but exclusively in the legal proceedings under which the land was sold. The parties to that proceeding, whose title it was the object to transfer, do not suggest any doubt as to the validity of the title. Neither plaintiff nor defendants—creditors, personal representatives or heirs of the mortgagor—make any objections; these are raised only by the purchaser.

It is well settled that a purchaser at a judicial sale is bound to make inquiry as to the jurisdiction of the court which ordered the sale, and whether all proper parties were before it, but beyond that he is in no way responsible for irregularities in the proceeding. This is certainly true when his title is assailed by others, and he acts defensively, and we suppose that the rule, at least to the same extent, applies when he acts offensively and makes the objection himself. Our view upon this subject is well expressed in the case of Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C. 323: "If we stretch the obligation of purchasers at public sales beyond the mere duty of ascertaining whether the court had jurisdiction in the matter in which it claimed to act, and whether all the parties to be bound are before it, in the language of Lord Redesdale, in Benet v. Hamil, 2 Sch. & Lef. 577, 'we shall introduce doubts on sales under the authority of the court which would be highly mischievous.' Something is certainly due to the purchasers at these sales from the confidence which the public reposes in the judgments of the courts of the country. They must be upheld, at least so far as they operate on the title of parties to the proceeding; and if the title, though of infants, is thus alienated by the sale, the conveyance of the officer of the court operates as an estoppel to the same extent and in the same manner that the proper deed of an adult carrying his title would bar him from asserting it against his grantee," &c. McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strobh. Eq. 80; Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 491.

As to the alleged want of jurisdiction in the court of Charleston county to foreclose a mortgage on lands situate in Georgetown county, there is no doubt that the Court of Common Pleas has general jurisdiction in the matter of foreclosing mortgages. That was part of the jurisdiction of the old Court of Chancery, to which the Court of Common Pleas succeeded when the jurisdic*tions were united by the constitution of 1868. It is not enough, however, for the court to have a general jurisdiction of the subject-matter; it must also have jurisdiction of the particular cause, and to have that, certain things are required. Although an action to foreclose a mortgage on real estate partakes somewhat of the nature of a proceeding in rem, the practice is settled that persons holding certain relations to the property must be made parties, and there have always been some rules of procedure as to the local court in which the proceeding should be had. In the time of our old Court of Chancery the place of trial was determined, not by the locality of the land, but by the county in which the defendants, or a majority of them, resided. In Smith v. Petigru, 2 Strobh. Eq. 324, a bill to partition real estate in Abbeville county was actually transferred to Charleston because the defendant resided there. According to the law, as it stood then, the complaint in this case was properly filed in Charleston, where all the defendants who were in the State resided.

But in 1870 the Code of Procedure was adopted, which prescribed a new rule as to the county in which trials should be had. The provisions on the subject are as follows:

"Sec. 146. Actions for the following causes must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action, or some part thereof, is situated, subject to the power of the court to change the place of trial in cases provided by statute. * * * 3. For the foreclosure of a mortgage of real property."

Section 147 provides that certain actions must be tried in the county "where the cause, or some part thereof, arose, subject to the like power of the court to change the place of trial in cases provided by statute."

Section 148 provides that in all other cases the action shall be tried in the county in which the defendant resides, &c., "subject however, to the power of the court to change the place of trial in the cases provided by statute."

"Sec. 149. If the county designated for that purpose in the complaint be not the proper county, the action may, notwithstanding, be tried therein, unless the defendant, before the time for answering expire, demand, in writing, that the trial be had in the proper county, and the place of trial be *thereupon changed by consent of parties or by the order of the court as is provided in this section. The court may change the place of trial in the following cases: 1. When the county designated for that purpose in the complaint is not the proper county. 2. When there is reason to believe that an impartial trial cannot be had," &c.

It would seem that these regulations were prescribed exclusively for the benefit of parties to the suit, and that persons outside of the record have no rights in the matter, as cases of all kinds are allowed to be tried in any county by "consent of parties or by the order of the court." In the case before us, no demand in writing was made that the trial should be had in Georgetown county. Indeed, all the defendants who were in the State, resided in Charleston, and, doubtless, it was more convenient for both clients and lawyers that the case should be there heard.

In opposition to this view, the respondent insists that the provisions of Section 149, allowing the case to be tried in a county not indicated as the proper one, if no objection be made, do not apply to cases arising under Section 146 relating to the locality of lands, the requirements of which are jurisdictional and not subject to waiver. This court has decided, more than once, that the provisions of Section 149 applied to cases arising under Section 148 in relation to the residence of defendants, and that it was merely a regulation of practice. Lebeschultz v. Magrath, 9 S. C. 276; Parker & Co. v. Grimes & Co., Ibid. 284. We are not aware that the precise point here made has ever been decided in this State, but we do not see why the provisions of that section should not apply as well to cases under Section 146 as to the location of lands, as to cases under Section 148 as to the residence of defendants. In both sections, the power is given to change the place of trial "in the cases provided by statute." And one of the cases provided by statute is "when the county designated for that purpose is not the proper county."

The provisions of our code are identical with those of the State of New York, and in that State the exact question was decided in the case of Marsh v. Lowry, 26 Barb. 197. That was an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage on lands in Westchester county, and the place of trial was in the city of

*New York. After judgment and sale of the mortgaged premises, the purchaser raised the objection that the action was not tried in the county where the premises were situated. It was held that "a demand to change the place of trial, and an order of court thereon, are essential to change the place of trial, even in local causes of action, when the complaint does not state the proper county. * * * The last section places the application to change the place of trial because the cause of action is local, on the same footing, in one respect, as when the motion is founded on the convenience of witnesses. In both cases there must be a demand or motion to change it, and in both there must be a consent to the change or an order of court. The proceedings are regular in the county first selected unless the consent to change be given or an order of court be made to that effect," &c. 16 How. Pr. 42.

But it is said that when the order of sale was made, the first nine lines of Section 149 (indicated above in italics) had been repealed by the act of 1879, 17 Stat. 14, and, therefore, at that time, the requirement of Section 146 that the action "must be tried in the county," &c., was absolute and not subject to waiver. The complaint was filed October 13th, 1879, and the answers of the parties originally made defendants were all filed before the repeal aforesaid, December 18th, 1879. The right to change the place of trial existing at the time the answers were filed having been waived by the parties, the jurisdiction of the court in Charleston county then attached, and, having attached, it was not, as to the parties originally made defendants, divested by the subsequent repeal, which operated only prospectively from its passage; and, as to the parties who were originally made defendants, the court had rightful authority to proceed to a final determination of the cause. After the jurisdiction of the court vests, it cannot be divested by subsequent events. Morgan's Heirs v. Morgan, 2 Wheat. 290 [4 L. Ed. 242]; Mullen v. Torrance, 9 Wheat. 539 [6 L. Ed. 154; Clarke v. Mathewson] 12 Pet. 164 [9 L. Ed. 1041]; United States v. Dawson, 15 How. 484 [14 L. Ed. 775].

As to the alleged want of parties. The purchaser at a foreclosure sale of mortgaged premises cannot be required to complete his purchase if one who was a necessary party was not *legally before the court when the order of sale was made. There were two decrees of foreclosure and orders of sale. Where the inquiry is whether the necessary parties were before the court, it is proper to consider the last as the decree in the case, January 1st, 1881. Were all necessary parties before the court on that day? The question is made by one who has no connection with the case except through his purchase of the land sold. If the proceedings are sufficient to carry good titles to the land he should not be heard to make objections which reach beyond that.

First. It is claimed that, this being an action to foreclose a mortgage, the personal representative of the mortgagor was a necessary party, and, conceding that Horace Waldo may have been the executor of Sarah C. H. Waldo in the State of New York, he was not her legal representative in South Carolina, and no such representative was before the court. Originally, the mortgagee had the right to take the land itself, and pay himself out of the rents and profits, or, as an alternative remedy, to foreclose by bill in chancery the debtor's equity of redemption. This latter was termed a strict foreclosure. But courts of equity delight to do complete justice, and they adopted the system of foreclosure and sale, causing the proceeds of sale to be brought into court and applied on the debt, the overplus, if any, to be paid to the mortgage debtor, but, in case of deficiency, the residue had to be collected at law. To avoid this circuity of action, another advance in practice was made, which was to allow in the foreclosure proceedings also a judgment for the remainder of the debt. Ror. Jud. Sales § 185.

This practice is useful, especially when, as in this State, the same court administers both law and equity. There is no doubt that this is generally the proper and safe practice. The plaintiff in this case made an effort to conform to it, and supposed she had done so when she made a party defendant "Horace Waldo, as executor of the last will and testament of Sarah C. H. Waldo, deceased," who, as executor, submitted himself to the judgment of the court. Under these circumstances the order of sale was made, but it now appears that there was a misapprehension in the matter—that the paper purporting to be *the will of Mrs. Waldo was not a will in South Carolina, and that Horace was not her personal representative in this State. Now, the question arises whether it was so indispensable to have before the court the personal representative of Mrs. Waldo, that the lack of such party, legally appointed, must make void the sale of the land.

Whilst the practice in the foreclosure of mortgages, above indicated, is the proper one, and especially useful for the mortgagee, as giving him complete justice, is he obliged to conform to it on pain of invalidating the whole proceeding, even as to the sale of the mortgaged premises? Would not the proceeding be maintainable, at least to carry title to the land, if, giving up the remainder of his debt, he should go for a strict foreclosure on the land alone? In such case, the personal representative of the mortgagor would not be a necessary party. We can very well see how such a proceeding might fail to afford full remedy to the mortgage creditors, and how the heirs of the mortgagor, having the right to push the debts over on the personalty, might object to it; but, if neither creditors nor heirs made objection, we do not see how the purchaser of the land could do so. "Although a mortgage is a debt primarily charged on the personal assets, a mortgagee is not bound to involve himself in an intricate account concerning the personalty of his debtor, and may, at his option, pursue, singly, his real security, leaving the terre-tenant to his remedies for reimbursement. * * * Whatever may be the form of procedure as to foreclosure, the same propriety exists of exempting the mortgagee from the necessity, against his option, of intermeddling in the administration of the personalty. One having a ready remedy should not be delayed until the equities of all interested in the matter should be adjusted." Bryce v. Bowers, 11 Rich. Eq. 49; Wightman v. Gray, 10 Rich. Eq. 518; Wright v. Eaves, Ibid. 583.

Does it alter the case that here the complaint contained a prayer for judgment as to the balance of the debt which the proceeds of sale might leave unpaid? We do not consider this a suit for the enforcement of the debt of the ancestor against land in the possession of the heirs, but for the foreclosure of a *mortgage. In this view, the prayer for judgment against the heirs, for any balance of the debt, was inappropriate. Such prayer could only be made properly against the personal representative of the debtor-mortgager. That prayer was made, but as soon as it appeared that Horace Waldo was not, in this State, the representative of Mrs. Waldo, it became ineffectual and mere surplusage. But the fact that such prayer was in the complaint did not vitiate other prayers which were good, or affect the relief granted to the extent which was authorized by the pleadings and the state of the parties. The heirs of the mortgagor were all parties, and the proceeding stood substantially as if its original scope had been only for a sale of the land by a strict foreclosure.

Mrs. Waldo had no personal property in the State, and administration on her estate would be purely formal. It is familiar doctrine that the administrator has no control over land, or right to control the proceeds thereof. Bank v. Inglesby, Speers Eq. 399. We are of opinion that the respondent cannot refuse to complete his purchase of the land, on the ground that the administrator of Sarah C. H. Waldo, appointed in South Carolina, was not a party to the proceedings under which the land was sold.

In the view we take of the case, the personal representative of Frank Waldo was not a proper party to the proceedings. He was not liable for the mortgage debt, and, in this proceeding, no judgment could be rendered for it or any part of it against his administrator. His widow and children were proper parties only for the reason that, after his death, they were heirs of Mrs. Sarah C. H. Waldo, who were necessary parties for the purpose of carrying to the purchaser her title which had descended to them.

Second. It is denied that the judge of Probate had the right to appoint guardians ad litem for the infant heirs-at-law, Rosalie L. Waldo and Katherine L. Waldo, and, therefore, they were not properly parties in the cause. Section 138 of the code, in the title headed "Parties to Civil Actions," under which the appointment was made, is in these words: When an infant is a party he must appear by guardian, who may be appointed by *the court in which the action is prosecuted, or by a judge thereof, or a Probate judge." The corresponding section of the New York code is in the precise words of this section, except the last phrase, which is, "or a county judge."

We have not been referred to a case in which the point was made either as to the power of a Probate judge in this State, or that of a county judge in New York. Under these circumstances we can only adopt our own construction. In our State the Probate judge has jurisdiction in relation to the appointment of guardians and the management of the estates of their wards, and in all business appertaining to minors. We do not think that the provision authorizing said judge to appoint a guardian ad litem for an infant party to a case in another court is so extraordinary as to require us to disregard its express terms. The Court of Equity treats infant parties as wards of the court. These infant defendants were represented, and their rights fully considered.

Third. But it is insisted that Mrs. Gertrude Waldo and her infant son, Rhinelander, residents of the city of New York, were not legally made parties to the cause in Charleston county, and that Mrs. Waldo, when the attempt was made to bring her in as a party by publication, made default, and the order pro confesso was not entered until after the last decree of foreclosure and order of sale. Mrs. Waldo and her son were heirs of Frank Waldo, and, through him, necessary parties. Publication was not made against them until after the amendment to the complaint was filed, May 19th, 1880, which was subsequent to the repeal of the nine lines of Section 149, December 18th, 1879, before referred to. An amendment for the purpose of making new parties must, upon a question of jurisdiction, be considered as to such parties an original proceeding. Campbell v. Bowne, 5 Paige 36; 4 Wait Pr. 691; Jeffries v. Cook, (Cal.) Rep. Nov. 1881, 586.

At the time the amendment was filed to make Mrs. Waldo and her son parties, the law permitting the trial by the court in Charleston, provided no objection was made, had been repealed, and that repeal had rendered nugatory the succeeding provision that "The court may change the place of trial in the following *cases: 1. When the county designated for that purpose in the complaint is not the proper county." At that time, Section 146 was left of force, without qualification or exception, requiring, in positive terms, that "The action must be tried in the county in which the subject of the action or some part thereof is situated."

It seems to us that the court in Charleston never acquired jurisdiction over the persons of Gertrude Waldo and her infant son, Rhinelander. This was not a mere irregularity, but a substantial defect, which rendered the decree of foreclosure and order of sale void, so far as these parties were concerned, and we are, therefor, constrained to hold that, to this extent, the title tendered the purchaser was defective and cannot be cured.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Aldrich, J., Marion, November, 1880.

This was an action by George A. McIntyre and others, children of Archibald McIntyre, deceased, (the testator,) against *Robert C. McIntyre, and others, children of testator. All the children of testator's children were parties defendant. Archibald McIntyre executed his will April 28th, 1850, and died within a month afterwards. The widow of testator died in February, 1880. Soon afterwards, the plaintiffs brought this their action for a partition of the lands of testator, but doubts having been entertained as to the right of testator's children to an absolute estate in this property, the grandchildren were made parties, and a construction of testator's will asked for. The entire will is given in the opinion of this court, and other facts are stated therein.

November 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. Archibald McIntyre, having duly made and executed his last will and testament, departed this life in May, 1850, leaving his widow and nine children named in his will surviving, another child having been born soon after his death. All of these children now have issue living, one of them haing had issue born since the commencement of these proceedings. The testator left a very considerable real and personal estate, which he disposed of as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath, after the payment of my just debts, to my well-beloved wife, Sophia McIntyre, for the term of her natural life, all my property, real and personal, to wit: [Here follows a description of the property.] To have and to hold all the said property, real and personal, and the increase thereof, for the term of her *natural life; and from and immeditely after her decease to my children now living, Matilda, Richard, Robert, Duncan, George, Rebecca, Archibald, Joseph, Sarah, and one in process of being, but not yet born, should the same live after its birth, likewise for the term of their natural lives, and to be divided among them share and share alike, the children of deceased parents representing such deceased parents and taking his or their share only; and, finally, upon the decease of my said children now living, and that now in process of being, to the issue of them and their heirs forever. Item. And I do hereby appoint my well-beloved wife, the said Sophia McIntyre, the executrix of this my last will and testament. I do hereby authorize, direct and empower my said executrix to keep my estate, real and personal, together, and to manage and improve the same during her natural life, that it may pass at her death into the hands of my said children, the life-tenants after her, and descend to their heirs in an improved and accumulated condition. And, finally, all the rest and residue of my estate and effects, real and personal, whatsoever and wheresoever, not herein disposed of, after payment of my debts and legacies, and funeral expenses and other charges, I do give, devise and bequeath, in manner and form, upon the same limitations and to the same parties aforesaid."

The widow took possession of all the property as executrix and tenant for life, and remained in possession until her death in February, 1880. After the death of the testator, but before the death of the widow, two of the sons named in the will, Richard and Archibald, died, each leaving one child: Richard leaving a son named Richard H., and Archibald leaving a son also named Archibald.

There is no controversy as to the disposition of the personal property, satisfactory provisions for its distribution having been made, and the only question is as to the real estate—or rather the proceeds thereof—it having been sold under an order granted in these proceedings, which directs that the proceeds be held subject to the order of the court.

The Circuit judge held that under a proper construction of the will of the testator each of his children took an estate for life in the realty, with remainder to their children in fee, and directed *that when the master shall collect the bonds given to secure the purchase-money of the real estate, he shall invest the same in bonds bearing interest payable annually, which interest shall be paid to the life-tenants, and that the corpus be paid to the tenants-in-fee, or their guardians, as the life-estates determine. From this judgment the plaintiffs and certain of the defendants appeal upon two grounds: First. Because of error in the construction of the will, the appellants claiming that, by a proper construction of the will, the children of the testator take a fee-conditional and not a life-estate in their shares of the realty. Second. Because Richard H. and Archibald McIntyre, the two children of the deceased sons, take an absolute estate in fee-simple by the express terms of the will, and, therefore, the judgment of the Circuit Court must, in any view of the question, be so modified as to give them at once their shares of the corpus absolutely.

There is no doubt that the rule in construing a will is that the intention of the testator must govern, unless such intention is in conflict with some rule of law. In this case, we suppose there is as little doubt that the testator only intended to give his children a life-estate, for he says so in express terms in the direct gift to them, and, in a subsequent part of his will, speaks of his children as life-tenants.

But this is not conclusive, for if this manifest intention comes into conflict with a well-settled rule of law, it cannot be carried into effect, but the intention must give way to the rule of law. The appellants contend that this intention of the testator comes into conflict with a rule of law which has been so long and so firmly settled as to entitle it to be called a rule of property, which is familiarly known as the rule in Shelley's Case. Without entering into a consideration of the origin of this rule or the reasons upon which it was originally founded, it is sufficient for us to say that by that rule it is well settled that where there is a devise to A. for life, and, at his death, to his issue, the limitation to the issue serves only to enlarge the estate of A. to a fee-conditional, and does not create a remainder to the issue as purchasers, notwithstanding the manifest intent to the contrary. Whitworth v. Stuckey, 1 Rich. Eq. 404, and the cases therein cited. So, that if, in this case, the devise were to the children *of the testator "for the term of their natural lives," and, at their decease, "to the issue of them," with nothing more, then, clearly, an estate in fee-conditional would have been created, and the issue could not take as purchasers. But such are not the terms of the devise under consideration.

The terms are to the children for life, and, at their decease, "to the issue of them and their heirs forever." So that the precise question in this case is, whether the words italicized in the preceding sentence are sufficient to take the case out of the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case. It is not to be denied that there is no little conflict in the English cases upon this question; but we think the authorities in this State conclusively show that where the word "issue" is so qualified by additional words as to evince an intention that it is not to be taken as descriptive of an indefinite line of descent, but is used to indicate a new stock of inheritance, the rule does not apply.

In Myers v. Anderson, 1 Strobh. Eq. 346 [47 Am. Dec. 537], the testator gave certain slaves to his son for life, and at his death to be equally divided between his two daughters "during their natural lives," and after their death "to be the absolute property of the issue of their bodies forever." The court held that the daughters took only life-estates with remainder to their issue as purchasers. In this case the court uses the following language: "All the authorities agree that if the limitation be to the heirs of the body or issue, and to their heirs, this constitutes them purchasers, as it shows an intention to give them an estate not inheritable from the first taker, but an original estate, inheritable from themselves as a new stock of descent." It is true that this was a bequest of personal property, but as will be seen from the remarks of Dunkin, chancellor, in delivering the opinion of the Court of Errors in McLure v. Young, 3 Rich. Eq. 576, this principle was regarded as equally applicable to a devise of real estate.

In that case the devise was to the daughter of the testator for life, "and at her death I give, bequeath and devise the same absolutely and forever to her lineal descendants; and in case she should die without lineal descendants (one or more) living at the time of her death, then it is my will that the whole of said real estate revert to my estate and be disposed of as hereinafter *directed." The daughter having died leaving a son, it was held that the daughter took a life-estate with remainder to her son as purchaser. In this case the doctrine laid down in Myers v. Anderson, supra, was distinctly recognized and declared applicable to real as well as personal estate, and the distinction between this case and that of Whitworth v. Stuckey, supra, was pointed out. In that case there were no additional words qualifying the term "issue," and hence it was there regarded as a word of limitation, and the case fell within the rule in Shelley's Case; but in McLure v. Young, as in Myers v. Anderson, there were such additional words and hence those cases did not fall within that rule.

It will be observed that the additional words in both Myers v. Anderson and McLure v. Young, which were held to take those cases out of the operation of the rule in Shelley's Case, were not so strong as in the case now under consideration. In the former the words were: "To be the absolute property" of the issue, and in the latter "absolutely and forever," which the court held were equivalent to a devise to the issue and their heirs; and these are the words used in this case.

In Lemacks v. Glover, 1 Rich. Eq. 141, there was a bequest of personal property to the use of the testator's sister Jane, "and after her death I give and bequeath the same to the heirs of her body, to them, their heirs and assigns forever," and the court held that the words "heirs of the body," which are stronger words of limitation than the word "issue," were words of purchase—one of the grounds of the decision being that the additional words "to them, their heirs and assigns forever," evinced an intention that such heirs should take in their own right as a new stock of inheritance and not successively and by descent from the first taker. In support of this decision Dunkin, chancellor, delivering the opinion of the court, in addition to two English cases there cited, relied upon the case of Dott v. Wilson, 1 Bay 453 [1 Am. Dec. 624], where the bequest was to Sarah Dott "during her life, (without the control of her husband,) and at her death to the heirs of her body and their heirs and assigns forever; but if she should leave no issue, then to be disposed of as she should think proper." In that case the court said:

"That she [the *testatrix] did not mean or intend a perpetuity is obvious from her adding immediately after the words heirs of her body, 'and their heirs and assigns forever.' That although the first words, 'heirs of her body,' unqualified and alone, would have made an estate-tail, yet the words superadded or engrafted on them make a joint tenancy, which is tantamount to share and share alike, and evidently shows she intended an equal distribution of the property among her grandchildren after her daughter's death." Chancellor Dunkin further remarks upon this case that "the decision of the court was made on the qualifying terms stated, although they thought that if any doubt existed on that clause it was removed by the language used in the proviso." In Lemacks v. Glover, Harper, chancellor, dissented upon another point, and commenced his dissenting opinion in these words: "It seems hardly to be questioned that the words 'to the heirs of her body, to them and their heirs and assigns forever,' are to be regarded as words of purchase. In addition to the cases referred to by the chancellor, the cases of Doe v. Laming, 2 Burr. 1100, and Luddington v. Kime, 1 Ld. Raym. 203, are authority that after a devise to 'heirs of the body' or 'issue,' the superadded words 'and to his or their heirs' have the effect of converting the former into words of purchase. * * * But in the present case it is plain that the words must be regarded as words of purchase only, and not words of limitation. The words of limitation are added—'their heirs and assigns forever'—denoting that the former words signify merely the persons who are to take in the first instance, and do not include any succession. The persons who are to take, are to take in fee or absolutely."

It will be observed that this distinguished chancellor, whose language has just been quoted, delivered the opinion of the court in Whitworth v. Stuckey, at the next succeeding term of the court, where he held that a devise to one for life, and at his death to his issue, there being no superadded words qualifying the term "issue," enlarged the estate given for life to the first taker to a fee-conditional, and that he soon afterwards concurred in the case of Myers v. Anderson, where the superadded words regarded as equivalent to the words "and to their heirs."

had *the effect of converting the word "issue" from a word of limitation into a word of purchase. This shows that he recognized fully the distinction which we have drawn in this case.

It seems to us clear that the case now under consideration comes fully up to the test laid down by Sir William Blackstone in the famous case of Perrin v. Blake, as to whether the rule in Shelly's Case is to be controlled by the manifest intent of the testator. For this purpose, according to his opinion, two things must appear upon the face of the will: 1. "That the testator meant to confine the first taker to an estate for his life." 2. "That he meant to effectuate that intent by some clear and intelligent expression of a design to have the heirs of his son take by purchase and not by descent."

Now it is perfectly manifest that the first requirement of this test is met by the terms of the will now under consideration, for the testator has, in express terms, declared his intention that his children should take estates for their lives only. It is conceded, however, that this, by itself, would not be sufficient, and we must, therefore, be also satisfied that the second requirement is met —that is, that the testator has expressed clearly his design that those who are to take after the children are to take by purchase and not by descent. The language which he used is, "to the issue of them and their heirs forever." Now what does this language mean? It cannot mean that the issue of the children are to take by descent, because, if that construction is placed upon it, then the result would be that the issue, if they could take at all, would take an estate in fee-conditional, while the language declares that the issue are to take in fee-simple, for it is clear that no more appropriate language could be used to create an estate in fee-simple in the issue than the language employed—to them and their heirs forever. Hence, to apply the rule in Shelley's Case to the devise under consideration would defeat both of the intentions of the testator, declared in express terms: 1. That the children should take estates for their lives only. 2. That their issue should take estates in fee-simple.

Applying the language used by Johnston, chancellor, in his Circuit decree in Myers v. Anderson, which is quoted with approbation in the opinion of the Court of Errors in Mc-

Lure v. *Young, to this case, we may say, if obliged by the rules of law to extend the interests of the children of the testator, which are expressly declared to be for life only, to estates in fee-conditional, or practically in fee-simple—all of them having had issue born—and to declare that the interest which is given to their issue expressly in fee-simple is no interest at all—that the absolute property is not in the issue to whom it is given, but in their parents, to whom it is not given, but, on the contrary, from whom it is expressly withheld; if we are required by the rule, in Shelley's Case, to do this, we should feel that we were sacrificing the intention of the testator, as to which there can be no mistake. But no such unpleasant alternative is presented to us, for, as we have shown, without infringing the rule in that celebrated case, and only recognizing an exception to it, which is well settled by the authorities in this St , we are at liberty to construe this will in accordance with what every one who reads it must believe to have been the intention of the testator.

As to the second ground of appeal, it is not clear that the Circuit judgment is open to the objection therein taken. That judgment determines that the children of the testator take an estate for their lives only, with remainder to their children in fee, and directs that the interest be paid to the life-tenants annually, and then concludes in these words: "The corpus to be paid to the tenants-in-fee, or their guardians, as the life-estates determine," and it is argued that as the life-estates preceding the remainders secured to the defendants, Richard H. and Archibald McIntyre, had already fallen in, the words "to be paid * * * as the life-estates determine" might leave it doubtful whether these parties could receive what they are now entitled to in fee. While the language used might afford room for some doubt, we think the intention is that those who are adjudged to be entitled in fee are entitled to receive their shares whenever it is ascertained that the precedent life-estates have fallen in, whether that occurs before or after the rendition of the judgment in the Circuit Court.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, as herein construed, be affirmed.

Messrs. A. J. Norris and H. W. Addison, for petitioners.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

November 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*300

*McIVER, A. J. This is a petition for rehearing, (filed May 10th, 1881,) in which the petitioners ask that the judgment of this court, rendered at a former term, be opened and the cases be reheard upon certain points mentioned in the petition.

The former judgment of this court was filed on October 3d, 1879, and the remittitur in the usual form was issued by the clerk of this court on October 16th, 1879, and on December 17th, 1879, the full copy of the opinion of this court was filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court, in which, however, there were some clerical errors in stating the names of the parties in the title of the case and in the spelling of the word "remittitur," the letter "n" being substituted for the letter "m." At a previous term of this court the petitioners herein filed a petition for rehearing, to wit, on December 13th, 1879, which was dismissed upon the ground that, the remittitur having been sent down, this court had lost its jurisdiction of the case. It is now alleged that this court was then misled as to the fact of the remittitur having been sent down. It is true that at the time the first petition for rehearing was filed the full copy of the opinion of this court had not been sent down to or filed with the clerk of the Circuit Court, but the remittitur in the usual form had been sent and this court had thereby lost its jurisdiction, as has been repeatedly decided. Pringle v. Sizer, 3 S. C. 335; Whaley v. Bank, 5 S. C. 262; Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 13 S. C. 33; Ex parte Dial, 14 S. C. 584.

The mere filing of the petition for rehearing in this court could not have the effect of staying the remittitur, even if it had not been previously sent, without an order to that effect. Rule XX. of this court provides for a stay of the remittitur for ten days after the final determination in this court, for the very purpose of enabling parties to apply to either one of the justices at chambers for a further stay in case they may desire to file a petition for rehearing; but if no such application is made and no order granted for a further stay, then it is the duty of the clerk of this court, at the expiration of the ten days, to transmit the remittitur to the court below, whereupon this court parts with its jurisdiction in the case and can no longer grant any order therein. The fact that the remittitur may not have been filed in the Circuit *Court does not affect the question of the jurisdiction of this court. When this court, through its proper officer, the clerk, acts by issuing the remittitur, it parts with its jurisdiction, and the failure of the clerk of the Circuit Court to file it there, or the failure of the parties to obtain an order from the Circuit Court making the judgment of this court the judgment of that court, cannot affect the question of the jurisdiction of this court.

But even if the paper first sent down to the Circuit Court should not be regarded as a proper remittitur, yet as it appears that the full copy of the opinion of this court was filed in the office of the clerk of the Circuit Court on December 17th, 1879, before there was any order of this court or of any of the justices thereof staying the remittitur, it is clear that this court then, if it had not before, lost its jurisdiction of the case.

The objection based upon the clerical errors in the title of the case and in the spelling of the word "remittitur," cannot be sustained, for it is quite manifest that these purely clerical errors were not such as would be calculated to mislead the parties.

It is very manifest, therefore, that this court had lost its jurisdiction of the case, not only when the present petition was filed, but also when the previous one was presented.

It is always a matter of regret that parties should lose the opportunity of showing what they honestly believe to be errors of the court, and if we believed that we had the power to do so we would gladly extend to the petitioners the privilege of pointing out what they believe to be errors in the former decision of this court. But remedies in a court of justice must be administered according to the laws granting them, and we have no power to dispense with the rules of law. Every party to a cause is entitled to his right of appeal from a judgment which he may think erroneous, but unless he takes his appeal within the time and in the manner prescribed by law, he loses this right, even though the judgment against him may be manifestly erroneous. So here, every party considering himself aggrieved by what he regards an erroneous decision of this court may apply for a rehearing upon certain well-established grounds; but if he fails to make this application within the proper time and in the proper manner, he loses the right to have his application heard.

*We have, however, looked into the grounds relied upon in this petition and are satisfied that even if the application for a rehearing had been made within the proper time and in the proper manner, it could not be granted. In Hunt v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 541, it was held that a rehearing could be granted on only two grounds: First. For error of law apparent on the face of the decree. Second. Because of newly-discovered testimony, which must be such as the party seeking a rehearing was not only not aware of before the trial, but such as he could not, by proper diligence and inquiry, have discovered in time for use at the former trial. In Simpson v. Watts, 6 Rich. Eq. 364 [62 Am. Dec. 392] it was held that it was not enough that the new matter came to the knowledge of the party after the fit time for the use of it, but he must show that he could not have acquired knowledge of it in time for effective use by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Again, it is said in Hunt v. Smith, supra: "The ground set down in this petition for a rehearing is nothing more than alleged error of judgment on the part of the court in deciding a question of fact. This is a very good ground of appeal, if well founded, when an appeal is taken from a lower to a higher tribunal, but I am not aware of any precedent for such cause being considered a ground for rehearing after a cause had been finally adjudicated." In support of this doctrine the case of Johnson v. Lewis, 1 Rich. Eq. 390, was cited by the learned chancellor delivering the opinion of the court, in which it was held that a petition for rehearing should not be granted for a supposed error in the conclusion drawn by the court from doubtful or equivocal evidence. This will be found to be a very strong case, for in it the rule above stated was applied when the cause was decided by two chancellors, in opposition to the opinion of one of the members of the court and of the absent chancellor who heard the case on circuit—the Court of Appeals at that time consisting of four chancellors.

We may say, however, in order to avoid misapprehension, that we do not see how this court could, in any case, grant a rehearing upon the ground of after-discovered evidence. With the exception of certain specified powers, which have no relation to cases of this kind, this court has no original jurisdiction, but *has "appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery" and is a court "for the correction of errors at law." Hence, when a case is brought here by appeal from the Cicuit Court we are confined to the consideration of alleged errors committed by that court, and, of course, therefore, we are restricted to the consideration of the case as made in the Circuit Court. If, therefore, after a trial in the Circuit Court a party wishes to avail himself of the benefit of after-discovered evidence, his application should be made, in the first instance, to that court, as we have no jurisdiction to consider the question until after it has been passed upon by the Circuit Court and brought here by appeal from the determination of that court.

Now, upon looking into the petition in this case it will be seen that the various grounds relied upon are based either upon alleged errors committed by the court in the conclusions drawn from the testimony or upon after-discovered testimony, which it is not even alleged that the parties could not, by the use of due diligence, have obtained in time for use at the former trial, and under the authorities above cited, these grounds would not be sufficient to warrant this court or the court below in granting a rehearing.

The judgment of this court is that the petition for rehearing be dismissed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, May, 1880.

This was an action instituted in February, 1880, by James K. Mendenhall and his sister, Pauline Eliza Scott, against George S. Mower, trustee, Nancy Mayes, as administratrix of William G. Mayes, deceased, and all the children and heirs of deceased children of the plaintiffs.

The case called for the construction of the following instrument:

"The State of South Carolina.—I, John Belton O'Neall, having, on yesterday, purchased at the commissioner's sale, the *lands and mills, in Newberry district, known as Mendenhall's the said tract of land containing 1,050 acres, subject to the inheritance of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall, on 400 acres on which are the mills and houses, at and for the sum of $2,600, and the following slaves, viz.: Frank, at $600; Jordan, at $500; John, at $610; Allen, at $510; Peter, at $360; Bob, at $250; Jupiter, and wife, Ritta, and their children, Tilda, Alsey, Frank, Eliza and Minerva, at $2,405; Calvin, at $580; Jacob, at $600; Tilda, at $400; Abbey, at $350, and Siller, at $150, making a total for the said slaves of $7,540. And, whereas, the said land and slaves so purchased were once the property of Dr. M. T. Mendenhall, and at his request, I have consented to hold the same upon the following trusts: 1. For the payment of $1,900, the balance of the purchase-money of the land and mill, ($700 having been to-day paid,) and of $7,540, the aggregate price of the said slaves. If these sums be paid by Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall, Pauline Eliza Mendenhall, or James K. Mendenhall, the wife and children of Dr. Mendenhall, or by the said Dr. Mendenhall as their agent, at the several times at which my bond to the commissioner, and notes in the bank, shall be severally due; then, in the second place, I am to hold the said land, mills and slaves for the use of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall for life, and after her death for the use of Pauline Eliza Mendenhall and James K. Mendenhall, and their respective issue, or the survivor of them (the said Pauline and James), if either of them should die without issue; if both should die without issue, then for the use of the said Dr. M. T. Mendenhall, or such person as he may direct and appoint; but if failure should be made in such payments, then I am to sell the said property or so much of it as may be necessary to make the payments. If at any time it be thought advisable by myself and Dr. Mendenhall to sell part of the said property, real or personal, it will be perfectly consistent with the trust intended that such sale should be made. The said land and property are placed in the hands of Dr. Mendenhall as my agent until the purchase-money be paid as hereinbefore stated, and after that as agent for his family.

"Witness my hand and seal this 5th January, 1847.

"John Belton O'Neall. [L. S.]

"Signed and sealed in our presence,

"G. W. Garmany,

"D. M. Cole."

In January, 1863, Judge O'Neall conveyed all of this land, (except the 400 acres and 157 acres, afterwards sold,) in two tracts, *to the two plaintiffs in this action, to each one tract, to him and her for life, with remainder to their children, respectively. Subsequently, the 400 acres and 157 acres were sold, as stated in the opinion of the court, which also states other material facts.

*306

The Circuit decree was as follows:

On hearing the pleadings and evidence herein, and argument of counsel thereon, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the plaintiffs are only entitled to the net income of the trust-estate in question in this action jointly and equally for and during their natural lives, and then, upon the death of either, leaving no issue at the time of his or her death, the survivor shall take the whole income for and during his natural life; and if either shall die, leaving issue at the time of his or her death, the survivor shall take one moiety of said income and the issue of the deceased the other moiety for and during the said remainder of the said survivor's life; and that upon the death of such survivor, the respective issue of the plaintiffs living at the time of the death of each, shall be absolutely entitled to said trust-estate per stirpes free and discharged from all trusts. It is further ordered that George S. Mower be and is hereby appointed trustee, in whom the said trust estate shall vest, to be administered by him for the purposes and upon the terms and limitations hereinbefore set forth, upon his entering into a bond to the clerk of this court, &c.

From this decree plaintiffs appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because the Circuit judge held that the appellants, James K. Mendenhall and Eliza P. Scott, have only a life-estate in the property in question; whereas, it is submitted, he should have held that they have an absolute fee-simple estate in it.

2. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the appellants have only a life-interest in the said property; whereas, it is submitted, he should have decided that they had at least a fee-conditional in the lands, and should have that estate in any lands in which the funds may be invested, and an equivalent estate now in the funds.

*3. Because, whatever estate the appellants may have in the property, there is no necessity for a trustee to hold and administer the property perpetually.

4. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the said estate should be kept together until the death of both appellants before division; whereas, it is submitted, he should have held the property divisible at the death of either of them, allowing that they have only life-estates.

Messrs. Y. J. Pope and J. F. J. Caldwell, for appellants.

Mr. T. S. Moorman, contra.

November 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. In 1847, the property, real and personal, of Dr. Mendenhall, then of Newbury county, was sold at public sale, we suppose at the instance of his creditors. The Hon. John Belton O'Neall became the purchaser, paying part of the purchase-money in cash, and securing the remainder by his notes.

The object of Judge O'Neall in making the purchase was to befriend the family of his friend, Dr. Mendenhall, and, to this end, immediately after the sale, he executed an acknowledgment of trust embracing the entire property purchased, to wit, a large tract of land and a number of slaves. In this acknowledgment he stated that he held the property in trust: First. for the payment of the purchase-money by Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall, Pauline Eliza Mendenhall and James K. Mendenhall, the wife and children of Dr. Mendenhall, or by Dr. Mendenhall, their agent. Second. For the use of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall for life, and after her death, for the use of Pauline Eliza Mendenhall and James K. Mendenhall and their respective issue, or the survivor of them, the said Pauline and James, if either of them should die without issue; if both should die without issue, then for the use of the said Dr. M. T. Mendenhall, or such person as he might appoint.

Some time after this, and after the death of Judge O'Neall in 1863, but at what time is not stated, proceedings were instituted *by a judgment creditor of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall, the life-tenant, to make a portion of the real estate embraced in the acknowledgment of Judge O'Neall, to wit, four hundred acres, claimed to be the inheritance of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall, liable to his judgment.

As the result of this proceeding, an order was passed by the court directing this land and also an additional quantity, to wit, one hundred and fifty-seven acres, part of said trust-estate, to be sold, the proceeds to be applied first to the payment of the judgment debt of Mrs. Mendenhall, and out of the remainder, after payment of expenses, &c., $1,000 was directed to be paid over to Mrs. Mendenhall, the balance to be held by a trustee, thereafter to be appointed, on the same trusts declared and set forth in the second clause of the deed made by the Hon. John Belton O'Neall, dated January 5th, 1847; and on June 1st, 1871, William G. Mayes, in the same proceeding, was appointed trustee, to wit: "For the use of Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall for life, and after her death for the use of Pauline Eliza Scott and James K. Mendenhall and their respective issue, or the survivor of them, if either of them should die without issue."

Mrs. Phœbe Mendenhall died in 1874, her husband, Dr. Mendenhall, having died long before. The appointment of W. G. Mayes, as trustee, was revoked in 1878, and George S. Mower, one of the defendants, was appointed in his stead by the Probate Court for Newberry county. The amount of the trust fund has not been ascertained, but it is supposed that the corpus will not fall short of $5,500.

The plaintiffs, appellants, claim the property as an absolute estate, and that it should be turned over to them without the intervention of a trustee. The defendants, respondents, who are the children—one of the plaintiff, Pauline Eliza, and the others of James K. Mendenhall—claim that plaintiffs are entitled to a life-estate only, and that they, the children, are entitled in remainder to the property upon the death of the plaintiffs, and that a trustee is necessary.

Upon the hearing below, Judge Wallace sustained the view of the defendants in so far, at least, that the plaintiffs, appellants, were adjudged to be entitled to a life-estate only. As to the *remainder, he held that such issue as might be alive at the death of appellants would take per stirpes. From this decree, the plaintiffs appealed. The grounds of appeal, though several in number raise but two questions:

1. What estate or interest did the parties, appellants and respondents, take respectively under the settlement made by order of the court of the fund in question?

2. How far is a trustee necessary?

It seems to have been assumed in the argument that the property in question, though, as matter of fact, in its present shape it is money, and, therefore, personalty, yet, having been converted into money by the sale of realty, should be regarded as realty, and that the questions involved should be discussed as if in fact it was realty.

Formerly there was a wide distinction between these two species of property, especially as to the limitations in instruments, deeds and wills by which they were transferred and conveyed. This distinction, however, growing less and less marked, as personal property in the course of years rose in value as compared to realty, has at length almost passed away, until now the rules governing the construction of limitations as to the two are generally the same. Hill v. Hill, Dudley Eq. 83. It will not be necessary, therefore, to determine positively whether the property in contest is to be regarded as personal or real property. And especially is this unnecessary in this case, when we find that we are remitted in the order of the court settling this property to the acknowledgment of trust executed by Judge O'Neall, in 1847, as to the terms upon which the settlement was made.

The question, then, before the court, must turn upon the construction of this acknowledgment of trust. In taking up this instrument for consideration, emanating as it did from the mind of Judge O'Neall, under the promptings of that noble generosity which was one of the great characteristics of his nature, and which so often moved him in private life to the rescue of falling friends, remembering how long and how steadily that mind shed its luster upon the pages of our judicial history and how ably it assisted in building up and establishing the very principles upon *which questions like this now before the court should be decided, as appears in many cases which arose during the period of his distinguished judicial career in this State, awed as if I were in his very presence, I feel great reluctance in confessing the hesitancy and doubt by which we have been embarrassed in endeavoring to reach the true intent of this paper. Nevertheless, from whatever cause it may spring, we are compelled to admit that the questions involved have been unusually difficult and perplexing. We have, however, reached a conclusion sustained, we think, by the authority of decided cases, and one which we hope will not defeat the benevolent purpose of the author of this paper.

The plaintiffs contend for a construction that will vest this property absolutely in them, dispensing with the necessity of a trustee. The defendants claim that they should be adjudged, as issue, to take as purchasers at the death of plaintiffs, by way of remainder, after the life-estate of their parents, and that the trustee should continue to hold to carry out this trust.

The terms of the deed are: "After the death of Phœbe Mendenhall, for the use of Pauline Eliza and James K. Mendenhall and their respective issue, or the survivor of them, the said Pauline and James, if either of them should die without issue. If both should die without issue, then for the use of Dr. Mendenhall, or such person as he may direct or appoint."

Now it has been well established as to personal property, where an estate is given to one and his issue, with a limitation over, to take effect at the death of the first taker, that the first taker has a life-estate only, and his issue living at his death will take in remainder as purchasers. It has also been well established that where a fee in real property has been devised to one with limitation over at his death without issue at that time, the limitation will be good as an executory devise. Thus it will be seen that the turning point in both deeds and wills is the fact whether the time fixed for the limitation to take effect is the death of the first taker. If so, in a deed, the limitation over is good as a remainder, unless it should clearly appear that a fee had been given in the first instance to the first taker. In such case the limitation could not take effect in a deed as a remainder, because, the whole estate having been granted, there would be *nothing left to be embraced in a remainder. But in a will or devise a fee may be limited after a fee; the essential requirement being that the period fixed for the limitation should not be beyond a life or lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter. If fixed within that time the original fee will be defeated by the happening of the contingency specified, and the second fee will spring into existence at that moment by executory devise.

The paper under consideration is a deed, and if the terms used had been to Pauline Eliza and James, and their "heirs," they would have conveyed a fee beyond all doubt, and in that case no remainder could have been limited, because, the whole having been conveyed, there would have been nothing remaining to be made the subject of a remainder. But the term used in this case is the word "issue." This, as to real property, is not the apt word of inheritance, and does not in itself convey a fee in a deed.

Hence, when this word is used in a deed, the question is open as to the intent of the grantor, and whether a limitation over can take effect when this word is used will always depend upon the fact whether, from the whole instrument taken together, the court can see that the time fixed for the limitation is at or beyond the death of the first taker; the rule being as to remainders that they must take effect during the continuance of the particular estate, or eo instante that it determines, otherwise they will fail.

The word "issue" is susceptible of three meanings: 1. It may describe a class of persons who are to take as joint-tenants with the parties named. 2. It may be descriptive of a class who are to take at a definite and fixed time as purchasers; and, 3, It may denote an indefinite succession of lineal descendants who are to take by inheritance. Whenever this word is used, either in a deed or will, it must be used in one of these senses. The difficulty in most cases is to determine in which of these senses it has been employed.

We cannot suppose that it was used in the case at bar in the first sense. It does not appear that Pauline Eliza or James had issue in 1847 when the deed of Judge O'Neall was executed, and he could hardly have intended that their issue, as they might come into existence thereafter, should become joint-tenants with *them, especially as Pauline and James and Mrs. Mendenhall were to pay the purchase-money of the property. Was it used in the second or the third sense?

Generally, this term, when used in a will, means an indefinite succession, and, when not controlled by subsequent words in the same instrument, this interpretation will be given to it, (see remarks of Chancellor Harper in Henry v. Archer, Bailey Eq. 536;) but it may be controlled by the use of subsequent words in such way as to demand an interpretation in accordance with the second sense as descriptive of a class who are to take as purchasers at a definite and fixed time. The next step in the inquiry is, what terms are subsequently used in this deed, and will they have the effect under the decisions of qualifying the previous use of the word "issue" so as to fix the death of the first taker at the time when the issue are to take?

We find first, in this deed, the phrase "dying without issue." This is a very common phrase in such instruments. What effect does it have? It has been often decided—so often that it has become a canon of construction—that this phrase, when standing alone, not only fails to fix a definite time for the limitation over, but it denotes, on the contrary, an indefinite succession. Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 381, and the cases there cited and discussed. Such being the fact, if there were no other words of qualification in this deed, we might stop our investigation at this point; but we find also the term survivor employed, the deed providing that if either Pauline Eliza or James should die without issue, then the estate to go to the survivor.

Does this word control the generality of the previous phrase, "dying without issue?" This subject has been much discussed, both in the English courts and our own, and although it is sometimes difficult to reconcile the different decisions, yet, upon a close analysis, it will be found, we think, that they have established the principle that when the term "survivor" is used, following the general phrase "dying without issue," and unaccompanied with other words indicating a transferable interest to the heirs of the survivor, that that term will always have the effect of controlling the generality of this phrase and of changing it from an indefinite failure, which it would mean when standing *alone, to a failure at a definite time, to wit, the death of the first taker, thus cutting down his estate to a life-estate, and giving a remainder to such of his issue as may then be living, or, in case he leaves no issue alive, then the remainder to go to the survivor.

One of our first cases on this subject is the case of Guery v. Vernon, 1 N. & McC. 69, decided in 1818. In that case there was a bequest by a father to his daughter of two slaves, but in case she died without issue, then to return to his son, Isaac. The whole court, Judge Cheves delivering the opinion, held the limitation too remote and, therefore, void. That case differs from the case before the court in the facts that there was no direct gift to the issue of the daughter, and the limitation over was to a person named, his son, Isaac, instead of to a survivor. No doubt the court concluded that Isaac was entitled to a transmissible interest, and, therefore, his being named did not indicate that he should be in existence at the death of the first taker to become invested with the remainder.

The next case we find is Henry v. Felder, 2 McC. Eq. 335, decided in 1827. The bequest there was of a girl to Elizabeth Conlietle, to her and the heirs of her body forever, but on failure of issue to go to the oldest child of his daughter, Nancy. The Court of Appeals, in an elaborate opinion, held the limitation void for remoteness. That case turned on the construction of the words failure of issue.

In Manigault v. Deas, Bailey Eq. 292, decided in 1829, a bequest was made of slaves to two of testator's daughters, and if either should die without leaving issue, then to the survivors. It was held that the daughters took an absolute estate. It will be observed that there was no direct gift to the issue, and the court could raise none by implication.

In Postell v. Postell, Bailey Eq. 390, decided 1831, a testator bequeathed his personal estate to his two sons, to them and their legal issue, and should either die without lawful issue, the said property to revert to the surviving brother and his lawful issue. Held, That the limitation was too remote and void, and that an absolute estate vested in the first taker. The word "survivor" employed in the case failed to limit the generality of the phrase dying without issue, because it was followed by the words "and *his lawful issue," showing that a transmissible interest was intended in case the brother did not survive.

In Murray & Buchanan v. Walker, 1 Strobh. Eq. 193, decided in 1846, there was a deed to grandchildren then alive, and also to those who might afterwards be born, with a limitation over to the survivors of the share of either that might die not leaving lawful issue. The court held that the issue of an unborn grandchild could not take under the deed, the limitation being too remote. And there are numerous other cases where the limitation, as to its remoteness, tested by other words employed, was held too remote even where the term "survivor" was also used.

On the other hand. In the case of De Treville v. Richard & Ellis, Bailey Eq. 37 [21 Am. Dec. 518], decided in 1827, in a devise of both real and personal property, the indefinite failure of the heirs of the body was controlled by the term survivors, and the devise over was held good both as to the realty and the personalty. So, too, in the case of Stevens v. Patterson, Bailey Eq. 42, decided in 1829, where a bequest was of personalty to a daughter, to her and the heirs of her body; but should she die without lawful issue, then to go back and be equally divided amongst the survivors of testator's children, the limitation was held good as an executory devise, the word "survivor" being held to indicate the death of the first taker as the event when the limitation should take effect.

In Cordes v. Adrian, 1 Hills Eq. 154, the words "surviving children" had the effect of controlling the generality of the phrase "dying without issue," and of fixing the death of the first taker as the time when the limitation was to take effect. See, also, cases Hill v. Hill, Dudley Eq. 71; Terry v. Brunson, 1 Rich. Eq. 79; Yates v. Mitchell & Porter, Id. 265; Lowry v. O'Bryan, 4 Rich. Eq. 263 [57 Am. Dec. 727]; McCorkle v. Black, 7 Rich. Eq. 407. In this last case there was a devise of land to several, to be equally divided between them, and after their death to their lawful issue, followed by a provision that if any of the devisees should die leaving no lawful issue, then their portion to be equally divided between the survivors. Held, that the first takers took a life-estate and the issue a remainder, as purchasers; the term "sur*vivors" having the effect of controlling the phrase "dying without issue."

Without referring to other cases, we say that the general principle to be extracted from all the cases is that where, in the first instance, there is no direct gift to the issue, nor any mention of issue, then the word "survivor" will not restrict the generality of the previous phrase: but where there is a direct gift to the issue in the first instance, and a limitation over to a survivor or survivors of persons in esse on the death of the first taker, without lawful issue, the limitation will not be held too remote, unless it should appear from the will that the survivor was intended to take a transmissible interest without reference to the time of vesting in possession, and in the absence of words to show such intention the presumption is that the survivor was to take personally and not a transmissible interest. Stevens v. Patterson, Bailey Eq. 42; Knight v. Ellis, 2 Bro. 570; Lampley v. Blower, 3 Atk. 396, commented on in Carr v. Porter, 1 McC. Eq. 60. Now, in this case, there is both a direct gift to the issue and a limitation over to the survivor. There is nothing showing that a transmissible interest was intended; on the contrary, the terms of the deed are: "To the survivor of the said Pauline and James," showing that it was the intention of the grantor that the survivor of Pauline and James, whichever it might be, should take personally.

Under the operation of this principle, we are of the opinion that the time fixed by the declarant for the issue to take, if alive, was at the death of the first taker, and the effect of this intent was to cut down the estates of Pauline and James to a life-estate, with remainder to their respective issue, such as might, at their death, be in existence, as purchasers.

Such being the interest of the parties, we are further of the opinion that a trustee is necessary, so that the estate may be preserved for the remaindermen.

This case thus far, and for the reasons already stated, has been considered as if the property in question was real property and embraced in the deed of Judge O'Neall, executed in 1847. But the fact is, it is personal-ty and and settled by the order of court *referred to above. When considered with reference to this order we think the result will be the same.

Although the precise date of the order is not given, yet there is no doubt that it was after the act of 1853, in reference to limitations. This act provides that the phrase "dying without issue," both in deeds and wills, where either personal or real property is disposed of, shall not be construed to mean an indefinite failure of issue, but a failure at the time of the death of the first taker.

If this act is applied to the case, it gives a legislative construction to the words under consideration, and fixes indisputably the event for the limitation over to be the death of the first taker, thus cutting down their estate to an estate for life, with remainder to such of their respective issue as may at that time be living.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

(Case No. 1123.)

MANGUM v. PIESTER.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Perpetuities ⇐4; Wills ⇐733, 747.]

Testator (who died in 1833) devised his real estate to his widow for life, with remainder to his son W., and, "if W. should die without issue, all the interest he has in my estate to go to H., and if both W. and H. should die without issue, then" over. Held, that the event fixed for the limitation to H. to take effect was not the death of W. without living issue during the life-time of the widow.

[2. Wills ⇐545.]

But an indefinite failure of issue to W. is the well-ascertained meaning of the words used by testator, and hence the limitation to H. is void for remoteness.

[5. Estates ⇐10.]

The widow of testator conveyed all of her interest in these lands to her son W., who conveyed to P., and P. held adversely under his deed. W. died, and, afterwards, his mother. Held, that by the conveyance to W. the life-estate was merged in W.'s greater estate and was thus extinguished, and if the limitation to H. was good as an executory devise, the statute of limitations would commence to run against him under P.'s adverse claim, from the death of W., and would not be postponed until the death of the life-tenant.

Before Wallace, J., Newberry, May, 1880.

This was an action commenced June 21st, 1874, by the children of Hillary R. Mangum against the executors and devisees of David B. Piester, and against Thomas M. Neel, Henry Koon and John R. Leavell—the last-named as a creditor of David B. Piester—for the recovery of a tract of land. The plaintiffs claimed under the will of C. Griffin, which was as follows:

In the name of God, amen. I, Christopher Griffin, being of sound and disposing mind and memory, but weak in body, and calling to mind the uncertainty of life, and being desirous to dispose of all my worldly estate God has blessed me with, do make and ordain this my last will in the manner following, that is to say: I desire that shortly after my decease all my personal estate shall be sold at public auction on a credit of one and two years, and out of the moneys arising therefrom all my just debts and funeral expenses be paid. After my debts and funeral expenses are paid, I will and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Phœbe Griffin, all my plantation now in cultivation, also, one-third part of the proceeds of my personal estate, after the debts and funeral expenses are paid, during her natural life-time, to be disposed of after her death as will be hereafter mentioned—my wife, Phœbe Griffin, being bound to board, clothe and educate my son, Wm. B. Griffin, or in failure or not performing the above requirements to my son, my wife, Phœbe, is to be charged with two-thirds of the rent of the plantation.

I will and bequeath unto my son, Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin), the sum of five hundred dollars when he arrives at the age of twenty-one years. If he should die not having any issue, the above legacy to become part of my estate.

*I will and bequeath unto my beloved son, William B. Griffin, the balance of my personal estate, and at the death of my wife, Phœbe, all my real estate, with the above-mentioned one-third of my personal estate bequeathed to the above-mentioned Phœbe during her life-time.

If the before-mentioned William B. Griffin should die without issue, all the interest he has in my estate is to go to my son, Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin); and in case the above-mentioned William B. Griffin and Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin) should die without issue, then all my estate, real and personal, to be equally divided between my four sisters, namely, Elizabeth Pitts, Sarah Griffin, Martha Barksdale and Lucinda Griffin; and, further, I constitute and appoint my friend, Bluford F. Griffin, executor of this my last will and testament, revoking all former wills.

In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and affixed my seal this twenty-second day of January, 1832.

Christopher Griffin. [L. S.]

This will was properly attested.

All the issues of law and fact were referred to J. F. J. Caldwell, Esq., who, in an able report, held that Mangum's heirs were not estopped from asserting their claim; that no one but Mrs. Griffin and W. B. Griffin, could object to the provisions of the will in favor of the bastard, Mangum; that the limitation over to Mangum was upon the death of W. B. Griffin without issue in the life-time of his mother, which was not too remote, and which had occurred; that D. B. Piester did not hold adversely for ten years, nor had his alienee, Neel, nor his devisees, and while the possession of ancestor and heir might be tacked together to make up the full statutory bar, that of devisor and devisee could not, the devisee being a purchaser, and not holding by descent.

Exceptions were taken by defendants to this report, and the case was heard by the Circuit judge upon these exceptions. He sustained the referee in his conclusions as to the estoppel, and the excessive provision for Mangum; but sustained the exceptions to his other findings, holding that the limitation over to Mangum was too remote, and that the Statute of Limitations commenced to run in favor of Piester and his assignee, Neel, at *the death of W. B. Griffin, and continued to run in favor of the devisees, who were also the heirs-at-law of Piester.

From this decree, appeal was taken to this court, by the plaintiffs, who urged their appeal upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the limitation over to Hillary R. Mangum, created by the will of Christopher Griffin, was too remote.

2. That his Honor erred in holding that the right of Hillary R. Mangum to bring this suit accrued to him upon the death of William B. Griffin, whereas it is contended that such right did not accrue to him until the death of Phœbe Wallace, and that, therefore, the Statute of Limitations did not run against Hillary R. Mangum until then.

3. That his Honor erred in holding that the Statute of Limitations did not cease to run at the death of David B. Piester, (to wit, August 20th, 1873,) but that it continued to run until the death of Hillary R. Mangum.

4. Because his Honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs are barred by the Statute of Limitations from bringing their action, whereas it is contended that the statute does not bar the plaintiff's action against any of the defendants.

5. Because the decree is contrary to the law and evidence in this case.

Mr. J. Y. Culbreath, for appellant.

In cases of great doubt the expression of the legislative desire might incline the balance. 11 Rich. 489. The act of 1853 construes the meaning of the phrase "dying without issue." But in this case, there was a precedent life-estate, and, therefore, testator was providing for the contingency of W. B. Griffin's death without issue, before his mother died, or, if with issue, the death of such issue before the termination of the life-estate. This view is sustained by the cases in 7 Rich. Eq. 105; 6 Id. 26, 83; Spears Eq. 312, 402; 10 S. C. 56; 1 Hill Ch. 265; and by 2 Jarm. Wills *693. Any words which indicate an intention in the testator to confine a failure of issue to a dying without issue living at the death of the first taker, will be sufficient to rebut *the construction of an indefinite failure of issue. 14 N. H. 215; 6 Harris 72; 3 Md. Ch. 257. As to the Statute of Limitations, plaintiffs were minors when their father died, and still are. Mangum took under Griffin's will an executory devise. 2 Bl. Com. 172. His interest could not be affected by deed of Phœbe Griffin to W. B. Griffin, nor by deed to Piester; for this latter deed was not recorded until February, 1867, and the former, never. Mangum could not bring action until Phœbe's death, for until then he was not entitled to the possession, and Piester had her life-estate. His rights were not affected by these conveyances. 2 Minor Inst. 375. The conveyance to Neel by a disseisor carried no right. Rice 10. Piester's devisees obtained no right from Piester, who had not matured title. A devise is only an alienation by purchase. 2 Bl. Com. 287. These devisees have held by purchase and not by descent cast.

Mr. J. W. Ferguson, on same side.

Argument of Mr. J. M. Baxter, deceased, and Messrs. Geo. S. Mower and T. S. Moorman, contra.

November 21st, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. Christopher Griffin, late of Newberry county, died in 1832 or 1833, leaving a last will and testament, in which, among other things, he devised his real estate to his widow for life, and at her death to his son, William B. Griffin, with the further provision that if his son, William B. Griffin, should die without issue, "that all the interest he has in my estate is to go to my son, Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin); and in case the above-mentioned William B. Griffin and Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin) should die without issue, then all my estate, real and personal, to be equally divided between my four sisters, Emily Elizabeth Pitts, Sarah Griffin, Martha Barksdale and Lucinda Griffin."

Mrs. Phœbe Griffin, who afterwards intermarried with Bennett Wallace, conveyed her life-estate in the land in January, 1854, to W. B. Griffin, who, on the same day, for valuable con*sideration, conveyed said land to D. B. Piester, who then conveyed ninety-two acres thereof to Jacob R. Schumpert, who, on December 6th, 1871, conveyed to defendant, T. M. Neel. D. B. Piester continued in possession of the remaining 522 acres from the date of the deed of W. B. Griffin to him, in January, 1854, until his death, having, during his life, mortgaged 521 acres to defendant, Henry Koon, to wit, on January 9th, 1872.

Piester died in 1873, leaving a will, in which he directed his executors to sell any portion of his estate, real or personal, sufficient to pay debts; and after the payment of his debts he gave the whole estate to his wife and children. Under this will his family have remained in possession. W. B. Griffin died in November, 1861, his mother, the life-tenant, surviving him until January 24th, 1864, when she died. Hillary R. Mangum died in February, 1874.

This action was commenced June 21st, 1874, by the children of Hillary R. Mangum, claiming the land in question on the ground that William B. Griffin, having died without issue living at his death, their father became entitled to said land, and their father having since died, the land descended to them as his heirs-at-law. The claim of the plaintiffs was resisted below on several grounds:

First. It being admitted that Hillary R. Mangum was a natural son of Christopher Griffin, the testator, the defendants relied upon the act of 1795 prohibiting a father, having a lawful wife or child, giving by deed or will more than one-fourth of the clear value of his estate to a concubine or to his illegitimate child. Second. They relied on the doctrine of estoppel, insisting that Hillary R. Mangum, having stood by and silently permitted Piester, after his purchase, to put up valuable improvements on his land, he and those claiming under him were thereby estopped from now setting up claim to the land. Third. They set up the remoteness of the limitation to Mangum, and claim, on that account, that it was void; and, Fourth, They interposed the Statute of Limitations. Judge Wallace, who heard the case below, overruled the two first grounds of defense, but sustained the two last.

The plaintiffs have appealed, their exceptions involving the *two questions decided for the defense below, to wit: Was the judge in error in holding that the limitation to Hillary R. Mangum was void for remoteness, and also in allowing the Statute of Limitations to be successfully interposed?

The first point made in the argument in behalf of the appellants is: That the event fixed for the limitation to Mangum was the death of W. B. Griffin during the life of the life-tenant, Mrs. Phœbe Griffin. And W. B. Griffin, having died during the life of the life-tenant, it is contended that this limitation took effect at his death, and the cases of Evans v. Godbold, 6 Rich. Eq. 26; Schoppert

v. Gillam, Id. 83; Anderson v. Smoot, Speers Eq. 312; Vidal v. Verdier, Id. 402, and Blum v. Evans, 10 S. C. 56, are relied on to sustain this proposition.

We do not think that these cases are applicable to the case at bar. In the case of Vidal v. Verdier, supra, which is the strongest case in this direction, it is true that the court did construe the will as intending to fix the death of the first taker in remainder before the death of the life-tenant as the event for the limitation over to take effect, but that case, as will be found upon examination, turned upon the construction of the words "in case of the death," which were embraced in the phraseology used. These words do not appear, in the case now before the court, in connection with the limitation to Mangum.

Besides, Vidal v. Verdier was fully discussed afterwards by Chancellor Harper in the case of Yates v. Mitchell, decided in 1845, and found in 1 Rich. Eq. 265, where that able chancellor defines and limits the principle laid down there within its proper boundary, and which excludes its application here. He says that Vidal v. Verdier was decided on the principle "that when a testator, giving in remainder after a life estate, uses one set of expressions denoting that the remainderman is to take an absolute estate, and another set of expressions limiting him to an estate for life, with remainder to his issue, and a limitation over in the event of his not having issue, this apparent repugnancy may be reconciled by restricting the dying without issue to the life-time of the tenant for life, thus permitting every part of the will to have its proper effect. If he dies during the life-time of the tenant for life, leaving issue, the issue will take as purchasers *under the will; if without issue, the limitation over will have effect; but if he survives the tenant for life, the estate is absolute in him." But he said, further, that this had nothing to do with the case he was then discussing, because, in that case, there was not a double set of expressions, indicating different estates conveyed, as in Vidal v. Verdier.

So we say here, as to the case now before the court, and for the same reason. Had W. B. Griffin left issue, beyond doubt they would have taken by inheritance, and not by purchase, showing that a fee was conveyed by way of remainder to him, which vested in right at the death of his father, to be enjoyed in possession at the death of his mother. There is not a word in the will which indicates that the testator intended his son, W. B. Griffin, should take an estate for life with remainder to his issue in any event.

In the case of Blum v. Evans, 10 S. C. 56, the will was executed after the act of 1853 on the subject of words of limitation, and the last constitutes a wide distinction between that case and this, and no doubt had much to do in controlling the judgment of the court.

We do not think that this point, though earnestly and ably presented by the junior counsel of appellant, can be sustained either upon principle or upon the authorities cited. We will proceed then to the consideration of the case as dependent upon the other questions raised.

First. Is the limitation over to Hillary R. Mangum void for remoteness? The limitation to Mangum is dependent upon the event that William B. Griffin should "die without issue." Do these words import an indefinite failure of issue, or can they be restricted to a certain time competent, within the rules of law, upon which a limitation over can take effect by way of executory devise? Did the testator use these words indicating that if, at any time in the future, the issue of William B. Griffin should become extinct, then the estate should go over to Mangum? or did he mean only that if, at the death of Griffin, there should be no issue, then the limitation should take effect? These questions must turn upon the construction of the phrase "dying without issue," as interposed by their own inherent meaning, or *as controlled, if they may be, by their connection with other expressions in the will.

These words, and words of similar import, have been a prolific source in the past of numerous and bitter legal contests, reaching far back into our judicial history. They have given rise to some of the most profound and abstruse discussions in our books, and they have formed the basis of numerous learned opinions of the law and chancery courts, both of England and America. Our own reports are full of such opinions, and they are found in the reports of all the States. It would seem, then, that all difficulty surrounding this subject ought to have been dissipated long since, and the way through these words made so clear that no one at this day should err therein: but such is not the fact. Notwithstanding all the lights afforded by the decisions of the past, and the profound special discussions of this subject by eminent and most able text writers on real property and estates therein, legal minds still fail frequently to agree as to the true intent and meaning of instruments in which these words are found, and especially in their application to a case in hand, and, as a consequence, almost every paper in which such terms have been employed, even at the present day, sooner or later appears in a court of last resort for adjudication. We are not much surprised, therefore, to see this case before us.

Without referring at this time to the different text-books and numerous decisions which we have examined, and through which we have reached our conclusions, we feel authorized to say, in the beginning, that there are two classes of cases in which these words constitute the pivotal point, and upon the construction of which they depend. The first class embraces all those cases in which the question arises whether the term "issue," as used in the instrument, was employed to denote an indefinite line of succession of descendants to take the estate by inheritance, or to denote a class of persons to take as purchasers at a fixed time. In other words, whether the term "issue" is a word of limitation, indicating that the first taker has the whole interest conveyed, descendible to his lineal descendants ad infinitum, or whether it is a word of purchase indicating that the first taker is only entitled to a life-estate with remainder to such persons as may *answer the description of the term "issue" at the death of the first taker.

The second class embraces all those cases in which it is admitted that the fee in the first instance is conveyed to the first taker, but an effort is made to transfer this fee upon the happening of a specified contingency from him to another by way of executory devise. In other words, those cases where the attempt is made to mount a fee upon a fee, which can be done only by executory devise. The difference between the two classes is that the first involves the law of contingent remainders and the second that of executory devises. The case now before the court belongs to the second class; the case of Mendenhall v. Mower, ante p. 303, belongs to the first class. These two cases will fully illustrate the different character of the two classes, and the principles of law applicable to each.

The precise question then, in this case, when brought down to its last analysis, is: Does the will of Christopher Griffin contain a legal executory devise, by which a fee in the land in dispute was devised to Hillary R. Mangum, after a fee already devised to W. B. Griffin—the fee to Hillary R. Mangum to take effect in him upon the defeat of the fee in Griffin upon the contingency specified? Or, to state it in another and shorter form, Can the will of Christopher Griffin be regarded as an executory devise in favor of Hillary R. Mangum?

An executory devise is a limitation by will of a future contingent interest in lands contrary to the rules of limitation of contingent estates in conveyances at law. If the limitation by will does not depart from those rules prescribed for contingent remainders, it is in that case a contingent remainder and not an executory devise. 4 Kent 265. For instance, among the rules governing contingent remainders is one which forbids an estate to be limited over to another after a fee already granted. In such case there can be no such thing as defeating the fee already granted and transferring it to another by way of remainder, because a remainder implies something left, which cannot be the case after the whole has once been disposed of. Yet, while this cannot be done by way of contingent remainder, it may be done by an executory devise, which, according to the definition above, *allows a departure from the rules of law governing contingent remainders. And this being an effort to create a fee after a fee, is a case of departure denied by contingent remainders but allowed by executory devises.

So, too, under the common law conveyances, a freehold interest in real property could not be limited to commence in futuro, because such interests were established under the feudal system, and under that system livery of seizin was necessary to the creation of a freehold, and as livery could not be given in futuro, a future freehold could not be created at common law. Neither at common law could a fee be mounted on a fee. In conveyances at law, it is true, a provision may be made for the defeasance of a fee, but not then for its transfer to another at some future period and upon some specified contingency.

These, and some others, being difficulties which our legal ancestors found surrounding conveyances at common law, which, in their opinion, demanded remedy, the executory devise was intended for that purpose. Hence it allows a freehold to be created in futuro without a particular precedent estate to support it, and by it a fee may be created after a fee. But at the same time the common law abhored a perpetuity, and to prevent perpetuities in executory devises, to which they would have inevitably led if left unguarded, it was established as a part of the machinery of executory devises that the contingency upon which the limitation intended was to take effect should not be postponed longer than a life or lives in being and twenty-one years and a fraction of another year thereafter. So that in all these cases, involving the validity of an executory devise, the main point to be considered is, has the contingency upon which the limitation is to take effect been fixed within the period of a life or lives in being and twenty-one years and a fraction after? If so, the executory devise is good and the limitation valid. If not, it is bad, and the limitation void for remoteness.

Now, was the event upon which Christopher Griffin intended the limitation in favor of Hillary R. Mangum should take effect, fixed by him to happen within the prescribed period? The exact language of the will is: "If the before-mentioned William B. Griffin should die without issue, all the interest he has in my *estate is to go to my son Hillary R. Mangum (or Griffin); and in case the above-mentioned William B. Griffin and Hillary R. Mangum should die without issue, then all my estate to be equally divided between my four sisters," naming them.

From this language it will be seen that the event upon which the limitation to Hillary R. Mangum was to take effect was the non-existence of William B. Griffin's issue after his death. This non-existence of William B. Griffin's issue might be found to be the fact at an indefinite period after his death when the last of his lineal descendants died, or it might be the case at the moment of his death.

If Christopher Griffin intended that the limitation should take effect at either of these periods—whenever it was found that William B. Griffin had no issue living—after his death, this would include an indefinite failure as well as a failure at a definite time, to wit, the death of W. B. The first, having a tendency to perpetuity, would be too remote, and therefore void, and the second being embraced in the first could not save the limitation. If he, however, intended to restrict this period to the time of the death of W. B. Griffin alone, and then the limitation to take effect if there was no issue, this would be within the life or lives in being, and therefore valid.

Which of these did he intend? This must be determined by the language used, interpreted according to the rules of law. It is well established that the phrase "dying without issue" or "die without issue," when standing alone, before the act of 1853, denoted an indefinite failure, and a limitation over, upon such terms unqualified, has ever been held void for remoteness. There can be no case found contrary to this. See Anderson v. Jackson, 16 Johns. 382, and the numerous cases there discussed. See, also, 2 Fearne 443; Graham v. Moore, 13 S. C. 119, and the cases there cited. But it has also been held, on the other hand, that these terms may be qualified by subsequent words, and when thus qualified, so as to be restricted to the death of the first taker, the limitation over will be preserved.

The last and precise point, then, in the case is: Are there any qualifying words in this will which restrict the limitation to Mangum to the death of William B. Griffin?

The words most *usually relied on as sufficient to restrict the generality of the phrase dying without issue, are such as these: "Leaving no issue," "issue living," "survivors," and words of like import. It is admitted that there are no such words in this will.

But it is contended that while this is true, yet, inasmuch as the limitation here is to one in existence, and to him by name, that the testator could not have intended an indefinite failure. On the contrary, he must have intended some period when the party named would probably be in existence, to wit, the death of Griffin, the first taker, without issue then living.

There is a class of cases in our reports in which it is held that, where the limitation over can be construed as a personal benefit alone to a party named, then the effect of such construction will operate as a restriction upon the generality of the phrase. And the term "survivor," when unaccompanied with words indicating a transmissible interest, should the survivor not be in being at the happening of the contingency, will generally have this effect. See case of Mendenhall v. Mower, ante, and the cases there referred to. But where the limitation also embraces a transmissible interest, even the term "survivor" will be impotent to this effect.

Now, have we any reason here to conclude that the limitation to Hillary R. Mangum was intended simply as a personal benefit to him alone, and, in case he had died before Griffin, that all claim as to him would have ended? Is there anything to show that the testator did not intend to convey to him a transmissible interest, to attach at the falling in of the estate of the first taker, either to Mangum or his heirs, as the facts at that time might require? We see nothing in the case which can demand this construction, except that the limitation is to Mangum by name.

There are numerous cases in the books where the limitation over has been held too remote, although one in esse is named as the party to take. In fact we have found no case where the naming of one as the party provided for has in itself restricted the generality of the previous words. Lyon & Norwood v. Walker, 8 Rich. 307. There is no reason, therefore, why the well-established meaning of the phrase dying without issue should *be changed in this case from an indefinite failure of issue after the death to a failure at the death of the first taker.

Mr. Ferguson, in his very clear argument, made a point on the use of the adverb "then," which deserves notice. This word, as an adverb, means "at that time," referring to a time specified, either past or future. It has no power in itself to fix a time. It simply refers to a time already fixed. The question here is: What time do the words "dying without issue" unqualifiedly fix? Do they fix an indefinite period when there shall be no issue, or do they fix a definite period, to wit, the death of W. B. Griffin? They must have been used with reference to the one or the other, and, having been thus used, the adverb then following them would refer to the one or the other, as their proper construction might indicate as the time intended. To assume that the use of the word would, in itself, fix a certain time, and then refer to it, would be giving it a double significance, of which it is not susceptible.

Our conclusion is, that the testator having used in his will those words which, according to well-established principles found in many decisions bearing expressly upon such words, could, before the act of 1853, have no other meaning but an indefinite failure of issue, and this will having been executed before the passage of that act, the limitation over to Mangum is too remote, and, therefore, void. We concur, therefore, in the decree of Judge Wallace on this branch of the case.

Next, as to the Statute of Limitations. Having determined the first question involved against the appellants, which ends all of their interests in this case, it would not be necessary, as a practical question, to consider the exceptions as to the plea of the Statute of Limitations; but this being one of the questions raised in the case, it is perhaps proper that we should decide it.

The Statute of Limitations begins to run at the moment a right of action accrues, and not before. To determine, then, whether the statute is a bar in this case, we must first ascertain when the right of action accrued, if any, to Mangum, and, second, whether the statutory period has elapsed since.

It will be remembered that Mrs. Phœbe Griffin had a life-estate. The life-estate, however, she conveyed to her son, W. *B. Griffin, in 1854, who had at that time a vested fee in remainder in the same land. Thus, W. B. Griffin became possessed in his life-time of both estates. He died in 1861, some three years before his mother, who died in 1864. Now, the question raised is: Did a right of action accrue to Mangum at the death of W. B. Griffin, in 1861, or was he to await the death of Mrs. Phœbe Griffin, the original life-tenant, before he could claim? If the former, then it is admitted that he is barred, more than ten years having elapsed. If the latter, then there may be some doubt.

Under the terms of the will, Hillary R. Mangum's interest could not attach until the expiration of both the life-estate to Mrs. Griffin and the estate in remainder to W. B. Griffin. Now, did the purchase by W. B. Griffin of the life-estate of his mother merge this life-estate into his remainder in such way as that it became extinct, when his remainder expired upon his death? or did it continue to exist after the death of W. B. Griffin, in 1861, up to the death of Mrs. Phœbe Griffin, in 1864?

Merger, as a general rule, takes place whenever a greater estate and a less coincide and meet in one and the same person without any intermediate estate. In such case the less is immediately annihilated, or, in the law phrase, is said to be merged—that is, sunk or drowned in the greater—but they must come to one and the same person, in one and the same right, else, if a freehold be in his own right, and he has a term in right of another, there is no merger. 2 Bl. Com. *178. Here the greater and the less were united in the person of W. B. Griffin when he procured the life-estate of his mother. The two then came to one and the same person, in one and the same right, and merger took place.

It follows, then, that at the death of W. B. Griffin, there was no life-estate in the way of Mangum. And if the executory devise to him was a good devise, he could have commenced action at that time. Not having done so, and ten years having elapsed since then up to his death, without action, the statute is a bar.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

COOPER v. SMITH.

(April Term, 1881.)

[Judgment ⇐=360.]

Action was brought for the recovery of a tract of land purchased from A.; defendant admitted plaintiff's deed, but alleged a possession under a prior contract to purchase made with A. The cause was called on calendar 1, and, without objection, submitted to a jury, who found for defendant. Upon this verdict, judgment was entered for defendant, and the next day plaintiff paid the costs, and the judgment was marked satisfied. More than two years afterwards, motion was made by plaintiff to vacate this judgment. Held, that the defense was equitable, and should have been passed upon by the judge, and that not having been done, the judgment was erroneous, and should be vacated.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, March, 1881.

Motion by plaintiff to vacate judgment in case of Ransom Cooper v. William Smith. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, for appellant.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

November 25th, 1881. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. This action was brought to recover possession of a tract of land—the plaintiff claiming through a deed from Dr. O. C. Rhame. The defendant admitted the execution of plaintiff's deed, but denied his right to recover, alleging that the defendant was in possession under an agreement to purchase from Dr. Rhame, made prior to plaintiff's deed.

The case was found by Judge Kershaw on calendar No. 1, and was submitted by him, without objection from either side, to a jury as a law case. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant. Upon this verdict, the clerk, after the adjournment of the court, entered judgment for defendant and for costs.

*The judgment was entered on December 4th, 1878, and the next day the plaintiff paid it, whereupon defendant entered satisfaction.

Thus the matter stood until February 21st, 1881, when the motion below, after notice, was made before Judge Mackey, in open court, to set aside the judgment, as having been entered by the clerk without authority of law, and to have the case placed by the clerk upon the proper calendar. Judge Mackey refused the motion, and the plaintiff has appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "That the defense, being equitable in its nature, belonged to the equity side of the court, and could only be determined by the judge in the exercise of his chancery powers.

2. "That the verdict of the jury was merely to ease the conscience and enlighten the understanding of the judge, and, together with the judge's notes of evidence, should have been sent over to the chancery side of the court, where the judge himself should have considered the evidence and rendered a decree thereon.

3. "That this not having been done, the judgment entered by the clerk upon the verdict of the jury was without authority of law, and should be vacated and set aside."

There is no doubt but that the defense in this case was an equitable defense, and one which, formerly, could only have been adjudicated in a court of equity. The plaintiff's title having been admitted by the defendant, it could not have been assailed before the adoption of the code, in the law courts, by setting up an equitable defense there. Such defense could then have been made available for defendant by a distinct proceeding in equity only, to restrain the action at law, and for such relief in this court as the defendant's equity might warrant him in demanding.

The forms of action heretofore prevailing in the different courts, however, having been abolished, and the powers of the Court of Chancery and Common Pleas having been combined and vested in one court, and one form of action prescribed for all cases, whether equitable or legal, a change as to the mode of defense also became necessary.

Hence, by the code, Section 173, *it was enacted that a defendant may set forth by answer as many defenses and counter-claims as he may have, whether they be such as have been heretofore denominated legal or equitable, or both. Under this section of the code, the defense, in this case, was set up, and the case went to the jury under the issue raised by this defense, the defendant having admitted plaintiff's deed, and, therefore, his legal title.

The question that the case upon the pleadings was an equity case, involving an equitable issue only, was not raised. Nor after verdict was there any motion made, either by the plaintiff or defendant, for decree or judgment by the judge. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the clerk, in pursuance of Section 288 of the code, which makes it the duty of the clerk, in the absence of other instructions, to enter up judgment in conformity with the verdict, did enter this judgment. The next day after it was entered, the plaintiff paid the costs, whereupon it was properly marked satisfied, and thus it has slept until this motion.

The plaintiff, to sustain his appeal, relies upon Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 108; Gadsden v. Whaley, 9 Id. 147, and Sloan v. Westfield, 11 Id. 447. These cases are strong to the point that where an equitable defense—such as formerly could only be heard in a court of equity—is set up in an answer to a law case, such defense must be tried by the judge, either personally or through the aid of a jury acting under his order and for his enlightenment. And if the defendant had objected at the trial to this case being submitted to the jury as a law case, no doubt these authorities would have controlled Judge Kershaw; but, no objection being made, the case went to the jury. This, however, did not legalize the judgment subsequently entered by the clerk, as the two latter of these cases decide that where judgment is entered on a verdict in such case, without decree of the judge, such judgment is erroneous and illegal, and may afterwards be set aside on motion. Under these authorities we think it was error on the part of the Circuit judge not to vacate the judgment.

This disposes of the third ground of appeal. The first two grounds, while it is true they contain correct legal propositions, *yet they assign no error on the part of the Circuit judge, and, consequently, raise no question for the judgment of this court. They seem to be rather in the nature of an argument by appellant, intended to sustain the third ground of appeal, to wit, "that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to vacate the judgment in question." This, in our opinion, being the only question before us, we have confined our judgment to that.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court, in so far as it refused the motion of appellant to vacate the judgment, be reversed, and that the case be remanded.

PRESSLEY v. KEMP.

(April Term, 1881.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1000.]

The question at issue is an equity case, being the validity of a deed, alleged not to be genuine, or, if executed, to have been obtained by fraud and undue influence, certain issues of fact were submitted to a jury, whose findings adverse to the executor of the grantor were approved and adopted by the Circuit judge. These findings not being opposed to the weight of the testimony held, that this court must affirm them.

[2. Deeds ⇐70.]

A maiden lady aged, deaf and feeble, a short time before her death executed a deed conveying a considerable portion of her property to a young man in whose family she had resided for two years, and between whom and herself a strong attachment had arisen. The deed was prepared by an attorney under her directions, given in the presence of the donee, and was executed by her after reading it over, and with knowledge of what she was doing. Held, that no coercion of the donor's will appearing, there was nothing in the relationship between the parties to raise the presumption of undue influence, or to avoid the deed for constructive fraud.

[This case is also cited in Wille v. Wille, 57 S. C. 413, 35 S. E. 804, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Wallace, J., Greenville, July, 1880.

This was an action by Samuel H. Pressley, as executor of the will of Sarah Eliza Evans, against E. T. Kemp and Giles L. Glazener, commenced August 19th, 1879.

*335

*The testimony was taken, mostly, in open court, was to some extent conflicting, and was very voluminous, covering thirty-six pages of the brief; but the points at issue are clearly indicated by the questions submitted to the jury. The answers are the finding of the jury, and they make the case upon which the decision is based. These questions and findings were as follows:

1. What was the age of Miss Sarah Eliza Evans at the time of the execution of the paper referred to in the pleadings, and under which the defendant Kemp claims? Seventy.

2. What was her domicile at the date of the execution of said deed? Greenville.

3. At the date of the execution of the deed was she infirm in body? Was she not feeble? Yes.

4. Was she sick at the date of the execution of said deed? Only feeble.

5. If she was infirm, feeble and sick, how long had she been so before the execution of said deed? Twelve days.

6. Was she not helpless at the date of the execution of said deed? No.

7. Was she under the control of defendant Kemp and his family at the said date? No; but she was living with Kemp.

8. At the said date was her capacity so alive as to prevent her from executing an instrument of the contents of which she was not aware? She knew what she was doing.

9. At said date was she so languid and reduced as to acquiesce in whatever might be proposed by those around her having influence with her? No.

10. At said date was her mind in such a condition as to enable her to give free and deliberate assent to the terms of said deed? Yes.

11. Was said deed read over to her? If so, by whom and when? No.

12. Could she on the day of its execution hear it read? No.

13. In her condition could she have understood it by the motion of human lips? No.

14. Was she capable of reading it on the day of its date? Yes.

*15. Was Kemp present and aiding in its execution? Yes.

16. At what hour of the day was it executed, and on what day of the week and month? Wednesday.

17. Did she ever read the deed? If so, when? Yes.

18. Did she ever have it in her hands, prior to the execution or after? Yes.

19. At the time of its execution was its legal effect made known to her, or did she know its legal effect? She knew its legal effect.

20. Did she know at the time of its execution that it would disappoint the charities provided for under her will? Yes; she had changed her mind.

21. Were any misrepresentations made by defendant Kemp to Miss Evans, moving her to the execution of said deed? No.

22. Were any misrepresentations made by any one in his interest moving Miss Evans to the execution of said deed? No.

23. Were any arts or stratagems used by defendant Kemp to obtain the execution of said deed? No.

24. Was any advantage taken of her age, helplessness or situation, by the defendant Kemp or any one in his interest, moving the execution of said deed? No.

25. At date of execution of deed did not Miss Evans have first cousins residing at Society Hill, in Darlington county, and elsewhere? Yes.

26. Did not these relatives manifest interest in Miss Evans before her death and up to the time of her death? But little.

27. Did not Miss Evans repose great confidence in Kemp, and did he not act toward her in that confidence? Yes.

28. Was there a relation of friendly habits between Miss Evans and defendant Kemp? Yes.

29. Did Miss Evans use defendant Kemp as an agent in the transaction of any of her business? As her agent in one or two instances.

30. Did defendant Kemp act for Miss Evans in any way in the preparation and execution of said deed? Yes; but in good faith.

31. At the date of the execution of said deed, how many of the friends of her youth resided in Greenville? Two.

*337

*32. To how many friends of her youth did Kemp communicate her intention to make this deed to him? Not one.

33. Did Kemp fail in his duty to Miss Evans during the last three weeks of her life in any particular? No.

After the case was opened and the contested deed was, on the call of the plaintiff's counsel, delivered to them by defendant's counsel, and for the first time inspected by them, plaintiff called in question the factum of the deed; and thereupon the judge ordered additional questions to be presented to the jury.

The additional questions with their answers are as follows:

34. Did Miss Evans sign the deed offered in evidence? Yes.

35. Did Miss Evans give instructions to her attorney for the preparation of the deed? Yes.

36. Was the deed in accordance with those instructions? Yes.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

It appears that Miss Evans, the grantor, was an aged maiden lady, and entirely deaf, that she was in feeble health, and had gone from Darlington county, where she had been brought up, to Greenville, because she found the climate of the latter place better for her health. The defendant and his mother lived together, and Miss Evans, by the advice of a friend, became their lodger. She lived with them for about a year, and then the Kemps moved into and occupied a house belonging to Miss Evans in the city of Greenville. The Kemps did not, for about a year—the time they occupied Miss Evans' house, in her lifetime—pay her rent, nor did Miss Evans pay them for board and lodging.

A few days before her death, Miss Evans executed the deed in controversy. While Miss Evans lived with the Kemps, a mutual affection had grown up between them. It is sought, by this proceeding, to set aside the deed, upon the ground that it was obtained by the influence of defendant, which he was able to exert on account of the relation of confidence between himself and Miss Evans. I do not fully set out the facts in the case and discuss them, because I am satisfied with the findings of the jury upon the issues submitted to them, and approve and *adopt their verdict. Do these findings bring the case within the principle which would operate to destroy the deed?

In Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. Sr. 125, Lord Hardwicke divided fraud into four heads: 1. Fraud arising from facts and circumstances of imposition. 2. Fraud arising from the intrinsic value and subject-matter itself. 3. Fraud presumed from the circumstances and condition of the parties contracting. 4. Fraud affecting third persons not parties to the agreement. It is sought to bring this case within the third division. This principle relates to transactions between trustees and cestuis que trust, attorney and client, parent and child, or other relation, connection or position, in which an undue advantage, influence or control may be obtained or exercised over the judgment of another. It does not declare absolutely void any and every transaction between parties standing in such relation to each other; but when one person stands in a relation of special confidence to another, he cannot accept a benefit from the other without exposing himself to the risk in a degree proportioned to the nature of their connection, of having it set aside as unduly obtained. A court of equity, perhaps, applies more exacting rules of proof of good faith of a transaction between parties who sustain a fiduciary relation, strictly so called, to each other, than to others outside of that class. For, between the former, it must appear that the transaction is to the advantage of the presumed weaker party, to be sustained.

There is another class of relations, not strictly fiduciary, from which the law presumes authority and control—that of attorney and client, and parent and child, for example. A transaction between persons in this class is sustained upon proof rebutting the presumption that it was obtained by influence. Descending from these conspicuous classes, there are great varieties of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another, but in proportion as such relationship is less marked and distinct, the presumption of fraud is less strong. Where the actual relation from which the law presumes dominion is dissolved, notwithstanding kindly feelings which the connection may have caused may remain, no presumption of fraud arises from that fact. Confidence in, or affection for, the grantee *affords no ground for assailing a voluntary deed, unless it further appears that the confidence was betrayed or the affection made use of to impose constraint upon the wishes or inclination of the grantor.

It has always been held that love and affection were a sufficient consideration to support a deed, and the statement of that consideration in a deed is not sufficient to throw upon the grantee the burden of showing that there was no fraud in the transaction. It appears, in the case in hand, that Miss Evans and defendant lived in the same house. He did not charge her for board, and she did not require him to pay rent. While she was old and deaf and in feeble health, there was no proof of mental unsoundness. Miss Evans was kindly treated by Mrs. Kemp, and affectionately treated by defendant. She had stated to some of her friends her regard for and interest in defendant. I do not see, in the relations of the parties as developed at the trial, any ground for the presumption of fraud. There was no proof that defendant ever undertook to persuade Miss Evans to do anything, or suggested to her any disposition of any part of her estate. Her kindly offices towards him, and his affectionate acts towards her, do not furnish grounds for avoiding the deed.

It is therefore decreed, adjudged and ordered, That the complaint be dismissed.

Plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. A. C. Spain and Boyd & Nettles, for appellants.

[The argument on the facts is omitted.]

Messrs. W. H. Perry and W. E. Earle, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action in the nature of a suit in equity, brought by the plaintiff, as executor of the last will and testament of Sarah Eliza Evans, deceased, late of Society Hill, Darlington county, to set aside and have canceled a deed alleged to have been made by the testatrix, in her lifetime, to the defendant, Edgar T. Kemp, of Greenville county, on the ground that said deed is void and of no effect by reason of fraud and undue influence.

Miss Evans had made her will March 11th, 1874, with codicil January 10th, 1876, by which she disposed of her whole estate. After certain devises and bequests, she gave the rest and residue to be sold to the best advantage, and the proceeds paid over to the Rev. James Furman, of Greenville, South Carolina, to be used by him in aid of Foreign and Domestic Missions, &c. She owned a house and lot in Greenville, which she leased to Edgar T. Kemp. She boarded with him, and died thereon December 9th, 1878. After her death, said Kemp produced a deed, which purported to have been executed by the testatrix on December 4th, five days before her death, by which was conveyed to him "the house and lot in Greenville, two notes made by Giles L. Glazener, and secured by a mortgage, and one undivided half of a tract of land at Florence, S. C., containing one hundred and thirty acres."

*The appellant, as her sole qualified executor, commenced the action in Darlington county, but to promote the convenience of witnesses, the venue was changed from Darlington to Greenville county. The case came on to be heard before Judge Wallace, and an issue was sent to a jury, consisting of thirty-six questions as to facts, about which it was supposed there would be conflicting testimony. It would unnecessarily encumber this judgment to set out these questions and answers at length. The answers were almost without exception favorable to the respondent, and, taken together, in reference to subject-matter, make a connected finding substantially as follows: "Miss Evans was seventy years of age when she executed the deed to Kemp. At that time her domicile was Greenville. The deed was executed on Wednesday. She instructed her lawyer, Governor Perry, to prepare the paper, which was prepared in accordance with her instructions. She was not sick at the time; not helpless, but feeble, and had been so for twelve days before the execution of the paper. She was living with Kemp, but not under his control. There was a relation of confidence between Miss Evans and Kemp. She reposed great confidence in him, and he acted towards her in that confidence. He acted as her agent in one or two instances. He was present aiding in the execution of the deed. He acted for her in the preparation and execution of the deed, but in good faith. She was not in condition to acquiesce in whatever might be proposed by those having influence with her. She knew what she was doing. The deed was not read over to her.

She could not have heard it read nor understood it by the motion of human lips, but she read the paper herself, and knew its legal effect. She had changed her mind as to 'the charities' without any misrepresentations or arts or stratagems by Kemp, or any one in his interest. No advantage was taken of her age, helplessness or situation. Miss Evans had first cousins residing in Society Hill and elsewhere, who manifested little interest in her before and up to the time of her death. At the date of the paper, only two of the friends of her youth resided in Greenville, and Kemp did not communicate her intention to make this deed to either of them. Kemp did not fail in his *duty to Miss Evans during the last three weeks of her life in any particular," &c.

The testimony and these findings were considered by the judge, who sustained the deed and dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appeals to this court. There seem to be no regular exceptions, but in the elaborate and learned argument of the appellant's counsel, the following grounds for reversing the judgment are insisted on:

1. "Because the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the findings of the jury as contained in answers to questions 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 14, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 33, 34, 35, 36 of issues of fact, and in answers to 29 and 30 in so far as it was found that defendant's agency was confined to one or two instances and the defendant acted in good faith in the preparation and execution of the deed in controversy.

2. "Because the Circuit Judge was in error in supposing that the plaintiff below relied alone on constructive fraud, and in confining his decision to that point; whereas the plaintiff relied strongly on the evidence of positive fraud, and now insists that the Circuit judge erred in not setting aside the deed on that ground.

3. "Because the Circuit judge erred in holding that the relations which existed between S. E. Evans and E. T. Kemp, with the circumstances in the case, at the time of its alleged execution, were not sufficient to invalidate the deed in question."

The first and second propositions complain of error of fact in the findings of the jury and in the judgment of the Circuit judge in relation to the charge of positive fraud. Notwithstanding Miss Evans had previously executed her will, giving the proceeds of the rest and residue of her estate to the purposes of religious charity, she had, as long as she lived, the undoubted right to change her mind and make a different disposition of those proceeds either by deed or will, only provided it was her own voluntary act, not induced by imposition, fraud or undue influence. The only question is: was the deed her own voluntary act? Upon this subject there was much proof. Foreseeing that there would be conflict of testimony, especially in reference to the capacity of Miss

Evans at the time the deed purports to *have been signed, and as to her signature and the due execution of the paper, issues carefully framed so as to test the question in every possible phase and form were submitted to a jury, who, as before stated, found for the defendant in most of the questions submitted, and the Circuit judge concurred in these findings, saying that "he was satisfied with the findings of the jury upon the issues submitted, and approved and adopted their verdict."

Under these circumstances this court will generally accept as established the facts thus found. Inquiry must end somewhere. A jury of the vicinage, acquainted with the witnesses who testify in their presence, is peculiarly fitted to weigh conflicting testimony and decide contested questions of fact. When the finding of such a body of twelve men is approved and adopted by the Circuit judge, who, intelligent, disinterested and accustomed to consider the force of testimony, is also present and sees and hears the witnesses examined before him, it would seem that the verdict ought to be as near absolute truth as is attainable under imperfect human institutions. In this respect the case is analogous to that of Gadsden v. Whaley, 14 S. C. 217, in which it is said: "Being an action for equitable relief this court may reconsider all the evidence, but the safe principle upon which it generally acts is not to overrule the conclusions of the Circuit judge upon doubtful questions of fact, though the court might not have reached the same conclusion he did. The rule is more strictly adhered to when there is concurrence between a Circuit judge and a referee. As to its probable correctness the verdict of a jury is as strong as the report of a referee. In the last case upon the subject, Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 548, it is said: 'The question of fact having been decided by the referee, and his decision having been confirmed by the Circuit judge, their decision must be regarded by us as conclusive unless it is without any testimony to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence.'" We have looked carefully through the testimony in this case and are unable to say that the judgment is against the weight of the evidence upon the charge of actual fraud.

The third proposition is that the Circuit judge erred in not holding the deed void on the ground of constructive fraud growing out of the confidential relation of the parties.

*Undue influence is a term not very clearly defined. It is easier to say what it is not, than what it is. Perhaps it is safer not to hazard a precise definition, as the circumstances in the affairs of life in which the principle may be invoked are infinitely various and diversified. The well established rule upon the subject, certainly as applicable to the execution of wills, is "that it must amount to force and coercion—destroying free agency. It must not be the influence of affection and attachment; it must not be the mere desire of gratifying the wishes of another, for that would be a very strong ground in support of a testamentary act. Further, there must be proof that the act was obtained by this coercion—by importunity which could not be resisted—that it was done merely for the sake of peace, so that the motive was tantamount to force and fear." 2 Wms. Ex., ch. I., § 2; Parfitt v. Lawless, 4 Moak Eng. R. 694; Means v. Means, 5 Strobh. 192. In our own case, last cited, it is said that "it is not influence merely, but undue influence that is always alleged —something excessive and unlawful. It is not the influence of friendship or affection that can be complained of, nor the influence of argument or entreaty, nor the impression made by kindness or prudence, nor even the effect wrought by servile compliance or mean endurance of wrong. It must be something that destroys free agency. Motives of almost every conceivable kind may be offered, and if the mind of the agent—free to adopt or reject the motives—yields its assent, the act is the act of the agent." This is beyond all doubt our law upon an issue of devisavit vel non, and, according to the principles announced in these authorities, the facts, as found by the jury in this case, would fall far short of setting aside the paper in controversy for undue influence, if it were a will. We look in vain for evidence to show anything like coercion of the will of the donor.

Lord Cranworth, in Boyse v. Rossborough, 6 H. L. C. 49, said: "One point, however, is beyond dispute, and that is, that where once it has been proved that a will has been executed with due solemnities by a person of competent understanding, and apparently a free agent, the burden of proving that it was executed under undue influence is on the party who alleges it." If, therefore, Miss Evans had taken the advice of her attorney *and expressed her intention in favor of the defendant by a codicil to her will instead of a deed, there could be no doubt of the legality and validity of the donation.

Does it alter the case that the form in which she expressed her change of intention was by deed and not by will? It has been urged with zeal and learning that, as this was a deed inter vivos, and the relations between the parties were of a confidential character, the doctrine applicable to wills does not apply; but that this is one of those cases in which the Court of Equity will declare the deed void, or at least presume undue influence and set it aside, unless the donee proves affirmatively that it was not procured by undue influence. This doctrine certainly tends to reverse the rule of evidence that no one shall be required to prove a negative; but it seems that the English Chancery, in a particular class of cases, does make a distinction in this respect between a will and a deed.

The leading case on the subject is that of Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300, but the doctrine is stated more fully by Lord Penzance, in the case of Parfitt v. Lawless, 4 Moak Eng. R. 692, as follows: "In equity, persons standing in certain relations to one another, such as parent and child, man and wife, doctor and patient, attorney and client, confessor and penitent, and guardian and ward, are subject to certain presumptions when transactions between them are brought in question. And if a gift or contract made in favor of him who holds the position of influence, is impeached by him who is subject to that influence, the courts of equity cast upon the former the burden of proving that the transaction was fairly conducted as if between strangers; that the weaker was not unduly impressed by the natural influence of the stronger, &c. * * * In the first place, in gifts or contracts inter vivos, there is a transaction in which the person benefited at least takes part, whether he unduly urges his influence or not; and in calling upon him to explain the part he took and the circumstances that brought about the gift, the court is plainly requiring of him an explanation within his knowledge. But in the case of a legacy, under a will, the legatee may have, and, in point of fact, generally has, no part in or even knowledge of the act. A more material distinction is this: The influence *which is undue in the cases of gifts inter vivos is very different from that which is required to set aside a will. In the case of gifts inter vivos it is considered by the courts of equity that the natural influence which such relations as those in question involve, exerted by those who possess it, to obtain a benefit for themselves, is an undue influence. Gifts brought about by it are, therefore, set aside, unless the party benefited by it can show affirmatively that the other party to the transaction was placed 'in such a position as would enable him to form an absolutely free and unfettered judgment.' Archer v. Hudson, 7 Beav. 551." We think the rule, as here announced, is only applicable where there are well-defined confidential relations, such as those indicated in the cases cited.

So far as this doctrine as to deeds is supposed to spring from relations of confidence between the donor and donee, assuredly those same relations may also exist between testator and devisee. In the case before us, for example, there was involved no general disposition of the whole estate, as is usual in wills, but the gift was to one person, single and simple, and the donor died only a few days after the execution of the paper. Under these circumstances, is there any principle which requires that the rule of evidence should be different from what it would have been if Miss Evans had acted on the suggestion to accomplish her purpose by means of a codicil to her will instead of a deed? It is difficult to say certainly what relations are and what are not within the rule, but we take it that it does not include those merely of friendship and confidence. In the case of Hunter v. Atkins, 3 Myl. & K. 113, a gift was made by a person upwards of ninety years of age, who had a wife and adopted daughter, to a confidential agent, who had for many years been in the habit of friendship with the donor—without the intervention of a disinterested third person—the solicitor who drew the deed being the solicitor of the person who took the benefit under it. The gift was declared void at the rolls, but, under all the circumstances, sustained upon appeal. Lord Brougham stated the rule in the following terms:

"The rule, I think, is, that where the known and defined relations of attorney and client, guardian and ward, trustee and *cestui que trust exists, the conduct of the party benefited must be such as to sever the connection and to place him in the same circumstances in which a mere stranger would have stood, giving no advantage, save only whatever kindness or favor may have arisen out of the connection; and that where the only relation between the parties is that of friendly habits, or habitual reliance, on advice and assistance, accompanied with partial employment in doing some sort of business, care must be taken that no undue advantage shall be made of the influence thus acquired. The limits of natural and often unavoidable kindness, with its effects, and of undue influence exercised, or unfair advantage taken, cannot be more rigorously defined."

The case of Huguenin v. Baseley, supra, is cited approvingly by the Chancellor who delivered the judgment of the court in our own case of Parris v. Cobb, 5 Rich. Eq. 457, but in the latter case the relation between the parties was that of grandfather and grandchild and agent. It is stated in a note to the case of Morgan v. Minett, 23 Moak Eng. R. 252, that "the principal case holds the rule relative to gifts to persons standing in confidential relations to the donor more strictly than it is held by the courts of this country. A gift to such person, when shown by direct or circumstantial evidence to have been understandingly made, by a person competent to make it, without fraud or imposition by the donee, is held valid." 1 Story Eq. §§ 311, 314.

We do not see that the donor and donee in this case held to each other such relations of confidence as are referred to in the cases. The parties were in no way related—they were not trustee and cestui que trust. Kemp and his mother lived together. Miss Evans lodged with them, and continued to do so for about two years, when she died in their house. While Miss Evans lived with them a mutual friendship had grown up between them. A few days before her death Miss Evans executed the deed in controversy. The jury found that she knew what she was doing. She read the paper herself, and knew its legal effect. She had changed her mind as to the charities without any misrepresentations, or arts, or stratagems of Kemp or any one in his interest. No advantage was taken of her age, helplessness or *situation. Kemp did not fail in his duty to Miss Evans during the last three weeks of her life in any particular.

In this state of facts we know of no rule of law or principle of equity which would authorize a court to declare the deed of Miss Evans invalid and thus defeat her intention in reference to her own property. In the language of Lord Brougham, in the case of Hunter v. Atkins, supra: "If, on such grounds, a deed so prepared and so executed is to be set aside, few, assuredly, of the acts of men, dealing with their own affairs, are safe; and the law which enables all who are of sound mind to dispose of their property, no longer exists but in name."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

PARNELL v. MANER.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Abatement and Revival ⇐74.]

Action of assumpsit was brought against a sole defendant, and issue joined, after which defendant died, and in June, 1870, entry was made on the docket "abated by death of defendant." The estate of the deceased was unrepresented until 1879, when respondent qualified as executor, and, in 1880, motion was made by plaintiff for leave to file a supplemental complaint, which motion was refused. Held, that the refusal was proper, as no leave to file was necessary, and that plaintiff had not, by lapse of time, lost his right to revive the action.

Before Thomson, J., Beaufort, November, 1880.

Motion by H. M. Parnell for leave to revive action by serving and filing a supplemental complaint. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. C. Davant and W. S. Tillinghast, for appellant.

Mr. Jeff. Warren, contra.

*January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. In this case, the plaintiff commenced an action on a promissory note on March 5th, 1868, against J. W. Lawton, and the case being at issue remained on the docket undisposed of until June Term, 1870, when it was marked on the docket, "abated by the death of the defendant," Lawton having died on March 8th, 1870, leaving of force his last will and testament, whereby he appointed the present defendant, S. P. Maner, executor, who, however, did not qualify as such until some time in the year 1879. On October 27th, 1880, the plaintiff gave notice to the said Maner of a motion for leave to file a supplemental complaint continuing the action against him as executor of the original defendant. Judge Thomson refused the motion, without prejudice, apparently upon the ground that where a sole defendant dies, pending an action against him, the plaintiff has no right to continue the action against his executor or administrator, as the case may be, by a supplemental complaint, but that a new original complaint is the proper proceeding.

This action having been pending, and the original defendant having died since the adoption of the Code of Procedure, its provisions apply to all subsequent proceedings. Code § 465. In Section 144 of the code, it is provided that "no action shall abate by the death, marriage or other disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue." Hence, as the cause of action here certainly did survive when Lawton died, the action did not abate, and the entry on the docket to that effect, at June Term, 1870, was clearly erroneous and should be disregarded. The plaintiff, under the provisions of the section just cited, had the right, at any time within a year, to have the action continued against the representative of the deceased defendant by a mere motion, but after the expiration of a year the action could only be continued by supplemental complaint. It will be observed that the provision made in Section 144 of the code for continuing an action by or against the representatives of a deceased party by supplemental complaint, does not require or contemplate that leave *should be obtained from the court to file such complaint as in case of the provision in Section 200 of the code for filing a supplemental complaint for other purposes. Accordingly, we find that the rule in New York is, that while it is necessary to obtain leave to file a supplemental complaint under Section 177 of the code of that State (corresponding with Section 200 of our code), it is not necessary to obtain leave to file a supplemental complaint under Section 121 of the New York code (corresponding with Section 144 of our code), but, on the contrary, the filing of a supplemental complaint in such a case is a matter of right; and, hence, in one of the cases, it was held that a motion to that effect should be denied, because leave was not necessary. 2 Wait Pr. 469, and the cases there cited.

The authority cited by the Circuit judge, from the notes to Wait's Annotated Code, appears to be the case of Johnson v. Snyder, 7 How. Pr. 395, which does not decide the proposition which it is cited to sustain, viz., that where there is but one defendant, and he dies, a new original complaint is the proper proceeding, and that the action cannot be continued against his representative by a supplemental complaint. On the other hand the cases cited in 2 Wait Pr. 468, show that even in cases where there is but a single defendant, and he dies, the action may be continued against his representative by a supplemental complaint where more than a year has elapsed since the death of such defendant.

While, therefore, we agree with the Circuit judge in the result which he reached, we cannot concur in the reasoning by which such result was attained, and, on the contrary, are of opinion that the motion should have been refused because it was unnecessary to apply for leave to file a supplemental complaint for the purpose of continuing an action against the representative of a deceased defendant, the filing of such complaint being a matter of right. Of course, when such complaint is filed, the defendant will have the opportunity, by answer or demurrer, to raise such objections and interpose such defenses as he may be advised are maintainable.

It was argued here, that, by lapse of time, the plaintiff has lost the right which he once may have had to continue the *action by supplemental complaint against the representative of the deceased defendant. To say nothing of the fact that a large part of the delay was occasioned by the failure of the present defendant to qualify as executor of the deceased defendant, it will be observed that while Section 144 does limit the time within which an action may be continued by motion to one year, it does not prescribe any limit to the time within which it may be continued by supplemental complaint after the expiration of one year. In New York it has been held in the case of Bornsdorff v. Lord, 41 Barb. 211, that the supplemental complaint provided for by section 121 of the code of that State stands in the place of the bill of revivor under the old system of equity pleading; and in a note to the case of Pendleton v. Fay, 3 Paige 205, the case of Lyle v. Bradford, 7 Monroe 115, is cited to sustain the proposition that "lapse of time from filing the original bill, omission to serve the original defendant with process, and a final disposition of the cause as to the other defendants, are no grounds of objection to the bill of revivor in such case." In addition to this, Section 144 of our code contains a provision by which a defendant may protect himself from unreasonable delay on the part of the representatives of a deceased plaintiff in continuing the action by supplemental complaint; and while there is no express provision in that section of the code by which the representatives of a deceased defendant can protect themselves from unreasonable delay on the part of the plaintiff in continuing the action, yet it has been held in New York, that, in such a case, the representatives of a deceased defendant may prevent unreasonable delay on the part of the plaintiff in continuing the action against them by moving for an order discontinuing the action unless the plaintiff shall, within a specified time, consent to an order continuing the action. Keene v. LaFarge, 16 How. Pr. 377.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court be affirmed, without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to file his supplemental complaint.

Before Thomson, J., Barnwell, October, 1880.

Both of the actions above stated were commenced in January, 1880, the first on the 7th, the second on the 17th. The note of April 17th, 1874, referred to in the opinion, was as follows:

*353

*$1,000. Allendale, S. C., April 17th, 1874.

On the first day of November next we, or either of us, promise to pay to W. K. Ryan, or bearer, the sum of one thousand dollars, value received. M. Kaphan. [L. S.]

I. Kaphan. [L. S.]

The condition of the mortgage was "that if we, the said Manheim Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, do and shall well and truly pay, or cause to be paid, unto the said W. K. Ryan the said debt or sum of money aforesaid, with the interest thereon, if any shall be due, according to the true intent and meaning of said bond and condition thereunder written, then this deed of bargain and sale shall cease, determine, and be utterly null and void; otherwise, it shall remain in full force and virtue."

It appears, from the testimony, that Ida Kaphan was the wife of M. Kaphan and the owner of the lands mortgaged. W. K. Ryan kept on his books an account current with T. Kaphan, and made no entries whatever on his note and mortgage. The last advance was made by Ryan, September 24th, 1874.

The note of Ida Kaphan, closing the account, was as follows:

$383.60. Charleston, S. C., February 19, 1875.

One day after date I promise to pay to W. K. Ryan, or order, three hundred and eighty-three 60-100 dollars, with interest from date until paid, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, for value received.

Witness my hand and seal.

I. Kaphan. [L. S.]

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. A. B. Conner, for appellants.

Messrs. Mitchell & Smith and Robt. Aldrich, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. On April 17th, 1874, Manheim Kaphan, and Ida Kaphan, his wife, executed a note to W. K. Ryan, *factor, of Charleston, for $1,000, payable November 1st, 1874, and to secure the same mortgaged certain lots in the village of Allendale, Barnwell county. It is now alleged by the mortgagors that the note has been paid in full, and the first case stated in the caption was to compel satisfaction of the mortgage and for a penalty of $500 against the mortgagee for refusing to satisfy the same under Ch. LXXXII., § 21, Gen. Stat. 428. The mortgagee insists that there is still due on the note and mortgage the sum of $404.30, with interest from January 2d, 1880, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, and for the collection of this balance, the second case stated was instituted to foreclose the mortgage.

The main question in both cases is, whether the note and mortgage have been paid, and, if not, how much remains unpaid. It seems that early in 1874, M. Kaphan called upon W. K. Ryan, factor, at his office, in Charleston, to obtain advances to enable him to carry on his mercantile business at Allendale, in Barnwell county. He stated that he wanted $2,000 or more; that the business was his own, but it would be conducted in the name of his brother, T. Kaphan. An arrangement was made. Ryan was to make advances, from time to time, as money was needed, and Kaphan was to forward cotton and to give certain securities to cover the advances. The note and mortgage now in controversy were executed by M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, in Barnwell county, and sent to Ryan, in Charleston. It appears from the correspondence of the parties, that there was also in the hands of Ryan some agricultural liens, but they were either sent back to Kaphan, at his request, or turned out to be worthless. Ryan never received anything on these liens. What Kaphan received he retained, and sent only the cotton. At the time the note and mortgage were delivered, no money passed, but soon after drafts were drawn on Ryan and cotton sent to him, as previously indicated would be done, in the name of T. Kaphan, with no other instructions than to sell and render an account of sales. No credits were directed to be placed on the note, but an account of advances and sales of cotton was opened.

Before November the drafts paid amounted to the sum of *$2,133.32, and the cotton shipped to $1,443.33, leaving a balance overdrawn of $689.99, which was afterwards reduced to $383.60. This account was submitted to M. Kaphan, who approved it and sent to Ryan the note of his wife, Ida Kaphan, closing the same, but making no reference to the bond and mortgage, which was still in possession of Ryan. Subsequently, March 29th, 1875, there was paid the further sum of $71.27.

In the law case for the penalty, the trial by jury was waived and it was agreed that both cases should be tried by the court at the same time. They came on to be heard by Judge Thomson, who dismissed the complaint in the case of the Kaphans for the penalty, and in that of Ryan he gave judgment of foreclosure for the balance due on the amount as fixed by the note of Ida Kaphan. The Kaphans appealed in both cases to this court on the following exceptions:

I. "That the decisions were not filed within sixty days, as is required by Article IV., § 17, Constitution of South Carolina.

II. "That his Honor Judge Thomson erred in giving judgment for the said W. K. Ryan.

1. "Because the note of M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan for $1,000, dated April 17th, 1874, and due November 1st thereafter, and secured by their mortgage of April 17th, 1874, was for a specific purpose and had been fully satisfied and discharged by payments made to the said W. K. Ryan before November 1st, 1874, as is shown by his complaint and account thereto attached, and as was already corroborated, not only by his own testimony, but by that of M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan.

2. "Because the said note and mortgage of the said M. and Ida Kaphan could in no way have been held as security for the additional $1,000 advanced to T. Kaphan, of which Ida Kaphan was totally ignorant.

3. "Because the refusal and neglect of the said W. K. Ryan to enforce, or to allow to be enforced, after having been repeatedly requested to do so, the liens which were given to secure the said W. K. Ryan by the said T. Kaphan, was laches on the part of the said W. K. Ryan sufficient to protect the said M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan against any liability for the additional $1,000, if ever they had been liable therefor.

*4. "Because the said W. K. Ryan, having accepted the second note of Ida Kaphan for $383.60, closing the account of T. Kaphan, it was a separate and distinct transaction, releasing M. Kaphan from any further liability on the original note, which was secured by the mortgage of both M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, thereby canceling the same, and was settlement in full of the indebtedness of T. Kaphan and in no way connected with or secured by the said mortgage.

5. "Because the indebtedness of T. Kaphan under the securities given W. K. Ryan appears by account, and interest not being recoverable on an open account, the said M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan cannot be charged with interest, even though they be liable for balance over first $1,000 advanced, the said W. K. Ryan having first brought his action to foreclose on the account of T. Kaphan and not on the note of M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, secured by their mortgage, nor on the note of Ida Kaphan for $383.60 closing account of T. Kaphan.

6. "Because his Honor Judge Thomson finds 'that on the 26th day of October, A. D. 1880, there was due and owing to W. K. Ryan by the said M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, upon the sealed note and mortgage mentioned in the complaint, the sum of $529.77,' whilst his statement shows that his calculations are based on the note of Ida Kaphan for $383.60, which closes account of T. Kaphan and bears interest from its date at twelve per cent. per annum and includes interest on the account at the same rate. That in giving judgment upon the sealed note and mortgage mentioned in the complaint, interest is calculated from February 19th, 1875, at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum, while the said note and mortgage, upon which the judgment is given, make no provision for interest.

7. "Because W. K. Ryan only claims in his answer and complaint the sum of $404.30, with interest from January 2d, 1880, at twelve per cent. per annum, making in all, up to October 26th, 1880, the sum of $443.92 still due him, while his Honor, Judge Thomson, finds on the said October 26th, 1880, the sum due W. K. Ryan to be $529.77, and gives judgment in favor of said W. K. Ryan for that sum, the same being $75.85 more than is claimed by the said W. K. Ryan."

*It has been decided by this court that a judgment filed more than sixty days after the last day of the term at which the cause was heard is valid. Koon v. Munro, 11 S. C. 140.

It is insisted by the appellants that the note for $1,000 secured by mortgage was paid at maturity in full and the mortgage should be marked satisfied. Whether that is so or not must depend to a large extent upon the agreement of the parties as to the purpose for which the note and mortgage were executed. Upon that subject the parties differ widely in their statements. The Kaphans contend that the note was given simply for so much money loaned, and that as soon as, in the course of business, the amount was in the hands of Ryan, it was to be considered paid, without any regard to the state of the account for advances; while Ryan insists that it was given as collateral security for any balance that might remain unpaid at the time indicated. This is a question of fact, which can only be determined by the evidence.

The note and mortgage are in the usual form and contain no indication of the purpose for which they were given, as the bond did in the case of Conway v. Cunningham, 6 S. C. 351. It was necessary to resort to parol proof to ascertain the agreement of the parties. This evidence was admitted without objection and no exception as to its admissibility is made here. But as something was said in the argument about the effect of parol proof upon the terms of the note and mortgage, it may not be improper to observe that this is not a case in which such testimony tends to vary the terms of a written instrument, but to show the whole agreement in which the instrument originated and of which it constitutes only a part. It is said in 1 Greenl. Evid. § 284a, that the rule does not apply to the admission of parol evidence "in cases where the original contract was verbal and entire, and a part only was reduced to writing." Lewis v. Gray, 1 Mass. 297; Knight v. Knotts, 8 Rich. 35; McGrath and Byrum v. Barnes, 13 S. C. 332 [36 Am. Rep. 687].

At the time the note and mortgage were given no money passed, and the fact that advances were to be made on them as a security, could only appear by parol. "A mortgage may be taken and held as a security for future advances and responsi*bilities to the extent of it, when this is a constituent part of the original agreement." In this case both parties agree that this was a constituent part of the original agreement, the only difference being that the one insists that "the security" was to be discharged by the first receipts in the course of business, and the other that it was to cover the final balance after deducting all other payments. In either case the fact does not appear in the note or mortgage and can only be shown by proof of the agreement of the parties.

In the case of Archer v. Hudson, 7 Beav. 556, Frances Kendray, with her uncle Daniel, signed a note for £500 to the York Union Building Company, and proof, without objection, was allowed of a verbal agreement that the note was to cover any "floating balance" which might arise for overdrafts by Daniel, and such proof appearing, it was held to be a fraud to charge the whole note as a debt without regard to the state of the accounts.

What was the agreement of the parties in this case? The only parties present when the agreement was made were Ryan and M. Kaphan, who acted for himself and as agent for his wife, Ida Kaphan. Ryan swears positively that "the securities were given as collateral security for all advances made under the agreement and to secure any balance that might be due after his accounts were rendered," and Kaphan testifies that the "agreement was to advance $1,000 upon the mortgage, and if further advances were made they were to be on liens—liens only." Under this proof and the circumstances of the case, the Circuit judge made an order dismissing the case for the penalty and rendered judgment of foreclosure in the other case, which was equivalent to a finding of fact that the note and mortgage were given to secure any balance to the extent of $1,000 which might remain unpaid upon the account for advances.

The case of M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan v. W. K. Ryan for the penalty is a law case, and, therefore, in that the said finding must stand as the verdict of the jury upon the facts and cannot be reviewed by this court. The case of Ryan v. M. and I. Kaphan, for a foreclosure, is a suit "in Chancery," and in that this court is not limited to a correction of errors of law, but may reconsider findings of fact. In the exercise, however, of this *appellate jurisdiction, the court has rarely overruled the findings of a Circuit judge reached from direct testimony involving the credibility of witnesses. We cannot say that the view of the Circuit judge upon this question of fact is without evidence to support it. On the contrary, in looking through the testimony, we incline to think that the nature of the transaction and the circumstances of the case all tend to corroborate the testimony of Ryan and to sustain the judgment of the court.

It does not seem to be reasonable that Ryan would advance $2,000 upon the security of a note for $1,000 and some agricultural liens which realized him nothing, and which had to be returned to Kaphan in order to be enforced in the county where they were given. The state of the account showed that his advances were in excess of his receipts, and it is hardly probable that Ryan would have continued to make advances if he had not supposed that the note and mortgage were there to cover any eventual deficiency. An account of advances and receipts was kept separate without reference to the note and mortgage, upon which no credits were entered, and the correspondence shows that the Kaphans never directed the proceeds of the cotton sold to be applied as so many payments on the note and mortgage.

The Kaphans knew that the note was not discharged by the first proceeds of cotton, for they offered to allow Ryan to still hold it if he would make advances the next year. Mrs. Kaphan wrote to Ryan that he could "retain the mortgage in your possession for $1,000," which he could not do if it had been paid and discharged. Mrs. Kaphan, with the consent of her husband, and at his instance, closed by note the balance of the account for advances, which was an acknowledgment that Ryan was not responsible in any way for the agricultural liens, and that the balance of account was correct in amount at least.

Nearly six years elapsed before the claim was put forward that the mortgage was satisfied and did not cover the balance of the account which had been put into the form of Mrs. Kaphan's note. We cannot reverse the judgment of the Circuit judge, that by the agreement of the parties, the note and mortgage were given to secure any balance which, after crediting the proceeds of cotton sold, might remain upon the account for advances. *We are not called upon to give construction to the note and mortgage, but to determine from the evidence in what way and for what purpose they were to be used.

This case is not analogous to those of Sollee & Warley v. Meugy, 1 Bailey 620; Boyce & Henry v. Ewart, Rice 134, and Lawton v. Maner, 10 Rich. 323. In all of these cases the question was as to the construction of a written guaranty for the debt of another. This is not the case of a guaranty or surety at all. The only question is: What was the original agreement between a creditor and his debtors as to the nature and character of the security which was given?

But, assuming this view to be correct, it is still further urged that the judge erred in holding that the note of Ida Kaphan, February 15th, 1875, closing up the accounts, was not payment and settlement of the balance of the debt and a discharge of the mortgage.

In the view which this court takes, the real debtor was not T. Kaphan, who was manifestly a mere figurehead, but M. Kaphan and Ida, his wife. They, through and by M. Kaphan, made the arrangement with Ryan. They furnished the securities. Ida Kaphan owned the property embraced in the mortgage, and she closed the account with her note, not as surety or guarantor for any one, but in liquidation of the debt of herself and husband. It is true that the correspondence was at first conducted in the name of T. Kaphan, but it does not appear that such a person ever had any interest in the business, or at any time even saw Ryan on the subject. At the very beginning of the transaction, M. Kaphan informed Ryan that the business would be conducted in the name of T. Kaphan, but that in fact it was his own. If his wife, Ida, did not manage the whole business from the beginning, she certainly finished it in her own name by giving her note. When she closed the account which, as we have seen, was secured by mortgage, by her note, did that have the effect of discharging the mortgage? Was it payment or mere substitution?

The principle applicable and the authorities are stated in the case of Gibbes v. G. & C. Railroad Company, 13 S. C. 252: "Nothing is payment but that which produces payment or is *received as payment. To give one security for another of equal dignity, without the intention of discharging the debt, is not payment but substitution, and, in such cases, it is well settled that a lien, such as a mortgage previously existing, is not discharged, but remains and still secures the debt in the new form." The note of the Kaphans has not produced payment, and it can hardly be supposed that it was the intention of Ryan to extinguish the old debt, secured by mortgage, for no other purpose than to discharge the mortgage and take in lieu thereof the unsecured note of one of the original debtors.

As we have held that the note of Ida Kaphan, given with the knowledge and consent of her husband, only liquidated and put in another form the balance of the account, we see no error in the judgment of foreclosure for the amount and interest due upon that note. After the balance of the account had been closed by a note, it bore interest according to its terms.

It appears that Ryan, in stating the claim in his complaint, made, in the calculation of the interest, a mistake of about $100. The mistake is patent in the record, and the judge made a correct calculation for himself, and rendered judgment for the true amount. That was, in substance, allowing the complaint to be amended in that particular, which, in furtherance of justice, he had a right to do. If such order had been made in terms, and the case referred to a referee to ascertain the amount due, according to the principles herein announced, the result would have been precisely the same. We cannot say that the judge was in error as to the amount of the judgment of foreclosure.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit judge in the case of M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan v. W. K. Ryan, be affirmed; and it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court in the case of W. K. Ryan v. M. Kaphan and Ida Kaphan, be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Barnwell, June, 1881.

The appeal in this case, which is fully stated in the opinion, was from the order of Judge Mackey, directing the sheriff to pay over the money in his hands.

Mr. L. B. O'Bryan, for appellants.

Mr. J. J. Brown, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The plaintiffs and the defendant, Simon, held agricultural liens given by S. T. Moore and others, and the defendant, Mary E. Roberts, had a claim for rent on the same parties. Warrants were issued to enforce these liens, under which the sheriff sold the crops of the lienors, and now holds the proceeds of such sale, a controversy having arisen as to which of the parties are entitled to the proceeds. It does not appear that any rule was taken out against the sheriff, but the plaintiffs brought an action against the parties who gave the liens, together with the defendants, Simon and Roberts, the other claimants of the proceeds of the sale, to which action, however, *the sheriff was not made a party, in which the plaintiffs prayed judgment that the proceeds of the sale, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be applied in satisfaction of their claim and the costs and disbursements of the action.

The case came on for trial before Judge Wallace and a jury, when the following verdict was rendered: "We find fifty dollars for Mrs. M. E. Roberts, and the balance in the hands of the sheriff for Warren, Wallace & Co." The defendant, Simon, moved for a new trial, which Judge Wallace refused upon the ground "that it was useless, as the verdict was a nullity, and that judgment could not be entered thereon." The attorney for the plaintiff then applied for an order requiring the sheriff to pay over the funds in his hands according to the terms of the verdict, which motion was also refused, "as the sheriff had never been made a party, and judgment could not be entered against him, and that the court could make no such order." From these rulings of Judge Wallace there was no appeal.

Subsequently, the plaintiffs brought an action against the sheriff alone, in which the proceedings in the former action were stated, with the allegation that the sheriff has in his hands the funds in dispute, and that he declines, after demand, to pay out the same in accordance with the verdict rendered in the former action, and prayed judgment that the sheriff pay to the plaintiffs the amount in his hands.

At the next term of the court, Judge Mackey "heard the statements and arguments of the different counsel interested" on the call of the case brought by the plaintiffs against the sheriff, "and thereupon directed the attorney for Warren, Wallace & Co. to enter up judgment in the former case, there having been no order made by Judge Wallace setting aside the verdict of the jury and no motion for that purpose then made or now pending;" and also granted an order in the same case requiring the sheriff "to pay over the money in his hands in accordance with the verdict." What became of the case against the sheriff does not appear, as no further notice seems to have been taken of it, the direction to enter judgment and the order appealed from having been made in the former action to which the sheriff was not a party.

*It seems to us very clear that the order of Judge Mackey cannot be sustained for two reasons: 1. Because it is practically a review and reversal of the action of Judge Wallace, and nothing is better settled than that one Circuit judge has no power to review and reverse the action of another Circuit judge. If Judge Wallace committed any error in refusing the motion made by the plaintiffs, which is by no means clear, their remedy was by appeal to this court. 2. The sheriff not being a party to the action in which the order in question was granted it was error on the part of Judge Mackey to make any order affecting him.

It may be, and no doubt is, entirely true, that the sheriff was fully aware of what was going on, but in order to entitle a court of justice to make any order affecting any person, it is necessary that the court should first have acquired jurisdiction of the person to be affected by such order, by service of process or by some other recognized mode of bringing a party before the court, otherwise the order would be an absolute nullity. In this case, the sheriff, as we have seen, was never in any way made a party to the action in which the right to the fund was sought to be adjudicated, and in which the order appealed from was granted, nor had he been brought before the court by rule.

While in this particular case no harm would probably result from the fact of the sheriff not being made a party to the action in which the order appealed from was granted, inasmuch as he was doubtless fully cognizant of all the proceedings, yet it would be a very dangerous precedent to establish that a party might be liable to have a judgment rendered against him, or an order granted affecting him, in a cause to which he had not been made a party in the manner prescribed by law, and one which we do not feel at liberty to sanction.

The judgment of this court is that the order appealed from be reversed.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Eminent Domain ⇐268.]

Before Wallace, J., Aiken, February, 1881.

Action by C. G. Tutt, trustee, against the Port Royal & Augusta Railway Company, commenced June 23d, 1879. Tutt was trustee duly appointed in the place of G. W. Miller, deceased. The opinion gives a sufficient statement of the deed of trust, and otherwise states the case.

The appellant renewed in this court his motion for a non-suit, upon the following grounds:

1. Because under the terms of the trust deed the conveyance of the right of way over said lands, executed by said H. R. Cook to the railroad company, gave at least to the said railroad company a license to enter upon and build their road over said lands, and that until said license was revoked the defendants were lawfully upon said lands, and this action could not be maintained.

*2. Because the conveyance of such right of way, executed by Cook to said company, taken in connection with the knowledge of the trustee of the proposed construction of a railroad over said lands, and his failure to object thereto, authorized said company to enter upon said lands for such purpose without giving the notice required by Section 75, Ch. 63, of the Revised Statutes, or was a waiver of said notice; in either case said company acquired such right of way, and the action could not be maintained.

3. Because the alleged owner of the land having permitted the railroad company to enter upon the construction of their highway over said land without previous compensation, the plaintiff could not bring this action to dispossess the defendants and for damages, but was restricted to his petition for compensation as provided by Section 83, Ch. 63, of the Revised Statutes.

4. Because Miller, the trustee, in 1870, while knowing that Cook had given the railroad company the right of way over said lands, having interposed no objection to the construction of the railroad over the same, but having permitted said company to lay out valuable improvements thereon in ignorance of his claim, and having remained silent during his life-time, and until ofter the purchase thereof by these defendants, and the same being true as to Mrs. Cook, the plaintiff is estopped from bringing this action, at least during the life-time of said H. R. and Helena Cook.

The defendants also moved for a new trial on the following ground, viz: Because the judge directed the jury to find for the plaintiff the land in dispute and damages.

[For subsequent opinions, see 20 S. C. 110; 28 S. C. 388, 5 S. E. 831.]

Mr. William Elliott, for appellants.

Messrs. Henderson Brothers, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. In this action the plaintiff, respondent, seeks to recover possession of a strip or parcel of land located in Aiken county and damages for its detention. His claim to this possession is founded upon an indenture executed by John Miller and *Geo. W. Miller, on January 1st, 1849, in which the said John Miller conveyed to Geo. W. Miller, his heirs and assigns, a tract of land embracing the strip now in controversy, with other property, in trust for the joint use, support and comfort of his daughter, Helena H. M., and her husband, Horatio R. Cook, and their children, during the joint lives of them, the said Helena and the said Horatio R. And in the event of the said Helena surviving the said Horatio, having a child or children living, then in trust for the joint use and support, &c., of the said Helena and her child or children during her natural life, and at her death to be equally divided, share and share alike, among her children surviving her and the children of such as may die before her, per stirpes, * * * and finally, upon the further trust and condition that during the life of the said Horatio R. Cook and until the happening of the contingency last aforesaid [which is a contingency upon the happening of which Horatio was to get half of the property in fee], the said property, real and personal, was to remain in the possession and under the control and management of the said Horatio, who shall be free from accountability for the annual rents, issues and profits thereof over and above the support of the family. Provided he shall abstain from waste and destruction thereof, * * * with the power in the said Horatio, in case the trustee therein named removed from the State or died, to appoint a successor. Under this deed the plaintiff became trustee and now seeks to recover the strip or parcel of land from the defendant, appellant.

The defendant is a body politic and corporate, and is in the use of the strip of land as a road-bed (right of way) for their railroad track through the tract of land conveyed in the indenture above, by virtue of a paper purporting to be a bargain and sale executed by the said Horatio on April 3d, 1870, to the Port Royal Railroad Company, of which the defendant is successor. This paper is without seal and attempts to convey this strip to the said Port Royal Railroad Company, their successors and assigns forever, reserving the right to cultivate the same on both sides of the road, as near the track as may be convenient, without obstructing the use thereof by the said company.

At the trial below, the defendant, disclaiming all title to the *fee in the land, offered no testimony. At the close of plaintiff's testimony, defendant moved for non-suit, which was overruled.

The judge charged the jury as follows: "The defendants have offered no testimony in this case. I have already decided upon the plaintiff's title on the motion for non-suit, and charge you that you must find for the plaintiff the land in dispute and damages for the detention of such land as you find the defendants are in possession of. The one question submitted to you being the question of damages, you must determine the same by the testimony, considering all of it." The jury found for the plaintiff the land in dispute and $183.25 damages.

The verdict was rendered for the plaintiff as a matter of legal right under the direction of the presiding judge because the fee in the land was in the plaintiff. There can be no doubt but that the fee is in the plaintiff. He is the rightfully appointed trustee under the indenture of John Miller and G. W. Miller, in which the land is conveyed expressly to the trustee, his heirs and assigns. But it does not follow, as matter of law, that because the plaintiff proved that the fee was in him he was, therefore, entitled to recover the possession of the land. Mr. Blackstone says that a complete title to land consists of three things—1st, possession; 2d, right of possession, and, 3d, right of property. These elements are all necessary to make out complete title, and when they are united in the same person he may be regarded as the complete owner of the property. But they may exist separately; possession may be in one, while the right of possession may be in another, and the right of property still in another. So it does not follow always that the right of property or a fee-simple title carries with it the right to immediate and personal possession.

The controversy here is not as to the title—the defendant claims no title; that is admitted to be in the plaintiff—but the controversy is as to the possession. The action is brought to recover possession. The defendant denies plaintiff's right, at least in so far as it would defeat the enjoyment on the part of defendant of the right of way which it is claimed has attached to it.

Now, we think that the presiding judge was in error in holding that the plaintiff was entitled to recover on the ground of *title, and that in directing a verdict for the plaintiff he solved a proposition of law material to the question at issue erroneously, which, under the case of McGowan v. Lowrance, 3 S. C. 365, entitles the appellant to a new trial.

There is nothing expressed in the deed of indenture which authorizes the trustee to take possession of this land under any circumstances. On the contrary, as we have seen from the terms, Horatio R. Cook was put in possession by the deed, and by express stipulation was to continue in possession of the whole property, real and personal, during his life, the same to be under his control and management, without accountability as to all rents and profits over and above a support to himself, wife and children, provided, it is true, that he should abstain from waste and destruction thereof. The purpose of the deed seems to have been simply to place the legal title in a trustee, with no more control than was necessary to secure the property to the benefit of the cestuis que trust, those in being at the time of its execution and those who might afterwards come into being as remaindermen, possession and control being given by the deed itself to Horatio R. Cook, the husband of grantor's daughter, during his life. Cook did not obtain possession through the trustee, and in no sense can be considered as the tenant of the trustee. On the contrary, he obtained possession through the indenture—the same paper by which the trustee obtained his title—and his right to possession is as full and complete as is the right of property in the trustee.

Inasmuch, however, as no doubt it is the duty of the trustee to see that the property is used, in the first instance, for the support and maintenance of Mrs. Cook and her children, and that no waste or destruction of the property is taking place in the hands of Cook, it may be that in the event of failure of Cook as to either of these matters the trustee would impliedly be authorized to have possession, the implication arising from the character of his duties and the necessity of such possession to the full discharge of those duties—the end to be attained necessitating such possession as the only means of accomplishing it; but if possession is sought upon such grounds, these facts should have been alleged and proved. There is no allegation of that *kind in the complaint, nor do we see any testimony reported in the case tending in that direction. The plaintiff's case is rested entirely upon his title, and the verdict was rendered solely upon that basis, which, as we have already said, we think was error. Such being our conclusion, it will not be necessary to discuss very fully the other questions raised.

As the case, however, is to be remanded for a new trial, it is, perhaps, proper that we should express our opinion, especially as to the right of Cook to license the Port Royal Railroad to construct their road through this tract of land.

Cook not having been invested with the absolute title to this land, of course he could make no conveyance in fee to this company or to any other person, of the land itself, nor of any portion of it. But he had the absolute control and management of the land vested in him for an especial purpose, and, in our judgment, he had the right to do anything, short of waste and destruction, necessary to that end.

If the construction of a railroad through the land would, in his judgment, add to the convenience of its cultivation or the value of its crops, either because it afforded facility for the transportation of products and fertilizers, or from any other cause, contributing to the end of supplying himself and family through this land, we see no reason why he could not have given the permission, binding so long as he lived and had control, or, at lease, until revoked. Can it be doubted that, if this land had been situated near a landing, upon some navigable stream, for the convenience of market, &c., he would have had the right to open a way to such landing, or to grant the right of way to others, if it did not interfere with the purposes of the trust? True, Cook having no right to convey the land, the paper which he executed, even although it had been executed under seal, would have been nugatory as a transfer of the land itself. The defendant seems to have understood this and disclaimed title on the trial. All the right which the defendant obtained was a right of way. The tract of land through which it ran was rightfully in the possession of Cook, and it is still in his possession, subject to this easement of appellant, and we do not see that the *respondent can legally claim the possession because Cook has consented to this easement.

Before the appellant, as trustee, could interpose, Cook's acts should amount to a forfeiture, either because he had diminished the capacity of the land to afford his wife and children support and maintenance out of the rents and profits, or because he had committed waste and destruction. His possession, control and management were limited by these two conditions and no others, and the happening of these not having been alleged or proved the plaintiff should not have recovered possession, and, not being entitled to the possession upon the facts proved, his claim for damages on account of the detention is unfounded. As to the mode of recovering damages in such cases, see Sams v. Port Royal & Augusta Railway Company, 15 S. C. 484.

It will not be necessary to go into the question of estoppel. That question does not legitimately arise in the case, as it was decided below entirely on the point of title.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded.

When an action, brought in a trial justice's court, must necessarily be considered an action for the recovery of personal property, an affidavit that the property claimed does not exceed in value the sum of $100, is an essential prerequisite to the jurisdiction of that court. But, quære—Where instituted without such prerequisite, and, afterwards, on appeal to this court, the case is remanded to the Circuit Court for new trial there, would an objection to the absence of such affidavit then avail the defendant?

Where the allegations of the summons and complaint, in a trial justice's court, are as appropriate to an action for damages for the taking and detention of personal property, as to an action for its specific recovery on appeal taken to the Court of Common Pleas, the plaintiff may then elect to treat it as an action for damages (especially when so treated in the judgment of the inferior court), and in that case, no affidavit of value is necessary to the jurisdiction. Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 327, approved.

*Before Wallace, J., Marlborough, September, 1881.

Action by Thomas W. Williams against Harriet Irby. The opinion states the case.

Mr. R. T. Caston, for appellant.

Messrs. Townsend & Livingston, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This action was originally commenced before a trial justice by summons and complaint. The summons addressed to the defendant was in the following form: "Complaint having been made to me by Thomas W. Williams that you are indebted to him in the sum of $68, on account of your agent, J. B. Irby, having taken a bale of cotton—said bale being worth said sum of money—on December 9th, 1879, this is, therefore, to require you to appear before me at my office, in ——, within twenty days from the service of this summons, to answer the said complaint, or judgment will be given against you by default." This summons was accompanied by a complaint in which the plaintiff alleged: 1. That on December 9th, 1879, he owned one bale of cotton weighing five hundred pounds. 2. That on that day, the defendant, by her agent, John B. Irby, took the same. 3. That the value of said bale of cotton is less than $100. Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment (1) for the said bale of cotton, or for the sum of $68 in case such possession cannot be had, and (2) for $20 damages for the detention thereof.

The trial justice rendered judgment for the plaintiff for $34 and all costs, from which judgment both parties appealed to the Court of Common Pleas. The case came on for trial in that court before Judge Aldrich, who simply affirmed the judgment of the trial justice, and from his judgment the plaintiff appealed to this court, where it was heard at the last term, when the judgment of Judge Aldrich was reversed and the case was remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial. 15 S. C. 458. Accordingly, the case came on for trial before Judge Wallace, when the defend*ant moved to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that the trial justice had no jurisdiction, inasmuch as it appeared from the record that there was no affidavit of the plaintiff, his agent or attorney, that the value of the property claimed did not exceed the sum of $100. Judge Wallace held that such an affidavit was necessary to give the trial justice jurisdiction of an action to recover possession of personal property, and, therefore, that all the subsequent proceedings were void, and that the objection to the jurisdiction could be made at any time. Thereupon he reversed the judgment of the trial justice, and from his judgment this appeal has been taken.

If the action must necessarily be regarded as an action to recover possession of personal property, we see no error in the ruling of Judge Wallace as to the necessity for the affidavit, inasmuch as Sub-division 10 of Section 74 of the code does seem to require such an affidavit. But whether such an objection would avail the defendant in the Court of Common Pleas, where such an affidavit is not necessary, after the case had been remanded to that court for a new trial, is a question which we do not now propose to consider, inasmuch as the judgment of the Circuit Court must be reversed upon another ground.

As we have said, the affidavit was only necessary in case the action could not be regarded as other than an action to recover the possession of personal property. But we think that the action is not necessarily to be regarded as an action to recover the possession of personal property, and that it may well be regarded as simply an action to recover damages for taking the property of the plaintiff, and of such an action the trial justice clearly had jurisdiction where the damages claimed did not exceed the sum of $100. The trial justice himself seems to have so regarded it, as he rendered judgment simply for damages and not for the return of the property.

The original summons did not indicate that the object of the action was to recover the possession of the bale of cotton, but, on the contrary, clearly indicated that the purpose was simply to recover damages for taking it, measured by the value of the property taken. So, too, all the allegations of the complaint were equally as appropriate to an action for damages as to an *action to recover the possession of personal property. It is true that the demand for relief was in the form suited to an action for the recovery of personal property, but it is well settled that the demand for relief forms no part of the cause of action, and does not even give character to it, inasmuch as the true theory of the code is to give a party such a judgment as his allegations and proofs entitle him to, no matter what may be the form of the demand for relief. Pom. Rem. 630 § 580; Balle v. Moseley, 13 S. C. 441.

In the case of Joplin v. Carrier, 11 S. C. 327, the action was originally commenced before a trial justice and a verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the following form: "For $50 for wagon and harness, or wagon and harness returned to plaintiff, and damages for plaintiff for retention of wagon and harness, $20." Upon appeal to the Court of Common Pleas, that court rendered judgment for $70, with interest, in favor of the plaintiff. In reference to this judgment, this court used the following language: "It is alleged that the judgment is erroneous, as it should have been for the return of the property, and that the value of the property should not have been included in the damages awarded, but assessed separately, so that the value would become part of the damages only in case the property was not returned. The plaintiff had a right to demand either damages for the taking and detention, as in trover for conversion, or the return of the property with damages. The code has not changed the rights of parties in this respect. The provisions of Section 301 of the code apply to a judgment awarding possession of personal property, not to a case where the plaintiff is entitled to general damages. It is for the plaintiff to elect which form of remedy he will pursue. It cannot be objected that the plaintiff's demand in the trial justice's court being for the recovery of a wagon and harness and damages for the detention thereof, it therefore bound him as an election as to the form of judgment. Whether a complaint in a court of record could have that effect need not be considered, but no such effect can be claimed for informal pleadings in a trial justice's court. The case then should proceed to judgment according to the rights of the parties."

*This case, it will be observed, is stronger than the one now under consideration, for here the trial justice evidently treated the case as simply an action for damages, and rendered judgment accordingly, and not for a return of the property, while in Joplin v. Carrier the action seems to have been treated as one for the recovery of personal property and judgment rendered accordingly, and yet the court held that the plaintiff might elect to treat it as an action for damages merely after it had been brought into the Court of Common Pleas by appeal, for the purpose of enabling him to maintain a judgment of that character rendered by that court. So here, we see no reason why the plaintiff could not elect to treat the case as an action for damages merely, after it had been carried into the Court of Common Pleas by appeal, especially as it seems to have been so treated by the trial justice, notwithstanding the form of relief demanded by the complaint; and if it be so regarded, then, clearly, there was no foundation for the objection to the jurisdiction.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

STATE v. CLYBURN.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Jury ⟸110.]

By reason of the non-attendance of one juror and the excusing of three others, only thirty-two jurors were present when two prisoners charged with murder were put upon their trial. To this the defendants made no objection, although apprised of the fact before the drawing commenced, and a jury was empaneled without exhausting their peremptory challenges. Held, that they could not afterwards object to the alleged deficiency of jurors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. § 520; Dec. Dig. ⟸110.]

[2. Jury ⟸66.]

It is not necessary that thirty-six jurors should be present in court. The statute fixes that number as a maximum, not as a minimum. State v. Stephens, 13 S. C. 285.

*After the State had announced that it had closed its testimony, and a witness for the defense had been called and sworn, the trial judge permitted the solicitor to recall a witness to prove a single fact. Held, that in this there was no error—the time when testimony may be introduced must be left to the discretion of the presiding judge.

Before Cothran, J., Kershaw, September, 1881.

Indictment against James Clyburn and Ella Sheorn for murder. When put upon their trial, defendants were informed that only thirty-two jurors were present, one juror not having been sworn and three having been excused by the presiding judge. Other facts are stated in the opinion. From the sentence of the court, Clyburn appealed.

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy and T. H. Clarke, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Bonham, contra.

January 10th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. The appellant and one Ella Sheorn were jointly indicted for murder and the jury rendered a verdict of guilty as to the appellant and not guilty as to Ella Sheorn. From the judgment rendered on this verdict an appeal has been taken by the defendant Clyburn upon two grounds:

1. "Because his Honor the presiding judge erred in permitting the jury which tried the defendant to be empaneled from a list of thirty-two jurors instead of thirty-six jurors, which he was entitled to have, and which the law requires.

2. "Because his Honor the presiding judge erred in permitting the State, after it had closed its testimony, and the first witness for the defense had been sworn, and was on the stand, to recall and examine one of its witnesses, Dr. A. A. Moore."

It appears from the report of the Circuit judge that, before the empaneling of the jury was commenced, the counsel for the defense were apprised of the deficiency in the number of the jurors, and that no motion or request that the panel should be *filled up was made, and that, notwithstanding the fact that the prisoners were entitled to forty peremptory challenges, a jury was obtained from the number present without exhausting the right of peremptory challenge, and this, of itself, would be a sufficient answer to the objection taken by the first ground of appeal, even if it were otherwise well founded. State v. Price, 10 Rich. 356; State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 429.

We do not, however, think that there is any foundation for the position taken in the first ground of appeal: that the law requires that there should be thirty-six jurors. The Act (Gen. Stat., Ch. CXI., Section 18, p.

522,) does not require that there must be that number of jurors present. On the contrary it simply declares that: "No more than thirty-six persons to serve as petit jurors shall be drawn and summoned to attend at one and the same time at any court, unless the court shall otherwise order." So, too, the act of December 24th, 1878, (16 Stat. 802,) entitled "An Act to regulate the number of jurors who shall be in attendance on the courts of Common Pleas and General Sessions," does not require that any particular number should be in attendance. It provides that the number of petit jurors actually in attendance at the court at any one time shall not exceed thirty-six, except where jurors are drawn and summoned to fill up deficiencies occasioned by challenges in a case, in which event it is provided that those so drawn shall serve only until the verdict is rendered in such case. It is manifest, therefore, that these acts prescribe a maximum and not a minimum, and hence the prisoners did not have a right to have the panel filled up to the number of thirty-six, and for this the case of State v. Stephens, 13 S. C. 285, is express authority.

The facts out of which the second ground of appeal arises are as follows: After the solicitor had announced that he had closed the case for the State, and the first witness for the defense had been sworn and placed upon the stand, but before any question had been propounded to her, the solicitor asked permission to recall Dr. Moore, a witness who had been previously examined, for the purpose of proving a single fact which he had omitted to prove. The court granted permission to re-examine the witness, and this is assigned as error in the second ground of appeal.

*The conduct of a case in the Circuit Court, so far as relates to the time when testimony may be introduced, must be left to the discretion of the Circuit judge, to be governed by the particular circumstances of each case. Matthews v. Heyward, 2 S. C. 247. Indeed the courts of this State have gone so far as to hold that a Circuit judge may, in his discretion, permit a plaintiff to introduce other evidence even after a motion for a nonsuit has been made and argued. Browning v. Huff, 2 Bailey 179; Poole v. Mitchell, 1 Hill 404; and these cases have been recognized and followed by this court in the recent case of Kairson v. Puckhaber, 14 S. C. 627. So in Colclough v. Rhodus, 2 Rich. 78, it was held that a Circuit judge might, in his discretion, permit a witness to return to the stand and testify after the case had been submitted to the jury and they had been addressed by counsel. It is true that these were civil cases, but the rules of evidence, with certain exceptions not applicable here, are the same in both civil and criminal cases. 1 Greenl. Evid. 65; State v. Rawls, 2 N. & McC. 331.

In the case now under consideration there is not the slightest reason for supposing that there was any abuse of his discretion on the part of the Circuit judge, and, therefore, it is quite clear that the second ground of appeal cannot be sustained.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

CONEY v. TIMMONS.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Taxation ⇐743.]

Land of A. was sold under legal process and purchased by B., who took titles in his own name, but verbally promised to hold the same in trust for Mrs. A.'s benefit, when paid the amount of his bid, and also certain other sums due by A. to B. Before this sale, B. stated that he would purchase for Mrs. A., and, in consequence of such representation, he obtained the property for less than its value. Mrs. A. took possession of the land and retained it, until sold under execution against B., when it was purchased *by C., with full notice of these facts. Held, that no time being specified for Mrs. A. to make these payments, and no demand being made by B. for compliance, the contract remained of force, and C., having notice, was bound by its terms.

The change of possession was sufficient to take the agreement out of the statute of frauds.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 303; Dec. Dig. ⇐129.]

[3. Taxation ⇐743.]

The representation made by B. was calculated to stifle competition at the sale, which, on that account, under the charge of fraud made in the complaint, might be avoided; but as no party to this cause objects, and A. admits the trust and asks that it be carried into effect, the court will so decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. § 1487; Dec. Dig. ⇐743.]

[4. Limitation of Actions ⇐182.]

The Statute of Limitations cannot avail the defendants, as it was not pleaded, and less than six years had elapsed since Mrs. A. was ousted by C. of her possession.

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, March, 1881.

In this case, Honorable JOSEPH B. KERSHAW, of the Fifth Judicial Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McIVER, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Action commenced in September, 1876, by C. J. Coney and Mary A., his wife, against W. B. Timmons and R. B. Garner, and afterwards, upon the death of Garner, revived against his administrator and heirs-at-law. The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree, which was as follows:

In September, 1867, H. E. P. Sanders, the United States Internal Revenue Collector, sold for taxes seventy-five acres of land, near Timmonsville, as the property of C. J. Coney, and it was bought by W. B. Timmons for $97.50.

J. B. O'Neall Divver was at the sale and had requested Mr. Keith to bid for said land, in behalf of Divver, to the amount of $150. He did not do so, because Timmons told them that he wished to buy the land to secure it to Mrs. Coney, and his statement to same effect is proven by other witnesses. None of them prove the terms of the arrangement between Coney and Timmons for securing the land to her. On that point, there is no *testimony but that of Coney and Timmons, who differ widely in their statements. Coney says he paid the purchase-money, and that Timmons was to hold the land in trust for Mrs. Coney. Timmons says that he, himself, paid the purchase-money; that Coney was to repay that, and also a confidential debt due to Timmons by Coney; also an amount due by him for store rent—the sum not stated. The confidential debt arose thus: Timmons, as sheriff, had sold certain mules to Coney, and delivered them to him, on his promise to pay his bid or return the mules. He did not pay, but, after considerable delay, he returned mules which Timmons says were not those he had sold, but were inferior. Coney says he returned the right mules, except one, which he kept, placing another in its stead. His bid for mules was $485. They brought only $185 at the resale, and Timmons was compelled to pay the $300 difference to the execution creditor. This $300, the store rent, and $97.50 bid for the land, Timmons says, was to be paid by Coney before his wife was to have the land. He waited a month or more for Coney to fulfill his promise, and then being pressed and required by Sanders to comply with his bid, he (Timmons) paid the same and received an absolute title to himself. He allowed Mrs. Coney to take possession of the land, rent it out and receive the rents, because he still expected Coney to comply with his promise.

In November, 1870, the sheriff of Darlington levied on and sold the said land to R. B. Garner, under an execution against Timmons, and at the end of that year Garner got possession and has held the land ever since. He had notice, at the sheriff's sale, of Mrs. Coney's claim, and previously knew that she was in possession of the land.

Being compelled to rely either on the testimony of Timmons, or on that of Coney, in settling the most material point of the case, I choose that of Timmons, partly because he is less interested than Coney, who testifies in behalf of his wife, and partly because the statement of Timmons is more consistent with the unpleasant relations then pending between him and Coney about the mules.

I therefore find that Mary A. Coney was in possession of said land under a valid contract, that it was to be held by Timmons *in trust for her, whenever he should be paid the items before stated, and that R. B. Garner has succeeded to the rights and the obligations of Timmons in that matter. Garner and his heirs have had possession from January, 1871, until now. He greatly improved the land by the yearly use of fertilizers and high cultivation, and the rental value thereby is greater now than it was before he improved it. Since this suit began, Garner died, and his administrator and heirs-at-law have been made parties thereto.

It is adjudged and decreed, That Mary A. Coney is entitled to an account from Garner's administrator and heirs-at-law respectively, of the rents and profits of the said land from the first of January, 1871, until the end of this year, the said rent to be estimated, not according to the present improved condition of the land, but according to its condition at the time Garner got possession. If the said rent, estimated and applied annually, shall fully pay the said sums of $300 and $97.50, and the store rent testified to by Timmons, with interest thereon, at the end of this year, the said land is to be conveyed to Mary A. Coney in fee. If the rents do not pay the said debts, with interest, then the land is to be conveyed to her whenever, after the end of this year, she shall pay the balance due thereon. And if the said rents shall exceed the said debts, with interest, then the amount of the excess is to be paid to the said Mary A. Coney, by the administrator of Garner, out of the assets of his intestate in due course of administration.

It is further ordered, That the clerk of the court take the testimony, and report the value of said rents, according to this decree; also the amount of the store rent, and the date from which it and the $300 should bear interest. That he also state the account, showing the amount of the balance on either side after applying the rents to the said debts.

To this decree, exceptions were filed by all parties, and appeal taken to this court.

Plaintiffs' exceptions were as follows:

1. Because the evidence showed that the defendant, Timmons, bid off the land at the sale by Sanders, at far below its value, *on representations that it was for the benefit of M. A. Coney; that thereby an express technical trust was created in favor of said plaintiff, and his Honor erred in holding that the same was in any way affected by any arrangement subsequently made between the said Timmons and C. J. Coney.

2. Because of error on the part of his Honor, the presiding judge, in holding that M. A. Coney was chargeable for anything more than $97.50, the amount of the bid of said Timmons, on his construction of the evidence, which is excepted to as an error of fact (the evidence establishing that he had received $100 from C. J. Coney to pay such bid).

3. Because, from the evidence, the plaintiff was entitled to the land, with the rents of the same from January 1st, 1871, and his Honor should have so decreed.

4. Because his Honor should have ordered an account between the parties to ascertain the true indebtedness of C. J. Coney to W. B. Timmons, instead of ordering a specific sum to be allowed said Timmons on his own evidence.

Defendants' exceptions were as follows:

1. Because the Circuit judge erred in stating as a conclusion of fact that W. B. Timmons allowed M. A. Coney to take possession of the land, whereas it appears from the testimony that Coney and wife were in possession of the land before the sale to Timmons, and continued to retain possession thereafter without leave or license from Timmons.

2. Because the Circuit judge erred in holding, on the facts of the case and the law applicable to the same, that M. A. Coney had rights and equities in and to the premises in question enforceable in a court of justice, at the time the same were conveyed to R. B. Garner.

3. Because, if M. A. Coney had rights and equities in and to the premises in question at the time of the conveyance to Garner, she lost the same thereafter by her laches, and the Circuit judge should have so held.

4. Because the agreement found as a matter of fact by the presiding judge, not having been reduced to writing, was void, *by reason of the Statute of Fraud, and his Honor, the presiding judge, should have so held.

Mr. W. W. Harllee, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, for defendants.

January 12th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by KERSHAW, A. A. J. We do not find sufficient reason to disturb the findings of fact upon which the Circuit judge based his decree. There is sufficient evidence to sustain them. We shall, therefore, determine the questions made by the appeals upon the state of facts so ascertained.

The case thus presented is substantially as follows: The plaintiff, Mary A. Coney, is the wife of C. J. Coney, the coplaintiff. In September, 1867, the land which is the subject of this action was the property of the said C. J. Coney. It was then sold under an execution against him for taxes due to the United States. It was bought by the defendant, W. B. Timmons, at such sale, under an agreement that it was to be held by him in trust for the plaintiff, Mary A. Coney, whenever he should be paid the price at which he purchased and certain sums of money due to said Timmons by C. J. Coney. This agreement was not in writing, but was established by parol evidence.

There was evidence in the case tending to show that Timmons represented himself, before the sale, as bidding for Mrs. Coney, and that, in consequence of such representation, he purchased the land at an under value. This evidence seems to have been adopted as true by the Circuit judge and is incorporated in his decree.

Titles to the land were duly made to Timmons, and he suffered Mrs. Coney to occupy the same and receive the rents therefor. On November 3d, 1870, Mrs. Coney still being in possession of the land, it was sold under a judgment and execution against W. B. Timmons, at the suit of G. W. Williams & Co., after due levy and advertisement by the sheriff, and pur*chased by R. B. Garner, the defendant, who paid the purchase-money and received titles therefor. Garner, at the time of the purchase, had notice of the rights of Mrs. Coney in the premises.

We do not regard the contract under which Mrs. Coney claims as a conditional one, to be fully performed on her part before she acquired any rights thereunder. No time was specified for the payment by her of the considerations of the agreement, and she was let into possession immediately. As stated in the decree, it was a unilateral contract, there being no express engagement by Mrs. Coney to comply with it; but an implied promise to pay the considerations arose when she assumed the possession of the land under the contract. She became bound by it when she accepted the benefits of it. There being no definite time fixed for the performance on her part, she will not be held to have lost the benefit of the contract by delay until some act was done, or notice given by the other party, requiring performance. Either party might have demanded performance within a reasonable time, and the contract might thus have been waived or forfeited by noncompliance. Seton v. Slade, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq., Pt. 2, *537, Am. Notes; Prothro v. Smith, 6 Rich. Eq. 324.

But here no such demand was made, and the agreement remained a subsidiary contract at the time of Garner's purchase, of which he had notice. He therefore became bound by all the obligations of Timmons in relation thereto. Massey v. McIlwain, 2 Hill Ch. 426.

Aside from the fact of possession by Mrs. Coney, such a contract, not in writing, would be void under the Statute of Frauds. McDonald v. May, 1 Rich. Eq. 91.

Change of possession has long been held to take a case out of the statute on the ground of fraud. It was held that a party receiving a benefit under an agreement could not set up the statute against it, as that would be a fraud, and the statute, intended to prevent frauds, could not be employed to enable a party to perpetrate a fraud. Upon this principle many authorities held that only the party injured by part performance could set up the contract, while the other party would be precluded by the statute from insisting upon its enforcement. Rob. Fr. 138; Buckmaster v. Harrop, 7 Ves. 347. But here it has *been settled that a party who is in possession under a parol agreement to purchase may claim its performance, because, otherwise, he might be treated as a trespasser. 2 Story Eq. 761; Smith v. Smith, 1 Rich. Eq. 136; Kine v. Balfe, 2 Ball & B. *347.

While these authorities are sufficient to sustain the Circuit decree, we think it may also stand upon another principle. It is well established, in this State, that where land has been purchased at an execution sale, either under an agreement to purchase for the benefit of the debtor or of his family, or where the purchaser (there being no agreement) represents himself as so purchasing, and, in consequence, competition is stifled, or the land is bought at an under value, the sale cannot stand. Kinard v. Hiers, 3 Rich. Eq. 423; McDonald v. May, 1 Rich. Eq. 98; Schmidt v. Gatewood, 2 Rich. Eq. 177; Cox v. Cox, 5 Rich. Eq. 365. If, in consequence of the agreement alleged here, and his actions under it, Timmons prevented even one bidder from competing at the sale, it was a fraud upon the sale and he could not retain the title for his own benefit or transmit the same by alienation to one affected with notice.

The last case on the subject is that of Johnston v. Lamotte, 6 Rich. Eq. 347. There Chancellor Johnston gives the following summary of the law:

1. "The bill may aver a contract without time. In such case, if the defendant deny it and plead the Statute of Frauds, or, at the hearing, objects to parol proof, or if he admit the contract and plead the statute, the contract cannot be established by parol—the bill must be dismissed. 2. The bill may aver a contract, and may also charge and set out circumstances of fraud. In such cases * * * whether the defendant admit or deny the contract, it is competent for the plaintiff to waive such portion of the pleadings as relates to the contract and proceed entirely upon the fraud. 3. The plaintiff may file his bill upon the fraud alone, which is certainly the better method of pleading. In this case the defendant has no resource but to deny the fraud, and leave the issue to depend upon the proofs, unless he choose to set up the contract by way of exonerating himself from the *fraud charged against him, in which case he must perform the contract."

There had been some difference of opinion upon the subject between Chancellor Johnston and his brethren of the bench, and he himself tells us that he had in consequence taken "some pains" to set forth a summary of the law with much explicitness. As the whole court concurred in sustaining the decree in Johnston v. Lamotte, the law may be regarded as settled in accordance therewith. It would follow that if an agreement of this character were made, and were so acted on by the purchaser as to procure the land at an under value, in consequence of its use to stifle competition, the statute is avoided where the plaintiff proceeds upon the ground of fraud.

In this case the agreement is alleged in the complaint, and the use made of it to procure the purchase at an under value. It does proceed upon the ground of fraud, and charges it explicitly. According, therefore, to the doctrine laid down in the cases cited the plaintiffs are entitled to relief. Upon the facts which appear here the sale to Timmons might properly be avoided. If the judgment of the court went no further the effect would be to leave the title to the land in C. J. Coney. But he is a party here, and admits by his pleading that it is subject to the trust claimed, and joins with her in asking that it be carried into effect by the judgment of the court. There is no one before the court who has any right to object. There is no reason, therefore, why the court should not do that which will meet all the equities of the case as presented, and this is substantially accomplished by the Circuit decree.

The Statute of Limitations, the benefit of which is claimed by the defendants, was not pleaded, nor had six years elapsed from the time when Mrs. Coney was ousted from the possession of the land (and time did not run against her before), wherefore this statute cannot avail the defendants. We do not find anything in this case to authorize the application of the doctrines of laches, waiver, &c.

The only other matter to be mentioned is that the Circuit decree does not fix any time within which Mrs. Coney is required to pay any balance that may remain due by her upon the account*ing directed. In the further orders to be taken a day should be named for such payment, if anything be due by her, with an alternative provision for its payment out of the land in case of her failure to do so.

The judgment below is affirmed, and the case is remanded to the Circuit Court to carry the same into effect.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

HOGG v. PINCKNEY.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Malicious Prosecution ⇐49; Pleading ⇐406.]

In action for damages for malicious arrest, under bail process, upon allegations of fraud, the plaintiff should allege and prove the absence of probable cause, and, failing to do so, the complaint might properly be dismissed on demurrer orally taken at the trial; but such demurrer having been overruled and testimony upon the question of probable cause freely admitted, and a verdict rendered for plaintiff, this court, on appeal, will not disturb the judgment.

The judge charged the jury that if they, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then they might conclude the defendants had reasonable cause for their action, but, in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants did, then the jury might conclude that the defendants did not have probable cause. This was erroneous, in that it did not confine the jury to the facts and circumstances which surrounded the defendants at the time they acted in procuring the arrest. And for this error a new trial was granted.

[This case is also cited in Acker v. County of Anderson, 20 S. C. 499, without specific application.]

Before Thomson, J., Barnwell, September, 1880.

Action by Thomas F. Hogg against B. G. Pinckney and R. Q. Pinckney, commenced August 5th, 1879, in Barnwell county, then transferred on defendants' demand to Charleston county, where they resided, and afterwards changed to Barnwell, by order of the judge, on account of the convenience of witnesses.

The facts are these: In February, 1877, the defendants here were doing business together in Charleston, under the firm name of Pinckney Brothers, and were engaged in selling a certain brand of fertilizers. Dr. Hopson Pinckney, as their agent, sold, at that time, to the defendant, five tons of this fertilizer, to be paid for in the next November, by the shipment of five bales of cotton. The cotton not being shipped, or other payment made for this fertilizer, the said Pinckney Brothers, in January, 1879, commenced an action against T. F. Hogg, in Barnwell, and, at the same time, made affidavit to the following effect: That these five tons of fertilizer were shipped upon the faith of Hogg's promise to give a lien upon his entire crop to secure the payment of their account for the fertilizers and cash advanced for freight, &c., without which promise the goods would not have been furnished, and that, although Hogg had been repeatedly requested to give the promised lien, he had failed and refused to do so, and had never paid for the goods; and that the defendant was guilty of fraud in contracting the debt for which this action is brought. Upon this affidavit, the clerk of court *issued a warrant for arrest and bail. Hogg was arrested at his home, in the county, by the sheriff. Hogg offered a surety, to whom the sheriff, with his prisoner, went, but this surety declined to justify. Hogg then mentioned other names, whom the sheriff refused to accept, and finally offered a person seven miles distant, to whose house they rode together, and, upon his signature being affixed to the bond, Hogg was released. Soon afterwards, in Barnwell, C. H., the defendant, Hogg, was told by the sheriff that he had learned that two sureties were necessary to a bail bond, and that Hogg must procure another surety, which Hogg then and there did. Hogg afterwards moved before Judge Hudson for an order vacating the order for bail. At the hearing of this motion, affidavit of Dr. Hopson Pinckney was read, which stated that the contract was as set forth in the affidavit for arrest; that five bales of middling cotton of 500 pounds weight each were to be delivered by Hogg at the nearest depot, in the fall of 1877, and that this contract was to be secured by a lien on his entire crop so soon as Hogg received the fertilizers; that a lien was sent to one Garvin for Hogg to execute, but that he had not executed it. Plaintiff's affidavit declared that Hogg had not executed the lien, shipped the cotton or made any payment on the account.

Affidavits submitted by Hogg, and in his behalf, were to the effect that the cotton to be shipped was not middling, but such as was made; that a lien was to be given on only five bales of cotton, and not on the entire crop; that the lien sent to Garvin was a lien upon the entire crop, and Garvin, knowing that the contract was for a limited lien, and other parties who had made similar contracts, having, on that account, refused to sign similar liens, had never presented this lien to Hogg nor told him of it. There was also a conflict in the affidavits upon another point: Dr. Pinckney swore that in the fall, Hogg said he was pushed for money to complete a gin-house which he was then building, and Pinckney told him to finish his gin-house and then pay the debt. Hogg and others swore that Dr. Pinckney was told by Hogg that a debt had unexpectedly been pressed, which, if not paid, would cause him to lose his land, and that he could *not then pay both debts, whereupon Pinckney told Hogg to pay for his land and "we will wait on you."

Upon these affidavits, Judge Hudson granted the order prayed for, and set aside the order of arrest, upon the ground that the only fraud alleged was in the failure to give the lien, whereas, the lien, if given according to the contract, would have been worthless as a security, as the goods were delivered before the time fixed for the lien to be signed; and, moreover, there was no testimony to show that the lien was ever presented to Hogg, and there was testimony to the contrary.

Thereupon this action was commenced, and the testimony at the trial was substantially as above stated.

The presiding judge charged the jury that to entitle the plaintiff to recover, malice on the part of the defendants and the want of probable cause for the arrest must both concur, but that it was not necessary to prove express malice and they could infer it from the want of probable cause. That the material points for them to consider was whether the plaintiff, at the time he agreed to give the lien to defendants, had no intention of giving the same, and that if they found he had no such intention it would go far to show probable cause for the arrest; but on the other hand, if they found that at the time he did intend to give it, it would go far to show want of probable cause. That this action was for damages, and the jury were not limited to the proof of special or actual damage shown in the case, which was not necessary for a recovery. That the jury could find as damages to the sum claimed in the complaint. They were warned, however, if they found for the plaintiff not to permit their feelings to carry them away, but, taking all the facts into consideration, to give a just compensation for the injury sustained by the plaintiff, of which they were the judges. That evidence was intended to assail or substantiate the statement contained in the affidavit and complaint. If the evidence disproves these statements, then, of course, the probable cause is overthrown. If, on the contrary, the evidence supports these statements, or pointedly increases their strength, the probable cause is sustained.

That if the jury, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants *did, then the jury might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action, but in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause.

Defendants requested the court to charge, that the plaintiff could not recover unless he showed that the defendants acted in malice. The court said, I charge you that, gentlemen; but by malice, I do not mean an evil intent, but a gross indifference to the rights of others.

The court also failed to charge the jury as to the effect of the advice of counsel, saying not a word to them about it, although it was urged in the argument. But there was no special request to charge on this point.

The jury found for the plaintiff $1,000.

Defendants moved for a new trial on the minutes upon all the grounds contained in the notice of appeal that relate to the motion for a new trial before the Supreme Court, and his Honor overruled the motion.

The defendants appealed upon the several grounds considered in the opinion of this court; but it will not be amiss to give the full text of the last five exceptions to the judge's charge. They were as follows:

5. Because his Honor erred in instructing the jury that, if they would have acted as defendants did, they should find for defendants, otherwise they should find for the plaintiff.

6. Because his Honor erred in instructing the jury that it was not necessary for the plaintiff to prove actual damage, and that they could find any sum they thought proper, not exceeding $5,000.

7. Because his Honor erred in allowing a partial record of the cause, wherein the plaintiff was arrested, to be submitted to the jury, against the protest of defendants; the defendants were entitled to have the verdict in said cause before the jury, and this was withheld from them.

8. Because his Honor should have instructed the jury that if defendants acted under the advice of counsel in arresting the plaintiff, after a full and fair statement of the case, they were not responsible, and plaintiff could not recover.

*9. Because the verdict is outrageous and excessive, based upon the erroneous charge of his Honor that the jury could give vindictive damages.

In explanation of the seventh exception, it should be stated that, when this record was offered in evidence, the complaint in Pinckney Bros. v. Hogg was in the hands of another jury in their room, and the verdict was not yet published—that case having been tried next before this case.

Mr. J. R. Bellinger, for appellant.

Messrs. Robt. Aldrich and H. M. Thompson, contra.

January 13th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. This is an action for malicious arrest, under civil process, for an alleged fraud in contracting a debt.

The complaint does not allege in terms that the arrest was without probable cause, nor does it allege that the suit wherein the arrest was made had been ended before the commencement of this action. The defendants below—appellants here—demurred orally at the trial, and moved the presiding judge to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it failed to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, being defective in the two particulars above mentioned. This motion was overruled below. It is now renewed here. So that the first question for our consideration is this: Is it necessary, in an action for an alleged malicious arrest on the ground of fraud in contracting a debt, that the plaintiff should allege in his complaint, in terms, that the arrest was made without probable cause, and, also, that the action in which the arrest was made had ended?

It is well understood that all the facts which the plaintiff is required to prove so as to entitle him in law to a verdict, should be alleged in the complaint, either originally or subsequently by amendment actually or impliedly made. This grows out of that first general rule of evidence laid down by Mr. Greenleaf, that the testimony must correspond with the allegations and be confined to the points in issue. It is not necessary, however, to *allege conclusions of law in a complaint. In fact this, under the code, is considered not only unnecessary but bad pleading. Pom. Rem. § 517 et seq.

Now the questions here are: Is the want of probable cause in an arrest for fraud in a civil action a necessary element to plaintiff's recovery when he sues for such arrest, and, if so, is it a question of fact for the jury, to be alleged in the complaint, or is it a question of law for the court, arising upon the facts alleged?

It has often been held that in an action for malicious prosecution, the term prosecution being used in its technical sense, to wit, prosecution for crimes, &c., that the want of probable cause is a necessary element to plaintiff's recovery, and must be alleged and proved. And, as appears from the old forms found in Chitty, the practice prevailed in the old common law mode of pleading, of inserting in the declaration, in terms, that the prosecution was without reasonable or probable cause, as the proper mode of making this allegation, and in the absence of this the pleading was fatally defective. The reasons for the necessity of such an allegation, and especially for the proof of it in actions for criminal prosecutions, originated in considerations of public policy. It is in the interest of good order, of the public peace and quiet, and good government, that criminals should be brought to justice, and to this end it has been held that whatever may be the motive of the prosecutor in a criminal action, he is free from danger if there be a probable cause for the accusation which he makes; and, as a greater protection to him, he is not required to prove the presence of probable cause by way of defense, but the plaintiff must show its absence as a part of his cause of action, and to do this an averment of the want of probable cause has ever been held necessary in such actions. Inclorn v. Berry, 1 Cowp. 204; Add. Torts §§ 852, 853; Given v. Webb, 7 Rob. 65; Chit. Pl. 261, note; 1 Greenl. Evid. 78, § 449.

The consideration of public policy referred to above as applicable to criminal prosecutions, may not apply as fully to arrests under civil process as to criminal, but yet it has been also held that arrests in suits at law are not actionable where probable cause exists, and that it is equally as necessary in actions for *malicious arrest as in actions for criminal prosecutions, for the plaintiff to allege and prove the want of probable cause. Chit. Pl. 261, note. 2 Greenl. Evid. § 449, treats of malicious arrests as governed by the same principles as malicious prosecutions. See Cooper v. Halbert, 2 McM. 419; Goslin v. Wilcock, 2 Wils. 307; Ford v. Kelsey & Deas, 4 Rich. 365.

This was the doctrine under the old law when parties could be held to bail for causes other than fraud in contracting a debt. It was founded upon the principle that every man has the right to appeal to the courts when he thinks he has been injured, and, as was said by Lord Campbell, in Goslin v. Wilcock, supra, the courts will be cautious in discouraging men from suing; and we can see no reason, since imprisonment for debt has been abolished and arrests in civil matters have been confined to fraud and to that alone, why this doctrine should not still apply, and why parties who arrest others for fraud in contracting a debt should not be exempt from action until the absence of probable cause for such arrest is alleged and proved.

Is it necessary, however, that the want of probable cause should be alleged in terms? Under the common law pleadings, as we have already stated, such was the practice. But under that mode of pleading the line between conclusions of law and the statement of fact was not very nicely drawn. As will be remembered, the old declaration usually embraced both. The code, however, has made a change in this respect, (§ 165, subd. 2,) providing that a plain and concise statement of the facts constituting a cause of action, without unnecessary repetition, is all that is required, conclusions of law being entirely excluded. Since the adoption of the code, then, it may be contended that the old forms are unimportant as precedents; that the code in its substance must govern, and as that requires an allegation of facts simply, it is not proper to embrace in the complaint conclusions of law. This is sound doctrine, but does it apply in cases of this kind? This must depend upon whether the absence of probable cause is a question of fact or a question of law.

Upon reading the cases already cited, it will be seen that probable cause itself is a mixed question of law and fact, involving both, the question of law being whether the facts proved *constitute probable cause, and the question of fact whether the facts alleged are true—the first being a question for the court and the second for the jury. But whether this probable cause, as thus understood, is absent or present in a particular case, is a question of fact dependent upon the circumstances of each case; and being a question of fact and a necessary fact to plaintiff's recovery in actions both for malicious prosecution and malicious arrest, as we have seen from the authorities already cited, it must be alleged in each. There being no allegation of that character in the complaint in this case, in our opinion it was obnoxious to the oral demurrer interposed below by the appellant, and it would not have been error for the judge below to have dismissed it on that account. But this was not done, and at the trial testimony on the question of probable cause, both for and against, was fully admitted. In fact the case turned upon this as one of the facts involved. Now the code is quite liberal as to amendments and its spirit is averse to non-suits and dismissals upon technical objections, especially where it is manifest that no advantage is taken of either party by surprise.

In accordance with this spirit it has been held that amendments may be made either during the trial or after verdict, so as to make the complaint conform to the testimony received without objection. In Cade v. Perrin, 14 S. C. 1, Willard, C. J., said: "That was a case under the code for not restraining the verdict to the issue framed in the pleadings, and that it properly went to the jury upon the evidence, with or without previous amendment of the pleadings, and it was decided in that case that when it appears upon the trial of a case, by evidence admitted without objection, or properly admitted under the pleadings, that the plaintiff is entitled to a remedy upon the case exhibited, he cannot be turned out of court merely because the cause of action set forth in his complaint does not conform to such state of proof." To the same effect was Porcelain Man. Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. 5. In Morton v. Pinckney, 8 Bosw. 135, it was held that an objection at the trial that a complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, is not available on appeal from the judgment where the defect is supplied by the evidence at the trial. Under these authorities, in *view of the testimony introduced in this case, the motion to dismiss the complaint, renewed here, must be refused.

Was the complaint defective because it did not state that the action in which the arrest had been made had ended before the commencement of plaintiff's action for this arrest? We think not.

It is true that in actions for malicious prosecution the complaint must allege that the prosecution was at an end, but this is because in criminal prosecutions the very question of probable cause is to some extent involved—so much so, at least, that it cannot be determined certainly, until the prosecution is ended, whether or not probable cause existed for the proceeding. If an action was permitted for damages before the prosecution terminated, either by acquittal, nol. pros., discharge, or in some other way, it could not be known but that the accused might be convicted, so that it is necessary in such case for the plaintiff to await the result of the prosecution before he becomes entitled to his action. But this doctrine does not apply in a case of the kind now before the court. Here an action was brought by the appellants against the respondent for debt; the cause of action was for cash advanced and goods sold. As an incident to this action the respondent was held to bail on an allegation of fraud in contracting this debt. The alleged fraud was no part of the debt, nor would the adjudication of the question whether or not the appellants were entitled to recovery in the action which they instituted, throw any light on the fraudulent conduct of respondent. That was a separate and distinct matter, and not involved necessarily in the action itself, and we can see no reason why plaintiff's right to action should depend on the termination of that suit.

It was, perhaps, necessary that plaintiff should allege that he had been discharged from the arrest. This fact he did allege in the third paragraph of the complaint. This, we think, was sufficient. See the well-considered case of Fortman v. Rattier & Hoenig, 8 Ohio St. 548. That was a case for maliciously and without probable cause issuing an attachment in aid of a civil action, in which it was held that "where the trial and judgment, in such former suit does not necessarily involve the question of *probable cause for issuing the attachment, it is not necessary that the plaintiff should aver or prove the termination of such former suit. Neither, in such case, was it necessary to aver or prove upon the trial that the attachment complained of had been discharged or otherwise terminated adversely to the claim of the party employing its aid before suit brought." In the case now before the court the arrest complained of was in aid of the civil action for debt, and in many respects similar to the case of Fortman v. Rattier & Hoenig, supra. We think there is no ground to dismiss the complaint on this ground.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony below, the appellants, defendants, moved for a non-suit on the following grounds: 1. Because no express malice on the part of the defendants being proved, the action cannot be sustained, and his Honor erred in holding that it was not necessary to prove express malice. 2. Because no actual damage to the plaintiff was proved, without which the action cannot be sustained, and his Honor erred in so holding. 3. Because the proof was abundant that the defendants did not act maliciously and without probable cause, but, on the contrary, the evidence rebutted malice and showed probable cause.

This motion was overruled below and it is renewed here. A non-suit is only proper when there is no evidence to support the material allegations of the complaint, and whether or not there is an absence of all testimony is always a question for the judge; whether the evidence is sufficient is for the jury. The two first grounds for the motion below raised questions of law, viz.: 1. Whether it was necessary to prove express malice; and, 2. Whether it was necessary to prove actual damage. These questions should have been raised strictly by request to charge and not by motion for non-suit. The judge, however, it is alleged, ruled adversely to appellants upon these questions, and, under this ruling, it made no difference whether express malice or actual damage was proved or not, so far as the motion for non-suit is concerned.

Was there error in his holding that it was not essential that either express malice or actual damage should be proved? The term "malice," as applied to torts, does not necessarily mean *that which must proceed from a spiteful, malignant or revengeful disposition, but a conduct injurious to another, though proceeding from an ill-regulated mind not sufficiently cautious before it occasions an injury to another. 2 Bouv. Dic. 98. "Malice," says Lord Campbell, C. J. (quoted in Broom Com. 756,) "in the legal acceptation of the word is not confined to a personal spite against individuals, but consists in a conscious violation of law to the prejudice of another. It is of two kinds—malice in law and malice of fact; malice in law being a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse; malice in fact being a personal malice against an individual, or a general disregard of the right consideration due to all mankind, which may not be directed against any one, but is nevertheless productive of injury to the complainant." Broom Com. 736.

Malice is understood to be express when the testimony shows an express intent to commit the illegal injury complained of with the view to injure another. It is implied where it shows a disregard of the consequences of the injurious act, without reference to any special injury which he may inflict on another. Express malice is expended in the commission of an intended injury; implied malice, in doing some illegal act for one's own gratification or purposes, without regard to the rights of others or the injury he may inflict on another.

In Willis v. Knox, 5 S. C. 476, it was held that it was necessary to prove both express malice and actual damage, and in the absence of such proof a new trial was granted, and, Frierson v. Hewitt, 2 Hill 499, was relied on to support this principle. Upon an examination of Frierson v. Hewitt it will be seen that although Judge O'Neall, in delivering the opinion of the court, did say that express malice was necessary in such cases, yet that question was not involved in the case and this remark was obiter. The case of Frierson v. Hewitt involved simply the question whether an action for malicious prosecution would lie where the indictment failed to charge a crime, the court holding in such case that such action would not lie. This was the only question raised or decided. The case of Willis v. Knox was an action for malicious prosecution, as was also the case of Frierson v. Hewitt.

In actions of that kind there may be good reasons founded on *public policy why express malice, in the sense of intent to injure the plaintiff, should be proved before the prosecutor should be held accountable. As has been already said, the public peace and safety require the punishment of law-breakers, and it may be that prosecutors should be held harmless until it appears that they have attempted to subordinate the courts to the gratification of their malignant desire to injure the accused, and for no other purpose. In the case of Ford v. Kelsey & Deas, 4 Rich. 372, decided after Frierson v. Hewitt, where an action had been brought for malicious arrest under bail process, Judge O'Neall, who also delivered the opinion in Frierson v. Hewitt, reserved the question whether express malice was necessary, saying: "Without adverting to the necessity of showing express malice to sustain a case of this kind, about which no opinion is now intended to be given on the part of the court, it is enough to sustain the non-suit if the plaintiff failed to show that the defendant held him to bail without any reasonable or probable cause." We do not find any authority for the position that in an action for malicious arrest, express malice must be proved, and we do not think that the principle which requires it in actions for malicious prosecution applies to actions for malicious arrest.

Was it necessary to prove actual damages? Mr. Greenleaf, (Vol. 2, § 456,) in discussing actions for malicious prosecutions and malicious arrest, says: "As to the damage, whether the plaintiff has been prosecuted by indictment, or by civil proceedings, the principle of assessing damages is the same, and he should be entitled to indemnity for the peril occasioned to him in regard to his life or liberty, for the injury to his reputation, his feelings and his person, and for all expenses. And if no evidence is given of any particular damages yet the jury are not therefore obliged to find nominal damages only." Referring to Tripp v. Thomas, 3 B. & C. 427, Judge O'Neall, in Frierson v. Hewitt, says: "In such cases you must not only show want of probable cause, but also express malice (this was a case of malicious prosecution) and actual injury or loss, as deprivation of liberty and money paid in defense." These authorities show that it is not necessary to prove actual damages in the sense of the objection made. See case of Rowe v. Moses, 9 Rich. 426 [67 Am. Dec. 560].

*As to the third ground for non-suit, there was, certainly, some testimony, and enough, as it seems, for the jury to render a very heavy verdict for the plaintiff. There was no error in the judge's refusing the non-suit below, and there is no ground for this court to grant the motion now.

The appellant excepts to the charge of the presiding judge upon several grounds, which will now be considered. As to the first exception, there seems to have been a misconception on the part of the appellant. The judge, in settling the case, corrects this mistake, which renders it unnecessary to consider this exception.

2. Because his Honor charged the jury that they could infer malice from the want of probable cause. The ruling of the judge is sustained by Horn v. Boon, 3 Strobh. 309.

3. Appellant objects because the judge left the question of probable cause to the jury as a question of fact. We do not understand, from the charge of the judge, that he left this question to the jury as a question of fact; on the contrary, he said "that the evidence in the case was intended to assail or substantiate the statement contained in the affidavit and the complaint. If the evidence disproves these statements, then, of course, probable cause is overthrown. If, on the other hand, the evidence supports, * * * then the probable cause is sustained." This was, in effect, saying to the jury that, in law, whether or not probable cause existed depended upon the truth of the facts alleged in the complaint, on the one hand, and the affidavit on the other, and that it was for the jury to determine the truth of these allegations respectively. In this he decided the question of law himself, and left the facts to the jury. This exception cannot be sustained.

4. "Because, though his Honor charged the jury that malice was necessary to sustain the action, yet he erred in saying that by malice was not meant an evil intent, but a gross indifference to the rights of others." This, and the sixth exception, as to actual damages, raises the question of express malice and actual damages already discussed above, and they need no further consideration.

The seventh exception as to admission of a portion of the *record in evidence is untenable. The arrest and discharge were all that plaintiff desired to prove. That portion of the record which proved these facts he introduced; the remainder was wholly irrelevant.

As to the eighth, there is nothing in the record which shows that the judge was requested to charge upon the advice given to appellant by his counsel, and, therefore, this exception cannot properly be considered; but even if it was before us, we do not think that the judge could have charged as desired where defendant acted under the advice of counsel. That is a fact which, if it exists, should always go to the jury, as it did in this case, with the other facts and circumstances bearing upon the questions of malice and want of probable cause, but it could not, in itself, shield the party from all responsibility.

The fifth exception has been reserved for the last, because, upon this, a new trial must be ordered. The judge seems to have charged the jury that if they, as reasonable men, under the circumstances proved, would have acted as the defendants did, then they might conclude the defendants had probable cause for their action; but, in view of the testimony, if the jury would not have acted as the defendants, then the jury might conclude the defendants did not have probable cause. If the judge had confined the jury to the facts and circumstances which surrounded the defendants at the time they acted, then his charge would not have been objectionable. But he went further than this and permitted them to consider all the facts developed on the trial, whether they were present before the defendant at the time of the arrest or not. This, we think, was error.

It may be that the minds of the jury were not influenced by any additional facts elicited at the trial other than those surrounding the defendants when the arrest took place: but we do not know this. Under the charge of the judge, they were at liberty to consider all the testimony offered at the trial bearing upon the question of probable cause, whether known to the defendants at the arrest or not, and their verdict may have been founded, in part at least, upon these subsequent facts. This exception must, therefore, be sustained.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Cir*cuit Court be reversed upon the fifth exception and the case be remanded for a new trial, with the privilege, on the part of respondent, to amend his complaint so as to allege distinctly the want of probable or reasonable cause.

McLAURIN v. WILSON.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Acknowledgment ⇐33; Husband and Wife ⇐15.]

The interest of a husband, in his wife's land, was sold under execution in 1840, and purchased by C., and a year afterwards the wife executed a deed to C., in which a valuable consideration was stated and its receipt acknowledged; but the husband did not join in this deed, and no reference whatever was made to the sheriff's deed. Upon this latter deed was indorsed a certificate dated eight days afterwards, signed by the wife and a proper officer, but not under his seal; this certificate was in the usual form prescribed for the renunciation by married women of their inheritance, with the omission, however, of the declaration "that she did, at least seven days before such examination, actually join her husband in executing such release." Held, that the interest of the wife in this land was not conveyed to C., for the double reason, that the omitted declaration was essential, and so was the officer's seal.

*Action by D. B. McLaurin, widower, and Henry J. McLaurin and others, children and grandchildren of Mrs. Agnes D. McLaurin, who died in 1863, against J. Harvey Wilson and others, heirs-at-law of Isaac James Chandler, commenced in 1872. The deed of Mrs. Chandler, mentioned in the opinion, was not produced, nor the certificate endorsed, and the record in the register's office was introduced. In this copy, a flourish of three curves was below and attached to the last letter in the officer's name: and this, the defendants insisted, was intended for a seal. This certificate was as follows:

"South Carolina, Sumter District—I, Mason Remes, one of the justices of the quorum for said district, do hereby certify unto all whom it may concern, that the within-named Agnes D. McLaurin did this day appear before me, and, upon being privately and separately examined by me, did declare that she did actually sign and execute the within release, and that the same was positively and bona fide executed at least seven days before this examination, and that she did then and still does, at this time, freely, voluntarily, and without any compulsion, dread or fear of any person or persons whomsoever, renounce, release and forever relinquish all her estate, interest and inheritance to the premises mentioned in the within release, unto the said Isaac J. Chandler and his heirs and assigns forever.

"Given under my hand and seal this second day of February, 1841.

Agnes D. McLaurin.

Mason Remes, Q. U.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

The Circuit decree, omitting its statement of the case, was as follows:

The first and main question is: Does the release and the renunciation of inheritance thereon convey the estate of Mrs. Agnes McLaurin to Isaac James Chandler?

Since the cases of Hillegas and Wife v. Hartley, 1 Hill Ch. 106, and Kottman and Wife v. Ayer, 1 Strobh. 552, I had supposed the question as to the manner of conveying the wife's estate of inheritance in land settled and no dispute could hereafter arise on that subject. The mode of conveying the estate is regu*lated by act of assembly: the object is to protect it against the husband and preserve it to the wife and children. Although the law allows the use of the estate to the husband during coverture and gives him one-third of it after the death of the wife, yet he cannot alien it unless she conforms substantially to the terms of the act permitting her to alienate. What are those terms? She must join her husband in the release, and seven days after go before a judge or justice and declare that she has joined, &c. Has this been done? The sheriff sold McLaurin's interest in his wife's estate which was the usufruct during coverture. A year after, Mrs. McLaurin made a title in fee of this land to her brother and trustee, Mr. Chandler, in which she is not joined by her husband, and not one word of reference is made to the sale by the sheriff. From all that appears on the fact of the deed, the husband had no interest in the land conveyed. It is not described as the land heretofore sold by the sheriff, nor is she alluded to as a married woman, the wife of D. B. McLaurin. From all that appears it is the deed of a feme sole. More than this, the renunciation on the back of the deed does not describe her as the wife of D. B. McLaurin. If it be true, as Chancellor Dunkin said in Kottman's Case (p. 577), the deed of a feme covert is a mere nullity—she has no legal existence: and if the object of the act was to protect the wife and secure her inheritance to her and her children against her own extravagance or the imprudence or misfortune of the husband, the wisdom of the rule is manifest that insists on a substantial compliance with the terms of the act before such a release can be effected. These papers are so defective—fall so far short of what the law requires, that to uphold them is impossible.

As to the payment of the $1,911, the consideration for the purchase, while I am free to say that the finding of a referee on a question of fact is not binding on the court, yet, like the verdict of a jury, it will not be disturbed unless against the weight of the testimony. The referees who made this finding, are intelligent gentlemen, learned in the law; they had the witnesses before them, and every opportunity to judge the value of their testimony; they live in the same county; know them personally or by reputation.

I cannot say I have come to a *different opinion in reading the evidence. This finding is supported by the consideration that Mr. Chandler was the brother of Mrs. McLaurin. She was very poor; he a man of fortune. As trustee, he made returns, as appears from the report, and yet not one dollar of the receipt or disbursement of this $1,911 can be found in his returns. It is said he expended it in the support of his sister and her family, but we are not allowed to resort to conjecture. As trustee, it was his duty, not only to account for her estate, but, when required, to exhibit his vouchers for expenditures. This was his sister's inheritance; so far as I can see, it was all she had left of her paternal estate. With a large family struggling against poverty, duty and affection alike combined to induce him to save to her this remnant. And if we are allowed to resort to conjecture, the more charitable construction would be that he was saving this pittance to his less fortunate sister and her children.

It is not necessary to consider the other exceptions.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the exceptions be overruled, and the report confirmed and made the judgment of the court.

The points made by the exceptions are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Moise & Lee, for appellants.

The release was effectual to convey Mrs. McLaurin's interest. We must consider the purpose, intention and object of the act. Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 230, 246, 260; 1 Bl. Com. 61. January 16th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover possession of *real estate, the title to which, it was conceded, was at one time in Mrs. Agnes D. McLaurin. The plaintiffs claim as heirs-at-law of Mrs. McLaurin, and the defendants, who are the heirs-at-law of Isaac J. Chandler, claim under an alleged conveyance from her to him. The land in question being the estate of inheritance of Mrs. McLaurin prior to her marriage with the defendant, D. B. McLaurin, his interest in it was sold, after the marriage, under executions against him, and bought by said Chandler, who took a deed for the same from the sheriff dated January 4th, 1840.

On January 25th, 1841, Mrs. McLaurin, while still a feme covert, executed a paper purporting to be a deed conveying the tract of land in question to the said Chandler. This paper is in the usual form of a conveyance of real estate, with covenant of warranty, and recites, as a consideration, "the sum of one thousand nine hundred and eleven dollars to me paid or secured to be paid by Isaac J. Chandler." There is nothing in the paper indicating that Mrs. McLaurin was at the time a married woman, and no allusion is made to the fact that her husband's interest in the land had been previously sold by the sheriff and bought by Chandler, but, on the contrary, it appears to be simply the independent deed of a feme sole. Upon this instrument there is endorsed a certificate signed by Mrs. McLaurin and by Mason Remes, one of the justices of the quorum, substantially in the form prescribed by the act of 1795, for the renunciation of the wife's inheritance, with the important exception, however, that it contains no declaration "that she did, at least seven days before such examination, actually join her husband in executing such release." Whether this certificate was under the seal of the justice is one of the questions of fact in the case.

Two defenses were set up: 1. That Chandler took a legal title under the papers above stated. 2. That if the court should hold that there was no valid release of Mrs. McLaurin's estate of inheritance, then the payment of the purchase-money, acknowledged by the paper purporting to be the deed of Mrs. McLaurin, operates as an equitable estoppel, and prevents her and those who claim under her as heirs-at-law from disputing the title of Chandler, under whom the defendants claim.

The case was referred to three referees

"to hear and determine *the whole issues in the action," and they made a report finding, in substance, as matters of fact: 1. That the certificate of the justice was not under seal. 2. That the consideration mentioned in the deed had not, in fact, been paid; and, as matter of law, that the estate of Mrs. McLaurin had never been conveyed to Chandler, and that upon the termination of the coverture by her death, her estate descended to the plaintiffs as her heirs-at-law. They also found that the purchase-money mentioned in the deed having never, in fact, been paid, there was no foundation for the equitable estoppel insisted upon by the defendants. Accordingly they found that the plaintiffs were entitled to recover the land described in the complaint, with five dollars damages, and, also, the costs of the case. This report, upon exceptions thereto, was heard by the Circuit judge, who overruled the exceptions and confirmed the report of the referees, and from his judgment this appeal has been taken.

The questions raised by the appeal are: 1. As to the sufficiency of the alleged release of inheritance. 2. As to the equitable estoppel. 3. As to the competency of certain testimony, of which a more particular statement will hereinafter be made.

As the law stood at the time of the transactions now brought in question, there can be no doubt that a married woman was not capable of binding herself by deed unless vested with power so to do by some act of the legislature or by some will or deed, and then only in the manner and to the extent prescribed by such act, will or deed. Brown v. Spand, 2 Mill Con. R. 12; Hays v. Hays, 5 Rich. 38. These and other cases cited in respondent's brief show with what rigid exactness our courts required that all the provisions of the statute providing the mode by which a married woman might release her inheritance in real estate should be complied with. As is said in Pitts v. Wicker, 3 Hill 199: "The right of inheritance of a married woman is protected with jealous vigilance by the law. She cannot be deprived of it but by a scrupulous adherence to the statute providing the mode in which a married woman may part with her inheritance in land." The real inquiry, therefore, in this case is whether the papers claimed to operate as a release of Mrs. McLaurin's inheritance are in compliance with the act of

1795 (5 *Stat. 257). That act provides, amongst other things, that a wife may bar herself of her inheritance "by joining with her husband in a release to the purport of the one hereinbefore prescribed," provided she will go before some judge or justice and declare, amongst other things, "that she did, at least seven days before such examination, actually join her husband in executing such release," and that a certificate to this effect signed by the woman and under the hand and seal of the judge or justice "shall be endorsed on the release, or contained in a separate instrument of writing to the same effect."

It is very manifest that the terms of this act were not complied with. The wife did not join her husband in executing the release which is expressly required by the act, and the certificate does not contain the declaration of the wife, which the act likewise expressly requires, "that she did, at least seven days before such examination, actually join her husband in executing such release," and indeed could not, consistently with the fact, contain any such declaration. There is not even the semblance of any concurrence of action on the part of husband and wife in conveying away her estate. The paper purporting to be a deed, signed by Mrs. McLaurin, makes no allusion to her husband whatever. It does not even purport to be the deed of a married woman, but, on the contrary, appears on its face to be the deed of a feme sole. It cannot be connected with the deed from the sheriff conveying the interest of her husband, for it does not even allude to such a conveyance. The two papers purport to convey separate and distinct interests—one the interest of the husband, the other the interest of the wife—and there is nothing whatever indicating any connection between them.

In Page v. Page, 6 Cush. 196, citing Powell v. Monson, 3 Mason 347, and Shaw v. Russ, 2 Shep. 432, it was held that the deed of a married woman, executed by her alone, relinquishing her dower in land previously conveyed by her husband, by his separate deed, did not bar her of her dower. And although this was a case of dower, yet as the statutes of Massachusetts prescribing the mode of releasing dower are very much the same as our statute in reference to the mode of releasing inheritance—requiring the wife to join with her husband in executing the deed

—*the principles there decided would apply to the case now under consideration. The paper purporting to be the deed of Mrs. McLaurin must, therefore, be regarded as a nullity.

There is also another fatal objection to the alleged release of inheritance. The act expressly requires that the certificate shall be under the hand and seal of the justice, but the fact as found by the referees and by the Circuit judge, is that there was no seal affixed to the name of the justice, and we see no ground to impeach such finding of fact. In addition to the fact that the act expressly requires that the certificate shall be under seal, it has been distinctly decided that the want of a seal is fatal to the validity of the release. McCreary v. McCreary, 9 Rich. Eq. 34.

As to the equitable estoppel relied upon as a defense, it would be quite sufficient to say that the fact upon which it is based, viz., the payment of the purchase-money, has been found against the appellants by the referees, and their finding has been concurred in by the Circuit judge. This, according to the well-settled rule of this court, is conclusive here, unless such finding is without any evidence to support it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. It certainly cannot be said that there was no evidence to support the finding, and we cannot say that it is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. We may add, however, that even if this fact were established we do not think that it would work an estoppel. For, as was well argued by respondent's counsel, such a proposition, if adopted as a rule of law, would effectually destroy all the safeguards provided by statute for the protection of the rights of married women. The statute prescribes certain formalities which must be observed in order to render the release of a married woman's inheritance valid; but if the mere fact that the purchase-money has been paid to the married woman be sufficient to divest her or her heirs of the estate, then the provisions of the statute might, in every instance, be very easily defeated, and the protection which the statute was designed to throw around the rights of married women would become a mere delusion, and the provisions of the statute rendered wholly nugatory.

The next inquiry is whether D. B. McLaurin, a party to the action, was a competent witness, under Section 415 of the code, *to testify to a conversation between his wife and Chandler, the deceased ancestor of the defendants. It will be observed that the exception to the general rule established by that section of the code is "that no party to the action or proceeding * * * shall be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person at the time of such examination deceased * * * as a witness against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir-at-law," &c., when the interest of such witness can in any way be affected by such examination, but it does not preclude a party from testifying to a transaction or communication between such deceased person and another. Hence, while D. B. McLaurin would not have been competent to testify as to any transaction or communication between himself and Chandler, the terms of the statute do not prevent him from testifying as to a conversation between his wife and Chandler. Roe v. Harrison, 9 S. C. 279; Hughey v. Eichelberger, 11 S. C. 49. It is clear, therefore, that there was no error in admitting the testimony of D. B. McLaurin as to what passed between his wife and Chandler.

The only remaining inquiry is whether there was error in excluding the deposition of Henry Spann, taken by the clerk under the act of February 15th, 1872, (15 Stat. 41.) It seems that the testimony of this witness had been taken by the clerk, under that act, some time before the hearing by the referees. At that hearing, Spann was present, and was examined and cross-examined orally, and after the conclusion of the examination the defendants offered in evidence the deposition of Spann taken before the clerk, which, upon objection, was ruled inadmissible upon the ground that the testimony of the witness, taken ore tenus, superseded the deposition of the witness taken by the clerk. This ruling seems to be in accordance with the rule in regard to testimony taken de bene esse, but this deposition was not so taken; but, on the contrary, it was taken under the provisions of a special statute, and we must look alone to the provisions of that statute for the rule to govern us in regard to such testimony. The statute, after providing for taking the deposition of any witness, not simply such as could have been examined de bene esse under the old law, declares as follows: "And the deposi*tions so taken shall be certified by the clerk before whom such examination was had, and shall be read in evidence at the trial of the said cause or proceeding, subject, nevertheless, to the right of either party to require the personal attendance and viva voce examination of the witness or witnesses at the trial of said cause or proceeding." Under the imperative language of this statute we think the defendants had the right to have the deposition of Spann read in evidence at the trial, which, however, did not preclude the viva voce examination of the witness if either party desired it. The statute does not assimilate the taking of such depositions to the taking of testimony de bene esse, but, on the contrary, expressly requires that such depositions "shall be read in evidence at the trial," with the privilege to either party to have the witness examined ore tenus, if his attendance can be procured without delaying the proceedings.

But, while there was error in this respect, we think it was wholly immaterial and that it could not affect the result. For, as we have determined that the alleged release of inheritance by Mrs. McLaurin was an absolute nullity, and that neither she nor those who claim under her would be estopped by the payment of the purchase-money to her even if such fact had been fully proved, we cannot conceive how the testimony improperly excluded could affect the result. This, therefore, affords no ground for reversing the judgment below. Susong v. Vaiden, 10 S. C. 247 [30 Am. Rep. 50].

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit court be affirmed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

January 16th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. In this case the relator invokes the original jurisdiction of this court for the purpose of obtaining a writ of prohibition to restrain the city council of Columbia from issuing certain licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors.

The question which confronts us at the outset is whether this court has the power to issue the writ prayed for. The powers of this court are derived from the constitution, and the only portion of that instrument which could be supposed to confer the power in question is Section 4 of Article IV., which reads as follows: "The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction only in cases of chancery, and shall constitute a court for the correction of errors at law, under such regulations as the General Assembly may by law prescribe; provided, the said court shall always have power to issue writs of injunction, mandamus, quo warranto, habeas corpus, and such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general supervisory control over all other courts in this State." It will thus be seen that this court has power to issue certain specified writs in any case where such a remedy may be appropriate, (Wallace v. Hayne and Mackey, 8 S. C. 374,) and that it also has power to issue such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give *it a general supervisory control over all other courts in the State. Accordingly it has been held that when this court is asked to issue a writ which is not among those specifically named in the above cited section of the constitution, it must be made to appear that the writ is asked for to enable this court to exercise some supervisory control over some one of the courts of this State, as this court has no power to issue such a writ except to some one of the courts of this State for the purpose above indicated.

In the case of Ex parte Carson, 5 S. C. 117, an application was addressed to the Supreme Court, in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, "for a writ of certiorari [which is not one of the writs specifically named in that section of the constitution] to the board of commissioners of elections of the city of Charleston, to remove into that court the plaint and record, together with the testimony taken by them, in a certain case in which an election for mayor and aldermen of the city of Charleston had been contested." The application was refused upon the ground that this court had no power to issue a writ of certiorari, except to some one of the courts of the State, in which, by the constitution, the judicial power of the State had been vested, and the board of commissioners of elections was not a court. In that case,

Moses, C. J., in delivering the opinion of the court, after stating that the authority of the Supreme Court to issue the writs specifically named in the section of the constitution above quoted is not limited, either as to subject-matter or as to the persons or bodies to whom they are to be addressed, uses this language: "This unrestrained right, as to the writs specified, does not attach to 'other original writs,' in which that now sought is included. The very qualification which is annexed shows that the power is restricted, and that a more limited jurisdiction was intended."

In Ex parte Childs, 12 S. C. 117, it is said that: "The jurisdiction of this court is defined in Section 4, Article IV. of the constitution, and, as there defined, it embraces four distinct classes of powers: 1. Appellate jurisdiction in 'cases of chancery.' 2. The correction of errors at law under such regulations as the General Assembly may prescribe. 3. The power to issue certain specified writs. 4. The power to issue such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general super*visory control over all other courts in the State;" and after showing that the fourth class of powers conferred are not general and absolute, but can only be exercised in such cases where they may be necessary to give this court some supervisory control over some one of the courts of this State, holds that, whenever this court is asked to issue one of the writs not specifically mentioned in the above-cited section of the constitution, it is necessary to make it appear: 1. That the writ is to go to one of the courts of this State. 2. That such writ is demanded for the purpose of enabling this court to exercise some supervisory control over the court to which the writ is to be directed.

In the case now under consideration, the application, as we have seen, is for a writ of prohibition, which is not one of the writs specifically named in the clause of the constitution above referred to, but falls under the general denomination of other original and remedial writs embraced in the fourth class of powers above stated. Hence, the first inquiry is whether the writ asked for is to go to one of the courts of this State; and, 2d. Whether such writ is demanded for the purpose of enabling this court to exercise some supervisory control over the court to which it is to be directed.

The body to which the writ is to be directed is the body in which the municipal authority of the city of Columbia is vested, called in the act incorporating said city "The mayor and aldermen of the city of Columbia," and the questions are: Whether that body is such a court as is contemplated by the constitution, and, if so, whether the writ is demanded for the purpose of enabling this court to exercise some supervisory control over such body acting in its judicial capacity? For if the writ is demanded for the purpose of controlling or supervising the action of the municipal authorities when acting otherwise than in their judicial capacity, it could not properly be said that the writ was issued for the purpose of enabling this court to exercise a supervisory control over one of the courts of this State.

The mayor and aldermen are invested with various powers by the charter of the city—legislative, executive, judicial and administrative—but they certainly cannot be regarded as one of the courts of this State except when acting in a judicial capacity, *and this court, therefore, has no power to issue a writ of prohibition for the purpose of supervising or controlling their action, unless such action be taken in their judicial capacity. Here the application is to restrain them from issuing certain licenses for the sale of spirituous liquors, and as that is an act which they would not perform as a court, we have no power to issue the writ asked for.

Inasmuch, therefore, as we have no original jurisdiction of the matter, we do not propose to consider the merits of the application, regarding it as improper for us to prejudge the questions which should, in the first instance, be determined by a tribunal having original jurisdiction.

The judgment of this court is that the petition be dismissed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McGOWAN, A. J., concurred.

(Case No. 1137.)

WARING v. CHERAW & DARLINGTON RAILROAD COMPANY.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Limitation of Actions ⇐73.]

The charter of a railroad company provided that, in the absence of contract, it should be presumed that the land on which the road was built had been granted to the company unless the owners of the land made application for an assessment of damages within ten years thereafter, saving the rights of femes covert and infants until two years after the removal of their disabilities. The company, in 1854, constructed its road on land which had been devised to a feme covert executrix and her heirs in trust for her married sister for life, and after her death "to the issue which she may leave living at the time of her death." The executrix and her husband qualified in 1850; the husband died in 1869, and the executrix still survives as his widow. The married sister died in 1880, and soon thereafter her surviving issue brought action against the railroad company to recover compensation for the land so appropriated. Held, that the legal estate being in the executrix and her husband for more than two years after the road was built, and then in the executrix, as trustee, for more than two years after she became discovert, with contingent remainders to the children, the action was barred by the terms of the charter.

[2. Statutes ⟸200.]

The word "hereinafter," in the seventeenth section of the charter of the Wilmington & Manchester Railroad Company (11 Stat. 408), was intended for hereinbefore, and must be so construed; the manifest intention of a statute will control the use of an inappropriate and senseless word.

[4. Eminent Domain ⟸288.]

Proceedings to obtain compensation for right of way, instituted in 1859, and then suspended, without assessment made, cannot operate to prevent the bar of the Statute of Limitations from running against such claim, or from defeating action brought eleven years afterwards for the same purpose, unless a continuance of the former action can be shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 783; Dec. Dig. ⟸288.]

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, March, 1881.

In this case, the Honorable JOSEPH B. KERSHAW, presiding judge of the Fifth Circuit, sat in the place of Associate Justice McIVER, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This was an action instituted in February, 1880, by Paul H. Waring and others, surviving issue of Frances Irene Quirk, against the Cheraw & Darlington Railroad Company to recover compensation for the use by the defendant corporation of their road-bed through the lands of the plaintiffs, such compensation to be fixed by commissioners, and, if not paid, for the recovery of the land itself.

This land was devised by James Hunter, who died in 1850, to his daughter, Mary Ann McClenaghan, and her heirs forever, in trust, for the sole and separate use of his daughter, Frances Irene, for and during the period of her natural life, free and discharged from the control, &c., of her husband: and after the death of the said Frances Irene, the land was devised "to the issue which she may leave living at the time of her death." Frances Irene married Mr. Waring during her minority, by whom she had two children, and after his death, married Mr. Quirk, by whom she had two other children. She died in January, 1880, leaving these four children surviving her. She and her husband, Waring, took possession of this land in 1858, and she continued in possession until her death.

Mrs. McClenaghan and her husband qualified as executors in 1850. McClenaghan died in 1869, and Mrs. McClenaghan is still living, with one child. The road was built in 1854. No contract or agreement was made with the road when it was being *built or afterwards. Mrs. McClenaghan and her husband made no demand upon the railroad company for compensation; it was not shown that Mrs. Waring ever did, until after the war, when some compromises were offered, but nothing was done.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

Plaintiffs are the children of Irene Hunter by her marriages with Paul H. Waring, and after his death with William Quirk. They apply for an assessment of damages arising from the use of right of way through their lands by the railroad of the defendant. Their title is derived through the will of their grandfather, who devised the land to his executors and executrix in trust, for the sole and separate use of the said Irene, for life, and after her death, by a valid limitation over to the plaintiffs. None of the executors qualified. The executrix, Mary A. McClenaghan, in connection with her husband, George McClenaghan, only qualified in 1850. The railroad of defendants passed through the land in 1854, without any assessment of damages or compensation to the owners. George McClenaghan died in 1869: Irene Quirk (Hunter) died in January, 1880, and in February, 1880, this action was instituted. Before that, in 1870 or 1871, Mr. Boyd was employed to press the claim, and there were negotiations between him and the president of the company in which defendant made offers of compromise, but did not at any time expressly admit the validity of plaintiffs' claim. The bar of the statute provided in the charter of said company is now pleaded. The will devising said land confers upon the trustees no power to sell the said land, or to encumber it in any manner. If this were a case of trespass to try title, in which defendant claimed the land by adverse possession, that claim would avail, because the legal estate was in a trustee, under no disability for more than ten years before commencement of this action; and adverse possession against the trustee will bar the life-tenant, though a married woman, and also the remaindermen, though minors. But it is not a case to try title unless it involved the doctrine of adverse possession. It is a claim of easement by the defendant. That can be acquired only by grant or by such possession as creates the presumption of a grant. By the charter of the *defendant that period is reduced to ten years, and the easement has been used for said road over twenty years. But that does not avail to bar the rights of the plaintiffs, because no presumption of grant can ever arise against cestuis que trust who are a married woman and minor children, where the trustee has no power to grant. If defendant, in this case, had an express grant from the trustees, it would be ultra vires and void, and no one would scarcely venture to claim that a grant, by presumption, could be any better than an express one.

It is adjudged and decreed, That plaintiffs are entitled to have five commissioners appointed for the assessment of damages done to the said land by the passage of said road through the same, and it is therefore ordered that five such persons as may be agreed on between plaintiffs and defendants, be and are hereby appointed for that purpose, they to proceed according to the manner provided in said charter. If the parties fail to agree in choosing said commissioners, then plaintiffs have leave to apply before me at chambers, or before Judge Hudson, for appointment of the same.

Defendant appealed on the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the defendant sets up a claim of easement; whereas it is submitted that the right to an easement is not involved, but simply the right of the plaintiffs to compensation for land appropriated by the defendant under the authority conferred by their charter.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that this is an action to determine a claim of easement; whereas it is submitted that it is an action simply to recover compensation, according to the provisions of the charter of the defendant, for land appropriated and now used by the defendant for railroad purposes, under the express authority conferred by the legislature in the charter.

3. Because his Honor erred in holding that no presumption of grant can ever arise against cestuis que trust, who are married women and minor children, when the trustee has no power to grant; whereas it is submitted that even between private individuals such presumptions will arise when the trustee can assert *the rights of the cestuis que trust and sequences in the enjoyment of the easement for the requisite period.

4. Because his Honor erred in holding that no presumption of grant can arise in this case from the possession of the defendant of the land appropriated for more than ten years, when the legislature, in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, has conferred in its charter the easement to the defendant, and only gave the right to the plaintiffs' mother, or her trustee, to have compensation therefor, to be obtained according to the provisions of the charter.

5. Because his Honor erred in holding that, in this case, the legislature had no power to grant the easement to the defendant, and as the legislature had no power, then the presumption of such grant can never arise against the plaintiffs.

6. Because his Honor erred in holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to the appointment of five commissioners to make an assessment of their damages against the defendant, for land appropriated for railroad purposes by authority of their charter, and used continuously for more than twenty years.

7. Because his Honor erred in holding that the plea set up by the defendant will not avail; when it is respectfully submitted that such a motion, in this case, practically denies to the legislature the exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The plaintiffs suggested the following grounds in support of the Circuit decree, in addition to that taken by the Circuit judge:

1. The limitation in their charter relied upon by the appellant is as essentially defective in its provisions as to render it inoperative and incapable of enforcement against the respondents.

2. That the life-estate in the premises in question, held in trust by Mary A. McClenaghan, was not affected by the limitation in the charter of the appellant, by reason of the coverture of the said Mary A. McClenaghan, and by reason of a contract in relation to said premises entered into with appellant before the period of limitation was complete as against the said Mary A. McClenaghan.

3. That even if the rights of the trustee and cestui que trust of the life-estate in the premises in question were barred in the *charter of the appellant, the rights of the respondents, who were remaindermen and minors, were not and could not be affected thereby.

Afterwards, plaintiffs gave notice of a motion to be made in this court for a new trial on the ground of after-discovered evidence. This evidence was the copy of an order signed by Judge Whitner, in 1859, appointing appraisers to assess the damages done to this land by the defendant corporation, and the affidavits of two of the commissioners that no action was taken. This order was entitled Geo. McClenaghan and Mary Ann, his wife, trustees of F. A. Waring v. The Cheraw & Darlington Railroad Company. The motion was supported by proper affidavits.

Messrs. Townsend & Livingston, for appellants.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, contra.

January 18th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by KERSHAW, A. A. J. By their charter, the defendant company was vested with all the powers conferred by charter on the Wilmington and Manchester Railroad Company. By the sixteenth section of that charter, provision is made for compensation to the owners of land which should be required for a right of way, where, for the want of agreement as to value, or from any other cause, it could not be purchased from the owner.

In such case the land could be "taken at a valuation to be made by five commissioners, or a majority of them, to be appointed by any court of record," &c. The fifteenth section of the act gave the company power to enter upon and lay out any lands required for the purposes of said road. The seventeenth section is in the following words: "In the absence of any contract or contracts with the said company, in relation to land through which the said railroad may pass, signed by the owner thereof, or by his agent, or any claimant or person in possession thereof, which may be confirmed by the owner thereof, it shall be presumed that the land upon which the road may be constructed, together with a *space of sixty-five feet on each side of the center of said road, has been granted to the company by the owner or owners thereof; and the said company shall have good right and title thereto, and shall have, hold and enjoy the same as long as the same may be used only for the purposes of the said road, and no longer, unless the person or persons owning the said land at the time that the part of the said road which may be on the said land was finished, or those claiming under him, her or them, shall apply for an assessment of the value of the said lands, as hereinafter directed, within ten years next after the said part was finished; and in case the said owner or owners, or those claiming under him, her or them, shall not apply for such assessment within ten years next after the said road is finished, he, she or they shall be forever barred from recovering the said land, or having any assessment or compensation therefor. Provided that nothing herein contained shall affect the rights of femes covert or infants until two years after the removal of their respective disabilities."

It was said by the learned judge who delivered the opinion of the Law Court of Appeals in Lewis v. The Railroad Company, 11 Rich. 93, construing this act, that "the general scheme adopted to secure to the company the right of way and compensation to the landholder is manifest. For the want of agreement as to the value of the land taken, or where it cannot be purchased, the sixteenth section directs a valuation by commissioners. But in the absence of any contract, or of any valuation by commissioners, within ten years from the completion of that part of the road, the seventeenth section authorizes the company to hold the land as long as it shall be used for the purposes of the road, and presumes a grant from the owner for that purpose; and should no application for an assessment be made within ten years, then the owner is forever barred from recovering the land or having any assessment or compensation."

Instruction may also be derived, as to the construction of this act, from the dissenting opinion of that eminent jurist, Judge Wardlaw, in the same case. Speaking of a vendee of the land which was taken for the purposes of the road, he said: "If he should permit the railroad company to hold, without complaint, *until the expiration of ten years from the time the road was there finished, the land would become subject to the company's right to enjoy the slip occupied by them so long as they continued to use it for their road, and no longer; but if compensation should be claimed and paid, the fee-simple absolute would thereby be vested in the company."

In the case under consideration, there was no contract in relation to the land. The company entered upon it and constructed their railway in 1854, and there was no assessment of value by commissioners within ten years next thereafter, nor any application for such assessment on the part of the owner within that period. The land, therefore, became "subject to the company's right to enjoy the slip occupied by them so long as they continued to use it for their road," unless there be something in the case to bring it under the operation of the proviso in favor of infants and femes covert, in which case two years after the removal of the disability would be required to perfect the rights of the company and conclude the owner. Upon that point we agree with the Circuit judge that "the legal estate was in a trustee, under no disability for more than ten years." We do not understand that either party denies that Mrs. Mary A. McClenaghan was trustee under the will, nor that the legal estate remained in her, either as sole trustee, or in conjunction with her husband, George McClenaghan, from 1850, when she qualified (with her husband) as executrix, until the death of Francis Irene Quirk (the cestui que trust for life), who died in January, 1880.

The legal estate was devised to Mary A. McClenaghan and her heirs, and she was seized of an estate in fee subject to the trusts declared in the will. This estate became vested in her husband, as would any such estate in relation to which there was no trust. The principle is thus conveniently stated by Mr. Hill in his treatise on trustees, page *304: "Upon the marriage of a female trustee, the legal interest in the trust property will become vested in the husband, either wholly or partially, according to the nature of the estate. If it consist of chattels personal in possession, they will devolve upon him absolutely by the fact of marriage, unless it be otherwise expressly provided; and if it *consist of chattels real, the husband's interest in them will be subject to the title to the wife by survivorship. Where the trust property is real estate, of inheritance, the husband will take either an estate by the curtesy if he have had heritable issue, or, otherwise, a bare estate during the life of his wife, jointly with her. * * * As the husband will be liable personally for any breach of trust committed by his wife, it must follow as a necessary consequence that she cannot act in the administration of the trust without his concurrence or consent."

The life-tenant of the use was a feme covert, and it was settled to her sole and separate use, and the remainders were contingent. Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 385; Ex parte Gadsden, 3 Rich. 467; Bacot v. Heyward, 5 S. C. 445. Certainly, during the life-time of the tenant for life, the fee was in the trustee. No one else could have received the compensation required by the act to be paid to the owner of the land. McClenaghan and his wife could have made application for the compensation, and no one else could, and there was no disability except that of the coverture of Mrs. McClenaghan. It would have been necessary for her to join her husband in an application for the compensation, while he was yet alive, because, as has been shown, he was seized jointly with his wife of the legal estate: and as the fund to be received appertained to the inheritance, and the action would have survived to her, such joinder was necessary. She was, therefore, entitled to the benefit of the proviso which allowed her two years after the death of her husband within which to apply for compensation. These two years expired in 1871, and, though there was some negotiation in this interval in regard to the matter, it was suffered to drop. No such application was made as was required for the legal assertion of the right, and the bar of the statute was not affected thereby.

If the trustee was barred, the cestuis que trust are also barred, (Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 69,) because the statute runs against the legal estate, which is vested in the trustee. Says Lord Chancellor Talbot: "Though the cestui que trust be an infant, yet he must be barred by the trustees not suing in time, for I cannot take away the benefit of the Statute of Limitations from the company, who are in default, and are entitled to take ad-van*tage thereof as well as private persons, since their witnesses may die or their vouchers be lost. And as to the trust, that is only between the administrator and the infant, and does not affect the company. So, where there is an executor in trust for another, and the executor neglects to bring his action within the time prescribed by the statute, the cestui que trust or residuary legatee will be barred." Wych v. East India Company, 3 P. Wms. 310.

Regarding, as we do, this action as involving only the right of the plaintiffs to recover against the defendant company the compensation to which they suppose themselves entitled under the act, the judgment of this court is that the claim was barred before their interests in the land vested, and that they cannot, for that reason, maintain their action.

We have said nothing in regard to the point contended for by plaintiffs' counsel: that the limitation of the charter is so defective in its provisions as to render it inoperative. In this seventeenth section of the charter the owner is required to make application for an assessment of its value "as hereinafter directed," and no directions follow. It is said that the owner cannot comply with this impossible condition, and, hence, cannot be barred by the omission to do so. Ample directions are given in a previous section, and the meaning of the act is so plain that we feel it incumbent on us to disregard this manifest error. The whole scheme of the act cannot be permitted to be destroyed by a blunder so evidently unintentional. The very word which here is supposed to destroy the efficacy of the statute was disregarded in the construction of a deed in Creighton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. 94. For the reasons given there, we are constrained to arrive at a like conclusion in this case. The same principle applies to a statute under construction, in this respect, as to a deed or will. The evident intention will control the use of an inappropriate and senseless word. Pott. Dwar. Stat. 175, 207, et seq. Construed with reference to the other sections of the act, none can doubt that the word which was intended to be used by the legislature was "hereinbefore" instead of "hereinafter," and this construction is necessary to sustain the legislation.

One other point remains to be considered—the motion for a new trial. Upon this subject, without entering into the question *made as to the merits of the motion, or the power of this court to entertain the same, we think the newly-discovered evidence alleged is not such as could avail the plaintiffs. It tends to show that an application was made by Mr. and Mrs. McClenaghan, as trustees, for the appointment of commissioners to assess the damages, now claimed by the plaintiffs, in 1859. That commissioners were appointed by the court, but never met, and no further steps were taken in the matter. There has been no continuance of the proceedings, and the steps taken would not take the case out of the operation of the limitation as to time unless there had been a regular continuance of the proceeding. In order to avoid the operation of the Statute of Limitations by a plea that the action was commenced within the statutory period, the plaintiff must show a continuance of that action up to the time of trial. McDowell v. Goodwyn, 2 Mill. Const. R. 441 [12 Am. Dec. 685]; Chapman v. Mayrant, 2 Speers 484.

For some reason the parties did not see fit to proceed in their attempted assessment, and it is but reasonable to suppose that they supposed themselves to have had good reason for not doing so. As an account was required by the act to be taken of the benefit and advantage which had accrued to the owners of the land from the erection of the railroad, as well as the loss and damage resulting therefrom, and only the excess of loss over the benefits could be recovered, it is quite probable that the trustees considered that the pursuit of the matter would be fruitless. At all events they did not proceed, and the statutory period, to which they were limited, expired, and they lost the remedy.

The decree of the Circuit Court must be set aside and the complaint dismissed, and it is so adjudged.

HUDSON, A. A. J. On December 29th, A. D. 1871, J. M. Shockley and Cassie B. Shockley, his wife, jointly conveyed to the appellant, Turner R. L. Wood, a tract of thirty-five (35) acres of land, situate in the county of Laurens, by deed absolute on its face. But, according to the allegations of the complaint, this conveyance was only intended to secure the repayment of three hundred dollars ($300) on January 1st, A. D. 1873, with interest at twenty-five per cent. per annum, claimed to have been loaned by Wood to Shockley and wife upon the faith of this land as a security. The object of the action below was to recover this debt and to enforce the lien on the land by foreclosure and sale.

Shockley and wife, against whom the action was originally begun, defended by alleging that the money was loaned to the husband alone, and that the wife did not become personally liable; that the land conveyed is her separate property, and was only pledged as security for the debt of the husband; that shortly after the debt became due the husband made a full tender of the amount owing, which Wood refused to accept, and that he is, and ever has been, ready to make payment. Wherefore James M. Shockley claims that he is liable only for the sum tendered, without costs; and Cassie B. Shockley contends that by refusing said tender the said Wood forfeited all claim to her land which stood pledged for this debt of her husband. The defendants, James M. Shockley and wife, Cassie, having both died pending the action, it was continued against their legal representatives and heirs aforesaid, under whose answers the points in controversy remain as before.

The cause was first heard by C. D. Barksdale, Esq., master for the county of Laurens, before whom all the testimony was taken and the cause fully argued by counsel. He, on April 30th, A. D. 1881, submitted to the Circuit Court his report, accompanied by all the testimony, in which report he passes separately upon all the issues of law and fact involved in the case.

His findings of fact are in substance:

*First. That on December 29th, 1871, J. M. Shockley borrowed of T. R. L. Wood $300, payable January 1st, 1873, at twenty-five per cent. interest. Second. That the money was loaned upon the faith of a mortgage on the wife's tract of thirty-five acres of land, which was given in the form of a joint deed by husband and wife. Third. That Mrs. Shockley signed the deed reluctantly and under importunities of the husband. Fourth. That shortly after the money became due Shockley stated to Wood that the bad weather had prevented him from bringing the money, and asked if he still would receive it. Wood replied that, although the time had expired, he supposed a few days would make no difference. Fifth. That on January 6th, A. D. 1873, Shockley, accordingly, went in company with two friends to Wood's house with a view to make a tender, when he was informed by the latter that a tender was useless as the time had run out, and "a contract was a contract." Sixth. That, nevertheless, Shockley did make a tender of an amount, admitted by Wood to be in full, and in currency to which he did not object, but which he refused only because the debt was past due.

The master concludes as matter of law—

First. That the debt being that of James M. Shockley alone, the wife is not personally liable; and the land, being her separate property, occupied the relation of surety or collateral security for the principal debt, and would be discharged by anything which would discharge a surety or guarantor who was personally liable.

Second. That being subject to be thus discharged, it was in law released from the lien of the deed by way of mortgage so soon as Wood refused to accept the tender of the debt in full, although it was made after the debt was due.

Third. That although only part of the money was proved to be in legal tender notes, and the balance may have been national bank bills, yet no objection was urged by Wood on that ground, and this was a waiver of any defect of the tender arising from the kind of currency in which it may have been made.

After noticing other minor points raised in argument by counsel for the plaintiff, the master recommends that the mortgage be marked canceled and delivered up to the executor of Cassie B. Shockley; and that the plaintiff have judgment against *M. E. Babb as administrator of the estate of James M. Shockley, subject to the plea of plene administravit, for the sum of $375, the amount tendered, and that the plaintiff be required to pay the costs of the action.

At an extra term of the Court of Common Pleas at Laurens in July, A. D. 1881, the cause was heard by Judge Fraser on exceptions to this report of the master. The Circuit judge, without rendering a judgment based on an opinion giving reasons therefor, in addition to those given by the master, merely concurred with him in his findings of fact and conclusions of law, and made the report of the master, with its recommendations, the judgment of the Circuit Court.

This action of the Circuit judge is made the ground of the first exception on appeal to this court, the appellant contending that he should have stated in full and separately his findings of fact and conclusions of law in rendering his judgment. This had been very fully done by the master in his report, and in making that report with its recommendations the judgment of the Circuit Court, the judge, in concurring with the master, has in fact rendered a judgment in which the findings of fact and conclusions of law are separately stated. No statute nor requirement of law has been thus violated, and the judgment is not open to this exception of the appellant.

The remaining exceptions assign error in the findings of fact and conclusions of law of the master adopted by the Circuit judge.

It is the well-established rule governing this court that where the findings of fact by a referee or master are concurred in by the Circuit judge, such findings will not be disturbed unless they be against the manifest weight of testimony or without testimony to sustain them.

We see no such objection to the findings in this case. In fact there seems to be but little if any room for dispute except upon the matter of tender—whether it really was made at all, and, if so, whether Wood had so waived the time as to let in a tender six days after the debt was due. In the first interview which Shockley had with Wood after the maturity of the debt (a day or two after, according to the testimony,) we think there was that said by Wood which waived the failure of a tender on *January 1st, A. D. 1873, and which precluded him from raising this objection when, on January 6th, Shockley came to tender the money. On that day, according to the weight of the testimony, a tender was certainly made of the sum then due as assented to by Wood, and in currency, a part of which, if not all, was in legal tender notes, and to none of which was objection made on account of the kind of currency, and consequently all objection on that score must be taken as waived, the refusal having been solely because of the lapse of six days after maturity.

In 2 Greenl. Evid. § 601, the author says: "If a tender is made in bank notes, it is good, if the want of it being in current coin is waived; and if the creditor places his refusal to receive the money on some other ground, or even if he makes no objection to the tender on the express ground that it is in bank notes, it is held a waiver of this objection." We perceive no such want of proof upon the subject of the tender as will justify us in reversing the findings of the master and Circuit judge.

The law of the case as announced by the court below, embodied in the master's report, follows as a consequence of the findings of fact. The tender having been found to be a good tender by reason of the waiver of objections which might have invalidated it, it follows that, as against the administrator of James M. Shockley's estate, the appellant can only recover the amount which Shockley tendered and which the appellant refused to receive; the act of refusal barring him of the right to recover interest after that time, and also of the right to recover costs of defendants. It having been ascertained that the land is the property of the wife, according to the testimony, having been conveyed to her by George W. Gerald, October 25th, 1871, and that she pledged it as a security and guaranty of her husband's debt, the property stood in the relation of surety to the debt of James M. Shockley, and became discharged of the lien by whatever would in law discharge a surety.

Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty, on page 28, Section 22, says: "While a married woman cannot usually become personally bound for the debt of her husband, she may ordinarily pledge or mortgage her separate property for his debt, and, if she does so, such property occupies the position of a surety or guaranty, and *will be discharged by anything that would discharge a surety or guarantor who was personally liable." And on page 397, Section 295, the same author says: "If the principal, after the debt is due, offers to pay it, and tenders the amount due to the creditor, and the creditor refuses to receive it, the surety is discharged."

According to this authority (and it is in accord with all the decisions since the days of Lord Coke. See Six Carpenters' case, 8 Coke 146, and authorities cited in Tiffany v. St. John, 65 N. Y. 314, reported in 22 Am. Rep. 612,) the tender made by Shockley and refused by Wood, January 6th, 1873, was sufficient to discharge this thirty-five acres from the lien of the mortgage, even though, by lapse of time, it might not have been available to Shockley as a defense, and would not have been so available but for the waiver of Wood. His refusal, however, clearly forfeited all right on his part to further lien on the land of Cassie B. Shockley, and discharged the mortgage lien from that moment.

We see no error in the judgment of the Circuit Court, and, therefore, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment below be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

STEVENSON v. WILCOX.

(November Term, 1881.)

[Executors and Administrators ⟸537.]

Pending application of a widow for administration on her intestate husband's estate, and because of her illness, a petition was filed by A. for administration pendente lite, and upon his appointment he filed a bond with sureties, in which he was styled administrator pendente lite, but the condition of the bond called for a general administration. The widow took no further steps in the matter of her application, but A. acted as general administrator, and was so recognized by creditors, distributees, ordinary and court of equity, and by the court last named was decreed to pay a balance ascertained to be in his hands. In action afterwards brought by creditors against his sureties to recover such balance, held, that A. was only administrator pendente lite, and that a general administrator was a necessary party to this action, and there being none such in office, a nonsuit was properly granted.

*Before Wallace, J., Marion, October, 1881.

Hon. J. B. KERSHAW, of the Fifth Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McIVER, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Action by James N. Stevenson and Mowry & Co., creditors of Samuel F. Gibson, against John Wilcox, C. D. Evans and S. A. Durham, sureties on the bond of A. L. Evans. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. C. A. Woods and J. G. Blue, for appellants.

Messrs. W. W. Harllee and Townsend & McKerall, contra.

January 20th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

KERSHAW, A. A. J. Upon the death of Samuel F. Gibson, in 1867, his widow, Constantine, applied for letters of administration on his estate. On account of ill-health she was unable to appear in the court of ordinary to complete her administration by taking the oath, giving bond, &c. Whereupon, one A. L. Evans, a stranger in blood to the intestate, applied, by petition, for administration pendente lite, assigning as a reason therefor the disability of Mrs. Gibson from illness; that there was a large crop planted on the farms of the estate and an insufficiency of provisions to carry on the farms, and that administration was necessary immediately to prevent serious detriment, loss of crops and other damages. Letters of administration were granted to him upon this petition, and he gave bond, with these defendants as sureties. In the bond he is termed administrator pendente lite, but the condition of the bond is in the same form as though he had been made the general administrator. No further steps seem to have been taken by Mrs. Gibson to complete her administration, but A. L. Evans acted in all respects as a general administrator. In 1868, he filed a bill to marshal the assets of the estate, making the widow and creditors parties thereto; obtained an order enjoining the creditors, and accounted under an order of the court therein. A *large balance was found and decreed against him. The decree was enrolled, execution issued thereon, and was returned nulla bona.

The plaintiffs, a portion of the creditors of Samuel F. Gibson, have brought this action against the defendants, as sureties, on the administration bond of A. L. Evans, demanding judgment for the amount of the decree against their principal, to be paid to the clerk of the court and distributed among the creditors of S. F. Gibson according to their legal priorities. The presiding judge on Circuit granted a non-suit and dismissed the complaint, holding that the action could not be maintained without administration on the estate of S. F. Gibson, "other than that granted to A. L. Evans." The appeal is from this judgment.

The Circuit judge proceeds upon the idea that the administration granted to Evans was merely provisional and special, not general; that there was no general administrator of the estate, and the action could not be maintained in the absence of such administration. If this view be correct, the judgment below must be confirmed. We agree with the Circuit judge on this point. There was a suit pending in the court of ordinary on behalf of the widow, who had a statutory right to the administration, when Evans, a stranger, applied for administration pending that suit expressly to provide for the emergency created by the illness of Mrs. Gibson and the delay in her suit resulting therefrom. The prayer of the petition was for "administration pendente lite." Upon such an application a general administrator could not have been appointed because the nature of the two offices is entirely different. The one is an officer or agent of the ordinary, having no title to the goods of deceased, while the other is an officer of the law, in whom is vested the legal title to the goods and chattels, rights and credits of the intestate, representing and succeeding him in his relations to his personal property. Whatever the form of the letters, or of the bond, this administration could only have been especial and provisional—pendente lite. The character of it could not be changed so as to affect these sureties by the conduct of Evans, his recognition by Mrs. Gibson or the creditors, or the ordinary, or the proceedings of the court of equity ascrib-ing to him, erroneously, *the character of a general administrator. The defendants have a right to stand upon their rights as they existed at the time of the original contract in this respect.

If Evans was not the general administrator the plaintiffs could not maintain their action, because an administrator is a necessary party to such a suit. Kaminer v. Hope, 9 S. C. 257; Easterling v. Thompson, Rice 350; 2 Wms. Ex. 1444; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 251.

In order to transmit the title to the assets of the estate of an intestate to the creditors there must be an administrator, and, hence, he is a necessary party to all suits brought to recover and to distribute or administer such assets. In the present case there was no one before the court who had the legal title to demand of the defendants the sum claimed to be due by them on their bond. If it had been shown that there was an administrator, the proceedings might have been so amended as to make him a party, but there being none, the non-suit was properly ordered. Appeal dismissed.

Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, September, 1881.

Action by Hudson B. Burckhalter against Thomas W. Coward, commenced in July, 1881. The plaintiff demanded judgment against the defendant for $5,000 damages for "false and defamatory words maliciously" spoken by defendant concerning the plaintiff, to wit, that plaintiff "had broken into a store between midnight and day, and stolen goods, and that defendant could and would prove that plaintiff had done so." The answer admitted that defendant had said "that plaintiff had broken into a store in the night-time and stolen goods, and that he could and would prove that plaintiff had done so;" that defendant has been informed and believes that the plaintiff has been and is guilty of the charge; that all this was said "in full belief of its truth and verity, and not from any motive of malice towards the plaintiff."

The evidence is not reported. The request to charge, and other matters, are stated in the opinion of this court. The charge to the jury was as follows:

The words alleged by the plaintiff to have been spoken of him are substantially the same as those admitted by the defendant. They are words which impute a crime to the plaintiff, and, therefore, are actionable in themselves, without proof of special damage, and if the testimony has failed to prove their truth to *your satisfaction, plaintiff is entitled to recover such damages as are, in your judgment, reasonable and proper under the circumstances. If, however, the testimony satisfies you that the charges made by defendant are true, by a clear preponderance of the proof, then your verdict must be for the defendant. The charge made is substantially the breaking and entering of the store, and the stealing of goods therefrom. To find for the defendant, it is necessary that you must be satisfied that the store in question was broken and entered by the plaintiff, and that goods of the character specified in the answer were taken by plaintiff under the circumstances alleged. The proof need not be beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient that you be satisfied by the preponderance of the testimony, so that you believe the charge to be true. If the question of the truth or falsity of the words spoken remain so doubtful that you cannot decide it from the testimony, and it is left equally balanced in your mind, you must find for the plaintiff, because the burden of proof is upon the defendant, and he is bound to satisfy you affirmatively of the fact of the plaintiff's guilt of the charge he has made, or his defense fails. If you find for the plaintiff you must find such damages as you think, under the circumstances, he ought to have. The amount should be apportioned according to the infamy of the charges made, and the circumstances under which they were spoken. They should be sufficient to compensate the plaintiff for the injury done him, and to punish the defendant for his wrongful act, according to the degree of wrong of which you may find him to have been guilty under the circumstances. You will take into consideration any circumstances of excuse or mitigation which you may find to exist on the one hand, or of the evil purpose, malice and aggravation on the other, and find such amount as you think proper, having relation to the pecuniary condition of the defendant. In no case can you exceed the sum claimed in the complaint.

The verdict was for the defendant, and plaintiff appealed.

January 24th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action of slander. The case was called for trial, and was to be heard by jury No. 1, which was full. The plaintiff objected to two of the jurors peremptorily, and to one for cause. The three jurors were directed to leave the box, leaving nine upon the panel. Before the defendant exercised his right of challenge he requested the court to have the panel filled, which was done against the protest of the plaintiff. After the jury was thus filled up the defendant objected to two of the jurors who had been called as talesmen. They retired from the jury, which was filled up by a second drawing from the talesmen. The plaintiff excepted.

The defendant's answer contained a plea of justification—that he spoke the words substantially, but without malice. Upon the pleadings the defendant claimed that he was entitled to open and reply in evidence and argument, and the court so ruled. To which the plaintiff excepted.

The evidence being closed, the plaintiff requested the judge to make certain charges, which he refused. Under the charge the jury found a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "That his Honor erred in overruling plaintiff's objection to the filling of the panel after plaintiff had peremptorily challenged two jurors and one for cause, and before defendant had exercised his right of challenge; and in allowing defendant to challenge jurors after the panel was filled from the talesmen; and in allowing defendant to challenge two of the talesmen drawn to fill the panel.

2. "That his Honor erred in allowing defendant, upon the pleadings, the right to the opening and reply in evidence and in argument.

*3. "Because his Honor refused to charge as requested by plaintiff.

4. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that 'if the testimony satisfies you that the charge made by the defendant is true by the clear preponderance of the proof, then your verdict must be for the defendant.'

5. "Because his Honor erred in charging that 'the proof need not be beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient that you be satisfied by the preponderance of the testimony, so that you believe the charge to be true.'

6. "Because his Honor erred in charging that 'you will take into consideration any circumstances of excuse or mitigation which you may find to exist on the one hand, or of the evil purpose, malice and aggravation on the other.'

7. "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that in fixing the amount of the verdict they could find such amount as they think proper, having relation to the pecuniary condition of the defendant."

We will consider these exceptions in their reverse order.

As to the last. In actions of libel and slander, where the object of the plaintiff is to recover damages for aspersions cast upon him, the jury is authorized to give what is called exemplary or vindictive damages. The primary object in such cases is to obtain such a verdict as will compensate the plaintiff for the injury done him, and to operate as an example to others; but it is also allowable to add something by way of punishment to the defendant, and as the action sounds only in damages, a verdict which would punish a defendant of small means might be no punishment whatever to another of large fortune. According to our decided cases it was not error to charge the jury that in fixing the amount of the verdict they might consider the pecuniary condition of the defendant. The exact point was ruled in the case of Rowe v. Moses, 9 Rich. 426 [67 Am. Dec. 560], where it is said by Judge O'Neale, in delivering the judgment of the court: "In my long experience as a lawyer and a judge I never knew an exception taken in actions for assault and battery, slander, malicious prosecutions, and malicious torts generally, to evidence of defendant's wealth: and if such proof could now be excluded as a measure *of damage it would be in fact to reverse a course of justice coeval with the administration of it by the courts in this State."

The sixth exception complains that it was error to charge that the jury might take into consideration any circumstances of excuse or mitigation on the one hand, or of evil purpose, malice and exaggeration on the other. It is true that when the plea of justification is entered in an action of slander there is no complete defense except by proof of the charge, but in fixing the amount of the verdict we do not see why there may not be circumstances of aggravation or of mitigation in such case as well as in any other. Why may not the defendant say: "I spoke the words, but under great provocation, or in sudden heat and passion," or "I spoke them only once, and then only from public rumor," &c? It is true that the defendant cannot avail himself of the defense which the truth of the charge affords without pleading justification; but it does not follow that in all such cases the verdict must be the same without regard to the facts and circumstances of aggravation or mitigation. Understood only as applying to the amount of damages, we see no error in this charge.

The fourth and fifth exceptions allege error in the charge "that the proof need not be beyond a reasonable doubt. It is sufficient if you are satisfied by the preponderance of the testimony, so that you believe the charge to be true." The judge was requested to charge that "where the words impute crime to the plaintiff, the defendant, to support a justification that the charge is true, must show the plaintiff's guilt by evidence sufficient to convict him of the crime on a trial for it, and if the defendant fails so to do, the jury must find for the plaintiff." We think it was error to refuse this request, and to hold that mere preponderance of evidence was enough to sustain the plea. Although it was not a criminal proceeding, a crime was charged, and the authorities hold in such case that it is proper to make the same proof which would be necessary to convict the party in a criminal proceeding for that crime.

"If the plaintiff has been tried and convicted, the conviction may be given in evidence in support of the plea of justification. If a man be adjudged by the Sessions to be the father of a bastard child, the adjudication is an answer to any complaint *made by him in the spiritual court or elsewhere against any one for saying or publishing that he has had a bastard. When the plaintiff has not been actually convicted of the felony he must be tried by the jury upon the plea of justification in the same way as if he was on his trial upon an indictment for the offense in a criminal court; so that if there is a doubt of his guilt the jury are bound to give him the benefit of the doubt." Add. Torts (3 ed.) 819; Towns. Sl. & L. 613; 5 Wait Ac. & Def. 758; Richards v. Turner, C. & M. 417; 2 Greenl. Evid. § 426.

The third exception embraces a refusal to charge as requested, that "if the defendant undertakes to justify the slander and fails, because the justification is unsupported by the evidence, it is an aggravation of the charge, evinces continued and express malice, and may be properly considered by the jury to increase the damages." The judge refused to charge in the words stated; but did charge that "if the defendant undertakes to justify the slander and fails because the justification is unsupported by the evidence, it may be considered as a circumstance of aggravation and of continued and express malice, and may properly be considered by the jury in estimating the damages." We see no error in the proposition as stated by the judge.

The second exception is that the judge erred in allowing the defendant the right to open and reply in evidence and argument. Upon this subject our present rule of court, LIX., is identical with the old rule which was in force before 1868. It is in these words: "On all motions or special matters, either springing out of a cause or otherwise, the actor or party submitting the same to the court shall in like manner begin and close; and so shall the defendant when he admits the plaintiff's cause by the pleadings, and takes upon himself the burden of proof, have the like privilege."

There is no doubt that the defendant is entitled to begin and close the case when he admits upon the record the plaintiff's cause of action, and takes upon himself the burden of proof; but it is insisted here that the admission in this case did not amount to the admission of the plaintiff's cause of action. The action was for slander. The complaint charged that the defendant maliciously spoke concerning the plaintiff certain false *and defamatory words, stating them; to which the defendant answered, admitting that he spoke the words, (nearly the identical words charged, but omitting the phrase "between midnight and day,") and adding "that he is informed and believes that the plaintiff has been and is guilty of each and every charge in the said complaint alleged to have been made against him by the defendant; and that whatever the defendant has said of or concerning the plaintiff he has said in full belief of its truth and verity, and not from any motive of malice towards the plaintiff," &c.

Was this an admission of the plaintiff's cause of action? Malice is a necessary ingredient of slander, and it was alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff's cause of action was not only that the words were spoken, but that they were spoken "maliciously." The admission that the words were spoken without malice was an admission of only a part of the cause of action. It was to this extent pleading both the general issue and justification. "Every plea of justification must meet and justify the charge or complaint set forth on the face of the declaration. If it does not do this, reasonably and substantially, it is a nullity." Add. Torts (3 ed.) 807. "The test to determine which party has the right to begin, and, of course, to determine where is the burden of proof, is to consider which party would be entitled to the verdict if no evidence were offered on either side. For the burden of proof lies on the party against whom, in such case, the verdict ought to be given." 1 Greenl. Evid. § 74, and note.

Upon proof of the allegations of the complaint in this case the plaintiff would have been entitled to recover. Did the answer, admitting the words but denying malice, shift the burden of proof upon the defendant? If the case had been submitted upon the complaint and answer, the defendant would have been entitled to a verdict, and therefore it cannot be said that the burden of proof was taken upon himself by the defendant. It was still necessary that the plaintiff should prove that part of the complaint which alleged malice. "The party who asserts the affirmative of the issue is entitled to begin and reply. If the record contains several issues, and the plaintiff holds the affirmative in any one of them, he is entitled to begin, as if, in an action *of slander for charging the plaintiff with a crime, the defendant should plead not guilty and a justification. For when the plaintiff is obliged to produce any proof in order to establish his right to recover, he is generally required to go into his whole case, and therefore is entitled to reply." 1 Greenl. Evid. § 74.

In the case of Mercer v. Whall, 5 Ad. & E. (N. S.) 447, it was held that whenever, from the state of the record at nisi prius, there is anything to be proved by the plaintiff, he is entitled to begin. Lord Chief Justice Denman said: "The natural course would seem to be that the plaintiff should bring his own cause of complaint before the court and jury in every case where he has anything to prove, either as to the facts necessary for his obtaining a verdict, or as to the amount of damages to which he conceives the truth of such facts may entitle him. The law, however, has, by some, been supposed to differ from this, and to require that the defendant, by admitting the cause of action stated on the record, and pleading only some affirmative fact, which, if proved, will defeat the plaintiff's action, may entitle himself to open the proceeding at the trial. * * * I have never doubted that the plaintiff was privileged and required to begin whenever anything was to be proved by him. The simplicity and easy application of this mode of practice would recommend it to adoption if the question were new, and would raise a great probability that the common sense of old times had sanctioned it as a part of our system."

After much controversy on the subject, it seems to have been finally settled in the English courts that in all actions for unliquidated damages for personal injuries, the plaintiff is entitled to open and reply. Mr. Greenleaf says: "The difficulty in determining the point exists chiefly in those cases where the action is for unliquidated damages, and the defendant has met the whole case by an affirmative plea. In these it has, at length, been settled by a rule of the fifteen judges that the plaintiff shall begin in all actions for personal injuries, libel and slander, though the general issue may not be pleaded and the affirmative be on the defendant." 1 Greenl. Evid. § 76, and note.

It has been held in our case of Brown v. Kirkpatrick, 5 S. C. 267, that the question must be determined by the nature of the *issues rather than by the character of the evidence called for in their support. The same case also decides that error in giving the reply to the party not entitled to it is appealable.

The first exception is that the judge erred in overruling plaintiff's objection to filling the panel after plaintiff had peremptorily challenged two, and a third juror for cause; and in allowing defendant to challenge jurors called from the talesmen; and in allowing defendant to challenge two of the talesmen thus drawn. The right to challenge jurors peremptorily was confined exclusively to criminal cases down to the year 1841, when the privilege, to a limited extent, was given in civil actions by the act passed in that year, which is in these words: "In all civil cases in which a jury shall be charged with the trial of any issue, each party shall have the right to challenge, without cause therein, two of the jury so empaneled, and the place of the jurors so challenged shall be supplied as provided by law." (Gen. Stat. 523.) The right to challenge jurors in a civil case is not derived from the common law or based upon any general principle, but is conventional, and comes entirely from this statute, in the construction of which the courts have decided that the right to challenge is confined to the original jury so empaneled; and that it is not allowable to challenge peremptorily a juror who did not belong to the original panel, but was called to fill a vacancy caused by the challenge of the other party. It may be that the same reason exists for making a talesman drawn liable to challenge as well as one of the original jurors; but the statute which gives the right does not so declare. If the precise point, in form involved here, has not been decided, the principle of construction which embraces this case has been. Kleinback ads. City Council, 2 Speers 418; Durant v. Ashmore, 2 Rich. 184; Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680]; Gunter v. The Graniteville Manufacturing Company, 15 S. C. 443.

In the case last cited it is said by the chief justice: "In a recent case (Huff v. Watkins, 15 S. C. 82 [40 Am. Rep. 680]) the exact point raised here was decided, and we need not now go beyond that decision. It maintains fully the exception of the defendant here, and must govern in the construction to be placed upon Section 26, Chap. CXI., of Gen. Stat., in reference to challenges to jurors in civil *cases." In that case, as in this, one of the parties was allowed to challenge a juror taken from the talesmen and not belonging to the original panel, and, upon that ground, a new trial was ordered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

An order dismissing the complaint, passed at the proper stage of a trial, is not erroneous because that no motion for dismissal was made by defendants.

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, April, 1881.

Action commenced in July, 1880, by L. A. McCall against D. D. Cohen and the other parties named in the opinion as defendants, and also against G. W. Brown. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. B. O. Townsend, for appellant.

*February 18th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an action to recover damages for a levy on property under a void judgment. The defendant, M. A. Huggins, being a trial justice, rendered, May 29th, 1877, a judgment in favor of Hart & Co.—namely, N. S. Hart, D. D. Cohen, P. Moran, John V. McNamee and McDuff Cohen—against McCall & Co.—namely, Stephen McCall and L. A. McCall. Under the execution issued in the case, a mule, the property of L. A. McCall, was levied on and detained some time. Afterwards the judgment was set aside, and said McCall brought this action for damages against the trial justice, who rendered the judgment, and the creditors, plaintiffs in that action. When the case was called, it was announced that two of the defendants, D. D. Cohen and John V. McNamee, had not been served, and the plaintiff was allowed to proceed against the other defendants.

It appeared that Hart & Co., merchants of Charleston, sent to R. K. Charles, Esq., an account against McCall & Co. for $14.57, to be collected. Mr. Charles placed the account in the hands of Trial Justice Huggins for suit, and, without further instructions from them, took such steps for the collection as he thought best. Huggins sued on the account. The summons was returned served by one Calvin Josey, acting constable, but who, as it appeared, was not a regular constable, and had no special appointment in the case. When McCall received the summons, and before the day of trial, he enclosed to Huggins the amount of the account, $14.57, without interest or costs. Huggins received the money, but, concluding that there was interest due at twelve per cent. and costs, he credited the amount received and gave judgment for $10, "balance of debt and costs."

Upon this judgment execution was issued, which was taken from the officer sent to levy it. Another execution was issued, whereupon the plaintiff here, McCall, made a motion before the trial justice to set aside the judgment, upon the ground that he had not been made a party by proper process. On that ground the motion was refused, but granted unless the plaintiffs would remit all interest over seven per cent., which was done, and the judgment reduced to $6.93. The execution was then placed in *the hands of the sheriff by Mr. Charles, attorney for Hart & Co., with instructions to notify McCall, his object being, as he testified, "to work him up to a settlement." G. W. Brown, deputy sheriff, levied the execution on a mule belonging to L. A. McCall. The sheriff offered to return the mule, but McCall declined to take him. After some six weeks the mule was returned in bad condition, and soon after died.

L. A. McCall applied for a writ of certiorari to set aside the judgment, which Mr. Charles resisted. Judge Wallace, March 12th, 1879, granted the prayer, ordering "that the judgment and execution mentioned in the petition be set aside and canceled, and, also, that Hart & Co. pay the costs of this proceeding, together with $10 costs of this motion." From this order there was an appeal, and this court affirmed the order. State, ex rel. McCall, v. Cohen, 13 S. C. 198.

When the testimony in this case closed, Judge Pressley required argument on the part of the plaintiff as to whether there was any evidence to go to the jury, and, being of opinion there was none, directed Mr. Charles, defendants' attorney, to draw up, for his signature, the following order: "There being no evidence to go to the jury to connect D. D. Cohen, P. Moran, John V. McNamee, N. S. Hart, McDuff Cohen and M. A. Huggins with the trespass set forth in the complaint, it is ordered that as to them the action be dismissed."

The plaintiff appeals from this order upon the following grounds:

1. "Though action has been commenced against the defendants, D. D. Cohen and John V. McNamee, by delivery of the summons to the sheriff for service, yet they, not having been served therewith, were not before the court, and the plaintiff should have been allowed further time to effect service upon them, and the case should only have been heard, and any decision related only to the defendants actually served with the summons.

2. "The order was made on the motion of the court itself.

3. "There was evidence to go to the jury to connect the defendants, known as Hart & Co., with the trespass set forth in the complaint.

*4. "There was evidence to go to the jury to connect M. A. Huggins with the trespass set forth in the complaint, and from which they could infer his willful, knowing, malicious and corrupt intention and animus.

5. "The order was otherwise erroneous."

No argument was submitted in this court for the respondents, and we have had to make such hasty examination as the press of business would allow. There is nothing in the order having been prepared at the instance of the judge himself. It was not, as in the case of the State v. Parker, 7 S. C. 235, "without notice to the party prejudiced by it," but in the midst of the trial and in the presence of all parties. We consider the matter precisely as if the motion had been made by Mr. Charles, attorney for the defendants. We cannot assume that he was opposed to entering an order in favor of his clients.

The rule certainly is that a non-suit upon the facts should not be granted when there is any evidence to go to the jury, whose exclusive province it is to decide upon the weight of conflicting testimony. As was said in the case of Redding v. South Carolina Railroad Company, 3 S. C. 9 [16 Am. Rep. 681], "where there has been a total failure of testimony, as in Brown v. Frost, 2 Bay 126 [1 Am. Dec. 633], and Hopkins v. DeGraffenreid, Id. 441, there was nothing to leave to the jury, and it was the duty of the judge to non-suit; but, as it is said in Rogers v. Madden, 2 Bail. 321, the practice of ordering a non-suit in invitum for defective testimony is to be pursued with caution." Holley v. Walker, 7 S. C. 144. It is the province of the judge to decide all questions of law, and in this case there was a mixed question of both law and fact.

Trial Justice Huggins was a judicial officer, and in the course of his official duties he rendered a judgment which, as it afterwards appeared, was void for the want of proper service of the parties. One of the questions was whether, as matter of law, he was responsible for the consequences. Upon that point there can be no doubt. It is as well settled as any legal proposition can be that a judicial officer is not liable in damages for an injury which may come to a party by reason of an error of judgment committed in the discharge of his duty where the subject-matter is within his jurisdiction.

Without going into the long list of *authorities in support of this proposition, extending back at least to the time of Lork Coke, it cannot be necessary to do more than refer to the case of Bradley v. Fisher, 13 Wall. 335 [20 L. Ed. 646], decided in the Supreme Court of the United States as late as 1871, in which the subject received exhaustive consideration.

That was an action for damages by Mr. Bradley, a lawyer, against Judge Fisher of the District of Columbia for striking him from the rolls as a practicing attorney. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Field said: "The principle which exempts judges of courts of superior or general authority from liability in a civil action for acts done by them in the exercise of their judicial functions obtains in all countries where there is any well-ordered system of jurisprudence. It has been the settled doctrine of the English courts for many centuries, and has never been denied, that we are aware of, in this country. It has, as Chancellor Kent observes, 'a deep root in the common law.' Yates v. Lansing, 5 Johns. 291. Nor can this exemption of the judges from civil liability be affected by the motives with which their judicial acts are performed. The purity of their motives cannot in this way be the subject of judicial inquiry. This was adjudged in the case of Floyd v. Barker, reported by Coke in 1608 (12 Coke 25), where it was laid down that the judges of the realm could not be drawn in question for any supposed corruption impeaching the verity of their records, except before the king himself, and it was observed that if they were required to answer otherwise it would 'tend to the scandal and subversion of all justice, and those who are the most sincere would not be free from continual calumniations.'" This is undoubtedly the law in reference to courts having general authority, and it is equally true in respect to judges of inferior courts, except possibly as to the right to call in question the motives with which they act—whether ignorantly or willfully and corruptly.

The case of Reid v. Hood and Burdine, 2 N. & McC. 168 [10 Am. Dec. 582], was very analogous to this. That was trespass against Burdine, a justice of the peace, and Hood, the plaintiff in an attachment which the said justice, at his instance, had illegally issued against the plaintiff. In delivering the judgment of the court, Judge Richardson says: "The essential characteristic distinction be*tween a judicial and a ministerial officer is that the former is to give judgment, which requires perfect freedom of opinion; but the latter is to execute, which supposes obedience to some mandate prescribing what is to be done, and leaving nothing to opinion. Now, as opinion upon any subject is various and uncertain, we cannot direct the judgment, but must leave it to the honest dictates of the officer's peculiar intellect, upon information acquired; and both information and intellect are so different in different men that it is vain to look for the same correctness of adjudication. In all judicial questions, then, the very aim and duty of the officer is to give his true opinion after due inquiry. If erroneous, he can no more answer for the error than for the head which Heaven has given him. All we ask of such an officer is the just picture which has been impressed upon the tablet of his intellect by the facts and the law together; and however discolored and distorted it may come out, yet if it be the true image of his intellectual impression, we get just what we require and all that he can give. Opinion, then, having no fixed test nor measure, no equal scales nor weights, all we can answer for is its honesty."

But it is insisted that this principle shields a judicial officer from pecuniary responsibility only when the act complained of is within his jurisdiction, and that he is liable as a trespasser when it is beyond his jurisdiction. It is alleged in this case that the trial justice acted without jurisdiction, and on that ground the judgment was declared void, as shown by the order in the certiorari proceedings. The State ex rel. McCall v. Cohen, supra. It is true it was held in that case "that a judgment" (this very judgment) "rendered by an inferior court against a party not brought within its jurisdiction by proper service of process may be set aside under proceedings by certiorari;" but it must not be overlooked that Trial Justice Huggins had jurisdiction of the subject-matter in which he rendered that judgment, although, the parties not being properly before him, it was in fact not a legal judgment. He was not acting beyond his jurisdiction, but he erred in supposing that he had acquired jurisdiction of the persons of the defendants when he had not. Having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, whether he had jurisdiction of the defend*ants was a matter for his own determination, although he might and did decide that question wrong.

This distinction between excess of jurisdiction and no jurisdiction at all is clearly made in the case already cited of Bradley v. Fisher. "The distinction here made between acts done in excess of jurisdiction and acts where no jurisdiction whatever over the subject-matter exists was taken by the Court of King's Bench in Ackerley v. Parkinson. In that case an action was brought against the Vicar-General of the Bishop of Chester and his surrogate, who held the consistorial and episcopal court of the bishop, for excommunicating the plaintiff with the greater excommunication, for contumacy in not taking upon himself the administration of an intestate's effects, to whom the plaintiff was next of kin, the citation issued to him being void, and having been so adjudged. The question presented was whether, under these circumstances, the action would lie. The citation being void, the plaintiff had not been legally brought before the court, and the subsequent proceedings were set aside on appeal on that ground. Lord Ellenborough observed that it was his opinion that the action was not maintainable if the ecclesiastical court had a general jurisdiction over the subject-matter, although the citation was a nullity, and said that "no authority had been cited to show that the judge would be liable to an action where he has jurisdiction, but has proceeded erroneously, or, as it is termed, 'inverso ordine.'"

Mr. Justice Blanc said there was "a material distinction between a case where a party comes to an erroneous conclusion in a matter over which he has jurisdiction and a case where he acts wholly without jurisdiction;" and held "that where the subject-matter was within the jurisdiction of the judge, and the conclusion was erroneous, although the party should, by reason of the error, be entitled to have the conclusion set aside and to be restored to his former rights, yet he was not entitled to claim compensation in damages for the injury done by such erroneous conclusion, as if the court had proceeded without any jurisdiction."

We see no evidence in this case that Huggins, the trial justice, acted willfully or corruptly in rendering the judgment. From *the record it appears that the defendants had been served in the usual way, and the illegality of that service having been made by a private person, without special appointment, was not obvious. It is not surprising that the trial justice made the mistake. Indeed, none but a well-informed lawyer would have known that the service was illegal and void. It was not shown that he had anything to do with making the actual levy or detaining the mule. There was nothing tending to connect him with that, except, perhaps, the statement of the deputy sheriff, Brown, that when he was informed of the levy, the morning after it was made, he replied: "All right, go ahead;" and laughed. Huggins denies this, but, if true, it was before the judgment was declared void, and afforded no evidence that in rendering the judgment he had acted willfully and corruptly.

As to the other defendants, members of the firm of Hart & Co., we see no evidence that they did more than creditors are allowed to do in collecting debts, or in any way were to blame. They lived in the city of Charleston, and it does not appear that any one of them was ever in the county of Darlington. In the course of business they sent a small account for collection to their attorney, who, in his efforts to collect it, took such steps as he thought proper. When a writ of certiorari was applied for to set aside a judgment he had obtained for his clients, he resisted the application, and, when he failed, they paid the costs as they were required to do. We see in this nothing so unusual or extraordinary as to show upon their part either the willful procurement or oppressive use of an illegal judgment.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Greenville, July, 1881.

This was an indictment against William Dodson, Pleasant Adams, Joseph Burton,

*454

Rich Bates and Fletcher Maddox, for *arson, in burning a large building in the city of Greenville, known as the Academy of Music, during one of the nights of 1879, the same being, at the time, occupied in part as a sleeping apartment. At the first trial, Fletcher Maddox pleaded guilty and was sentenced to be hung. The others were convicted and sentenced, but appealed to this court and obtained a reversal of the judgment. On their second trial, they were again convicted and sentenced, and again they appealed.

Omitting its statement of facts bearing upon grounds of appeal based upon the insufficiency of evidence in certain particulars, the report of the presiding judge was as follows:

An effort was made in behalf of defendants to have the case continued because of the absence of several (two) witnesses alleged to be material. These witnesses were shown by the return of the sheriff and by other evidence, to be absent from the State or not to be found, and one of them to be incompetent. The witnesses being without the jurisdiction of the court, in view of all the surrounding circumstances, I deemed it my duty, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to order the trial to proceed. From the information derived from the statements and argument of counsel, I then thought, and still think, that no injury was done the defendants in refusing this motion—which I could not have granted consistently with the rules of sound discretion, in view of the long time this charge had been pending, its previous tedious trial and the great uncertainty of ever obtaining the attendance of the witnesses.

The organization of the jury was greatly delayed and rendered very tedious by lengthy examinations and cross-examinations of each juror on his voir dire before being presented, and by the exercise of the right of challenge by each defendant separately. A number of persons stated on their voir dire that they had formed an opinion regarding the guilt or innocence of the prisoners, were biased by such opinion and felt that they could not stand indifferent in the case. The challenge for cause against them was of course sustained. Others stated that they had formed an opinion, but stated further that such opinion arose from what they had heard of the case or from the report of newspapers, which, however, would not in the least influence *their minds as jurors if sworn in the case. They stated that they were sensible of no bias or prejudice whatever, for or against the defendants or either of them, and would stand entirely indifferent and be governed alone by the evidence to be adduced. Answering thus, they were presented, but in every instance were challenged peremptorily, and no juror was empaneled except those who, on their voir dire, swore that they were without opinion in regard to the guilt or innocence of the accused—were entirely free from bias, and stood indifferent between the State and the prisoners at the bar. Such boni et legales hominès and none others, were sworn as jurors in this case.

In the progress of the trial, the State's counsel offered in evidence the written statement and confession of the defendant, William Dodson; to this the defendants' counsel objected, because the said Dodson had been previously convicted of two infamous offenses and had suffered punishment therefor. The court ruled that in no event could the confession of Dodson be evidence except as against himself, and its admissibility was not destroyed by reason of his infamy. If freely and voluntarily made, it should be admitted for what it might be, in the opinion of the jury, worth, as against Dodson and no other. It appearing to have been freely and voluntarily made by Dodson, and reduced to writing by another and signed by Dodson, the statement was admitted to be read by the jury, they being duly cautioned that it should not and must not be at all weighed by them, save only as against Dodson.

Fletcher Maddox, who had been jointly indicted with the other defendants, and pleaded guilty at the first trial, and against whom sentence of death had been pronounced, was tendered by the State as a witness for the prosecution. The counsel for the defendants objected that this witness not only had been sentenced to be hanged for this arson, but had been twice previously convicted of larceny, once for grand larceny, in 1879, and, subsequently, for petit larceny, for both of which offenses he had suffered the penalty of the law. To this the counsel for the State replied by producing a pardon in due form by the executive of the State for each of the crimes, and also a general pardon for *all past offenses against the laws of the State. No allegation nor proof was made of any offense save these crimes for which he held specific pardons.

I held that these pardons restored the competency of Maddox as a witness in our courts, but not his credibility. He stood as a competent witness, but whose credibility was impaired by infamy; but how far he was to be believed was a question for the jury. I remember no contest over the competency of any other witness offered by the State, and the exceptions and grounds of appeal make mention of no other.

On behalf of the defendants, Hattie Burton, wife of the defendant Joseph Burton, was offered as a witness, but objected to by counsel for the State. I held her incompetent. Joseph Burton being jointly indicted with the others, his wife, who is clearly incompetent to testify in his behalf, is, also, by the rules of evidence, excluded from testifying in behalf of his confederates and co-defendants.

The case is one of great importance; it excited, as is usual, great interest in the community, and brought forth the warmest zeal and highest powers of intellect of learned counsel for the State and defendants. A large number of witnesses appeared on the stand, and the voluminous testimony consumed much time in development. At the close of the argument I proceeded to deliver my charge to the jury. To them I carefully defined the crime of arson, and, in doing so, read the statutes of the State defining the offense. I earnestly cautioned them not to consider the statement and confession of Dodson, except as against himself, and that as against him, even, it was for them to say what weight they should attach to it.

In speaking of the witness Maddox, I told the jury, as I have stated above, that his testimony was before them as that of an infamous man and as an accomplice in this grave charge. It was for them to say what credit should be given to his testimony; and it was my duty to tell them, that whilst it is lawful to convict upon the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice, yet it is unsafe to do so, and that they should seek for facts and circumstances, established by credible witnesses, in corroboration of Maddox before believing him. In my entire charge,

I rigidly *confined myself to my strict duty in expounding the law, avoiding comment on the testimony, and leaving the facts of the case entirely to the jury. No exception at the time was taken to my charge by either side, nor did the counsel for the defendants make any request to charge any legal proposition; nor was I requested to call the attention of the jury to any statute prescribing the punishment for the offense.

The jury rendered a verdict of guilty against each defendant on trial, and their counsel, upon the grounds set forth in the proposed case, and which need not be here repeated, moved the court for a new trial, and in arrest of judgment. I refused the motion and pronounced against the convicts sentence of death.

The motion for a new trial and in arrest of judgment, is now renewed before the Supreme Court, upon the grounds urged before me. The case as proposed by the appellants, with the solicitor's allowances and disallowances, comes to me for settlement and for my report. Perhaps I cannot better complete this, my report, than by noticing seriatim but briefly the appellants' grounds of appeal in order merely to correct misconceptions and errors of fact, and to place the case in its true light before the Supreme Court.

I remark on ground of motion for new trial:

1. The rule observed in presentation of jurors has been sufficiently explained. None were presented who did not swear that they were indifferent, and could give the defendants an impartial trial, notwithstanding impressions made upon their minds from reports and rumors, and no juror was sworn who had formed any opinion at all, or who expressed the least bias.

2. Hattie Burton was held an incompetent witness, because she was the wife of Joseph Burton, a co-defendant with the others—a fact which the appellants' counsel omits to state.

3. The admission of William Dodson's statement and confession as evidence against himself alone, has been explained.

4. No further explanation is required as to the competency of Fletcher Maddox as a witness. Specific pardons restored his competency.

5. This ground is erroneous in its statement. The court did not refuse to allow the solicitor to point out the statute upon *which the indictment was based. It was pointed out to Mr. Stokes by the solicitor, and it was read by the court in charging the jury.

6. This ground arises from misapprehension. Mr. Stokes, in the heat of argument, was in eloquent but extravagant terms urging upon the jury that, if convicted, the defendants would be hanged, and that their innocent blood would be upon the hands of the jury. He had said much as to the severity of the punishment, when I interrupted him only so far as to remind him that the jury were not responsible for the law; they must not be frightened out of propriety by the severity of the punishment.

7. This exception is erroneous in representing me as giving the same instruction as to the confession of Dodson and testimony of Maddox. It fails to draw the distinction. Dodson's confession was carefully restricted as affecting him alone. The testimony of Maddox, affecting all, the jury were told, should be corroborated, as I have explained.

8. So far as the recommendation of mercy is concerned, it is the province of the jury in all cases to incorporate it in their verdict. There was nothing in the evidence tending to mitigate the offense of any one of these men, if guilty; and I suppose this is the reason why no mention of the matter of mercy was made by the counsel for the State, nor for the defendants, nor by the court. In fact, so frightful was the arson, that the whole burden of the argument, both for the State and the defense, was, that if guilty, they must be hanged. And this fate was so strongly held out by Mr. Stokes in terrorem over the jury as to call for the interruption by the court above stated. It was competent for defendants' counsel to plead for and to urge mercy in behalf of all or either of them, and to read them the statute. It was competent for him to ask the court to instruct them upon their power in this respect, and its consequence if exercised. This he failed to do, and cannot now be admitted to charge the omission to the court.

Messrs. E. F. Stokes and J. T. Nix, for appellants.

Messrs. Solicitor Orr and W. E. Earle, contra.

*February 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. The appellants in this case have again been convicted of the crime of arson, this court having granted them a new trial, after the former conviction, upon grounds stated in 14 S. C. 628, and they now appeal again upon various grounds.

We do not propose to recite the various grounds as set out in the "case," some of them being mere repetitions of others, but will proceed to consider and determine the various questions which we understand to be made by the several grounds of appeal.

The first question raised is whether the Circuit judge erred in refusing the motion to continue the case. As has been repeatedly decided, this is a question addressed solely to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and is not reviewable on appeal. We may add, however, that it seems to us that the discretion of the Circuit judge was very properly exercised in refusing the motion to continue.

The next question is whether the Circuit judge erred in allowing certain jurors to be presented to the prisoners, who, when examined on their voir dire, stated that they had formed an opinion in reference to the case from what they had heard or seen in the newspapers, which, however, would not in the least influence their minds as jurors; that they were not sensible of any bias or prejudice whatever, either for or against the prisoners, and would be governed by the evidence adduced in the case. The statute, after providing that the court shall, upon the motion of either party to the cause, examine any person called as a juror upon his voir dire, declares that: "If it appears to the court that the juror is not indifferent in the cause, he shall be placed aside as to the trial of that cause, and another shall be called." Gen. Stat. Ch. CXI. § 25, p. 523.

This would seem to vest the power of determining the question of fact, as to whether the juror was indifferent, in the hands of the court called upon to try the case, and we do not see how this court could undertake to review such determination. But even were this not so, we see no error in the course pursued by the Circuit judge. Any other course would have the effect of *excluding from the jury box, in any case of such magnitude or public interest as would be likely to attract attention, the very class of persons who would be best qualified to occupy that position, for in cases of that character it would be difficult to find persons of ordinary intelligence who had not received some impressions in regard to a case from what they had heard or read in the newspapers. If, however, the Circuit judge did err in allowing such persons to be presented as jurors, such error could not avail the appellants here, for they were not prejudiced thereby, inasmuch as it appears that none of the jurors who had so expressed themselves were sworn in the case, but that all of them were peremptorily challenged, and as it was admitted in the argument here that the prisoners did not exhaust their peremptory challenges. State v. Price, 10 Rich. 356; State v. McQuaige, 5 S. C. 431; State v. Gill, 14 Id. 412.

The next questions as to the competency of Hattie Burton as a witness for the defendants, and as to the competency of the confessions of Dodson, are fully disposed of by the recent decision in the case of State v. Workman, 15 S. C. 540. Hattie Burton was the wife of one of the prisoners, Joseph Burton, and was offered "to prove the whereabouts of Joseph Burton" on the night the arson was alleged to have been committed, for which purpose she was clearly incompetent. The confession of Dodson was held to be competent evidence against him by the former decision in this case; and the fact that in such confession he used the names of the other defendants did not require that it should have been excluded, or that it should be read omitting the names of the other defendants, as was distinctly decided in the case of State v. Workman, supra. It was, however, the duty of the judge before whom the case was on trial to instruct the jury that such confession could only be regarded as evidence against the person who made it, and not against the other defendants. But this duty was fully performed by the judge who tried this case, and the jury were explicitly cautioned that the confession of Dodson was evidence only against him, and "should not and must not be at all weighed by them save only as against Dodson."

The next inquiry is whether the competency of Maddox as a witness was restored by the pardons exhibited. It is laid down *in all the elementary writers on evidence that a pardon restores the competency of a witness who has been convicted of an infamous crime, even if the entire punishment has been suffered before the pardon is granted. 1 Greenl. Evid. § 377; 2 Stark. Ev. 722.

The next objection raised by the appellants —that the Circuit judge "erred in refusing to require the solicitor to point out the exact statute under which the prisoners were indicted, and to read the same to the jury,"— seems to be based upon a misapprehension of the facts, and we need not, therefore, consider whether there would have been any error of law if the Circuit judge had refused to require the solicitor so to do, for it appears that the statute was pointed out and attention called to the amendment increasing the punishment of the offense charged.

The several grounds of appeal which complain that the Circuit judge checked one of the counsel for the prisoners in pressing upon the jury the idea that in case their verdict should be guilty the prisoners would be hanged, and that the jury were instructed that they had nothing whatever to do with the consequences of their verdict, but that their simple and sole duty was to determine whether the prisoners were guilty or not guilty, seem to be based upon a misconception of the judge's charge. The object of these grounds is to convey the impression that the judge deprived the jury of the right to consider anything but the simple question of fact whether the prisoners were guilty of burning the house in question, without any reference to the degree of such guilt, or whether there were any such mitigating circumstances in the case as would justify the jury in finding such special verdict as would, under the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 631), exempt the prisoners from the extreme penalty of the law.

That such was not the intention of the charge, and that it could not have been so construed, we think is manifest from the report of the Circuit judge. In checking the counsel, as it is called, the manifest purpose of the judge was simply to remind the jury that they would not be responsible for the consequences flowing from their verdict, and that they should not be frightened from their propriety by any gloomy visions which counsel, in their zeal in behalf of their clients, might present before them, *but that their duty was to pass upon the facts, uninfluenced by the consequences, from the expression of their honest convictions. This is quite common in cases of this character, and we cannot say that it is improper. Certainly we can see no such error of law in it as would justify our interference. It was not charging the jury upon the facts of the case, but, at most, was simply an invocation to the jury to do their duty regardless of the consequences.

The next question is whether there was any error of law on the part of the Circuit judge in omitting to inform the jury that they had the power, under the act of 1878, to bring in a special verdict recommending the prisoners to mercy. As has been recently determined in the case of State v. Gill, 14 S. C. 410, the jury always had this power, and the only effect of the provision in the act above cited is to declare what shall be the definite legal effect of the exercise of this power in the cases mentioned in the act. There are very few instances—we doubt if there are any—in which such recommendation has not been respected by the proper authority, and yet we have never heard it suggested before that the omission of a judge to inform the jury that they had such a power would constitute such an error of law as could be corrected by this court; and we can see no reason why it should be so regarded now, especially when, as in this case, there was no request so to instruct the jury. For, while in capital cases this court, in favorem vitæ, will not insist upon the rule requiring a party who wishes to take advantage of any omission to charge to show a request to charge the matter omitted, but, as is said in State v. McNinch, 12 S. C. 96, will "take notice, in behalf of the accused, of any error apparent upon the record by which the prisoner has been deprived of any of the substantial means of enjoying a fair and impartial trial," yet this does not mean that any immaterial error or omission will thus be noticed. It must be such an error or omission as is substantial or material. Hence, if the error or omission is merely theoretical or immaterial it will not avail the appellant here.

If the judge should omit to charge some undeniable proposition, which did not appear to be applicable to the case as made, it could not avail the appellent here. For example: If, upon the trial of a person under an indictment for murder, where the *evidence was that the deed was done by deliberately administering poison, or that the prisoner, after making express threats, lay in wait for his victim, the judge should omit to instruct the jury that under an indictment for murder they had the power to convict the prisoner of manslaughter, which would reduce the punishment from death to confinement in the penitentiary, such an omission would certainly not be such an error of law as would justify this court in granting a new trial. For, while it is undeniably true, as an abstract legal proposition, that upon an indictment for murder the jury have the power to render a verdict of manslaughter, the legal effect of which would be to reduce the punishment of the person so convicted, yet the omission so to charge would not be such an error of law as this court would take notice of without a request so to charge, because it would be wholly inapplicable and immaterial to the case.

So here, according to the judge's report, and from the evidence submitted here, it does not seem that there was anything whatever in the case as made below, calling for such an instruction to the jury, as it is now contended should have been given. So far as we are informed there were no mitigating circumstances in the case. The sole question was whether the persons charged were the persons who did the deed, and it seemed to be conceded, even in the argument of the counsel for the prisoners, that if they were guilty they would be hanged. This being the case, in the absence of any request so to instruct the jury, we do not think the omission of the judge to inform the jury that they had the power to bring in a verdict of guilty accompanied by a recommendation to mercy was such an error of law as deprived the prisoners of any of the substantial means of obtaining a fair and impartial trial. A judge is not bound to lay before the jury all the law which might, under any circumstances, apply to the offense charged but only such principles as are applicable to the case as made by the evidence; and if the party charged desires to have any other principles of law laid down to the jury it is his duty to request the judge to instruct the jury as to such other propositions as he may desire the jury to be informed of.

The case of State v. Nicholas, 2 Strobh. 278, which is mainly relied upon by the counsel for appellants, we do not think *applicable to the case now under consideration. That was a case in which a slave was convicted, before a court of magistrates and freeholders, under the act of 1740, which declared that if any slave "shall grievously wound, maim or bruise any white person," such slave should suffer death. The Court of Appeals held that a new trial should be granted where the freeholders who tried the case were ignorant of the existence of the act of 1751, which provided that in any trial for the violation of any of the provisions of the act of 1740 it should be lawful "for the justices and freeholders upon such trial, or a majority of them, to mitigate the punishment to be inflicted upon the offender in all and every case where any favorable circumstances shall appear and induce them to be of opinion that such punishment ought to be mitigated." In that case it was made to appear that the freeholders were ignorant of the law giving them power to reduce the punishment, and it is manifest that it was a very proper case for the exercise of that power. For it was at least doubtful whether the injuries inflicted amounted to a grievously wounding, maiming or bruising within the meaning of the statute, it being alleged that the wounds were merely superficial or flesh wounds, not attended with any peril to life or limb, and not followed by any permanent evil consequences.

Here, however, there is not only no evidence that the jury were ignorant of their power to recommend to mercy, but the presumption is the other way, as it can scarcely be supposed that the jury were ignorant of the fact that they possessed a power which had been exercised by juries, whenever so minded, ever since the foundation of our judicial system; and, as we have said, there does not appear to be anything in the circumstances calling for the exercise of such a power.

The next objection is based upon an alleged informality in the verdict, or rather a variance between the Christian name of one of the prisoners, as written in the indictment and in the verdict—one of the prisoners being designated in the indictment as Rich Bates, while in the verdict his name is written Richard Bates. This we think wholly immaterial, for the names might be rejected altogether—certainly the Christian names—and the verdict would be sufficient.

*Various other grounds of appeal are based upon an alleged insufficiency of evidence, but this has been so often ruled upon by this court as not constituting any ground of which this court can take notice, that it is unnecessary to cite the cases here.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of having a new day assigned for the execution of the sentence heretofore passed.

DUREN v. STRAIT.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Assumpsit, Action of ⇐25.]

In action against an executor upon an implied contract of the testator to pay for timber trees of the plaintiff cut and removed by the deceased, it is not essential to a recovery that plaintiff should prove title to the land from which the trees were cut; but the Circuit judge erred in instructing the jury that mere proof of plaintiff's possession of the land would entitle him to recover the value of the trees, unless the defendant showed a better right. The real issue involved was the ownership of the trees.

[2. Ejectment ⇐90.]

In such action, a plat found among the records of a prior cause between this plaintiff's father as defendant, (then holding in right of his son, a minor,) and another party as plaintiff, involving the title to the land from which the trees were cut, was competent evidence to show the extent of this plaintiff's claim under color of title.

Before Fraser, J., Lancaster, February, 1881.

Action by Thomas R. Duren against S. L. Strait, as executor of John Sinclair, deceased, begun in 1876 and revived in 1878. The opinion states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see Duren v. Sinclair, 22 S. C. 361.]

Mr. Ernest Moore, for appellant.

Mr. R. E. Allison, contra.

*February 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This action was originally commenced against John Sinclair to recover damages for trespass upon land claimed as the property of the plaintiff. Sinclair having died pending the action, the plaintiff obtained an order to continue the action against the present defendant as the duly qualified executor of the last will and testament of the original defendant, John Sinclair. The executor demurred and his demurrer was sustained, but leave was granted to plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to convert the action into an action to recover the value of certain timber trees alleged to have been taken from said land by Sinclair in his life-time and converted to his own use.

It will be at once perceived that the present action differs very materially from the one originally instituted. The original action was in substance nothing more than the old action of trespass quare clausum fregit, the object of which was to recover damages for an injury done to plaintiff's possession, and, therefore, the title to the property damaged was not necessarily put in issue. Hence, to maintain that action it was only necessary for the plaintiff to prove his possession and the trespass upon such possession, and unless the defendant, by the plea of liberum tenementum, put the title in issue, it would be unnecessary for the plaintiff to prove any title in himself. This being an action of tort, did not survive, and, therefore, upon the death of Sinclair the plaintiff's right of action of this character was gone, and his only remedy was that pursued by his amended complaint—to waive the tort and sue for the value of the property taken upon an implied assumpsit. To maintain this kind of action it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege and prove ownership of the timber trees; and this might have been done by showing title to the land from which the trees were cut, or by showing ownership of them in some other way, or such a possession of them as would invest him with the character of temporary owner: but mere proof of possession of the land from which the trees were cut would not entitle him to recover their value in an action ex contractu.

The plaintiff having obtained a verdict, the defendant moved *for a new trial, which was refused, and from the judgment entered on the verdict the defendant appeals on several grounds.

The first position taken by the appellant is that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to charge the jury "that, in an action of this kind, under the pleadings, the plaintiff, in order to recover, must show actual paper title to the land from which the timber was taken or possession for the statutory period, with color of title, embracing the same," and on the contrary instructing the jury "that actual possession of said land, or constructive possession under color of title, for less than the statutory period is sufficient to enable the plaintiff to sustain the action in its present amended form, unless the defendant has shown title or possession by himself, or title by some one under whom he claims." We cannot say that there was any error in refusing to charge as requested, inasmuch as it may be that, though the plaintiff should fail to establish his title to the land either by adverse possession for the statutory period, or by regular paper title, yet if he had shown his ownership of the trees, acquired after they were severed from the freehold, or such a possession of them as would invest him with the character of temporary owner, he would be entitled to recover.

But we think there was error in instructing the jury that mere proof of possession of the land from which the trees were taken would be sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover the value of the trees in an action of the character of the one now under consideration, unless the defendant showed title to or possession of the land in himself, or title in some one under whom he claims. Such a proposition seems to us to ignore the distinction, hereinbefore pointed out, between the action of tort to recover damages done to the possession of land, and the action ex contractu to recover the value of the trees as personal property. To illustrate this distinction more broadly: Suppose the plaintiff had actual possession of the land, and the timber trees in question had been cut on the land and carried off by A., and afterwards taken possession of by B., and converted to his own use. Now the plaintiff could maintain an action of tort against A. for a trespass upon land in his possession, upon mere proof of his possession, unless A. could show title to the mitted any trespass on the land, and plaintiff's only remedy against B. would be an action to recover the value of the trees which he had converted to his own use; and to maintain such an action it would be necessary for him to allege and prove his ownership of the property whose value he was seeking to recover. Mere proof of possession of the land from which the trees were originally taken would not be sufficient, unless such possession was of such a character and sufficiently long to give him a statutory title to the land.

So, here, the right to sue for the trespass committed on the land by Sinclair having been lost by the death of Sinclair, the plaintiff can only sue for the value of what he alleges is his property which had been taken from him, and to recover in such an action he must prove his ownership of the property taken, and this he may do either by showing a title to the land from which the trees were cut, or that he acquired the ownership of the trees after they were converted into personal property by being severed from the freehold, either by such a possession of them as invested him with the character of owner, or in some other way; but mere proof of possession of the land will not be sufficient.

The next position taken by the appellant is that the Circuit judge erred in instructing the jury that the plat made and used on the trial of the case of J. R. Massey et al. v. Wylie R. Duren et al. [3 S. E. 34] dated September 20th, 1869, could avail the plaintiff as color of title, though it remained among the records of the court and was not in the possession of the plaintiff. It seems that some years before this action was commenced Massey and others brought an action against Wylie R. Duren to recover possession of a tract of land which was claimed by Wylie R. Duren as the property of his son, then a minor, the present plaintiff. For the purposes of that trial a plat was made by the surveyors appointed under the order of the court showing Duren's claim, which covered the land from which the timber trees sued for in this case were cut. That case resulted in a verdict for the defendant, and the plat used on the trial, as is usually the case, was left in the record of that cause.

*We are unable to see any reason why the plaintiff could not rely upon this plat as color of title. The fact that it was not in the possession of the plaintiff but remained in the record of the above-mentioned cause cannot make any difference. That would seem to be the appropriate place for it, and it certainly furnished evidence of the extent of plaintiff's claim. In Simmons v. Parsons, 2 Hill 492, note, color of title is defined to be "anything which shows the extent of the occupant's claim." It certainly was competent evidence to go to the jury to show that the plaintiff, or those then acting for him, when that plat was made, claimed the land embraced within the lines of that plat, and that clearly would avail the plaintiff as color of title. See Slice v. Derrick, 2 Rich. 629.

The last position taken by the appellant is based upon the ground that the Circuit judge erred in refusing the motion for a new trial, "there being no evidence that the plaintiff had title to the timber or was in actual or constructive possession of the land from which it was taken." There certainly was some evidence on both of these points, and, therefore, this ground need not be considered further.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Wallace, J., Hampton, March, 1881.

Action by Samuel P. Maner and others, devisees of James W. Lawton, deceased, against B. J. Wilson and U. B. Wilkinson, commenced in April, 1879. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Jeff. Warren, for appellants.

Mr. Robt. Aldrich, contra.

March 1st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. James W. Lawton died March 8th, 1870, in possession of a tract of land, consisting of 1,250 acres in *Hampton county, and other property necessary for the cultivation of such a plantation, viz., horses, mules, oxen, stock, cotton, plantation tools, guano, &c. He left a will by which, after several minor legacies, he devised and bequeathed all his property to Mrs. Mary Ann Maner for life, and after her death to her children. Mrs. Maner is now dead, and her children are the plaintiffs claiming the property.

Shortly before his death (April 3d, 1868) the testator, being indebted to Wilkinson & Wilson, factors, of Savannah, Georgia, for supplies to run his farm, executed to them a mortgage and lien, which provided as follows: "In consideration of advances made to me by Wilkinson & Wilson, to the sum of $2,500, with interest at nineteen per cent., payable November 1st, next, said advances having been made to assist me in my planting operations during the year 1868, I do hereby declare and create a lien or mortgage to the said Wilkinson & Wilson on all that plantation containing 1,250 acres, and on all crops to be cultivated on said place this year, also on eight mules, six cows and calves, two yoke oxen, forty sheep, three wagons, &c., to secure the said payment. And I do hereby constitute said firm my agents to sell and make titles to said place and crops and all other property herein mentioned, repaying themselves for the advances, with interest, fees and expenses incurred," &c.

On April 16th, 1869, the testator also executed to the defendants, Wilkinson & Wilson, a deed in fee of the same property, real and personal, "in consideration of eight thousand dollars paid by said firm to him." Lawton remained in possession of the property until his death in 1870, when Wilkinson & Wilson took possession of all the property, real and personal, covered by the deed of April 16th, 1869, and, in addition, four tons of guano found on the place. In April, 1870, the defendants had sold personal property on the place to the amount of $850, under a judgment and execution against James W. Lawton, which they had purchased and assigned to them April 22d, 1869, by one R. R. Turner. The said defendants also rented the plantation as their own property for about nine years from the death of testator in 1870.

In 1879 the plaintiffs, as remaindermen

under the will of James W. Lawton, instituted these proceedings against the defendants to have the paper executed as a deed bearing date April 16th, 1869, declared to be a mortgage, and to ascertain the true amount due by the testator Lawton to the defendants, and to have the land reconveyed to them and an account taken of the rents and profits thereof while in possession of defendants under their claim as owners. The defendants answered, claiming the land under their deed. Judge Fraser first heard the case and filed his decree December 19th, 1879, holding that the said deed should stand as a mortgage, and ordering that the clerk of the court, W. J. Causey, Esq., as referee, should take an account of the amount due to the defendants by James W. Lawton at the time of his death—the defendants to be actors in the accounting—the personal property taken and the rents of the land to be set down as credits, making all proper allowance for interest and taxes. From this decree there was no appeal.

The referee took the testimony and made his report, and it will only be necessary to refer to two or three of the points made. The defendants were allowed to the extent of $800 and interest at seven per cent. upon their account current for advances, which had been rendered to Lawton, November 24th, 1869, and also the balance of the judgment, $2,012.61, against J. W. Lawton, which they had purchased and had assigned to them at the rate of seven per cent. interest per annum. And these demands were to be credited with the rental value of the land for nine years, $8,500, and interest on each year's rent from the end of that year, and the value of personal property sold under execution, $850 and interest thereon, and the value of four tons of guano found on the place at $80 per ton and interest thereon.

To this report both parties filed exceptions. The plaintiffs claiming that the referee should have held the account stated for advances barred by the Statute of Limitations, or, if not, that no interest should have been allowed thereon, and, also, that too little was allowed for the rents, which should have been at least $1,200 per annum. The defendants excepted because the referee had not allowed the whole account stated, $1,690.61 and interest, on the account, as well as the assigned judgment at the rate of nineteen per cent. per annum for the whole time until paid, and, *also, because the referee charged "rental value," when he should have found "that the defendants were only chargeable with the amounts actually received from the annual rents."

The case upon the exceptions came on to be heard before Judge Pressley, who filed his decree July 28th, 1880, overruling the Statute of Limitations and sustaining the referee in charging rental value instead of rents and profits received for the land; but holding that the whole of the account stated for advances, $1,690.61, should have been allowed the defendants, and that both this account and the assigned judgment should bear interest at the rate of nineteen per cent. per annum. The judge recommitted the case to the referee to take further testimony and restate the accounts between the parties according to the principles above decided. "Either party is free to offer testimony as to the value of the annual rents, or the guano, personalty, property shipped to Savannah or sold by the sheriff," &c.

The referee took further testimony and again stated the accounts. Upon this accounting the defendants offered a new item of indebtedness against J. W. Lawton, which had not appeared before, viz., a sealed note, as follows:

"$1,200. On or before the first of November next I promise to pay Wilkinson & Wilson or order twelve hundred dollars for plantation supplies to assist me in my planting operations the present year. In consideration of which supplies furnished me by Wilkinson & Wilson I obligate and bind myself to consign to them my cotton crop of three hundred and fifty acres production to sell and repay themselves for all advances and customary charges, &c.

"J. W. Lawton. [L. S.]

"June 5th, 1867."

Also tax receipt for 1869, $101.06.

The referee made his report restating the old items of account according to the principles of Judge Pressley's decree, but refusing to allow the defendants the aforesaid note for $1,200, and the tax receipt, on the ground that they were new matter, and not within the terms of Judge Pressley's order of reference. Both parties again excepted, and Judge Wallace overruled the report in so far as it excluded the note for $1,200 and the tax receipt *for $101.06, and allowed a credit of the gross amount of sheriff's sales, $850, instead of the net balance of $678.85. The judgment also modified the report by reducing the rental value of the land to the amount of rents actually received, and again ordered the report to be recommitted to the referee.

The plaintiffs appeal to this court from the decree of Judge Pressley upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor erred in allowing interest at nineteen per cent. on the account current of $1,691.61 and the judgment of $2,012.61, and overruling referee's report that interest on same be fixed at seven per cent.

2. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the referee's report rejecting as inadmissible a copy of a letter said to have been written by defendants to Lawton in his lifetime, and witnesses' statement, after Lawton's death, as to what Lawton said or agreed to verbally in reply about terms of said letter.

3. "Because his Honor erred in not sustaining the referee's report that $800 was only due by Lawton on the account current at time of his death."

The plaintiffs also appeal from Judge Wallace's decree upon the following grounds:

1. "Because he erred in not sustaining

plaintiff's exception to the report of referee, that the rental value of the land was worth $1,200 annually, and in allowing only ten bales of cotton annually as rent, Judges Fraser and Pressley having decided that the defendants had taken possession of the land unlawfully and were to be charged with such rents as the land could have brought on fair competition in open market.

2. "Because, at any rate, his Honor erred in overruling the referee's report that the rental value of the land was $1,200 per annum.

3. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the referee's report which was adverse to the allowance of the tax receipt of 1869 for $101.06 and the note for $1,200—the same not being authorized by Judge Pressley's decree.

4. "Because his Honor erred in overruling the referee's report allowing $830 worth of personalty sold under execution, as well as $407.61 worth of guano.

*5. "Because their Honors', Judge Pressley's and Judge Wallace's, decrees were otherwise contrary to law and the preponderance of the evidence."

In the first place objection is made that it is too late to appeal from the decree of Judge Pressley, which, as respondents claim, was not "an intermediate decree necessarily affecting the judgment not before appealed from," but a final judgment, which cannot be reviewed upon appeal from Judge Wallace's decree. Judge Pressley's decree, after declaring the principles which should govern in the accounting, recommitted the whole matter to the referee to state the account, and at least to that extent was an intermediate order; but without going into the question whether Judge Pressley's decree can be reviewed on appeal from Judge Wallace's decree, it is enough to say that, as admitted, the decree of Judge Pressley was filed in vacation and no written notice of it was served on appellants. The object of the notice required is to apprise the appellant that the respondent intends to insist on an appeal within the time fixed by law, and unless such notice is given the appellant is unrestricted as it regards the time within which an appeal may be taken. "The time for giving notice of appeal from a judgment filed in vacation begins to run from the receipt of written notice of the judgment, notwithstanding actual notice." Lake v. Moore, 12 S. C. 563.

In regard to the exceptions, we will, for the sake of clearness, consider them according to subject matter.

First, as to the claims of defendants:

1. It seems that an account current from Wilson & Co. to J. W. Lawton was in evidence, and it is to be regretted that it is not in "the case" as presented here. In regard to that account nothing appears but a mere statement that it bears upon its face, "A balance of $925 on January 12th, 1869, and also items of merchandise and cash furnished to Lawton during the months of April, May, June, July, August, September, October and November, aggregating $2,730.61, reduced by credit to the amount of $1,690.61 due Wilson, November 24th, 1869." In the first report, under Judge Fraser's decree, the referee allowed of this balance only $800 and interest on it at seven per cent. Judge Pressley decreed that the defendants were entitled to the whole *balance of the account as rendered, $1,690.61, with interest thereon, until paid, at the rate of nineteen per cent. per annum. In the second report this amount and interest as decreed by Judge Pressley were retained.

We have not the means of determining whether that balance was correct or not, except in so far as interest at nineteen per cent. after November 1st, 1868, entered into it. We cannot agree that any balance of the account which remained unpaid should bear more than seven per cent. interest after November 1st, 1868. At the time the lien or crop mortgage for advances was executed, April 3d, 1868, the law of 1866 was of force, which provided as follows: "In all cases of contract for the hiring, lending or use of money, wherein, by the terms of the original contract, no specific rate of interest shall have been agreed upon in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, the legal interest shall be and remain at the rate of seven per cent. per annum." 13 Stat. 318.

In this case there was a contract wherein a specific rate of interest was agreed upon in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith, but that contract was in these words: "with interest at nineteen per cent. payable first November next" (1868). That contract carried the interest at nineteen per cent. until the advances were due and payable on November 1st, 1868, and no longer. This court has held "that if the debt bears a fixed rate of interest on its face higher or lower than that provided by law, the interest fixed by law attaches on it, for the detention of the principal sum after the debt becomes due, where the parties do not contract that it shall be the rate after that time." Langston v. S. C. Railroad Company, 2 S. C. 248. In several subsequent cases it has been held that it is always a question of intention, to be derived from the terms of the obligation itself, whether the party agreed that the specified interest should continue to run after it fell due. Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341; Mobley v. Davega, ante p. 73 [42 Am. Rep. 632].

The only paper in this case signed by the party to be charged, which mentions nineteen per cent. interest, is the lien or mortgage of April 3d, 1868, due November 1st, 1868; and there is nothing in that paper which authorizes the construction that Lawton's *promise to pay nineteen per cent. on advances, "payable first November next," was intended to reach beyond the time the money fell due. We do not see how it can alter the result if the account for advances, with interest calculated at nineteen per cent., was rendered to Lawton in his life-time; and there was no evidence that he objected to it, or even if it were shown that he verbally promised that the interest should continue to run at nineteen per cent. on the balance after it became due and payable, in order to continue that interest after the obligation fell due it seems that two things were necessary; first, that it should appear to be the agreement of the parties that the interest should so run, and, second, that such agreement should appear in writing in the original contract. No such agreement appears in the contract, and, as a consequence, the balance of the account for advances will bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. from and after November 1st, 1868.

II. In reference to the balance of the judgment of E. C. Wade & Co. v. James W. Lawton, $2,012.61, which was assigned to defendants April 22d, 1869, the interest should be allowed at the rate of seven per cent. It nowhere appears how much was paid for the judgment. There is no charge for the money, as such, advanced for the judgment, which was not "taken up," but assigned and kept in force as a judgment, and, as we understand it, certain personal property of Lawton, after his death, was actually levied and sold under it. A judgment at law bears interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum. Gen. Stat. 318.

We can find no evidence in the case that Lawton ever agreed in writing to pay nineteen per cent. interest for any advances except for agricultural purposes. The money with which the execution was purchased was not advanced for agricultural purposes, and we cannot infer such a contract, as to the judgment, from the mere fact that he promised that interest for advances to make crops. We do not think that the money with which the judgment was purchased "stands on equal footing with the advances in the account current." So far as the interest on the judgment is concerned, the decree of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the interest on the judgment will be calculated at seven per cent. according to law.

*III. The claim for the $1,200 agricultural note was not made until the last reference under Judge Pressley's decree, which authorized the referee "to take further testimony and state the account between the parties according to the principles therein announced," either party being free to offer testimony as to the value of the annual rents, or the guano, personalty, property shipped to Savannah or sold by the sheriff, &c. Under this order the referee held that he could take testimony only on the points specially indicated, and refused to consider the new matter—the note and tax receipt—then presented for the first time.

Judge Wallace overruled the report upon this subject, and ordered the note and tax receipt to be allowed. The ground upon which the referee excluded these matters was not sufficient. The order was to ascertain the debt of the defendants against Lawton at the time of his death. The business being still under consideration and unfinished, equity will not allow any newly-discovered matter of importance to be excluded for no other reason than that it was not brought forward in the first instance.

As was said in the case of Gist v. Gist, Bail. Eq. 343: "In strictness this claim comes too late; it ought to have been made before the master on the reference. This was not done, and there was neither any exception to his report on that ground, nor was the point made at the hearing in the court below. Still, however, I suppose it to be within the competency of this court, if any claim or ground of defense has been casually omitted to be made, to afford the parties an opportunity of trying its merits, and the court is always reluctant whilst the case is in its power to exclude any apparently just claim or defense."

There seems to be no doubt about the tax receipt for 1869, which was before the defendants took possession of the land, and if it was not included in the account stated, should be allowed.

But, as to the note, it seems strange that in such a controversy the defendants should have entirely overlooked an item of debt for $1,200, or so far miscalculated the amount of their claim, when Mr. Wilson said in his testimony "that Lawton owed them $900, in January, 1869." The note bears date June 5th, 1867, and is in the nature of a lien for agricultural advances. Its terms show that it was given, not to be collected as an ordi*nary money demand, but to cover plantation supplies for 1867, as the lien for $2,500 was given for the year 1868, "in consideration of which supplies Lawton bound himself to consign to them his cotton crop of three hundred and fifty acres production to sell and repay themselves for all advances and customary charges," &c. There is no proof as to what extent supplies were furnished Lawton in 1867, nor how much, if any, of his cotton crop of that year went in payment. The defendants did not claim the lien for $2,500 in 1868, but rendered a formal account current for supplies down to November, 1869, which included charges anterior to that time. Unexplained, the presumption would be that this account included balance for all advances previously made. It is not to be supposed that the defendants would render a formal account for supplies, omitting those made in 1867 to the extent of $1,200, and, accordingly, Mr. Wilson states in his testimony that "when we made up account current we put in all appearing on the books."

It may be that the itemized account rendered will show the truth of the matter. If it turns out that supplies were furnished in 1867 to the amount of this lien note, and they have never been paid for or included in the account stated, the claim should be allowed. But we think the note should be referred back to the referee to ascertain all the facts connected with it: why the delay in producing it, and especially whether the supplies covered by it were furnished in 1867, and if so, whether they were included in the account rendered, or have been paid for in whole or in part by cotton or otherwise; and it is so ordered.

Second, as to the claims against defendants:

I. In reference to the rents of the land. The defendants took possession of the plantation May 4th, 1870, and held it and rented it until January 1st, 1879, as owners under a paper, in form a deed, but which has been declared to be a mortgage. It is conceded that the land did not belong to the defendants, and they must account for rents, but the contest is as to what amount they shall be required to pay. The plaintiffs contend that the defendants are chargeable with such rent as they could have received if they had offered the plantation for rent on fair competition in open market; and the defendants insist that they *are only liable for the actual rents and profits received while they had possession. Judge Pressley held that the view of the plaintiffs was the correct one—that the defendants should account for "the rental value"—for the reason that they took possession without due process of law, and had no right to cause loss to the estate of Lawton by their unsuccessful planting experiment, and so he construed Judge Fraser's decree. We concur in this view. The occupancy of the defendants certainly bears no analogy, as was contended, to that of a tenant in common, as against his co-tenant, who is in possession of his part as of right. "One tenant in common cannot maintain a possessory action against his co-tenant except for an actual ouster; but if he ousts the other co-tenants, and keeps them out by force, then he would be liable as a trespasser for the rental value," &c. Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 307.

The defendants entered and held as absolute owners. It is true that they had a conveyance of the land, in form a deed, but as a deed it has been held to be invalid. They knew it was intended to be a mortgage, and as they did not enter and hold as mortgagees they are not entitled to be considered as mortgagees rightfully in possession.

Under this judgment the referee restated the accounts. There was proof as to the amount of rents actually received, and conflicting testimony as to the rental value of the land, and he found the rental value to be $1,200 per annum.

Judge Wallace, while concurring in the principle upon which the rents were charged, held as matter of fact that the rents actually received were substantially the same as those the plantation would have brought "on fair competition and in open market." He says: "That in fixing the rent of the land the proof of the plaintiffs and the finding of the referee tend more to show what the plantation was worth, in the opinion of the witnesses, than what it would have brought during the time defendants had it in possession. The proof is that it brought ten bales of cotton, weighing five hundred pounds each, and the taxes for each year defendants had it in possession, except the last year, when it brought nine bales and the taxes. There is no proof that there was either carelessness, negligence or thriftless*ness in the renting of the land, or that there was any desire or intention of defendants to benefit the party to whom they rented it by allowing him to have it at an under value; on the contrary, it is proved that after the plaintiffs came into the possession of the place they rented it to the same party for the same rent—nine bales of cotton and the taxes. My conclusion is that the rents which could have been received, had the place been offered on fair competition, in open market, are ten bales of cotton and the taxes for each year the defendants had it in possession, except the last, and for that year the rent should be nine bales and the taxes." Shall this ruling of the Circuit judge, modifying the finding of the referee upon a question of fact, stand as the judgment of this court?

Being a case in chancery, we have the right to consider all the testimony, which we have done. There is conflict in the testimony, and in that case the judgment of the Circuit judge is at least prima facie right. There are several considerations which induce us to concur with him. The opinion of witnesses as to what land would rent for is necessarily somewhat speculative. The question of what land would rent for in the market is not always identical with that of its worth. During at least part of the time this land was in possession of the defendants the government was somewhat unsettled and labor more or less demoralized. The defendants did not occupy the land themselves, but rented it to others. They claimed to be the owners, and it was their interest to get full rent. This is the third estimate that has been made of their rents. It concerns the interest of the country that there should be an end of litigation. Whilst, as an original question, we might possibly not have reached the same conclusion which the Circuit judge did, we cannot say his ruling as to the amount of rents was error, and the same is affirmed.

II. The sheriff, under the execution assigned to defendants, sold personal property on the place to the amount of $850, of which $171.15 was applied to costs and expenses, leaving a net balance of $678.85, which amount, and not the gross sales, the judge ordered to be credited on the execution. In this we concur with the judge. This exception is overruled.

*III. The defendants found on the place when they took possession, four tons of guano, worth $407.61, which they used. The defendants deny accountability for this, alleging that they sold the guano to Lawton in his life-time, and that it was neither paid for nor included in the account stated—that they simply canceled the charge by taking back the guano. The referee held the defendants liable, and the Circuit judge reversed the report in that particular. This item is recommitted for further proof under Judge Wallace's order of reference.

Subject to the modifications herein made, it is the judgment of this court that the judgments of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

SIMPSON, C. J., and McIVER, A. J., concurred.

(Case No. 1149.)

STATE v. THORNBURG.

(November Term, 1881.)

[Intoxicating Liquors ⟸152.]

A party was properly convicted under the act of 1880 (17 Stat. 460) for selling liquor without a license outside of an incorporated town, although the liquor was whiskey sold and used only for medicinal purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 165; Dec. Dig. ⟸152.]

Before Aldrich, J., York, June, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Gaston, contra.

March 4th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McGOWAN, A. J. This was an indictment under the act of December, 1880, for selling spirituous liquors without a license. Eugene Lowry testified as follows:

*483

*"On or about twenty-first of this month (June, 1881,) I bought and paid for a quart of whiskey from the defendant, William Thornburg. His place is outside of the town limits—outside of corporation—short distance outside. It is in this county, York. The defendant sold it to me, and I paid him for it. I have a very sick brother; his disease is consumption. The doctor uses whiskey in the treatment of brother's case. He told my father to send to Thornburg's for whiskey, because his whiskey was better than any other he could get. Father sent me for the whiskey, and I told Thornburg all about what the doctor said, and what the whiskey was wanted for before I got it. Thornburg owns a government distillery outside the corporate limits. The whiskey I bought from him was used strictly in the way for which it was bought."

The judge charged the jury that the act under which the indictment was framed contained no exceptions as to the use that might be made of the spirituous liquors sold; that the prohibition was absolute and without exception against all selling outside of the corporate limits of a city, town or village. Hence, if they were satisfied that the sale was made as alleged, it was no defense that the whiskey was bought for medical purposes—was sold for such purposes—and that, in fact, it was so used.

The jury found the defendant "guilty," with a recommendation to mercy. His attorney moved for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. The judge refused both motions, and he appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. "For, that his Honor charged the jury that if it was proved that the defendant sold spirituous liquors without a license in the county of York, outside of the corporate limits of Yorkville, that would be sufficient upon which to base a verdict of guilty.

2. "For, that his Honor charged the jury that the fact that the said liquor was sold for the purpose of being used, and was in fact used, only for medical purposes, did not constitute a legal defense.

3. "For, that his Honor charged the jury that if they believed the facts as testified to by the witnesses for the State, the same constituted a violation of the act.

4. "For, that his Honor did not grant the motion for a new *trial upon the ground that the testimony was not sufficient to base a conviction under the act.

5. "For, that his Honor did not grant the motion in arrest of judgment upon the ground that the testimony was not sufficient to base a conviction under the act."

The act of 1880 (17 Stat. 460) provides as follows:

"Section 1. That from and after the passage of this act no license for the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquors shall be granted in South Carolina outside of the incorporated cities, towns and villages of this State; and it shall be unlawful for any person or persons to sell such liquors without a license so to do.

"Sec. 4. Any person violating any of the provisions of this act shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined in a sum of not less than two hundred dollars, or imprisoned for a term of not less than six months, or both fined and imprisoned, in the discretion of the court trying the case."

These provisions are positive and without qualification of any kind, and we have no authority to amend them or construe them in such way as, in effect, to add the words: Provided this inhibition shall not include a sale to one who declares at the time that the liquor so purchased is intended alone for medical purposes. Such construction would not only disregard the plain and positive words but completely emasculate the act and thereby defeat the manifest intention of the Legislature.

We do not think that the case cited from Kansas is analogous to this. Neither the title nor reference was given,† but, as stated here, the case involved only the question whether certain compounds or tinctures containing alcohol as one of the ingredients should be held to be within the meaning of Section 10 of the Kansas act, which is in these words: "All liquors mentioned in Section 1 of this act, and all other liquors and mixtures thereof, by whatever names called, shall be considered and held to be intoxicating liquors within the meaning of this act." It seems that there were three cases heard together. In one the article sold was "bay rum," in another it was "a compound of whiskey, tolu and wild cherry—prepared by a physician," and in *the third it was a compound known as "Prickly Ash Bitters," and the question was whether these were such articles as fell within the meaning of the act.

Judge Brewer, in delivering the judgment of the court, said: "It cannot be doubted that Section 10 is broad and sweeping enough to bring within the statute every liquid which, by reason of the presence of alcohol, will produce intoxication, and this, irrespective of the amount of alcohol contained, or the presence of other ingredients of such a character as to prevent any use of the liquid as a beverage. * * * But such was not the intent of the Legislature. The use of intoxicating liquors as a beverage was the evil, and the statute must be read in the light thereof. Now the cases before us group themselves into three classes. The first embraces what are generally and properly known as intoxicating liquors, unmixed with any other substances. Thus, in one case, the sale of brandy is charged. The second includes articles equally well known —standard articles—which, while containing alcohol, are never classed as intoxicating beverages. Their uses are culinary, medical, or for the toilet. They are named in the United States Dispensatory and other similar standard authorities. The formulæ for their preparation are there given. Their uses and character are as well recognized and known by their names as those of a horse, a spade, or an arithmetic. The possibility of a different and occasional use does not change their recognized and established character. A particular spade may be fixed up for a parlor ornament, but the spade does not belong there. So essence of lemon may contain enough of alcohol to produce intoxication. It is possible that a man may get drunk on it, but it is no intoxicating liquor. Bay rum, cologne, paregoric, tinctures generally, all contain alcohol, but in no fair or reasonable sense are they intoxicating liquors or mixtures thereof. * * * Now, in reference to these several classes we think these rules may be laid down. The first class is within and the second without the statute, and the court, as matter of law, may so declare. It is unnecessary in charging the sale of whiskey or brandy to allege that it will produce intoxication, nor will it bring the sale of 'essence of lemon' within the statute to allege that such essence will produce intoxication. *The courts will take judicial notice of the uses and character of these articles. You need not prove what bread is, or for what purpose it is used. No more need you in respect to whiskey or gin on the one hand, or cologne or bay rum on the other. They are all articles of established name and character." &c.

This case distinctly holds that there can be no doubt when the article sold, as in this case, was whiskey, pure and simple. The quality of the article as to the power to produce intoxication is well known, and its sale is forbidden, without regard to the purpose for which, in particular cases, it may be intended. "You need not prove what bread is, or for what purpose it is used. No more need you in respect to whiskey or gin on the one hand, or cologne or bay rum on the other. They are articles of established name and character."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE v. SIMS.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Riot ⇐5.]

Where a riot is committed in doing an unlawful act it is not necessary that the indictment should charge that the offense was done in terrorem populi.

[2. Criminal Law ⇐93.]

The Court of General Sessions has jurisdiction of riots only when they are of a high and aggravated character, but this is sufficiently charged in an indictment which alleges the riot to have consisted in assault and battery on peace officers.

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, March, 1881.

This was an indictment against Thomas Sims, Jupiter Mitchell, Joseph Thomas and William Mikell. Mitchell was acquitted, and the other three convicted. They appealed.

The indictment in its first count charged that the defendants "with force and arms at Columbia, in the county and State aforesaid, unlawfully, riotously and routously, did assemble and gather together to disturb the peace of the said State; and being so then and there assembled and gathered together, in and upon one E. R. Warner, a peace officer and policeman of the city of Columbia, in the county and State aforesaid, and Starling Strickland, a peace officer and policeman of the city of Columbia, in the county and State aforesaid, and in and upon one W. W. Higby, a peace officer and policeman of the city of Columbia, in the county and State aforesaid, in the peace of God and the said State then and there being, then and there unlawfully, riotously and routously, did make an assault; and them the said E. R. Warner, the said Starling Strickland, and the said W. W. Higby, then and there unlawfully, riotously, and routously, did beat, bruise, and wound, and ill-treat, and other wrongs to the said E. R. Warner, the said Starling Strickland, and the said W. W. Higby, then and there unlawfully, riotously, and routously, did to the great damage of the said E. R. Warner, the said Starling Strickland, and the said W. W. Higby, in contempt and defiance of the laws, to the evil example of all others in like case offend*ing against the form of the act of the General Assembly in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the State."

The second count charged the defendants with an assault upon these same officers, naming them as above, and that the defendants "from them the said E. R. Warner, &c., and out of their custody and against the will of them, the said E. R. Warner, &c., unlawfully, and forcibly, and riotously, and routously, did rescue and put at large one Joseph Thomas, then and there being under arrest and in the custody of the said peace officers and policemen aforesaid, and the said Joseph Thomas himself out of the custody of the said peace officers and policemen aforesaid, and against their will, unlawfully, and forcibly, did rescue and put at large, against the form of the act," &c.

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Allen J. Green, for appellants.

Mr. Solicitor Bonham, contra.

March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. At the March Term, 1881, of the Court of General Sessions for Richland county, the defendants were tried and convicted on an indictment containing two counts; the first for riot, and the second for rescue. Allen J. Green, Esq., appeared for defendant Sims, and John T. Sloan, Esq., for the other two. The prisoners were tried together and the presiding judge ruled that one attorney should alone conduct the cross-examination for all of the defendants.

The riot charged in the first count of the indictment was not alleged to have been committed in terrorem populi, nor was it charged as of a high and aggravated nature.

The defendants were found "guilty." Motions were made in their behalf for a new trial and in arrest of judgment. First. For a new trial for defendant Sims, because his Honor refused to allow his counsel to cross-examine witnesses for the prosecution. And *for all of the defendants: 1. Because his Honor erred in receiving testimony to contradict defendants and defendants' witnesses; the solicitor having failed to lay the foundation therefor according to rules of evidence. 2. Because his Honor erred in allowing the State to introduce cumulative evidence in reply. 3. Because there was not sufficient evidence to connect Sims with the second count of the indictment. 4. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the arrest laid in the second count of the indictment was a lawful arrest—the arrest having been made by a policeman without warrant, and at a time when there was no disturbance.

For arrest of judgment: 1. Because the first count in the indictment was fatally defective, in that it did not allege terrorem populi and that the offense was of a high and aggravated nature. 2. Because the court had no jurisdiction of the first count; and, 3. Because the arrest which is the foundation of the second count, to wit, rescue, was unlawful and that his Honor should have so held. These motions were refused, and the defendants, appeal on the grounds above stated and on the further ground: That his Honor erred in charging the jury that the only question for them was, did the defendants rescue the prisoner in a riotous and tumultuous manner, saying: "Has the evidence convinced your minds that there was a riotous rescue of prisoners? If so, your verdict must be guilty."

The facts of the case are briefly as follows: The defendant, Thomas, created some disturbance of a violent and disorderly character at Griffin's store in the city of Columbia. Griffin sent for the police, and very soon Warner, Strickland and Higby appeared; by this time the disturbance had ceased, though Thomas was still present and drunk. Griffin pointed out Thomas to the peace officers as the party who had created the disturbance and ordered them to arrest him. The officers attempted the arrest, but Thomas resisted, a scuffle ensued and a crowd collected. Thomas was tied, but finally escaped, as it was alleged, by the assistance of the defendants. The arrest was made by Warner, Strickland and Higby, as policemen under the city authorities, and was made without a warrant.

The verdict of the jury has settled the facts. First. That the *defendants did take from the policemen the prisoner, Thomas, in a violent and tumultuous manner; and, second, after being assembled and gathered together, they did riotously and routously assault, beat, wound and ill-treat the said policemen. The indictment charged these two acts and the jury have said guilty. This verdict covers both charges, and we must regard both established as matter of fact. Now, the important question in the case is, do these facts establish as matter of law the offenses of riot and rescue. After considering these questions we will then look into the other exceptions.

It is urged in arrest of judgment: 1. That riot has not been established, because no such offense is charged, the indictment being defective in that it failed to allege the offense in terrorem populi. If there could be no riot in the absence of proof of terrorem populi as an independent fact, then this objection would be fatal. But Lord Holt has given a distinction, as is said, in Commonwealth v. Runnels et al., 10 Mass. 519, founded in good sense, between those indictments in which the words in terrorem populi are essential and those wherein they may be admitted. He says that in indictments for that species of riot which consists in going about armed and without committing any positive act, the words aforesaid are necessary, because the offense consists in terrifying the people, but in riots in which an unlawful act is committed the words are useless. 11 Mod. 116.

According to Blackstone, a riot is where three or more actually do an unlawful act of violence, or if they beat a man, or do any other unlawful act with force and violence. * * * 4 Bl. Com. 146; State v. Brooks, 1 Hill 362. The essence of the riot in some cases is the terrorem populi. In such cases it is necessary to aver that fact. In others the essence may be the committing some unlawful act with violence, or in a violent and tumultuous manner; in such cases it seems unnecessary that the aforesaid words should be used. Mr. Greenleaf (3 Vol., Sec. 219,) says: If the indictment charges the actual perpetration of a deed of violence, such as assault and battery, &c., it is not necessary to allege or prove that it was done to the terror of the people, but proof of all the other circumstances alleged will support the indictment without proving directly any terror.

*In this case the charge is the commission of an assault and battery on peace officers unlawfully, riotously and routously. We think this was sufficient, and therefore the exception of appellant as to this point is untenable.

2. Appellants except to the indictment as to the first count, because it does not charge the offense as of a "high and aggravated character," and, therefore, no offense is charged and proved over which the Court of General Sessions had jurisdiction.

In the case of the State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 346, it was held that in cases of assaults and batteries it was necessary that the indictment should contain an allegation of facts and circumstances showing that the offense was of a high and aggravated character, or some distinct charge of that kind, in order to give the Court of General Sessions jurisdiction. This applies to riots as well as to assaults and batteries. Section 11 of Chapter XXV., General Statutes, page 195, defining the criminal jurisdiction of trial justices, gives trial justices jurisdiction of all rioters * * * in almost the same language as Section 10 does of assaults and batteries, and declares the punishment of such offenders, when not of a high and aggravated character, is within the limit prescribed for trial justices, to wit, by fine not exceeding $100 and imprisonment in the jail or workhouse not exceeding thirty days.

The indictment charges the riot to consist in an assault and battery by three or more persons, upon peace officers, riotously and routously, and though it does not distinctly allege that this assault and battery was committed upon these peace officers while in the discharge of their duty, yet such was the testimony, and such may well be regarded after verdict as the legal intendment of the indictment. A charge of that character upon peace officers performing their legitimate duty, would be of a high and aggravated character.

There is no conflict between the case of the State v. Simmons, 4 S. C. 72, and the case of McKettrick, as some seem to suppose. Previous to the case of the State v. Simmons, an act had been passed conferring exclusive jurisdiction on the City Court of Charleston in all offenses less than felony. This act in that case was declared unconstitutional, because in violation of Section 18, *Article IV., which gives exclusive jurisdiction to the Court of General Sessions in all criminal cases which shall not be otherwise provided by law. The court in the case of the State v. Simmons very properly held, that the legislature had no power in the face of this section of the constitution to divest the Court of Sessions of jurisdiction in any criminal case. It might confer concurrent jurisdiction on other courts, but not exclusive, as it attempted to do in the act referred to on the City Court.

But this does not apply to the exclusive jurisdiction conferred on trial justices in assaults and batteries and other breaches of the peace, as decided in the case of the State v. McKettrick, because that exclusive jurisdiction does not come from an act of the legislature, but it comes from the constitution itself. Section 19, Article I., provides, that all offenses less than felony, in which the punishment does not exceed a fine of one hundred dollars or imprisonment for thirty days, shall be tried summarily before a justice of the peace, or other officer authorized by law, on information under oath without indictment or intervention of a grand jury, &c.

Assaults and batteries and other breaches of the peace, rioters, &c., not of a high and aggravated nature, can only be punished by fine not exceeding one hundred dollars and imprisonment not exceeding thirty days. Gen. Stat., Ch. XXV., §§ 10 and 11. If so, under Section 19, Article I., they shall be tried by justices of the peace, or other officer authorized by law, to wit, trial justices, summarily and without the intervention of a grand jury. This makes the jurisdiction in such cases exclusive. It is derived, not as the City Court of Charleston, from an act of the legislature, and therefore unconstitutional, but from the constitution itself, therefore legal. There is not the shadow of a conflict between the two cases.

The next exception raises the question, whether there was error in holding as matter of law that the police officers had authority to arrest as they did, without warrant and after the disturbance had ceased. The exception raising this question is in the following language: "Because his Honor erred in charging the jury, that the arrest laid in second count of indictment was a lawful arrest —the arrest having been made by the police *without warrant and at a time when there was no disturbance." This exception admits that the arrest was made by the police, to wit, by persons acting as policemen. But the legality of the arrest is questioned upon the grounds that it was made without warrant and when there was no disturbance. Whether the city authorities had the power to appoint policemen or peace officers is not raised in this exception, or in any other, nor is it denied that these men were appointed and were then on duty. If it was necessary to decide this question, we would say that the city authorities certainly had such power under the amendment to the charter, March 2d, 1871, § 10, (14 St. 572.) The power therein granted to make all such rules as may tend to preserve the quiet, peace, safety and good order of the inhabitants, carried with it the power to provide the necessary machinery to execute. The end warranted the necessary means, the only limitation being, "not inconsistent with the laws of the land."

When a statute gives jurisdiction over an offense, it impliedly gives power to apprehend the offender. 4 Bl. Com. 290, note. So, here, where the amended charter, 1871, gave the power to make all such rules as might be necessary to good order and public peace, it impliedly gave power to provide the means of enforcement, by the apprehension and punishment of the offenders. The fact that these men, Strickland and the others, were on duty, with the insignia of office and the badge of authority visible on their persons, accompanied with their own testimony as to their appointment, is sufficient evidence that the city authorities had exercised the power to make rules for the good order of the city and had provided the machinery for arrests, &c. Under these circumstances we must assume that they were legally on duty on this occasion as peace officers, and that they had all the powers which ordinarily belong to such officers.

Is it legal for peace officers to arrest for offenses less than felony, without warrant and when there is no disturbance in view? As a general rule it is not, but we find the following in East P. C. 306: "Lord Hale and some later authorities have holden that such arrests may be made upon the charge of another, though the affray be over, for the purpose of bringing the party before a justice to find sureties, or for appearance. But *where time and circumstances will admit of it, the better way is to apply for a warrant. It seems clear, however, that if one menaces another to kill him, upon complaint thereof to a constable forthwith, he may, in order to avoid present danger, arrest the party to detain him till he can conveniently bring him to a justice of the peace. 2 Hale P. C. 88. But this power is grounded on the duty of the officer to prevent a probable felony, and must be governed by the same rules which apply to that case; though Dalton extends it even to the prevention of a battery. Dalt., Ch. CXVI., § 3." In 1 Russ. Cr. & M., Ch. X., § 2, p. 771, it is stated "that in all cases of misdemeanor a peace officer may apprehend the party while committing the offense, and it should seem upon fresh and immediate pursuit in some instances." See, also, Rose. Cr. Ev. 256.

It seems in this case that Thomas had raised a row in Griffin's store, and had beaten two or three men. Griffin had put him out, but he came back and went out again, but was still present and drunk when pointed out to the police; he refused to be arrested and got into another man's wagon. Was not this upon fresh and immediate pursuit? This was certainly within the principle laid down by Lord Hale, cited above. See also case of City Council v. Payne, 2 N. & McC. 475. We think the arrest, under the special circumstances of this case, as detailed in the evidence, was legal. Without such power on the part of policemen under such circumstances, municipal authorities for the preservation of peace and good order would be worthless, and our towns and cities would be frequently subjected to uncontrolled violence and disorder.

Next exception. "Because his Honor erred in receiving testimony to contradict defendants and defendants' witnesses, without laying the foundation therefor according to the rules of evidence. It is a rule of evidence, that before a witness can be impeached by evidence that he has made statements out of court different from those made on the stand, the foundation must be laid by stating to him time, place and person. We do not see that this rule has been violated here. The rule does not preclude a party from proving that what the witness has testified to in court is untrue. If so, truth, which is the object of judicial investigation, *would seldom be found. The question was, did the defendant Sims use a certain expression, and also whether Mikell was there. Sims had denied using the expression and Mikell had denied being present. The State was allowed, after these denials, to prove that Sims did use the expression and that Mikell was present. This violated no rule of evidence.

The exception as to cumulative testimony is equally untenable. The admission of such evidence was within the discretion of the judge. 2 Phil. Ev. 912.

We do not see that the Circuit judge violated the inhibition of Art. IV., § 26 of the constitution, by charging upon the facts of the case. What he said about there being a tumultuous assemblage at Griffin's store on that day, and the calm that came over the crowd when the police arrived, was not pertinent to the issue. The jury was not charged with the finding of these facts. Their inquiry was whether after the police arrived they had been riotously assaulted and beaten, and whether a prisoner subsequently arrested by them had been rescued from their grasp. The statement of the judge objected to had nothing to do with these questions and could not have affected the verdict.

The appeal must fail also as to the exception that but one counsel was allowed to cross-examine the witnesses for the State. The offenses charged were riot and rescue, the defendants were all tried together. In fact they had no right to sever if they had demanded it. State v. Littlejohn, 1 Bay 316. The case was an entirety. Besides, the motion made was one addressed to the discretion of the court; it appertained to the conduct of the cause in court, of which the presiding judge is more competent to determine than any one else. Without this power on the part of the judges, cases would be interminable. We do not see that any legal right of the defendant was infringed or refused. In the absence of this we have no power to interfere.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

YATES v. GRIDLEY.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Process ⟸96.]

In action for partition, the clerk of court issued an order for the publication of a summons to the non-resident co-tenants (but made no direction for service through the mail) upon plaintiff's affidavit "that defendants are not residents of this, but are residents of the State of New York, and that their post-office is unknown to deponent and cannot be ascertained, notwithstanding due diligence has been employed, nor can they be found in this State after due search for them." Defendants had no notice of the action until after sale. Held, on motion afterwards made by defendants to vacate the judgment, that the order of the clerk was valid, and that it was not necessary that the affidavit should state that the sheriff had made search, or show the facts upon which the statements of the affiant were based, if the clerk was satisfied by the allegations of the affidavit. This case distinguished from Smith & Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C. 174, which arose under the attachment act.

[5. Partition ⟸112.]

A defendant made a party by publication to an action for partition, cannot, under Section 158 of the code, be admitted on motion after sale, to have the judgment vacated. If he desires to raise the question of good faith he must do so under a proceeding more formal than a motion, and by proof more reliable and better sifted than affidavits.

Land was sold by the clerk in December, under an order of sale which required cash sufficient to pay costs, the balance on a secured credit, and if terms of sale were not complied with the land to be immediately advertised for resale on the next sales-day at the risk of the former purchaser. The purchaser did not comply with her bid until January 15th, when the clerk executed the title-deed, the property not having been resold. Held, that the delay of the purchaser to comply furnished no ground for vacating the sale and canceling the deed.

*Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, September, 1881.

This case is stated fully in the opinion. The order for publication should be added, which was [as] follows: "After reading and filing the affidavit of Kate C. Yates, the above plaintiff, of the non-residence of Edward Gridley and Elisha Risley the above defendants, it is ordered, that said defendants be served by publication in the 'Aiken Journal and Review' once a week for the period of six weeks."

Copy-summonses were, however, mailed addressed to the defendants at New York city, but they did not reside there and never received them. They first heard of the action about the end of January, 1881.

Messrs. James Aldrich and John C. Haskell, for appellants.

Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. The appellant instituted an action for a partition of a tract of land located in Aiken county, of which she and respondents were co-tenants. The respondents being non-residents were made parties by publication. The writ in partition was directed to three commissioners, two of whom alone acted. These two made return and recommended a sale, and Judge Thomson, by a decretal order dated November 11th, 1880, ordered a sale by the clerk, the terms being, cash sufficient to pay all costs and disbursements of the action, and the balance on a credit of one year, &c., with the condition, "that upon failure of the purchaser to comply" the clerk shall immediately thereupon advertise the premises for sale on the next sales-day at the risk of the former purchaser.

At the sale under this order the appellant became the purchaser, but she did not comply until after the next sales-day, but then complying she received a conveyance from the clerk. On March 5th, 1881, Judge Wallace, upon certain affidavits and certificates submitted to him, stayed all further proceedings under *the decretal order of Judge Thomson and directed the appellant to show cause before him why the alleged service of summons on respondents should not be set aside, also the judgment rendered by Judge Thomson, and all proceedings under said summons and judgment. Also, why the deed from the clerk should not be disaffirmed and set aside as irregular and fraudulent.

The return to this rule was ultimately heard by Judge Kershaw, who, on September 24th, 1881, pronounced his decree vacating the judgment and all proceedings thereunder and all orders before judgment, on the following grounds: 1. Because the service of summons was incomplete, the affidavit upon which it was made being held by him insufficient. 2. Because only two of the commissioners of the three named in the writ acted, the third never having been called upon to join in the performance of the duty imposed, and also because it appeared that the two who signed the return, never went upon the land, or held any conference with each other, but separately signed the return recommending a sale. He further held, that the appellant not having complied with the sale on the day of sale, although she complied afterwards, the clerk was not authorized to execute a deed to her.

The appeal seeks to reverse this decree and the questions involved are: 1. Was the summons sufficient? 2. Was the return by the commissioners to the writ in partition so defective as to vitiate it? 3. Was the deed by the clerk "ultra vires"?

As to the first point. It seems that the publication of the summons was ordered upon the affidavit of the appellant. The Circuit judge held this affidavit insufficient, upon the ground that it failed to show the jurisdictional facts, in that it did not appear "that the summons had ever been lodged with the sheriff, nor that any effort had been made to ascertain the post-office of the defendants, nor that any search was in fact made in the State, except from the statements of the affidavit, but upon that alone the clerk acted in granting the order, as will appear from the recitals of the order."

The affidavit was as follows: "Personally appeared before me Kate C. Yates, who, being sworn, says that Edward Gridley and Elisha Risley, the above defendants, are non-residents of *this, but are residents of the State of New York, and that their post-office is unknown to deponent, and cannot be ascertained, notwithstanding due diligence has been employed, nor can they be found in this State after due search for them. That said defendants have property in this State, as deponent is informed and believes, as described in the complaint in this cause for a partition of the same."

This affidavit was held insufficient for the reasons given above, the judge stating that the officer making the order of publication was not warranted in accepting the statements contained in the affidavit, as to the post-office of respondents and the fact that they could not be found in the State, as conclusive; but that he should have required the facts upon which these statements were based, so that he could have decided for himself whether the conclusions of the affiant were reasonably true.

Section 158 of the code provides that where a party is a nonresident, but has property in the State, and the court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action, he may be made a party by publication, where it is made to appear by affidavit, to the satisfaction of the officer ordering such publication, that defendant cannot after due diligence be found within the State, and that a cause of action exists against him * * * a copy of the summons to be forthwith deposited in the post-office directed to the person, to be served at his residence, unless it appears that such residence is neither known to the party making the application nor can with reasonable diligence be ascertained by him.

All that this section requires is, that it be made to appear by affidavit to the satisfaction of the officer who directs the publication, that the defendant has property in the State, that he cannot be found therein after due diligence, and that a cause of action exists against him. And if the post-office is known, or can with reasonable diligence be ascertained, the order must direct also that the party be served at his residence through the post-office.

In this case the clerk of the court who ordered the publication, we must suppose, was satisfied with the affidavit submitted to him. His duty was somewhat of a judicial character, which he could perform upon being satisfied by affidavit that the conditions demanding the publication were present. The act does not *specify the character of the facts and circumstances which must be stated in the affidavit, or the quantity of evidence necessary to satisfy the officer, before ordering publication. It simply requires that it must appear by affidavit to his satisfaction. It seems to be left to his discretion, and, in the absence of fraud and collusion, can his judgment be overruled?

There is nothing in the act directing that the summons should be placed in the hands of the sheriff, and non est returned thereon, nor is there anything defining what facts should exist probative of the jurisdictional facts. All this seems to have been left to the officer, and when he is satisfied, in the absence of fraud and collusion, it is final.

We do not think that the case of Melton v. Walker, 6 S. C. 169, applies. The attachment act does not employ the language found in the publication act. The former requires certain facts to appear, not to the satisfaction of the officer ordering the attachment, but absolutely. It would be proper, therefore, in attachments, that the facts relied on to found the attachment, should be stated circumstantially.

Next, as to the ground that the return to the writ in partition was fatally defective. The motion to vacate this judgment was made in part, as is stated by respondent's counsel, under the act of 1869, as to erroneous judgments, (now repealed by the act of 1880, but still of force as to this judgment,) and also under Section 158 of the code.

The act of 1869, (Gen. Stat. 497, § 2,) as construed in Hill v. Watson, 10 S. C. 275, was not intended to make any change in the legal grounds upon which relief either at law or in equity would previously have been given or refused, but simply to provide a new mode of procedure by which judgments might be assailed, to wit: by motions, applicable alike to judgments at law and to decrees in equity. Previous to this, decrees in equity could not be attacked below except by petition for rehearing, if made before the filing of the decree, or leave to file a bill of review, if made after decree filed. Simpson v. Downs, 5 Rich. Eq. 421. Since this act, and while it was of force, the mode of procedure in all cases was by motion, but this act, as has been *stated, furnished no new grounds upon which to vacate judgments and decrees. Hill v. Watson, supra.

As to decrees in equity, Chancellor Dunkin, in Hunt v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 540, said: "A bill of review and motion for rehearing are entertained on similar grounds. First, they will be entertained on account of error of law apparent on the face of the decree, and any part of the record may be resorted to for the purpose of making such error of law in the decree manifest. The other ground upon which a bill of review or a motion for a rehearing will be entertained, is newly-discovered testimony."

Now, the facts upon which the Circuit judge acted in vacating the judgment of Judge Thomson on this branch of the case, were, first, that but two of the commissioners out of the three appointed executed the writ; second, that the third was never called to join; and, lastly, that the two who acted never went upon the land, but separately signed a prepared return recommending a sale. The fact that but two of the commissioners joined in the writ appeared on the face of the proceedings. Was it error of law in Judge Thomson to order the partition on such a return? We think not. The acts authorizing the appointment of commissioners in such cases expressly provide for the execution of such writs by the appointees, or a majority of them. Here, three were appointed, and two acted; this was within the acts. Judge Thomson, after a full review of the case, and after carefully reciting all the facts, both as to the service by publication, and the return of the writ by two only of the commissioners, granted the judgment. We see no error in this—none such as can be corrected by a brother Circuit judge.

But it is said that the mandate of the writ, requiring the commissioners to go upon the land, was not obeyed. It appears from the affidavits that Commissioner Hall did go upon the land—Chafee did not, the reason being, that he was well acquainted with it—had known it all his life, had hunted on it when a boy, and had frequently been on it since manhood, and that he was thoroughly prepared to say that it could not be equitably divided. Meeting Hall on his return from inspecting the land, Chafee, after consultation, agreed with Hall upon a return, which was made to the court. This we think was a substantial com*pliance with the act by a majority of the commissioners. It was not such a subsequently-discovered fact as should vacate a judgment.

The motion was also made under Section 158, Subd. 5, of the code, which provides that were one is made a party by publication, upon good cause shown, he may be allowed to defend after judgment at any time within one year after notice thereof, * * * but the title to property sold under such judgment, to a purchaser in good faith, shall not thereby be affected. Without undertaking now to say what the mode of proceeding should be where a party desires to avail himself of this provision of the act as to publication, or what should be the effect of such application upon the case, it is enough to say that the order below is too far-reaching here, if the motion of respondents was merely a motion to come in and defend.

The section referred to provides that property sold under the judgment to a purchaser in good faith, shall not thereby be affected. The appellant should have the opportunity of raising the question of good faith under some proceeding more formal than a motion, and to test that question upon testimony more reliable and better sifted than affidavits.

Next, as to the non-compliance. The land was sold on sales-day in December, the terms being cash sufficient to pay costs and disbursements of suit, and the balance on a credit of one year, and upon failure by purchaser to comply, then an immediate advertisement for resale, on the next sales-day, or upon some convenient sales-day thereafter, at the risk of the former purchaser. It seems that the appellant did not comply on the day of sale in December, but did comply during the month of January after, and the clerk executed titles. Why compliance was not made on the day of sale does not fully appear. If appellant refused to comply, or was wholly at fault, she could not have demanded thereafter a specific performance. Seymour v. Preston, Speers Eq. 486. But in the absence of fraud or collusion, we do not think that a failure to comply literally with the terms of sale as to the cash payment, the moment the hammer falls, is such failure in itself as will in every case forfeit the bid.

'Tis true that when property is offered either at public or *private sale for cash, the sale is not binding unless the cash is tendered according to the terms, and officers selling under orders should not indulge contrary to the order, but there may be reasons why cash could not be paid down at once, and why the sale, notwithstanding this, should be held good. In this case the cash portion was not a fixed portion of the purchase-money, as one-fourth, or one-third, or any other fixed proportion, but such sum as might be required to pay costs and disbursements, the balance on a credit of one year.

It may be that the exact amount of the costs and disbursements could not be ascertained on the day of sale, or the parties entitled thereto may have been willing to wait a few days. At all events, the clerk afterwards received the cash and executed titles. Had he refused to do so, it may be that appellant could not have enforced the contract, but having completed the contract, by receiving the money and executing titles, we are of opinion that it should not be set aside upon a summary proceeding like this and solely upon the ground of failure literally to comply.

In Young v. Teague, Bailey Eq. 13, where land was sold for partition as in this case, the terms required the giving of a mortgage by the purchaser to secure the purchase-money. This was not done at the purchase, nor had it been done when a proceeding was instituted to vacate the sale on that and other grounds; yet as it did not appear that the purchaser had refused to give the mortgage but was ready and willing to comply, the court held that all it could require now was that the purchaser should do then what ought to have been done at the sale.

In the case of Young v. Teague, the application was grounded upon an offer of an advance of $600 over the bid of the purchaser, and other facts showing that the party making this offer was prevented from bidding at the sale by mistake, &c. This was a strong case, and although the purchaser had not complied literally with the terms of sale in giving the mortgage, yet as the deed had been executed by the commissioner the court refused to set it aside.

The English practice of opening the biddings before confirmation does not apply in this State. Young v. Teague, supra. *When titles have been executed in this State at official sales, they are good without confirmation unless assailable for fraud, or other facts and circumstances entitling the party to equitable relief. And the better practice in such cases, unless the matter is clear, is by regular action rather than by motion to show cause. Gordon v. Sims, 2 McCord Eq. 160.

It does not appear, however, that the conveyance from the clerk has been set aside for fraud, but solely upon the ground that the terms of sale as to the payment of the cash portion immediately upon the sale were not complied with. We do not think that fact, in itself unexplained, when these terms were complied with within so short a time afterwards, as above, was sufficient to annul the clerk's deed.

Without prejudice to respondent's right to come in and defend under Section 158 of the code, by such proceedings as may be legal and proper, in our opinion the service in this case by publication was sufficient; the return to the writ in partition by two of the commissioners out of three named, in the absence of fraud, was all that was necessary, and that the execution of the deed to the appellant by the clerk must stand unless assailed by some more effective ground of equitable relief than the mere unexplained fact that the cash portion of the sale was not immediately paid upon the sale.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

16 S. C. 504

(Case No. 1156.)

MURRAY v. WITTE.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Vendor and Purchaser ⇐266.]

A purchaser of an intestate's lands sold for partition in 1853 gave her bonds for the purchase-money, and as guardian for two of the infant distributees received two of these bonds in part of their estate. As the instalments upon the bonds became due, she charged herself as guardian with the amounts, and accrued interest, and so it appeared in her returns made at the *time to the Court of Equity. One ward became of age in 1858 and the other in 1859, and the guardian, at these dates respectively, gave to each her bond, without sureties, in a penal sum double the amount ascertained to be due, and conditioned for its payment, which sum in each case was larger than the amount of her purchase-bonds. In 1866, the guardian confessed judgment upon each of these bonds given to her former wards, and under these judgments the lands purchased by the judgment debtor at the partition sale were sold. Afterwards the former wards brought their action against the vendees of the purchasers at the sheriff's sale to foreclose the statutory lien under the act of 1791. Held, that the bonds given to the commissioner in equity in 1853 were paid, and the lien to secure their payment thereby discharged.

[2. Guardian and Ward ⟸74.]

The union of the character of debtor and creditor in the person of the guardian here, did not certainly extinguish the statutory lien that secured her indebtedness, but the circumstances of the case show that the original debt was treated by all parties as paid, and its security as satisfied.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 206–218; Dec. Dig. ⟸74.]

[3. Payment ⟸24.]

One security does not operate as payment of another unless so intended by the parties; but the intent that the bonds taken by the wards at their majority should discharge the indebtedness of their guardian as then ascertained, is clearly deducible from the circumstances of this case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 28, 29; Dec. Dig. ⟸24.]

Before Wallace, J., Sumter, June, 1881.

Action by George M. Murray and Elizabeth N. Bradley against George W. Witte, G. M. Sanders and Robert J. Brownfield. It cannot be certainly ascertained from the brief when the action was commenced, but it was probably not long before its hearing on Circuit. The opinion states the facts.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

The first question that arises upon the merits is, was the lien destroyed by the delivery to Mrs. E. V. Murray, of her bonds as the estate of her wards. This question has been repeatedly considered, and the principles governing it stated by our own court. See Clowney v. Cathcart, 2 S. C. 409; Charles v. Jacobs, 9 S. C. 297; Koon v. Munro, 11 S. C. 139. The principle is fully and clearly stated in Charles v. Jacobs. It will be seen that when Mrs. E. V. Murray received her own bonds as part of the estate of her wards, there was a presumption of their payment at maturity, but this presumption was not conclusive against the wards, and they were not concluded by it, but could set up the debt and lien, if it was not actually paid.

*When the plaintiffs attained their majority, Mrs. E. V. Murray, their guardian, gave to each a bond for the amounts due each by their guardian. Subsequently, Mrs. Murray confessed judgment to each upon these bonds. It is insisted that this was payment of the original debt, and operated to discharge lien. In the case of Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 527, the court says: "Whether the debt of the ancestor is discharged by the bond of the heirs is a question of fact depending upon intention. It is not payment unless so accepted by the creditors, and the burden of proof is on the party affirming it."

In the recent case of Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C. 72, the court says: "The plaintiffs stood upon their note, and the defendant whose defense was payment and satisfaction should have shown affirmatively that the new note was intended to be and was actually received in payment and satisfaction." This rule has long been established. See Bailey v. Wright, 3 McC. 484; Thomas v. Kelly, 3 S. C. 214 [16 Am. Rep. 716].

In regard to these bonds given by the guardian to her wards, only the naked facts appear that the bonds were given and judgment confessed. This is not enough to show affirmatively that these bonds were given and received in payment and satisfaction of the indebtedness of the guardian secured by the statutory lien. Judgments were entered on these confessions, executions issued and levied upon the land and bought by Kirkpatrick for five hundred dollars. Under the rule established in the cases of Ex parte City Sheriff, 1 McC. 399; McClure v. Mounce, 2 McC. 423; McLure v. Wheeler, 6 Rich. Eq. 343, there can be no doubt as to the interest sold under a judgment and execution upon a bond that is also secured by a mortgage. These cases hold that an execution issued to enforce a judgment upon a bond that was secured by a mortgage before the judgment, is only leviable upon the equity of redemption, and that was all that passed at the sale; that the fee still remained subject to sale under proper proceedings to foreclose the lien. So here the sale under the confessions was only of the equity of redemption, and this was all that Kirkpatrick bought. The fee still remained subject to the lien, and Kirkpatrick bought subject to that incumbrance. The answer set up the presumption of pay*ment from lapse of time. There were as matters of fact, repeated acknowledgments of the liability by Mrs. E. V. Murray, in her return to the ordinary, the bonds executed and the confession of judgment as late as 1866. Twenty years did not elapse from that time to the filing of the complaint.

There is no proof of other facts, to raise the presumption of payment. It not appearing that the bonds were received in payment, they are a mere "acknowledgment of the amount ascertained to be due," (Thomas v. Kelly, 3 S. C. 214 [16 Am. Rep. 716]) and are secured by the lien (Griffin v. Addison, 3 S. C. 109). The debt and lien still subsisting, and not barred by lapse of time, the possession of the lands cannot be set up as a bar to the enforcement of the lien. In Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582, it is held, that "where from payment made by the debtor or his representatives, or other cause, the mortgage debt will not be presumed satisfied, as between debtor and creditor, from lapse of time, no presumption of release or satisfaction of the mortgage will arise in favor of one holding under a purchase from the mortgagor, although twenty years have elapsed since the mortgagor conveyed the premises and delivered possession to the purchaser. Twenty years have not elapsed since the sale by the sheriff. Mrs. Murray before the sale could not claim adversely as against the lien. See also Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. C. 130, and Clark v. Smith, 13 S. C. 585. It is therefore ordered that the third ground of demurrer be overruled. It is adjudged that plaintiff have judgment for the foreclosure and sale of the land described in the complaint as subject to the lien set up in the complaint.

Messrs. J. J. Dargan and Buist & Buist, for appellants.

Messrs. Haynsworth & Cooper, contra.

March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. This is an action to foreclose a statutory lien of lands of an intestate sold for partition. The defendants demurred to the complaint. The demurrer was overruled and judgment of foreclosure pronounced. The defendants appealed *and the following is a statement of the facts out of which the legal questions arise. Samuel J. Murray, late of Sumter county, died intestate, in 1850, leaving a considerable estate real and personal. On January 5th, 1852, his real estate was sold for partition by order of the Court of Equity. His widow became the purchaser of the Grove Hill tract, a portion of which was located on the west side of the Charleston road. The remainder of his lands was also partitioned at the same time, but as this remainder is not involved in this action no further reference thereto is needed here. The purchase of Mrs. Murray of the Grove Hill tract on the west side of the Charleston road amounted to $4,788.03. She complied with the terms of sale by receipting for $145.50, the amount to which she was entitled as one of the heirs, and by executing and delivering to the commissioner three bonds dated January 17th, 1852, bearing interest from January 5th, 1852, with surety, two of which were conditioned each for the payment of $1,865.35, and the other for $911.83, all payable in three annual equal instalments. Thereupon, the commissioner by deed conveyed to her the land.

In the meantime, Mrs. Murray had been appointed guardian of two or her minor children, who are the plaintiffs here. Under the order of sale the commissioner was directed to distribute the securities and other proceeds of sale among the parties entitled thereto, to the said parties who were of age and to the guardians of the minors. In pursuance of this order, he made the distribution, turning over to Mrs. Murray, for her ward Elizabeth N., in October, 1852, one of her own bonds for $1,865.35, and on the same day, another of her bonds, for the same amount, for her ward George. The third bond was turned over to some other of the parties, and having been long since paid, disappears from the case.

This action of the commissioner was duly reported to the court and was filed for information on June 6th, 1853. During her guardianship Mrs. Murray received other funds for her wards more than sufficient to pay their current expenses. In her annual returns to the commissioner Mrs. Murray charged herself with the instalments and accrued interest on these bonds at or about the time at which they became due and payable respect*ively. On July 7th, 1858, Elizabeth having arrived at age, a computation was made of the amount due her in the hands of her guardian. This amount was ascertained to be $4,870.58; of this amount, $2,790.94 came from the bond which the guardian had received from the commissioner. On the same day Mrs. Murray liquidated her indebtedness as guardian to Elizabeth by executing to her her penal bond of that date for $9,600, conditioned for the payment of $4,870.00 on January 1st, 1860, with annual interest until finally discharged. On this bond payments have been credited in discharge of the interest up to January 1st, 1860. George M. arrived at age in July, 1859, and the same arrangement was made with him. The amount found due him was $4,208.63, of which $2,936.89 came from the bond received by the guardian as his share of the Grove Hill land. This indebtedness was liquidated by Mrs. Murray giving to George her penal bond for $8,000.00, conditioned for the payment to George of $4,000.00. Upon this bond appears credits on January 1st, 1860, of $245.00 in excess of the interest up to that date.

In 1866, George and Elizabeth (who had intermarried with one Samuel J. Bradley) commenced actions on these last bonds, upon which Mrs. Murray confessed judgments for the penalty in each of the bonds. These judgments were duly entered and signed by the clerk on December 12th, 1866, and on the same day executions were issued and lodged in the sheriff's office for Sumter county.

Thereafter, some time in 1868, the sheriff of Sumter, by virtue of these executions, levied upon and sold the Grove Hill plantations, then in the possession of Mrs. Murray, with other property. At this sale, one James D. Kirkpatrick became the purchaser of the land at the price of $500.00. In January, 1869, Kirkpatrick having received titles from the sheriff sold and conveyed a portion of his purchase, embracing two hundred and eighty-seven acres, more or less, of the Grove Hill tract on the west side of the Charleston road, to Samuel J. Bradley. The remainder of this tract on the west side of the Charleston road Kirkpatrick sold to William Bonneau Murray, taking his bond and a mortgage of the premises. This bond and mortgage Kirkpatrick subsequently assigned to the defendant, George W. Witte.

*Witte afterwards obtained a judgment of foreclosure of this mortgage against the heirs of Bonneau Murray, then deceased. At this foreclosure sale Witte became the purchaser, receiving a deed from the sheriff on February 11th, 1874. Samuel J. Bradley died in November, 1869, having a short time before his death conveyed to Samuel J. Pinckney that portion of the Grove Hill tract which he had bought from Kirkpatrick, with other lands, in trust for certain purposes. Under this deed the defendant, Robert J. Brownfield, became trustee, so that Brownfield and Witte (Geo. M. Sanders being the tenant of Witte) became possessed of all the Grove Hill tract lying west of the Charleston road purchased at the original partition sale by Mrs. Murray, to secure which purchase it is claimed by the plaintiffs that the statutory lien now sought to be enforced, attached under the act of 1791.

The plaintiffs claim that no part of Mrs. Murray's bonds to the commissioner given for this land has been paid, and they now seek by this action to enforce the statutory lien on the land in possession of the defendants, which, they allege, attached at the purchase by Mrs. Murray in 1852, and which they claim is still of force, to secure to them the payment of the purchase-bonds received for them by their guardian. The presiding judge sustained the plaintiffs and gave judgment for the foreclosure of this statutory mortgage.

The grounds of appeal are numerous, being fifteen in number, but the leading question is, whether, upon the facts stated, one or all, the statutory lien which it is admitted originally covered the land, has since become extinct, and before this action was commenced. If so, the case will end at that point, and this opinion in that event need not be encumbered with the discussion of the other questions raised. We will address ourselves first to this leading question.

The main facts relied upon by the appellants in support of their position, that the statutory lien has been extinguished, are: First. That the relation of creditor and debtor became united in the person of Mrs. Murray as to the bonds in question, when they were assigned to her in 1852 by the commissioner, and hence they were then paid by operation of law, and hence, also, *the land pledged for their payment was then released. Second. That Mrs. Murray in her annual returns as guardian charged herself with the receipt of the instalments on these bonds, with accrued interest, at about the time they fell due respectively. Third. The settlement between Mrs. Murray and her wards, the plaintiffs, after they arrived at age, when they each took from Mrs. Murray, in liquidation, as they state in the complaint, the penal bonds mentioned above; and, lastly, they rely on the lapse of time.

The effect of the union of the characters of creditor and debtor in the same person, has been often before the courts, not only in our own State but elsewhere. The most recent decision with us is Charles v. Jacobs, 9 S. C. 297. In that case the question was fully discussed, and the general rule, with the exceptions, presented in a concise and compact form. The authorities sustaining the positions there announced, will be found cited and discussed in the opinion delivered, so that it will be unnecessary for me to make further reference than to that case and the cases therein referred to.

The rule, as is said there, appears to be, that where a debtor becomes executor or administrator of his creditor, the debt is presumed to be paid from the time of its maturity. * * * This is the general rule. But this does not bind the creditors and distributees not having assented thereto, so as to prevent them from reaching such securities, if any, by mortgage pledge or lien originally taken to secure said debt, if it should turn out that the debt had not really been paid. In other words, the presumption of payment by operation of law in such case will not defeat the securities mentioned as against creditors and distributees, in the event that no payment has in fact been made.

The presumption of payment is not conclusive, so as in itself to extinguish such securities by mortgage pledge or lien, if any. So, too, the executor or administrator may prevent the presumption of payment from attaching as to themselves, by dealing with the obligation as still outstanding, by transferring it to creditors of the estate, as was done in the case of Charles v. Jacobs and also in Clowney v. Cathcart, 2 S. C. 402. But in that case the union of the two characters, though not discharging the principal *debtor, will discharge the personal sureties. If, however, the executor or administrator, as was said in Charles v. Jacobs, "actually treats the debt as paid and accounts for it as such, it becomes legally extinguished, and it cannot be revived by any act of the executor afterwards, such as transferring it in payment of debts of the estate; and if payment is accepted by the distributees on such account, they too, are precluded from setting up the debt."

Now, according to these principles, the statutory lien under the act of 1791 having attached on the bonds of Mrs. Murray, the mere union of the character of creditor and debtor in her person did not in itself extinguish this lien in so far as to prevent the distributees from enforcing it. Yet, if it subsequently appears in the case that she has treated her debt as paid, and that it has so been accepted and regarded by the parties entitled to the proceeds, and that an accounting has been had upon the basis of payment to herself and accepted by the parties in interest, then the case of Charles v. Jacobs is authority for the position that the debt is extinguished and consequently with it the statutory lien also. So that the real questions are: Do the admitted facts force the inference that Mrs. Murray dealt with and treated her bonds as paid—that she accounted for the proceeds on settlement as if collected? Did her wards so understand, and have they accepted other bonds in payment?

It is stated in the complaint that Mrs. Murray, during her guardianship, charged herself in her annual returns with the instalments and accrued interest on her bonds at or about the time they respectively became due and payable. In Clowney v. Cathcart, supra, which is similar in many of its features to this case, the real estate of an intestate was sold by order of the court. James Cathcart, the acting administrator, became the purchaser, and gave his bond secured by mortgage of the premises. The order of the court, after directing the commissioner to apply the funds in his hands to the payment of certain debts, directed the balance to be paid over to the administrator to be administered in due course of administration. Under this order Cathcart's bond and mortgage were delivered to him. Shortly after receiving them, and after the characters of creditor and debtor had *thereby re-united in his person, he assigned these securities to Robinson and Caldwell, creditors of the estate, in payment of their demand, thus treating the debt as a subsisting obligation, notwithstanding the union of the two relations. Shortly after this, in his returns he charged himself with the amount of his bond with the accrued interest, and credited himself with the amount as paid to Robinson and Caldwell.

The question in the case was whether the bond and mortgage had been extinguished. The court said: "That had the administrator done any act expressive of an intention to treat the securities as extinguished and in its nature equivalent to payment, the debt would have become extinguished and the mortgage discharged." The return of the administrator was relied on, but that was held not sufficient, because, before this return was made, the administrator had assigned the bond and mortgage to Robinson and Caldwell as a subsisting obligation, and the court said: "That the return was intended to express the transaction, which was complete by the transfer of the bond and mortgage into the hands of the administrator, and the subsequent transfer of the same by him to Robinson and Caldwell." In other words, the object of the return was to show that this bond and mortgage had come into the hands of the administrator as part of the estate, and had been accounted for in the transfer to Robinson and Caldwell, and this entry in the administrator's accounts, instead of affording evidence that the debt had been paid, was evidence directly to the contrary. In that case, therefore, it was properly held that the mortgage should be enforced.

The case before the court differs very materially from Clowney v. Cathcart and also from Charles v. Jacobs, in the fact that there is no evidence that Mrs. Murray dealt with her bonds as a subsisting obligation. She did not transfer them to her wards or to any one else. We never hear of them after the assignment by the commissioner, except at or about the time the instalments fell due, when she returned the proceeds with the accrued interest in her hands as so much cash. This was certainly an act on her part expressive of her intent to treat the original debt as extinguished, and in its nature equivalent to payment. What else could have been her purpose? If she had regarded the bonds as *still outstanding, why have not returned them as investments, and why especially did she make this return part of the time that the instalments fell due, embracing the interest which had accrued up to that date? This transaction, so far as she is concerned, can be explained upon no reasonable hypothesis except that she had complied with her contract, and had paid herself as guardian the amount which she owed herself in that character as an individual.

But the important question is, has this debt, thus received by the guardian, been accounted for on settlement, and have the appellants accepted this settlement as payment in such way as to preclude them from now setting up the statutory mortgage against the land? The appellant, Elizabeth, came of age in 1858, and George in 1859. Very soon after each arrived of age an accounting took place. In these accountings, if the bonds of Mrs. Murray had been understood by the parties as still in existence and unpaid, they should have been produced and turned over to them respectively. The guardian was the mother of the appellants, and we cannot suppose that she had any purpose of defrauding her own children. And no doubt had the bonds been in existence as uncollected interests they would have been produced and delivered to the parties, and her notes given for the balance of the funds in her hands. But this course was not adopted. The computation was made upon the basis of her returns, as we must suppose, embracing the proceeds of these bonds as collected by her, and the remainder of the funds received by her during her administration as guardian. The amount ascertained upon this basis to be due, in the strong language of the complaint, was liquidated by Mrs. Murray to each of the parties by giving her penal bonds in double the amount thus found due.

In 1866, actions were instituted by both plaintiffs on these bonds, in which actions Mrs. Murray confessed judgment. Under these judgments the lands now attempted to be subjected to the statutory liens were sold in 1868, and the proceeds applied, and thus matters have remained until 1879, when this action was commenced.

Now, do these transactions furnish evidence that plaintiffs accepted and ratified the understanding of Mrs. Murray that her original bonds had been paid? That the accounting and settle*ment above was made on that basis, and her penal bonds taken by them in payment of the amounts then found due as a finality? Or, do they show that this settlement was intended simply to ascertain the amount due, and that the bonds of Mrs. Murray were taken as mere memoranda showing the result, leaving the original bonds outstanding and to be enforced with the statutory mortgage on the lands at such time in the future as the plaintiffs might desire?

The fact that the computation and settlement were made; that the original bonds were not produced and turned over; that heavy penal bonds of the guardian were taken for the full amount in liquidation, as is stated in the complaint; that suit was afterwards brought on these bonds; that Mrs. Murray confessed judgment in these suits, that her land was sold thereunder, and the proceeds applied; that twenty years elapsed from that settlement before this action was brought, nearly eleven years of which defendants or their grantors were in possession of these lands, with the plaintiffs living near by and making no whisper of their rights under the statutory lien, afford a very strong moral presumption that it was the understanding of all parties that this settlement was final and conclusive as to the past. And the attempt now to revitalize the original indebtedness of Mrs. Murray, in the face of these facts, and after this long delay, has much the appearance of an afterthought.

'Tis true that the mere taking of a new bond does not in itself extinguish a prior bond. The authorities of this State are full to the effect that a new obligation does not amount to a satisfaction, unless it is so agreed and understood by the parties. Thomas v. Kelly, 3 S. C. 214 [16 Am. Rep. 716] Kelsey v. Rosborough, 2 Rich. 244. In Adger v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 527, McIver, A. J., said: "The rule of law is well understood, that where a creditor takes an obligation of inferior or equal rank it does not extinguish ipso facto the prior obligation, as that is payment only which is intended and accepted as payment; hence, when a creditor takes a new bond for one previously held by him, which has been lost or destroyed, the original debt or obligation is not extinguished unless it is made to appear that the creditor accepted such new bond in payment; and the burden of proof is upon him who *asserts the fact that the new bond was taken as payment." In Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C. 72, the same doctrine was held, with the statement that the fact that the new bond was accepted as payment might be shown by the facts and circumstances as well as by positive proof. In Burton v. Pressly, Cheves Eq. 9, Chancellor Johnston said in the Circuit decree, which was adopted as the opinion of the court: "That if the new was given in payment of the old, the fair inference is that the mortgage must fall with the note. But if for mere convenience a new note was executed to take the place of the old one, the object being substitution and not payment, I suppose that all the incidents were transferred to the new."

Whether a new note then is to operate as payment, depends entirely upon the intent of the parties, and, when so intended, if there be a mortgage or other security attached to the old, it will fall with the old note. The error of the Circuit judge was not in the conclusion which he drew from the facts which he applied to this question, but in not applying all the facts. He based his decision upon the naked facts that a new obligation had been given and the confession thereon. If these had been all the facts of the case, his conclusion was in accordance with the cases above referred to. We think the return of the guardian, the failure to produce the original bonds at the settlement and to turn them over, the long delay and the profound silence of the plaintiffs for more than twenty years after the settlement and liquidation, all of which are admitted, were significant facts bearing upon the question as to the intent and understanding of the parties as to the purpose of the settlement. These were all circumstances connected with the transaction, surrounding and intermingled with it, and should have been considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Before Pressley, J., Marion, March, 1881.

Action by John O. Wilson, as executor of the will of W. W. Braddy, deceased, against E. A. Braddy and others, legatees and creditors. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Townsend & McKerall, for appellant.

Messrs. Johnson & Johnson, contra.

March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. Judge Pressley, who heard this case on Circuit, makes the following statement of material facts: "In *January, 1864, plaintiff's testator, W. W. Braddy, at a sale by the Court of Equity, bought the land of James Tart, deceased. He paid three-fifths of the price in cash and gave bond and mortgage, payable in two equal instalments, for the remainder. When the first instalment fell due, which was on January 1st, 1865, he offered to pay the same, but E. J. Moody, guardian of Enos M. Tart, a minor, who had a share in said land, refused to receive that share in Confederate money from the commissioner unless W. W. Braddy would give a bond of indemnity to save him harmless. Braddy gave the bond. Moody received the Confederate money."

The minor, E. M. Tart, arriving at age in 1869, brought action against his guardian, Moody, for an accounting and settlement, and recovered judgment against Moody for $1,092, the amount adjudged him on account of the payment to Moody by the commissioner of the first instalment of the land purchased in Confederate money above referred to. How the court reached this amount does not fully appear. It seems, however, that Braddy bought the entire lands of Tart, containing seven hundred and thirteen acres, at $33,600.32, three-fifths to be paid in cash, and the remainder to be paid in one and two years. The cash payment was made, and the remainder, to wit, $13,552, secured by bond and mortgage. Of this remainder Moody was entitled as guardian to one-half.

When the first instalment fell due he received his ward's share in Confederate money under the circumstances above stated. When the second instalment became due, on January 1st, 1866, which was after the war, the parties by valuing the land in good money, and adopting some scale of their own, fixed the amount at $600, which was accepted as payment of that instalment, and the court seems to have adopted this as a basis as to the amount due by Moody to his ward in good money for the Confederate money received by him from the commissioner in payment of the first instalment, and gave judgment for the ward against Moody for $600, with interest from January 1st, 1866, amounting in all to $1,092. From this judgment there was no appeal. In the meantime Moody, the guardian, had become insolvent and failed to pay to his ward the amount thus adjudged *him, with the exception of $66.25, which it seems the ward received.

W. W. Braddy having died, his executor, the plaintiff, instituted the present action to marshal the assets of Braddy's estate, and the creditors being called in, the bond of indemnity given by Braddy to Moody, the guardian, was presented by T. C. Moody, as assignee of E. J. Moody, as a claim against the estate, because of the fact that in the action above referred to he had been held liable for $1,092 to his ward in receiving the Confederate money in which this bond was to indemnify and save him harmless. E. M. Tart, the ward, also claimed this bond as a security for the amount due him from his guardian as established in the action mentioned. The condition of this bond is as follows: "That whereas the said E. J. Moody is guardian of Enos Murchison Tart and is entitled to receive as such guardian a portion of bond in the commissioner in equity's office in said district, which the commissioner in equity is willing to receive in Confederate currency, provided the same will be received by the said E. J. Moody, guardian as aforesaid. Now, if the above bound, William W. Braddy, principal, and his sureties, shall indemnify and save harmless the said E. J. Moody from all liability, expenses, costs, or loss he may incur in consequence of receiving the sum of three thousand eight hundred and thirty-four and eighty-five one-hundredths dollars, the portion to which E. M. Tart is entitled to of the payment now due in Confederate currency, then this obligation to be void and of none effect, else to remain in full force and virtue."

The referee to whom the case was referred reported as to this branch of the case, that he found as matter of fact that the sale of the land purchased by Braddy was based on Confederate money as receivable in payment, and, therefore, that the commissioner in equity and Moody, the guardian, rightfully received that currency in discharge of the first instalment of Braddy's bond. Judge Pressley concurred in this finding of the referee, and decided in substance that if such was the fact, then Moody committed no default as guardian in receiving the Confederate currency, and inasmuch as the bond of indemnity was to save Moody harmless in receiving this currency and not for his failure *to account for it, there had been no breach of this bond, and, therefore, no liability had attached to the estate of Braddy. He also held that T. C. Moody, assignee, was not a purchaser for valuable consideration of the indemnity bond, but that E. M. Tart, the ward, was entitled to it, if in the opinion of this court it could be established against the estate of Braddy, except $66.25, which had been paid Tart by Moody, the guardian. This amount he adjudged would go to T. C. Moody under the assignment, if the bond was recoverable.

E. M. Tart appeals from this decree, alleging error on the part of the Circuit judge, in that he erroneously held that E. J. Moody, the guardian, committed no default in receiving the Confederate money to which the bond of indemnity related, thereby practically reversing, as it is claimed, the judgment of the Circuit Court in the case of E. M. Tart v. E. J. Moody, his guardian, in which the said E. M. Tart had been adjudged the sum of $1,092, on account of the wrongful receiving of this Confederate currency by his said guardian, from which judgment there had been no appeal. The plaintiff also gave notice of appeal in the event that Judge Pressley's decree should be reversed, on the following grounds: 1. Because E. J. Moody has not been damnified, and until he is there is no liability on the part of the estate of W. W. Braddy on the bond of indemnity. 2. Because if the estate of Braddy is liable at all, the liability is the value of the Confederate money received by Moody as guardian, to be ascertained by the Corbin scaling act and not under the ordinance of the convention.

We concur with Judge Pressley in holding that the commissioner rightfully received Confederate currency on the bond in question on the facts found by the referee, concurred in by himself, and that the guardian did not commit a breach of trust in receiving this money from the commissioner. Independent of the general rule, that where a trustee or other agent acts in good faith, within the scope of his duties, and a loss occurs, that the loss should fall upon the estate rather than upon himself individually, the decisions in reference to receiving Confederate currency during the war, fully sustain the action of the commissioner and trustee in this case. Neely v. McFadden, 2 S. C. *180; Smith v. Prothro, 2 S. C. 376; State v. Mosely, 10 S. C. 1; West v. Cauthen, 9 S. C. 59; DeSaussure v. McClenaghan, 6 S. C. 85.

It will not do to look back from our standpoint to transactions occurring during the war and determine them by our present surroundings. Great injustice would be done by such a course. Things were anomalous then and it was difficult to know what was best. The soundest judgment was often at fault, and men of the highest business capacity and practical sense failed to mark coming events correctly and to foresee their unfortunate results,

There was a complete upheaval in everything. The entire Confederacy, embracing a large portion of the American states, had no other medium of exchange except Confederate currency. Business men in their private affairs, public officials, judicial tribunals, trustees, guardians, and agents, for themselves and for their cestuis que trust and wards, and all other classes dealt with it, and there is no reason that fiduciaries should alone be made victims.

Good faith, even in peaceful and quiet times, and when business rules are fixed and well established, has been allowed its influence in the protection of parties occupying such relations, when overtaken by misfortune, much more should it be regarded as to transactions during the war, when all these rules had given way and acts and conduct had to be determined upon a state of things entirely new and in which all were without experience. But especially in this case should these considerations govern. The land out of which Braddy's sale bond originated was sold in Confederate times. It was confessedly with reference to Confederate currency. Indeed the price it brought shows this. The tract contained about seven hundred acres; it brought $33,-632 net, nearly $50 per acre, when, according to the testimony, it was not worth more than $10 or $12 in good money; three-fifths were paid in cash in Confederate currency, the balance on a credit of one and two years.

There can be no doubt as to the understanding of the parties. It was bought on a Confederate basis, and was expected to be paid in that currency. When then the commissioner received the money, he did but what his contract required him to do, and *when Moody received it from the commissioner he received the property of his ward. For this receipt he incurred no responsibility except to account for it. Judge Pressley's decree on this branch of the case is sustained upon principle and authority.

It is contended, however, that Braddy's bond of indemnity was intended to save Moody harmless against all loss, &c.; that Moody has been adjudged by the decree in the case of Tart v. Moody to pay $1,092 on account of his receipt of this Confederate money, and, therefore, the estate of Braddy is responsible for that sum. The object of the indemnity bond when properly construed was intended to save Moody harmless against all loss that he might legally incur. It was intended as a guaranty that Moody could legally receive the Confederate currency. Has there been a breach of the bond in this respect? This we have decided above.

It is true the Circuit Court in the case of Tart v. Moody, Judge Townsend presiding, decided otherwise, and, Moody having submitted to that decision without appeal, it binds him, but it did not settle the law of the case except as to the parties and privies bound by failure to appeal. Under our view, that decree was clearly erroneous. The ordinance of the convention allowing the value of the property to be inquired into was resorted to to fix the liability of Moody. Under the decisions, this ordinance was never intended as a measure of liability, but was intended to develop the fact, whether the contract was made with reference to Confederate currency or good money. It was intended to relax the rules of evidence and to open the door for the inquiry, whether the term dollar, in contracts during Confederate times, means a Confederate dollar or other currency.

The price which property brought, compared with the real value, was a clear index to this question, and such was its purpose. This question being determined then, the measure of liability was left to other evidence, the act known as Corbin's act, in the absence of other evidence showing a different value at a given time and place, being adopted as the measure for Confederate currency. Neely v. McFadden, 2 S. C. 169; Harmon v. Wallace, 2 S. C. 208; Parker v. Wilson, 3 S. C. 296; Moore v. Johnson, 7 S. C. 308; [Thorington v. Smith] 8 Wall. 1 [19 L. Ed. 361]. This principle should have been applied in the case of Tart v. Moody, and if it had *been, Moody could have been held responsible only for the value of the Confederate money which he received from the commissioner, and, perhaps, not even for that, if this money died on his hands without fault on his part.

Suppose Braddy had not paid the commissioner, would his liability after the war, under the facts of this case, been greater than the value of his bond scaled by Corbin's act? We think not. If so, this is all that could legally have been adjudged against Moody. When he received the Confederate money on Braddy's bond he virtually occupied to his ward the position that Braddy had to the commissioner, and he should not have been held to higher responsibility than Braddy would have been had he never paid it. We have said, however, that the judgment in the case of Tart v. Moody, being unappealed from, binds Moody. Does it bind Braddy? Judgments bind parties and their privies only. Braddy was no party to that suit. He was not summoned as an original party, nor indeed could he have been under the then state of the pleadings. He was not even touched by Moody. He was in no sense a party.

Was he a privy? Privies are of two kinds, privies in blood and privies in estate. We cannot see that Braddy occupied either of these relations. The suit was by Tart against Moody, as his guardian, for account and settlement, and Moody in no sense represented Braddy. In Bond ads. Ward, 1 N. & McC. 201, A. gave B., a constable, an indemnity bond to levy and sell a mare of C., which B. did. C. recovered the value of the mare of B. B. then brought an action on the indemnity bond. Held, that he could not recover, not having given notice to A. of previous action. In Burrill v. West, 2 N. H. 192, where the plaintiff brought action on a promise to save harmless, the same doctrine was held. See Big. Estop. 66. Also the Ordinary v. Condy, 2 Hill 313.

It is the judgment of this court that so much of the judgment of the Circuit Court as adjudged that Braddy's estate was not liable for the receiving of Confederate money by Moody, the guardian, and also so much as held that Braddy's estate was not bound by the judgment in the case of Tart v. Moody, is affirmed.

*March 4th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. Under an act entitled "An act to authorize and empower certain counties to issue bonds in subscription for preferred stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company," approved March 14th, 1874, the county of Chester subscribed the sum of $75,000, and in accordance with the terms of said act, duly made, executed and delivered seven hundred and fifty bonds, of the par value of $100 each, in payment of said subscription. The fourth section of said act provides as follows: "On the completion of the said railroad in the county, the board of county commissioners shall receive from said company an amount of preferred stock of said company equal to the amount of the said bonds, which preferred stock shall bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum."

This road had been completed for more than a year prior to this proceeding, which was commenced on May 13th, 1881, by petition to Hon. T. J. Mackey, Circuit judge, at chambers, praying that a writ of mandamus do issue to Hardin, the president of the company, and Hemphill, the secretary, commanding them to execute and deliver certificates for fifteen hundred shares of preferred stock of said company to the petitioners, county commissioners, alleging a demand and refusal, previously made. Upon this petition an alternative writ was granted on May 13th, 1881, requiring the respondents to make and execute a certificate or certificates of "preferred stock" in the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company to the amount of $75,000, * * * and to deliver the same to the said county commissioners immediately upon the receipt of the writ, or that they appear before the Honorable Thomas J. On the 1st day of June thereafter an order was granted the petitioners for leave to amend the alternative writ issued on May 13th by inserting the words, "In proper form and manner a certificate or certificates for fifteen hundred shares (of the par value of fifty dollars a share) of preferred stock in the Cheraw *and Chester Railroad Company, bearing interest at seven per cent. per annum," in place of the words "certificate or certificates of preferred stock," &c., and also to insert after the word "subscription" in the original writ, the words "being fifteen hundred shares of said stock." This amended writ was served on June 3d, 1881, with leave on the part of respondents to make their return thereto within twenty days; and the hearing was fixed for the 30th day of June. To these writs respondents made return within the time, and while denying that any demand had ever been made upon them for fifteen hundred shares, at the par value of $50 a share, of preferred stock, and that no mandamus could lawfully issue from one of the judges of the Circuit Court, they tendered a certificate, which they stated the board of directors had authorized them to prepare, and further stating that they had no power to offer any other. The certificate tendered is as follows: "Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company. Certificate No. 1. $75,000. State of South Carolina. Preferred stock, seven per cent. interest. These presents certify that the Board of County Commissioners of the county of Chester, having issued seven hundred and fifty bonds of one hundred dollars each, of date April 1st, 1875, in pursuance of an act of the General Assembly of the aforesaid State, entitled 'An act to authorize and empower certain counties to issue bonds in subscription for preferred stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company,' approved March 14th, 1874, are holders of seventy-five thousand dollars of preferred stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company, which said stock bears interest at the rate of seven per centum per annum from the day of the completion of said railroad in said county, to wit, the 1st day of June, 1880, to be paid prior and in preference to any dividend upon the capital stock of the said company. Witness the hands of the president and treasurer, and the corporate seal. May 26th, A. D. 1881."

Judge Mackey held this certificate insufficient, as it failed to show the number of shares in the capital stock of the company which the county was entitled to, and leaving it doubtful whether it was intended as a certificate of indebtedness of the company to the county, or a certificate showing the number of *shares that the county held in the capital stock of the company; and he issued a peremptory mandamus commanding the respondents without delay to deliver to the petitioners a certificate in the following form:

"This is to certify that the county of Chester is entitled to fifteen hundred shares in the capital stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company. This certificate of fifteen hundred shares of the capital stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company is preferred stock issued by virtue of the act of the General Assembly of the State of South Carolina, approved March 14th, 1874. Witness the hands of the president and treasurer with the corporate seal."

From this peremptory mandamus the respondents to petition below have appealed on the following grounds:

1. Because the cause was heard and the judgment rendered at chambers.

2. Because there was no proof of any previous demand upon respondents for a certificate or certificates of fifteen hundred shares of the capital stock, or preferred stock, or preferred capital stock of said railroad company, but it was proved on the contrary that no such demand had ever been made.

3. Because the relators are not entitled to fifteen hundred shares of capital stock, or preferred stock, or preferred capital stock of the Cheraw and Chester Railroad Company.

4. Because the alternative writ of mandamus does not state sufficient facts upon which to base relators' claim to the relief demanded, nor does it set forth the particulars in which they have been wronged.

5. Because the peremptory writ of mandamus does not conform to the alternative.

6. Because the peremptory writ requires the respondents to execute and deliver a certificate in a particular form therein set forth, contrary to law.

7. Because respondents had already tendered to the relators, as county commissioners as aforesaid, a certificate for $75,000 of preferred stock of said railroad company in conformity with law.

The prominent questions involved in this appeal are, whether the respondents, under the facts and law, are entitled to a certifi*cate from appellants representing that they have shares in the capital stock of appellants' company? And, if so, whether the certificate tendered by appellants, or the one ordered by the court, is the proper certificate? This question must be determined upon the construction which shall be given to the act of the legislature above referred to, under which the county of Chester has become connected with this railroad.

The words in that act to be interpreted, and upon which the question depends, are "preferred stock." What was meant by these words is the question. The act authorized the counties to subscribe for "preferred stock" and the county commissioners to receive certificates of "preferred stock" for such subscription. Did the legislature intend by this that the county should have shares in the capital stock of the company, or that it should become simply a preferred creditor, or occupy some other relation not well defined?

The first rule in ascertaining the intent of an instrument, whether it be an act or any other paper, is to go to the meaning of the words. What then is the meaning of the term "stock"? Stock in its general acceptation, when applied to business, according to lexicographers, means money invested in business. Capital stock and capital are synonymous terms, hence capital stock. In this general sense it is money invested in business operations, whether that business be conducted by a single individual, a partnership, a corporation, or government; and it makes no difference how the money is obtained, whether by labor, by borrowing, or otherwise. If the money is borrowed it is represented in the hands of the lender by bonds, notes or other papers, with the government by governmental securities, sometimes called stocks. But in such cases the lender is not a stockholder in the business. So far as the party himself is concerned, if the money borrowed or otherwise obtained is invested in his business, it is his capital or stock in trade. This is the general meaning of the term.

But when it is used in connection with a chartered or joint stock company, made up of individuals, it has a somewhat more limited signification. It means then the money advanced by the corporators or members as the capital, which is usually, for con*venience, divided into equal amounts called shares, for which each member is entitled to a certificate, showing the number of shares which he has in the company; or, in other words, the amount of money he has furnished to the common stock; which certificate is the evidence of his being a stockholder. Field Corp. § 123.

The word "stock" in connection with a corporation composed of numerous corporators united in one organism by charter, seems to have this technical meaning, in the limited form above given; and although a corporation as well as natural individuals engaged in business may borrow money, and indeed are often compelled to do so, yet the money thus borrowed is not understood to be stock, except in the general acceptation above given. The corporators are not entitled to distinct shares in such money, nor are the bonds or other evidences of indebtedness given by the company in such cases to the lender called the stock, capital or otherwise, of the company.

Our opinion is, that when the term "stock" is used with reference to railroad or other corporations, especially when it is used in connection with the privilege to "subscribe" thereto, it means capital stock. We have not been pointed to a case or an authority where, with such surroundings, it could be or has been legitimately interpreted otherwise. There is no other stock in a business company, the basis of which is money, except capital stock; if so, it has not yet received a name or distinctive feature.

Would a privilege to subscribe to stock in a company chartered and organized for business purposes, ever be interpreted by any one to mean a privilege to lend money to such company in the sense of becoming a creditor? Such a conception would scarcely enter the mind of the most experienced in the ways of such companies if invited to subscribe to the stock. The common mind would never think of such an idea, and the rules of interpretation require that the ordinary and well understood meaning of words should be given to them, unless they are controlled and directed by the context, or by the demand of other words, or other parts of the instrument, when the whole is construed together. If Chester county is not a stockholder or shareholder, what relation does it occupy to the company? If it be *that of a creditor, where is the evidence of the debt, and when is the debt to be paid? There is nothing promised except the interest, and that is contingent. If the county is a stockholder, what other stock has the company but capital stock?

Next, what does the word "preferred" mean? This word is relative; it refers to something else, and it means that the thing to which it is attached, whatever that may be, has some advantage over another thing of the same character, which but for this advantage would be like the other. If, then, the term "stock," when employed in connection with railroad or other chartered companies, means money invested in the business of the company, represented by certificates of shares, known as capital, or capital stock, and there is no other known stock belonging to such companies, having a distinct and separate characteristic from capital stock, what effect can the word "preferred" have when attached to it, except to indicate that in that case it is to have some advantage which it would not have otherwise? In other words, in such case can it be anything else than preferred capital stock, or a preferred interest in the money paid in by stockholders, divided into shares and represented by certificates showing the shares of each holder? The word "preferred" used in the act intended certainly to give the counties some advantage over others holding a similar interest, and occupying (without that word) the same position to the company as the counties, and who, but for the county being preferred, would stand with them on the same plane.

Now, have the counties any preference over creditors? The only preference provided for, is the payment of seven per cent. It does not appear that other creditors are entitled to less; the county cannot therefore be a creditor. The act then must have intended to put the counties on the same plane with the other stockholders, with the advantage (over the others) of being preferred in the particular mentioned.

We think that when the legislature allowed the counties to "subscribe for preferred stock" in this company, it intended that they might subscribe to the capital stock thereof, their stock to be preferred over the common stock by being entitled to seven per cent. interest out of the dividends in advance of the others.

*Now, as to the certificate which should be issued to the county commissioners. Having held that the words "preferred stock" in the act, accompanied with the word "subscribe," indicated the capital stock, the same words employed in the certificate would mean the same thing there; and if the railroad authorities in the certificate tendered had followed the language of the act strictly, without additional expressions throwing doubt upon their understanding, or rather indicating that they did not intend the county to be regarded as shareholders in the capital stock of the company, then the certificate would have been a compliance with the act and in strict performance of the duty imposed upon them, and in such case they would have been exempt from this writ. But they added to the words of the act the following: "Prior and in preference to any dividend upon the capital stock of the company." This was drawing a distinction not only as to the preference, but as to the essential character of the stock. This was in effect denying that the county was a shareholder in the capital stock, and impliedly asserting that it held some other position. Now, it is not for this court to speculate as to what underlies this controversy, but whatever may be behind it, the parties in conflict, either present or prospective, have a right to place themselves in proper position—the position to which the law entitles them.

We think the legislature means that the counties subscribing should have a certificate showing that they were stockholders in the capital stock of the railroad company; that the certificate tendered by the company as at present couched fails to show this—in fact it implies otherwise. We think further that the certificate ordered by Judge Mackey expresses the idea plainly and fully as to this right, and, therefore, that his order should be affirmed.

The cases referred to by the counsel of appellant in which the terms "preferred stock" are concerned, have been examined and considered. We have found nothing in any of these cases antagonistic to the position taken above. It seems to be admitted in all the cases that the holders of preferred stock are shareholders or stockholders in the stock of the company. The question which seems to have been discussed in many of the cases *was, whether the company had the power to create preferred stock. In others, what were the rights of the holders of such preferred stock as to the interest or dividend allowed on such stock. And in some of them, what control such stock had in the management of the company. In no case was it denied that they were stockholders, or claimed that they were simply creditors.

Most of the cases relied upon by appellant will be found reviewed somewhat in Green Br. U. V. 164 and notes. See the cases there of St. John v. The Erie R. R. Co., 22 Wall. 136 [22 L. Ed. 743]; Williston v. Mich. Southern & Ind. R. R. Co., 13 Allen 400; Hazlehurst v. Savannah G. & N. A. R. R. Co., 43 Ga. 13; Rutland & Burlington R. R. Co. v. Thrall, 35 Verm. 536; Hoyt v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 17 Hun 172; Kent v. Quicksilver Mining Co., 12 Hun 53; Bailey v. R. R. Co., 17 Wall. 99 [21 L. Ed. 611]; Taft v. R. R. Co., 8 R. I. 311. Some of these were the cases cited for appellant. They involved almost entirely questions of the character above stated. In the discussion of these questions the "preferred stock" is constantly referred to as represented by shares, and in no case are the holders of such preferred stock regarded as creditors simply. Such stock has often been resorted to, say these cases, to raise money, when the corporation has become crippled, and disaster and failure seemed near at hand; and with the view to raise the money, this stock has been allowed some advantage, some preference over the common stock.

"The issue of preferred stock," says Mr. Pierce, "is a mode by which a corporation obtains funds for its enterprise without borrowing money or contracting a debt. Its holders are a privileged class who are entitled to dividends of a certain per cent., payable out of the net earnings, in priority to any dividends upon ordinary stock." Pierce Rail. L. 124.

We come next to the exceptions to the mode of procedure, &c., in this case. The first raises the question of the power of the judge to hear application for mandamus at chambers. This power is expressly conferred on the judges of the Court of Common Pleas by statute. Gen. Stat. 547.

The next raises the question of demand. It seems that demand was twice made on the officers of the company for the certificate.

*It is true the demand did not specify the precise character of the certificate which the commissioners claimed to have issued, but it was a demand for certificates of "preferred stock," and we think was sufficiently definite to warrant this proceeding, upon failure to respond on the part of the company.

The appellants further except: "Because the peremptory writ of mandamus does not conform to the terms of the alternative writ." The alternative writ in mandamus, is required to sustain the same relation to such proceedings as a declaration does to the ordinary common law action. High Extr. Rem. §§ 449, 530. In it is found the relator's cause of action and the relief which he seeks. It combines the double function of process and pleading. It serves to bring the respondent into court as well as to apprise him definitely of the ground of action against him. The peremptory writ is the final process or judgment, and it must conform to the alternative; otherwise it is defective. In the amended alternative writ in this case, the relator claimed a certificate of fifteen hundred shares of preferred stock under the act March 14th, 1874. The peremptory writ substantially conforms to this claim, and the certificate prescribed by the judge is, in substance, in accordance with the mandate of the writ.

It is the judgment of this court, that the order of the judge below be affirmed.

McIVER and McGOWAN, A. J.'s, concurred.

16 S. C. 533

(Case No. 1159.)

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA v. CORBIN & STONE.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Attorney General ⇐7.]

Under a statute which authorized the attorney-general "to file and prosecute informations or other process against persons who intrude upon the lands, rights or property of the State," he had authority to institute an action to recover moneys of the State received by attorneys representing a former attorney-general in a previous action brought by such former attorney-general to require a corporation to pay for phosphatic rocks taken from lands belonging to the State.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. §§ 8–10; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[2. Attorney General, ⇐7.]

*This action was also authorized under Chapter XVI., § 35, of the General Statutes, which requires the attorney-general "to defend the rights of the State in all cases wherein the rights of the State may be involved."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. §§ 8–10; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[3. Attorney General ⇐7.]

It having been twice reported to the General Assembly by two successive attorney-generals that this action had been instituted and was pending, and no disapproval having been expressed by that body, it amounted to a confirmation by the General Assembly of the action taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney General, Cent. Dig. § 10; Dec. Dig. ⇐7.]

[4. States ⇐76.]

There is no statute that authorizes the comptroller-general to settle with attorneys representing the State for moneys of the State in their hands by allowing them to retain a part in payment of fees for services rendered by them in recovering such moneys.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. ⇐76.]

[5. States ⇐130.]

Such a settlement would be in violation of Article II., § 22, of the constitution, which provides that "no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of an appropriation made by law."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 128; Dec. Dig. ⇐130.]

[6. Trial ⇐136.]

In this action the Circuit judge construed the order of the court in a former cause allowing attorneys a certain per centum of the fund collected, and submitted it to the jury to say what was the amount of the fund then collected. Held, that in this there was no error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 318, 320, 321, 323–327; Dec. Dig. ⇐136.]

[7. States ⇐64.]

An order of a Circuit judge allowing attorneys a certain per centum of moneys recovered for the State as a fee for services rendered in the cause, could amount to no more than an audit of the proper fee, as the moneys of the State can be paid out only in pursuance of an appropriation made by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. ⇐64.]

[8. States ⇐199.]

An individual has no right to sue the State directly, nor can he interpose a claim against the State as a counter-claim, discount, or set-off in action brought against him by the State.

For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. § 189; Dec. Dig. ⇐199.]

[9. Pleading ⇐211.]

To a counter-claim in such case, an oral demurrer interposed at the trial was properly sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 481; Dec. Dig. ⇐211.]

[10. Courts ⇐305.]

The United States Circuit Courts have no jurisdiction of a controversy between a State and a citizen of another State. It was not error, therefore, in the State court in such case, to refuse an order removing the cause to the United States Circuit Court.

Before Hudson, J., Richland, July, 1880.

This was an action by the State of South Carolina against D. T. Corbin and William Stone, partners in the practice of law. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. E. Earle, for appellant.

Messrs. Youmans, attorney-general, and C. R. Miles, contra.

*535

*March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. In this case, the State brought action against the defendants for certain money collected by them as attorneys, to wit: for $28,000, less $3,700 allowed them in the complaint as a counsel fee. The defendants, appellants, interposed objection to the action on the ground that it had been instituted by authority of the comptroller-general, and they denied the right of the comptroller-general to prosecute such action. This objection was overruled by the presiding judge. They then claimed that the money sued for had been collected by them in a certain proceeding against the "Oak Point Mines," in which they represented the State; that the Circuit Court had allowed them sixty-two and a half per cent. upon this amount, and that they were entitled to retain this much at least. The court left it to the jury to determine whether the whole amount in the hands of defendants had been recovered in that suit, or only a portion, to which the order of the Circuit Court referred.

For a further defense, they relied on an alleged settlement made with T. C. Dunn, the then comptroller-general, in which this matter had been adjudicated, and the balance due, to wit, $206.06, had been turned over to the State treasurer. They also set up various counter-claims and set-offs for services rendered the State as attorneys. These, on motion, without previous notice, were struck out, upon the ground that they constituted a cross-action and that the State could not be held to answer thereto. Among these counter-claims was one for a sum of money alleged to have been advanced to the treasury, which Treasurer Leaphart had taken credit for in accounting with and paying off the members of the General Assembly of 1876 and '77. The court refused to hear testimony on this subject, it being a counter-claim that could not be set up in the courts against the State.

The defendant Stone claimed to have acquired citizenship in New York before suit brought, and upon a showing that he had instituted proceedings to remove the case to the Circuit Court of the United States, asked judgment of dismissal as to him. This was refused. The jury found a verdict for $23,728.44, with *interest from July 8th, 1876. The defendants appealed from the above rulings of the presiding judge, and also from certain refusals to charge upon requests, hereafter to be noticed and considered if necessary.

The important questions in the case are: First. Did the settlement made with Comptroller Dunn bar this action? If not, then, Second. Did the presiding judge err in submitting to the jury as a question of fact, whether the whole amount in defendants' hands had been collected in the suit against the Oak Point Mines Company, and therefore subject to the order of the Circuit Court allowing defendants sixty-two and a half per cent. as a fee, or only a part of it? Third. Did the judge err in holding that the State could not be sued even by a counter-claim?

Before considering these questions, however, it will be proper to dispose of the question which lies at the threshold of the case, as to the authority of the attorney-general to institute this action. In 1873 Attorney-General Melton, under "An act to fix the salary and define the duties of the attorney-general," (Gen. Stat. 109, § 26,) which empowers the attorney-general, when in his judgment the interests of the State require it, to file and prosecute proceedings against persons who intrude upon the lands, rights, or property of the State, * * * commenced proceedings against the South Carolina Phosphate Company, Limited, or the "Oak Point Mines," for intruding upon the rights of the State by mining and removing from North Wimbee creek, a navigable stream, phosphate rock, the property of the State, and prayed judgment for the value of the rock removed, and for perpetual injunction. * * * The appellants, with Attorney-General Melton, represented the State. Under an order of court in that proceeding, this company paid to appellants the sum of $28,000. Of this amount they paid to the treasurer in June, 1877, $206.06, retaining the balance as fees for professional services, viz.: $17,737.34 in that case, and $10,056.60 in another. Attorney-General Conner, at the instance of Comptroller-General Hagood, in August, 1877, brought action to recover this money, thus retained by appellants as counsel fees, claiming that appellants under the order of the court, hereafter to be considered, were entitled to retain only the sum of $3,700.

*This action, thus commenced by Attorney-General Conner, has been continued by Attorney-General Youmans, and is the one now before the court.

There can be no doubt but that Attorney-General Melton, under Section 5 of the act above referred to (Gen. Stat. 110), had authority, on his own motion, to commence the action against the phosphate company, which resulted in the recovery of the money here sued for. This section is as follows: "He may, when in his judgment the interests of the State require it, file and prosecute information or other process against persons who intrude upon the lands, rights, or property of the State." This gave Attorney-General Melton full authority to act in the original suit, and we think the act is wide enough to vindicate the action of Attorney-General Conner in instituting this suit and Attorney-General Youmans in prosecuting it. This suit may well be regarded as an incident to the action against the phosphate company. It is intended to gather the fruits of that action, and was rendered necessary as a result thereof.

Besides, if the appellants illegally withhold the State's money claimed at their hands, why is not this a violation of the act above cited? Money is property, and if appellants are illegally in possession of the State's money and refuse to deliver it, why, in contemplation of law, may they not be regarded as having intruded themselves upon the property of the State and thereby made themselves liable under the act above referred to.

But, in addition to this, the attorney-general is especially required to "defend the rights of the State in all cases where its rights are involved." Gen. Stat. 110, § 35. The prosecution of a claim in behalf of the State is defending its rights. In fact, inasmuch as the State is seldom or never a defendant in a cause, the only, or, at least, the general way in which he may be called upon to defend its rights, is by prosecuting its claims as plaintiff. But still, in addition, it appears that Attorney-General Conner reported this action to the General Assembly; the same report was made by Attorney-General Youmans after he took charge of the case. Even then, if legislative authority was required, the failure of the General Assembly to condemn or disapprove, after two formal reports, on the familiar doctrine of principal and *agent, would amount to a confirmation. This objection cannot be sustained.

Next, was the comptroller-general authorized to make the settlement relied on by the appellants as accord and satisfaction? If the comptroller had such power, it should be found in the acts creating the office and defining its duties. There are no common law powers attached to this office. On the contrary, the comptroller is a constitutional officer, having only such powers and duties as have been, or may be, provided by law. Const. Art. III. § 23. We have not been cited to any act in which such power is expressly delegated, nor in which such duties are imposed, as would by necessary implication invest him with such power. Nor have we been able to find any act of the kind. We conclude, therefore, that no such act exists.

But, even if one could be found, would it be constitutional? The legislature might authorize the comptroller or any other officer to audit and determine claims against the State, but could it empower such officer to direct payment and satisfaction in the absence of a regular appropriation. Section 12, Article IX, of the constitution, provides in brief and express terms, "That no money shall be drawn from the treasury but in pursuance of an appropriation made by law." This section stands directly in the way of the settlement of Comptroller Dunn, as an accord and satisfaction, even if he was authorized to adjudicate the claim of defendants. The adjudication, even if legal, did not authorize appellants to retain the money in payment of their claim.

No officer of the State is empowered to appropriate the public money in this shorthand way. The General Assembly makes the appropriation, the comptroller draws his warrant, and the treasurer pays. This may seem somewhat formal and technical, especially when the creditor has the money already in his hands. But experience has taught that it is best to be particular in reference to public funds. Some forms must be observed and some checks interposed. These have been required with us, and no power has been given to any officer to dispense with them.

Next. Did the Circuit judge err in submitting to the jury the question whether the order of Judge Maher, allowing appellants sixty-two and a half per cent. on the amount collected, *covered the entire amount received, or only that part received under the first judgment? The original action against the phosphate company was brought to recover damages on account of phosphate rock dug previous and up to the date of the action, and for perpetual injunction. This action was instituted in 1873. On July 21st, 1875, a decree was filed in this action, giving judgment to plaintiff for $5,984, being the value of rock mined up to the commencement of the action. At the same time it was further ordered that the company be enjoined from continuing their mining operations until they complied with the act of March, 1870, Section 3, 14 Stat. 381. On the same day, a second order was filed directing the referee to ascertain and report the quantity of rock mined by the company pending the litigation, the company having been permitted to mine during the litigation under an arrangement agreed upon. On November 9th, 1875, the referee reported, under this last order, that 22,016 tons had been mined while the suit was pending, in addition to that for which judgment had already been granted. On November 11th, 1875, the court confirmed this report of the referee and ordered the company to pay to plaintiffs' attorneys the sum of $22,016, and also the sum of $5,984 previously adjudged to plaintiffs. In October, nearly a month before this last report in November and its confirmation by the court, the judge, on motion of the appellants, and upon the suggestion of Attorney-General Melton, referred to Asher D. Cohen, Esq., the matter "to determine and report what per cent. of the fund collected in the above entitled cause would be proper compensation to be paid to Messrs. Corbin & Stone for their professional services therein."

It will be observed, that when this order was made, no money had actually been collected, but judgment had been rendered for $5,984, the value of the rock mined up to the commencement of the action, and which was the result of the suit proper. Mr. Cohen, October 28th, 1875, reported, recommending sixty-two and a half per cent. of the fund collected in the case as a suitable fee. This report was confirmed by Judge Maher, November 4th, 1875, all this being before the decree of November 11th, giving judgment for $22,016 for the mining during litigation, and after the judgment for $5,984, the value of the rock mined *up to the beginning of the action. Now, the question before Judge Hudson upon these facts was, did Judge Maher intend to subject both of these amounts to the sixty-two and a half per cent. as appellants' counsel fee, or did he intend to apply this measure to the $5,984 only, which was the product of the suit proper.

In the extract from Judge Hudson's charge found in the exceptions, it does not clearly appear what precise question he submitted to the jury. It is unfortunate that the whole charge has not been furnished. The brief is exceedingly voluminous as to other matters, but it is meagre as to the charge of the judge, and the court has had some difficulty in determining the exact question submitted. It was the province of the court to construe the order of Judge Maher and to submit to the jury such questions of fact as arose thereon, and, as we understood the charge, this is what Judge Hudson did. He construed the order to mean that the counsel fee was to come from the product of the action proper, and he submitted to the jury, as a question of fact, the question, what fund had been collected in that action, stating to them at the same time that the $22,016 was the result, not of the action, but of an intermediate arrangement to prevent suit. We see no error in this. But, even if there was, we do not see that it should affect the result of this case. Admit that it was the purpose of Judge Maher's order to fix the fee at sixty-two and a half per cent. of the whole amount collected ($28,000), could that order, thus interpreted, have been allowed as a defense to this action, brought to recover money in the hands of appellants belonging to the State? We think not. Judge Maher, provided he had jurisdiction of such question, might have settled the amount of the claim due appellants. But would that have authorized Judge Hudson to direct his jury to give appellants credit for that amount in the action before him? This would have been an appropriation of the State's money by the court, when the constitution says that no money can be appropriated except by the General Assembly.

But, did Judge Maher have legal authority to adjudicate appellants' claim against the State? We know of no act or law which gives the courts of the State jurisdiction to audit claims of *this kind. The order of Judge Maher amounted to nothing more than an audit. It simply adjudged the value of the services, fixing sixty-two and a half per cent. of the amount "collected in the suit" as proper compensation. It did not order payment, nor could it have done so legally. And for the same reason Judge Hudson was powerless to have this amount credited on the funds in the hands of appellants. If the order of Judge Maher was final and conclusive as to the amount of the fee, the appellants should have paid the money collected by them into the treasury of the State, and have gone before the legislature with this order and had their claim incorporated in the appropriation bill. Under this view of the case, as the order of Judge Maher could in no event have been a good defense to this action, it is immaterial what question Judge Hudson submitted to the jury arising thereon.

Next, did the judge err in holding that the State could not be sued in her own courts, and on that ground in ruling out the counter-claims of appellants? It is hardly necessary to discuss the question as to the right of an individual to sue the State directly. That no such right exists is universally admitted. However righteous, just and meritorious the claim may be, the courts can afford no remedy. The State in her sovereignty will do justice at her own will, and not by the intervention of her courts. The courts are of her own creation, and for her citizens. Treasurers v. Cleary, 3 Rich. 374; State v. Baldwin, 14 S. C. 138.

But it is said that this is a discount or counter-claim, and not a suit. In Treasurers v. Cleary, supra, that question was made, and the court said: "A discount is nothing else than a modified form of suit, in which defendant claims of the plaintiff some right which he might enforce in a suit at law." In the State v. Baldwin, supra, McIver, A. J., for the court, said: "The State cannot be sued in its own courts, nor can the defendant interpose such claim as a discount or set-off, which is nothing but a cross-action, to an action against him by the State." He said further, "one who renders service to the State, for which there is no compensation provided by statute, cannot, as in the case of services rendered to a private person, raise an implied assumpsit against *the State, and for such services he has no legal claim which can be enforced by process of law." The discount allowed in the case of the State v. Gaillard, 1 Bay 500, was especially provided for under the amercement acts—and that case has no general application. The cases referred to by appellants' counsel, from the Supreme Court of the United States, in our opinion are inapplicable. They were all, more or less, influenced by the act of Congress, March 3d, 1797, providing for discounts legal and equitable against the United States, under certain circumstances and conditions. True, in some of the cases it is stated that this act did not create the right to discount, but simply recognized it as pre-existing, and that the act was intended to regulate and control it. But still, in reading the cases we cannot fail to see that the act was relied on as the foundation. Besides, in some of the cases, the claim set up by defendant was for services rendered under contract well defined and the fees fixed by law. In others for a pro rata share of funds in possession of the government, in which the defendants claimed an interest, differentiating these cases from the case now under consideration.

Thus, in the case of United States v. Mann, 2 Brock. Marsh. 10 [Fed. Cas. No. 15,716], the defendant's claim, as deputy marshal, was founded upon services which his office required him to perform under law, the fees being fixed by statute.

In the case of United States v. Wilkins, 6 Wheat. 144 [5 L. Ed. 225], Judge Story said: "We think it a reasonable construction of the act (referring to the act of 1797) that it intended to allow the defendant the full benefit, at the trial, of any credit, whether arising out of the particular transaction for which he was sued, or out of any distinct and indefinite transaction, which would constitute a legal or equitable set-off of the debt sued for by the United States."

In the case of The Siren, 7 Wall. 154 [19 L. Ed. 129], where Mr. Justice Field lays down the doctrine more broadly in favor of appellants' position than in the other cases, the proceeding was in rem, and the court permitted the claims of individuals to be established against the property libeled, although adverse to the claim of the United States. Justice Field, it is true, placed this right broadly on the ground of set-off, saying that

"although direct *suit cannot be maintained against the United States, or against their property, yet, when the United States institute suit, they waive their exemption so far as to allow a presentation by the defendant, of set-off, legal and equitable, to the extent of the property demanded."

But we do not see that this declaration was necessary to the case and the judgment rendered. The Siren had been condemned by the court at the instance of the government, and the proceeds having thus been placed in course of judicial administration, it was held that any proper claim prior to that of the government might well be paid out of such proceeds. We do not see that this prevented a case of discount or set-off. In the case from Kentucky—The Sinking Fund Commission v. Northern Bank—the State had sold property to the defendant with a mortgage over it. The court allowed the defendant a reduction out of the purchase-money sufficient to remove the encumbrance. The case in 18 Geo. 662, Powers v. Central Bank, is placed squarely on the right of discount, but Judge Lumpkins seems to have reached his conclusion with hesitation and doubt, and frankly suggested at the conclusion of his opinion that it would be well for the State legislature to pass an act similar to the act of Congress, expressly allowing defendants to discount legal and equitable claims against the State. From a note appended to this case, it would seem that it did not give satisfaction.

But, whatever may have been decided elsewhere, in the face of our own cases of the Treasurers v. Cleary and the State v. Baldwin, we cannot do otherwise than hold that the claim of appellants had no legal status in the court below. It is universally admitted that a State cannot be sued in its courts without its consent. Our courts have decided that a counter-claim is a suit. It is so recognized in this case by the appellants in their motion for judgment on the failure of the State to answer their counter-claim, and cannot be set up.

There can be no doubt, however, that there is an underlying principle of justice, which might permit defendants, under proper regulations, to have their claims against the State, if any, considered and passed upon by the same tribunal before which they *may be summoned to answer the State. And, if we might presume to suggest, it may be wise for the General Assembly to enact some remedy in such cases. Until then we must declare the law as it stands. Our province is judicial, not legislative.

The defendant, Stone, sought to remove this case, as to himself, into the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, on the ground that at the commencement of the suit he was a citizen of New York. The petition presented for that purpose and the bond filed were in form correct, but no order was granted by the Circuit Court, Judge Shaw, before whom the motion was made, having died without acting thereon, and the motion was not renewed thereafter. The attorney for Stone, however, filed a copy of the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States. Thereafter, in 1880, Attorney-General Youmans moved that court to have the case stricken from its docket, but no decision has been rendered on that motion. Under this state of facts Judge Hudson refused the motion, and ordered the trial to proceed against both dedendants. We think he was right.

We do not see that the United States Circuit Court has anywhere been given jurisdiction in a controversy between a State and a citizen of another State on the ground of the citizenship of the parties. That court has jurisdiction only as has been conferred by the act creating it, and the amendments thereto. We have been pointed to no act conferring such jurisdiction as contended for here. The constitution of the United States has conferred this jurisdiction upon the Supreme Court, but nowhere do we find it conferred upon the Circuit Courts. The reason seems to be founded in the dignity of the State. Respublica v. Cobbet, 3 Dall. 467 [1 L. Ed. 683]. In the Railroad Co. v. Mississippi, 12 Otto [102 U. S.] 136 [26 L. Ed. 96], the case was removed to the Circuit Court, but this was on the ground that the controversy involved the construction of an act of Congress. It belonged to that class of cases where jurisdiction is conferred, because "arising under the constitution, or the laws of the United States." It affords no authority for the motion made here. Besides, it does not appear, except in the statements of the petition, that defendant, Stone, was a citizen of New York when this action began.

*The Circuit Court then not having jurisdiction in a case like this, it was not subject to removal, under the acts of Congress providing for the removal of causes to the United States Circuit Courts. Dillon p. 10 et seq.

We do not think the court below was in error in admitting the oral demurrer interposed by plaintiff to the counter-claims of defendants. This demurrer raised the question of jurisdiction. This question, under Section 171 of the code, like that, "That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is expressly reserved from waiver, although no objection be taken by formal demurrer or answer." The cases referred to by appellants' counsel, in [Evans v. McLucas] 12 S. C. 56 and [Ross v. Linder] Id. 592, do not controvert this proposition. There the objection was such as required a formal demurrer. Neither do the cases of Bank v. Zorn, 14 S. C. 450 [37 Am. Rep. 733], and Cohrs v. Fraser [5 S. C. 351] apply; there the motion was to strike out the answer, not for the want of jurisdiction, but for other causes.

The exceptions involving inadvertent remarks made by the judge must be overruled. These remarks were not strictly upon the facts at issue, and therefore contrary to the inhibition of the constitution. At most they were irrelevant, and as is said in the exceptions, inadvertent. Certainly not so material as to afford ground for a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BRISTOW v. McCALL.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Trusts ⟸151.]

A testator devised his real estate to A. and B. and their heirs in trust for the use and benefit of both his son E. and daughter D. He continued: "I hereby direct my executors hereinafter named to divide my lands equally between my son E. and daughter D., and permit each to use, possess and enjoy his or her half in severalty during his or her natural life, and after *the death of either, that they divide the share of each among his or her children equally." A. and B. were appointed executors of the will. After testator's death, the trustees divided the land between E. and D., and each went into possession of the share allotted to them. Afterwards E.'s interest in this land was levied upon under execution and sold. Held, that the purchaser took no title.

*546

[2. Trusts ⟸131.]

The trust was not executed for the life of E. by the Statute of Uses, but the legal title remained in the trustees to enable them to perform the duties imposed upon them.

Nor was the interest of E. in this land such an interest as was subject to levy and sale under the tenth section of the Statute of Frauds (2 Stat. 527, Gen. Stat. 472 § 2,) the trust not being a pure and simple trust for the benefit of the debtor alone.

Before Wallace, J., Marlborough, September, 1881.

Action by Alexander E. Bristow against C. S. McCall. The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Townsend & Livingston, for appellant.

Messrs. James Conner and H. H. Newton, contra.

March 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. The plaintiff, appellant, seeks to recover possession of a tract of land located in Marlborough county, of which the defendant is in possession.

It was admitted that one John H. David formerly owned the land, and the plaintiff attempted to connect himself with the title of David. For this purpose he first introduced the will of John H. David, deceased, referring to the tenth clause thereof as bearing upon the land in dispute. In this clause the testator gave and devised to A. H. Douglass and A. N. Bristow and their heirs, all of his real estate, in trust, nevertheless, for the use and benefit of both his son, Evander David, and daughter Elizabeth, wife of William J. Daniels, with directions to his executors to divide the lands equally between his son Evander, and daughter Elizabeth, and to permit each to use, possess and enjoy his or her half in severalty during his or her natural life, and after the *death of either that they divide the share of each among his or her children equally, appointing the said A. H. Douglass and A. N. Bristow, executors. The division of the land was made by the executors and each party put in possession of his and her share.

Numerous judgments and executions against Evander were offered in evidence, under which the land in dispute was sold, and a deed from the sheriff to the plaintiff, dated December 7th, 1870, regularly recorded, was properly proved. Under this deed the plaintiff went into possession and so continued until some two years ago, when the defendant went into possession, but it does not appear how the defendant got possession. The executors, A. H. Douglass and A. N. Bristow, are both dead.

With the proof of the above facts the plaintiff closed, whereupon the defendant moved for a non-suit, on the ground that E. David had no interest in the land in dispute subject to levy and sale under and by virtue of the aforesaid judgments and executions. The presiding judge granted the non-suit.

Now, the only question before this court on appeal of plaintiff is this: Did Evander David have such an interest in the land as was subject to levy and sale by the sheriff? If so, there was error in the judgment of non-suit: otherwise, the judgment must be affirmed.

Two classes of interests in lands are subject to levy and sale for debt: First, legal interests, and, second, certain trust estates, such as are contemplated by Section 10 of Statute of Frauds. Did Evander David have an interest in this land belonging to either of these classes? This interest, whatever it was, came through the will of his father. It will not be contended that he took a legal interest by the express terms of this will, because the fee in the land is conveyed expressly by the will to Douglass and Bristow, as will be seen at once on reading it. It is devised to these parties and their heirs. This is a direct conveyance of the fee.

This is admitted by appellant, but it is contended that the legal title passed from these parties to Evander and the remaindermen by the Statute of Uses, and that at the time of the sale by the sheriff, by operation of this statute, Evander was legally seized of *a life-estate, which, by the sale, went to the plaintiff as purchaser. The Statute of Uses never executes the use while there is anything for the trustee to do, necessary to the accomplishment of the trust created by the deed. It applies in cases only where there is nothing to be done by the trustee, as where an estate is given to one and his heirs simply in trust for another. In such case the title passes through the trustee directly to the cestui que trust, the latter becoming the legal owner by virtue of this transmission, caused by the statute.

But, where the trustee is charged with the performance of some duty in connection with the property, which cannot be performed except by the authority of the legal title vested in him, the statute has no application, because, if it did, it would defeat the very purpose intended by the execution of the deed. The statute affords a statutory mode of conveyance, where a conveyance is intended, but it does not destroy a trust interest, when such interest was intended to be created as evidenced by imposing a duty upon the trustee. In this case, Douglass and Bristow, trustees named in the will, were charged with duties. They were, in the first instance, to divide the land between Evander and his sister, then, to permit each of them to use, possess and enjoy his or her portion in severalty for life, and after the death of either or both, to divide the share of each among his or her children equally.

Now, if immediately upon the death of the testator, the statute stepped in, and ousting Douglass and Bristow, transferred the legal title to Evander and his sister for life, and to their children in remainder, by what authority could they have attempted to discharge the important duties which the testator solemnly enforced upon them as his chosen friends? This is not a case for the statute, and Evander not having a legal interest the sheriff had no power to sell the land on that ground.

Did he have such trust interest as by Section 10 of Statute of Frauds is subject to levy and sale? The trust interest referred to, it is true, is not very distinctly defined in the act, nor is it clearly pointed out in the decisions. But it is conceded that it must be a clear and simple trust and for the benefit of the debtor alone, the object of the statute being merely to remove the *technical objection arising from the interest in the land being legally vested in another person, where it is so vested for the benefit of the debtor. Doe v. Greenhill, 4 Barn. & Ald. 684; White v. Kavanagh, 8 Rich. 395.

A simple trust is said by the authorities to be (Lew. Trusts 21; Bouv. Inst. § 1900;) "a trust corresponding with the ancient use; and it exists where property is simply vested in one person for the use of another, and the nature of the trust not being qualified by the letter is left to the construction of the law." A trust of this kind, for the benefit of the debtor alone, and not jointly with others, would fall under this section, but if others were interested, that fact would exclude the application of the statute. Rice v. Burnett, Spears Eq. 585 [42 Am. Dec. 336]. The trust must be a pure and unmixed one in favor of the debtor alone, because the effect of a sale under this section is to divest the estates both of the trustee and the cestui que trust, and to transfer them to the purchaser, which would be prejudicial to the interest of others, where others are joined in the trust. Harrison v. Battle, 1 Dev. Eq. 541.

Now, did the will of David create a pure and unmixed trust, or, in the language of the cases, a simple trust in this land in favor of Evander alone, such an interest as that a sale thereof by the sheriff would not interfere with any duty imposed upon the trustee, or the interests of other cestuis que trust? The will conveyed the fee-simple of the entire land of the testator to Douglass and Bristow, for the use and benefit of Evander, and Elizabeth, a married woman, with direction to divide the land equally, and to permit each of them to use, possess and enjoy one half in severalty during life, and after the death of either, to divide his or her share equally among his or her children.

We do not think that there was a simple trust conveyed here in any distinct portion of this land to Evander alone, in the sense contemplated by the tenth section of the Statute of Frauds, as construed by the decisions. Before the division, there was a joint life interest in Evander and Elizabeth, and after the division, the interest of each in the portions allotted to each was accompanied with an interest in behalf of their children by way of remainder.

*The interests of the life-tenants were encumbered with unexecuted trusts in favor of the children, which made it necessary that the legal title should remain in the trustees. The statute does not apply where the interests of others are mixed up with the debtor's title. Rice v. Burnett, Spears Eq. 584 [42 Am. Dec. 336]; Doe v. Greenhill, 4 Barn. & Ald. 684. On the questions discussed, in addition to the cases cited, see also the cases of Ioor v. Hodges, Spears Eq. 596; Bogart v. Perry, 1 Johns. Ch. 52; also, 17 Johns. 352; Lynch v. Utica Ins. Co., 18 Wend. 250.

We think there was no error below in granting the non-suit. The only error assigned in the appeal, being that his Honor held that the land described in the complaint was not subject to levy and sale under an execution against the debtor, being disposed of, it is only necessary to say:

That it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Lancaster, February, 1880.

The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Patterson & Gaston, for appellants.

Mr. Ira B. Jones read argument of W. L. De Pass, deceased, contra.

March 8th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. On May 10th, 1867, the plaintiff filed a bill against the defendant, McIlwain, for a foreclosure of a mortgage on real estate. To this bill, amongst other defenses, McIlwain set up a claim of homestead, which was disallowed, and a judgment of foreclosure was rendered, directing a sale of the whole of the land mortgaged. Under this judgment the whole of the land was advertised for sale on December 2d, 1867, and on that day a sale was made, but exactly what was sold, whether all of the land subject to the defendant's claim of homestead under military orders No. 10, issuing from the headquarters of the department then embracing this State, or whether the homestead was reserved, was the subject of much conflict of testimony. The commissioner in equity, however, who was directed to make the sale, executed a deed on the day of sale to the plaintiff, Kibler, who was the highest and last bidder at the sale, for the *whole of the land, and this deed was duly recorded on May 29th, 1868

On June 19th, 1868, the commissioner in equity made his report of the sale to the court, in which he stated that, in conformity with the order of sale, "he exposed for sale the lands described in the pleadings" on the terms prescribed: that Kibler bid off the same, and having complied with the terms of sale, he, as commissioner, had executed a deed to said Kibler "for the lands described in the pleadings." To this report no exceptions appear to have been taken, and accordingly, on June 22d, 1868, the court made an order confirming the report of the sale, "and making it the decree of the court." It appears, however, that in the meantime, to wit: on May 7th, 1868, McIlwain had been adjudged a bankrupt by the District Court of the United States, and that on August 22d, 1868, D. A. Williams became his assignee.

On January 18th, 1869, Kibler commenced an action against one Bridges, who had become the tenant of the assignee Williams, to recover possession of the dwelling house, situate on the land covered by his deed from the commissioner in equity, and about twenty acres adjoining, which was claimed as McIlwain's homestead. The defense to this action rested upon the allegation that under the military orders aforesaid, McIlwain was entitled to a homestead, and that the same was reserved and not sold by the commissioner in equity. The defendant in that action having obtained a judgment in his favor, from which there was an appeal, the Supreme Court ordered a new trial upon the ground that the military orders could confer no right of homestead as against a mortgage. Upon a second trial the defendant again had a judgment, and the Supreme Court again ordered a new trial upon the same ground. (See the case as reported in [Kibler v. Bridges] 3 S. C. 44, and again in [Kibler v. Bridges] 5 S. C. 335.) That case is understood to be still pending in the Circuit Court for Lancaster county.

It appears also that D. A. Williams, as assignee of McIlwain, commenced an action on November 14th, 1872, against Kibler to set aside the sale of the land by the commissioner, substantially upon the ground of fraud.

This case was heard in May, 1875, *by the Court of Common Pleas for Lancaster county, and a judgment rendered setting aside said sale. From this judgment Kibler appealed, and the same was reversed by the Supreme Court in March, 1878, ([Williams v. Kibler] 10 S. C. 414,) upon the ground: "That if the sale was improperly reported and confirmed, the plaintiff (in that action), as the assignee of McIlwain, bound by the order of confirmation, should have intervened in the foreclosure suit and sought to set that order aside:" it being made to appear to the court that the foreclosure suit was then pending.

On June 19th, 1878, D. A. Williams "resigned his position as assignee of J. D. McIlwain," and the defendant, J. W. De Pass, was appointed in his place. On June 24th, 1878, DePass, as assignee, filed his petition asking that the original foreclosure suit, which had been dropped from the docket, be redocketed, that he, as assignee, might be allowed to intervene, and praying, in substance, that the sale made by the commissioner in equity, together with his deed to Kibler, might be set aside upon the ground of fraud. To this petition the plaintiff herein filed an answer, in which, amongst other things, he relied upon the Statute of Limitations. The Circuit judge overruled the plea of the Statute of Limitations and rendered judgment in accordance with the prayer of the petition, and from this judgment the plaintiff appeals on numerous grounds.

We do not deem it necessary to consider separately the several grounds of appeal as they are set out in the "case," but will simply consider such questions as are, in our judgment, conclusive of the case.

There can be no doubt that when the original action for foreclosure was commenced the Court of Common Pleas had full jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and the fact that, pending the action, McIlwain was adjudged a bankrupt could not divest such jurisdiction. Hence, the judgment of foreclosure and sale and all subsequent proceedings therein had the same force and effect as if there had been no adjudication of bankruptcy. It is true the assignee might have come in and defended the action, or upon a proper showing might have had any orders improperly granted set aside, but until he did so he was as much bound by the proceedings as the bankrupt would *have been if there had been no adjudication of bankruptcy. Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521 [23 L. Ed. 403]; Daniels v. Moses, 12 S. C. 138.

This being the case the question of fact, as to whether the whole or only a portion of the land was sold by the commissioner in equity, cannot arise now, for it has been adjudged and conclusively settled as to both McIlwain and his assignee, unless such adjudication is assailed upon the ground of fraud. The order required a sale of the whole of the land, and it was so advertised. When, therefore, the commissioner reported that he had sold all the land described in the pleadings; that the purchaser had complied with the terms of sale, and that he had executed a deed for the same, and this report was not excepted to, but, on the contrary, was confirmed and made the decree of the court, the matter was res adjudicata both as to McIlwain and his assignee.

This, however, would not preclude either McIlwain or his assignee from assailing the proceedings upon the ground of fraud, and it therefore becomes necessary for us to consider the case in that aspect. But as we are satisfied that this proceeding on the part of DePass, as assignee, is barred by the Statute of Limitations, it will be unnecessary for us to consider the evidence relied upon as establishing the charge of fraud.

There can be no doubt that a proceeding to set aside a deed or judgment upon the ground of fraud, where the party seeking so to do is in a condition to institute an action for that purpose, must be commenced within four or six years, according as the right of action accrued before or after the adoption of the Code of Procedure, from the time when the facts constituting the fraud are discovered by the aggrieved party. The inquiry then is whether this proceeding was commenced within the time allowed. Although the Circuit judge has found as matter of fact that neither McIlwain nor his assignee had any knowledge of the alleged fraud until some time during the month of July, 1872, we are utterly at a loss to conceive how such a finding can be supported in the face of the undisputed facts appearing in the record.

The alleged fraud consisted in what occurred at the sale, what was stated (untruthfully, as defendants assert,) in the report of the sale and in the confirmation thereof, and all these facts were *certainly known to McIlwain at the time, or he had such knowledge as would, by the exercise of the most ordinary diligence, have led to the full discovery of them. He was undoubtedly present at the sale and knew what occurred there. He was a party to the foreclosure suit and knew, or ought to have known, what was done therein. Indeed it would be a great tax upon the credulity of the most credulous person to suppose him ignorant of what disposition was made of his claim to have the homestead reserved from the sale of the balance of the land. The deed conveying the whole of the land, without any reservation of the homestead, was spread upon the records as far back as May 29th, 1868. Kibler commenced an action to recover possession of the very land now in controversy on January 18th, 1869, to which the defense was the very same facts now relied upon to set aside the sale.

In view of all these undisputed facts it is impossible to doubt that McIlwain knew then all that he knew when the present proceeding was commenced, and the statute having commenced to run against him would continue to run against his assignee. But, in addition to this, the first assignee, Williams, in his testimony, admits that, as early as January, 1869, he knew the facts which are now alleged to constitute the fraud, and he must be regarded as having notice of the deed and the terms of it from the time when it was put upon record, and he, therefore, would have been barred in January, 1873, and, of course, his successor, the present assignee, is in no better condition, in this respect, than his predecessor.

We are unable to see how the abortive proceeding instituted by Williams, as assignee, in November, 1872, could affect the currency of the statute. That action was dismissed, and is not and cannot be in any way connected with the present proceeding. It has been adjudged to have been erroneously brought, and can have no effect upon the operation of the statute. It is clear, therefore, that this proceeding comes too late, and that the Circuit judge erred in not sustaining the plaintiff's plea of the Statute of Limitations.

Although this is conclusive of the case, yet there is one question raised by the exceptions which, from its general importance, *had better be determined with a view to settle the practice as to the mode of conducting the cross-examination of a witness, about which, it is said, some difference of opinion exists. That question is whether a party has a right to interrogate a witness, on his cross-examination, as to facts not alluded to in the examination in chief. In this case the Circuit judge followed the rule which Greenleaf (Vol. 1, § 445,) says has been established by the Supreme Court of the United States whereby "a party has no right to cross-examine any witness except as to facts and circumstances connected with the matters stated in his direct examination, and that if he wishes to examine him as to other matters he must do so by making the witness his own, and calling him as such in the subsequent progress of the cause."

This question, strange to say, does not seem to have been distinctly decided in this State, though in the case of Clinton v. McKenzie, 5 Strobh. 41, it seems to be assumed that the rule is different here from that established by the Supreme Court of the United States, and that here a witness may, on his cross-examination, be interrogated as to any fact pertinent to the case, "whether the examination be directed to qualify, neutralize or discredit the testimony which the witness may have given on his examination in chief, or to lay the foundation of his defense in any new matter in the knowledge of the witness;" and this, so far as we have been able to learn, is the rule which has very generally prevailed in this State. It is conceded by Greenleaf, in the section above cited, that this is the rule in England, and there counsel, in the cross-examination of a witness, are permitted to ask questions bearing upon the whole case, so as to bring out matters of independent defense, and are not confined to the matters testified to in the examination in chief. 1 Whart. Ev. § 529; Morgan v. Brydges, 2 Stark. 314 (3 Eng. Com. L. 361). In Massachusetts the English rule seems to have been adopted. Moody v. Rowell, 17 Pick. 499; Commonwealth v. Morgan, 107 Mass. 205. So also, in Alabama, Kelly v. Brook, 25 Ala. 523, and Fralick v. Presley, 29 Ala. 461. In New York, Jackson v. Varick, 7 Cow. 238, and in Missouri, State v. Sayers, 58 Mo. 585.

We think, also, that this rule has the support of reason as well *as of authority. The oath administered to a witness requires him to speak the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and, therefore, when a witness is put upon the stand he ought to be allowed an opportunity for stating all the facts within his knowledge bearing upon the issues involved in the case, and should not be confined to those facts only about which the party who offers him as a witness chooses to interrogate him. It is very true that the other party may put him on the stand as his witness and examine him as to any facts within his knowledge which he may desire to bring before the Court, but he is not obliged to do so; and it may and often does happen that the other party would prefer to forego the opportunity of bringing out such facts rather than adopt one of his adversary's witnesses as his own. In such case the result would be that the witness would have no opportunity of telling the whole truth, as he has been sworn to do. We think, therefore, that the English rule, founded as it is in reason, and fully sustained by authority, is the better rule and should be followed. Hence, the Circuit judge erred in refusing to allow counsel for the plaintiff to cross-examine the witness Clyburn except as to such matters as had been brought out on the direct examination.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and that the petition filed by the defendant De Pass be dismissed.

16 S. C. 557

(Case No. 1165.)

MOODY v. TEDDER.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Wills ⇐616.]

Testator by his will devised and bequeathed to his wife "during the term of her natural life only, all my property both real and personal, authorizing and empowering her to use and dispose of so much thereof as may be necessary for her comfortable support and maintenance in such style and manner as she may see fit and proper;" and after her death, he gave "whatever portion may be remaining of my said property to J., her heirs *and assigns forever." Held, that the widow, as life-tenant, having an absolute power of disposal, could not be held accountable as trustee to the remainderman, for three slaves sold to pay the debts of the widow, to run the plantation and to support herself and agent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1418–1430; Dec. Dig. ⇐616.]

[2. Deeds ⇐114.]

The widow, in consideration that T., the husband of J., assumed the payment of her debts and covenanted to support and maintain her through life, conveyed to T. all her interest and life-estate in this property, and he it was who sold the slaves for the purposes mentioned. Held, that the deed carried to T. not only the life-estate, but also the power of disposal, and must be referred to her power whether it purported to be an execution or not; and T. was not accountable to the remainder-men, children of J., after the widow's death, for the purchase-money of the slaves so sold.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 326; Dec. Dig. ⟸114.]

[3. Wills ⟸693.]

The deed, accompanied by the widow's acquiescence for fourteen years, could, at least, be construed as a power of attorney, authorizing T. to make the sale.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1655–1661; Dec. Dig. ⟸693.]

[4. Wills ⟸693.]

But, under this will, the remaindermen had no right to the slaves so sold, as neither they nor the purchase-money were property of the widow remaining at the time of her death. 1. Because they were sold for purposes within the scope of the power and their price so expended; and, 2. Because the slaves were emancipated before the widow's death.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1655; Dec. Dig. ⟸693.]

Simpson, C. J., concurred only upon the last ground stated.

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, October, 1881.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court. The will is very short and contains only what is copied into the opinion.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, for appellants.

Mr. G. W. Dargan, contra.

March 11th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McGOWAN, A. J. William Griggs, late of Darlington county, died in the year 1850, leaving a widow, Mary, but no children. At the time of his death he was seized and possessed of his homestead tract of land, containing five or six hundred acres, twenty-seven negro slaves, horses, hogs and other personal property. He left a will by which he devised and bequeathed to his "widow, Mary, during the term of her natural life only, *all his property, both real and personal, authorizing and empowering her to use and dispose of so much thereof as may be necessary for her comfortable support and maintenance in such style and manner as she may see fit;" and, secondly, after the death of his said wife, Mary Griggs, he gave "whatever portion may be remaining of his said property to Jemima Tedder (wife of William Tedder), to her, her heirs and assigns forever."

Mrs. Griggs qualified as sole executrix of the will, and continued to reside on the homestead and manage the property. She became embarrassed, and in order to pay the debts and prevent the sale of a negro, which had been levied upon by the sheriff, and doubtless to place the property under the control of one who could manage it, on April 22d, 1856, she executed to William Tedder, the husband of the devisee in remainder, the following deed: "Whereas, William Tedder having this day executed to me an obligation, in writing, to pay all my just debts, as well as the debts, if any, against the estate of William Griggs, deceased, and to give me a respectable maintenance and support for and during my natural life; now, I, the said Mary Griggs, for and in consideration of the obligation above named, and of the sum of one dollar to me paid, have granted, bargained, transferred and delivered, and by these presents do grant, bargain, transfer and deliver unto the said William Tedder all my interest and life-estate in and to all and singular the lands, negroes, horses, cattle, hogs and other property left to me for life by the last will and testament of William Griggs, deceased, together with all the debts due me or the estate of William Griggs aforesaid for negro hire, &c., together with all and singular the rights, members, hereditaments and appurtenances to the said land or other property belonging or in any wise incident or appertaining; to have and to hold all and singular the land or other property named unto the said William Tedder, his heirs and assigns forever. And I do hereby quit claim to the same in behalf of myself and my heirs forever," &c.

Under this deed, William Tedder took possession of the property, leaving Mrs. Griggs in possession of the dwelling-house and household and kitchen furniture. The property at that time was in bad condition. There was a lack of provisions and the *work animals consisted of four worn-out horses, two of them blind. The debts amounted to $1,500, and it was necessary to restock the farm. Tedder managed the property skillfully, made good crops and improved the place up to the end of the war, when the slaves were emancipated. In 1859 he sold three negroes (one of them being unmanageable) for $2,700 and used the money in paying off the debts which he had assumed ($1,500), to run the plantation and to support his aunt, Mrs. Griggs, himself and family. When the slaves were emancipated they had increased to thirty-two, exclusive of the three sold. After the war the property depreciated mainly through theft, and at the death of Mrs. Griggs some of the personal property remained, which had been delivered to Tedder.

In 1864, Jemima Tedder died, and her interest in the estate descended to her heirs—her husband, William, to the extent of one-third, and the remainder in equal shares to her seven children, of whom the plaintiff, Mahalie Moody, is one. Mrs. Mary Griggs was supported until she died in 1873, after which time all the children were allowed to cultivate the land, Tedder cultivating about one-third. As they grew up they continued to hire out the place, planting such of the land as they wished. Plaintiff, Mahalie Moody, and husband, went on the land in 1875, and instituted this proceeding against her father and brothers and sisters in May, 1879, for partition of the land and for an account of the rents and profits, and personal property which went into the possession of William Tedder, under the deed of April, 1856. Before trial it was conceded that the heirs of Jemima were entitled to partition of the land, and the plaintiffs abandoned all claim for account, except for the value of the three negro slaves sold by William Tedder in 1859. That point was referred to J. J. Wood, Esq., as special referee, who held that William Tedder was not liable to account for the $2,700, the price of the slaves sold. The case came up, on exceptions to this report, before Judge Wallace, who held that William Tedder was liable for the value of the negroes sold. From this judgment William Tedder appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. That the deed of Mary Griggs invested William Tedder with the right to dispose absolutely of the negroes, or at least to *dispose of them in the interest of the plantation and for the maintenance of Mary Griggs.

"2. That under the will of William Griggs the plaintiff or remainderman had title only to such of the property as might remain at the death of Mrs. Griggs, and as the three negroes sold did not exist as property at that time they have no right to account for their value.

"3. The circumstances under which and the purposes for which the negroes were sold and the purchase-money applied, justified the sale, and relieved William Tedder from liability for the purchase-money.

"4. The sale being in the interest and for the benefit of the life-estate, William Tedder is not liable for the same."

This case, like that of Finley v. Hunter, 3 Strobh. Eq. 84, must be determined upon the strong phraseology of the testator's will and a manifest intention appearing from the terms he has employed in the gift to his wife for life and the limitation over. It seems that the testator was childless, and naturally his wife was the first object of his bounty. He desired to make her comfortable for the remainder of her days if it took the whole of his estate to do it, as is shown by the gift to her of the whole property for life, "authorizing and empowering her to use and dispose of so much thereof as may be necessary for her comfortable support and maintenance in such style and manner as she may see fit and proper." This was practically an absolute power of disposal, for while it is true that the will indicates the purpose for which it was given and for which alone the power could be exercised, yet in extent it was unlimited, as the widow was made the sole judge of the "style and manner" of her living and necessarily of the amount which would be required to support it.

Being a lady unaccustomed to business she had the right, at least, to employ some one to look after the property for her. There can be no doubt that Mrs. Griggs had the power to dispose of any portion of the estate for the purpose indicated, and if she had sold the three negroes which were sold by Tedder and applied the funds precisely as he applied them, in paying off the debts, restocking the farm, and in supporting herself and the family of Tedder while he was attending to her business, there could not *have been a shadow of claim for accountability upon her. "Powers may be general or limited. In a limited power, the limitations contained in it constitute the rule by which it is to be executed. In the execution of a general power there can be no rule but the discretion of the party to whom it is confided." Fronty v. Fronty, Bail. Eq. 529.

We are, therefore, relieved from considering the embarrassing questions which arise out of the relation of technical tenant for life and remainderman. As we understand it, a tenant for life is one who is entitled to the use of property which, at his death, goes over to some one else. The property may consist of particular articles described or of many in one, as a flock of sheep, or a gang of negroes, or a plantation stocked for farming purposes. In each of these classes there is a certain rule of accountability, not always the same, but in all the underlying principle is that it is the property itself that the remainderman is entitled to receive; and as the tenant, while in the use, may have abused or destroyed the property, in that regard he is considered a trustee for the remainderman.

There is no foundation in this case for such relation. The most ample power of disposal was given to the first taker, and the second taker was expressly restricted to what property "remained after the death of Mrs. Griggs." No such relation as that of trustee and cestui que trust in the usual form existed between Mrs. Griggs and Jemima Tedder. It is clear the testator did not intend to make his wife accountable to her niece either for extravagance in the manner of her living, or for want of business habits and economy, or generally for the manner in which she used the property while in her possession. His wife was the first object of his affections, and she was to be made comfortable out of his property if nothing remained of it at her death.

But, conceding as an abstract proposition, that such would have been the result if Mrs. Griggs had retained possession and sold the negroes herself in execution of the power, it is contended that Tedder cannot claim such exception from accountability, for the reason that the deed from Mrs. Griggs to him was not the execution of her power of disposal, but simply the conveyance of a *naked life-estate, and being thus constituted tenant for life without the powers, he falls under the principles applicable in such cases, and, as a consequence, must account for the purchase-money of the slaves sold by him. That is to say, that, although Tedder assumed the responsibility of paying the debts and supporting Mrs. Griggs for life, yet to enable him to do so, no means were conveyed to him except the bare use of the property in its dilapidated condition, with responsibility over to Jemima or her heirs as technical tenant of property belonging to them in remainder.

The first observation suggested by this view is that no life-estate pure and simple was created by this will, and if Tedder held such a position it must have been not under the will of Mr. Griggs, but under the deed of Mrs. Griggs. In such a state of facts, could the plaintiffs, who claim exclusively under the will of Mr. Griggs, go against Tedder in respect to this alleged life-estate? What privity was there between them? But passing over this point let us see what was conveyed to Tedder under the deed of Mrs. Griggs. She had a life-estate in the property and coupled with it an unlimited power of disposal for certain purposes; she found herself unable to manage the property, and in consideration of the payment of the debts and her support she conveyed "all her interest and life-estate in the property to William Tedder, his heirs and assigns forever." Did she mean to convey a bare life-estate or all her rights in the estate, including her power of disposal? A large amount of debt was pressing, some of it in judgment, and a negro hired. Present relief was the object of the arrangement, and the conveyance simply of a life-estate would not have accomplished the purpose. We cannot suppose that at the moment when her need was the greatest she intended to relinquish altogether her power, or to separate the power from the life-estate —conveying the latter and still retaining the former. We think her intention was, in consideration of the payment of the debts and her support, to put Tedder precisely in her place, with all her rights in respect to the property, including the power of disposal.

Did the deed effect that intention? The words are "all my interest and life-estate." No reference in terms is made to the power of disposing, but besides the life-estate she had no other *"interest" in the property, and there is express reference to the property as to which the power existed "in and to all and singular the land, negroes, &c., left to me for life by the last will and testament of William Griggs, deceased." It may be true that the word "interest" was not the technical term to express the idea of a power, but in the ordinary acceptation of the word it was broad enough to cover it; and we think the deed was intended to include the power. The question of the execution of a power is always one of intention, "and if the devisee of the power intends to execute it, that intention, however manifested, whether directly or indirectly, positively or by just implication, will make the execution valid and operative. I agree that the intention to execute the power must be apparent and clear, so that the transaction is not fairly susceptible of any other interpretation." Bilderback v. Boyce, 14 S. C. 540.

Assuming this to be the proper construction of the deed, and considering the nature of the power, we incline to think that it conveyed the whole interest in the estate, subject to the rights of the remainderman, somewhat in analogy to the remarkable case of McAllister v. Tate, 11 Rich. 510 [73 Am. Dec. 119], in which it was held that a devise in the words "in fee-simple for life" carried the absolute estate. So considered, the deed of Mrs. Griggs, according to well-established principles, must be referred to her power of appointment, and not to her life-estate. "When a man has a power and an interest, and he creates an estate which will not have an effectual continuance in point of time, if it be fed out of his interest, it shall take effect by force of the power. As where a tenant for life, with the power to borrow money, granted a rent charge generally as a fund for the payment of the debt, it was deemed an execution of the power, and not a grant out of his interest." 1 Sugd. Pow. 419.

It is insisted, however, that the deed as to all interest beyond the life-estate was ineffectual, for the reason that it did not purport to be the execution of a power, but the transfer of the power itself, which could not from its nature be delegated. It may be that the deed could not pass the power as property, so as, in respect to its execution, to substitute Tedder for Mrs. Griggs. We have seen that the deed may be construed to pass the absolute *estate, subject to the rights of the remainderman, and in that view must be referred to the power, whether it purported to be an execution or not.

But, if we are mistaken in that, we see no great difficulty in construing the deed as a power of attorney, authorizing Tedder to execute the power for and in behalf of Mrs. Griggs. A power may be executed by attorney when it is not of such a character as to impose a personal confidence in the devisee of it to exercise his judgment. At the time the deed to Tedder was executed there was no confidence or option involved in the matter. The debts and the support of Mrs. Griggs were certain and fixed, had to to be provided for, and were referred to in the deed as the very object of its execution. She was not limited to any particular mode of execution, and, having the right herself to provide for them, she could appoint another to do it for her. Tedder's act in selling the negroes was the act of Mrs. Griggs through him, and this receives confirmation from her silent acquiescence from 1859 until 1873, when she died.

"It is frequently contended in practice that a devisee of a power cannot execute a deed of appointment by attorney. But the cases by no means authorize this position. They merely establish that the devisee cannot delegate the confidence and discretion reposed in him to another. There the devisee points out the precise appointment which he is desirous should be made; there no confidence, no discretion is delegated. The appointment is in every respect an exercise of his own judgment, and there cannot be any reason why he should not be permitted to execute the deed of appointment by attorney. The contrary doctrine would lead to great inconvenience. Where, however, a particular mode of execution is required, it would be difficult to support an execution by attorney." 1 Sugd. Pow. 215.

There is still another view of this case. The plaintiffs claim, through Jemima Tedder, under the will of William Griggs, and it would seem that they should be limited to what the will gives them. The second clause of the will is in these words: "After the death of my said wife, Mary Griggs, I give, decree and bequeath whatever portion may be remaining of my said property to Jemima Tedder (wife of William Tedder), to her, her heirs and *assigns forever." The three negroes sold in 1859 were no part of the estate "remaining" in 1873, at the death of Mrs. Griggs, for two reasons, first, that they had been sold during the life of Mrs. Griggs by her authority, and the proceeds of sale applied to the payment of the debts and to the support of her and the family of the said Jemima, including the plaintiff, Mahalie. We see nothing to show that the sale of the negroes was unnecessary, or that the proceeds were not applied as indicated. The plantation, under the control of a widow without business habits, had run down and needed restocking. The debts to be paid amounted to $1,500, and it probably required the whole $2,700 to pay the debts, employ an overseer and refit and begin again; all of which was within the scope of the power in the will. Second. If the negroes had not been sold they could not have constituted any part of the property "remaining" at the death of Mrs. Griggs, for the reason that before that time they had been emancipated and ceased to be property. We do not mean to say that in certain cases the proceeds of property may not be pursued instead of the property itself, but that, under the peculiar provisions of this will, neither the property nor its proceeds can be considered as "remaining" at the death of Mrs. Griggs.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed so far as it required William Tedder to account for the proceeds of the three negroes sold by him, and affirmed in all other respects.

McIVER, A. J., concurred.

SIMPSON, C. J., concurred in the judgment of the court in this case on the last ground stated in the opinion pronounced by Mr. Justice McGOWAN, to wit, the emancipation of the negroes before the falling in of the life-estate.

*(Case No. 1166.)

HAMMOND v. PORT ROYAL AND AUGUSTA RAILWAY COMPANY.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Covenants ⇐68.]

Plaintiff conveyed in fee-simple to a railroad company for its road-bed a strip of land through his plantation, by a deed-poll, which contained the express condition, subsequent, "that the system of drainage shall remain the same as now, and ditches to remain of such a depth as to allow, as heretofore, the drainage of the land to the depth of five feet." This condition was violated by the grantees, and afterwards the railroad was purchased by a new company. Held, that the terms of the deed did not create a covenant running with the land, and there being no personal covenant by the present owners they were not liable to plaintiff in damages for their mere failure to remove obstructions which had been placed in the ditches by the former company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Covenants, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. ⇐68.]

[2. Railroads ⇐72.]

To render the defendants liable it must be shown that the plaintiff's system of drainage had been affected by obstructions caused by defendants, or by them increased.

Plaintiff is not confined to an action to enforce a forfeiture under his deed for condition broken, as the corporations, independently of covenant, are liable for damages done by them to plaintiff's system of drainage; but the defendants' duty was passive—their only obligation was not to obstruct the drainage and to permit plaintiff to keep it up—and, therefore, the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury that the defendants were liable for damages, resulting from their failure to remove the obstructions caused by the acts of the former owners, and to restore the system of drainage as it existed when the deed was executed.

Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, September, 1881.

Action by Paul F. Hammond against the Port Royal and Augusta Railway Company.

To the statement made in the opinion it will be necessary only to add the precise language which raised the points considered by this court.

The motion for non-suit was based, in part, substantially upon the positions taken in the following requests to charge:

1. That the deed of Paul F. Hammond to the Port Royal *Railroad Company, was a conveyance upon condition, without any covenant by the grantee to observe or perform the condition, and did not impose upon the defendant, as assignee of the Port Royal Railroad Company, the duty of preserving intact the plaintiff's system of drainage, or of keeping the ditches to such a depth as to allow the drainage of the plaintiff's land to the depth of five feet, and that the only remedy of the grantor for breach of condition, is to enforce a forfeiture of the estate.

2. That the defendants cannot be made responsible for any injury except that occasioned by their own acts of commission or omission, and that the plaintiff is not, therefore, entitled to recover such a sum as would restore the ditches on plaintiff's land to the condition they were in on May 22d, 1872, but only such a sum as would be necessary to restore the ditches to the condition they were in on October 1st, 1878.

3. If the jury find from the testimony that the obstructions to the drainage were put there by the Port Royal Railroad Company prior to October 1st, 1878, no action would lie against the defendants for continuing the nuisance until they had been requested to remove the obstructions and had refused or neglected to do so.

The judge declined to charge in this form. He did charge, "that in order for the plaintiff to recover you must find that the system of drainage on the Cathwood plantation, which existed May 22d, 1872, was obstructed by the Port Royal Railroad Company (the first corporation), and that such obstructions were continued by the present defendant company, after they acquired the property and franchise of the said railroad company and after they were requested by the plaintiff to remove them. Such request may be either in express words or implied from the conduct of the parties." His Honor further instructed the jury: "If the present defendant company did acquire the title and possession under the grantees, under the said deed from the plaintiff, dated May 22d, 1872, they are bound to perform all the conditions set forth in that deed in relation to the system of drainage of the Cathwood plantation, and are responsible for any injury done to the plaintiff attributable to their failure to perform such duty upon the request or demand of the plaintiff, which request or demand may be either in express words or by impli*cation from the circumstances or conduct of the parties. It was incumbent under that deed upon the grantees and their assigns holding the land therein conveyed to them to maintain the system of drainage as it then existed on the Cathwood plantation, so far as it depended upon the transmission of the water across the land therein conveyed to them. In their use of the land they were to take care that this was not impeded, but that the drainage was to be preserved in such a condition that the ditches should remain of such a depth as to allow, as theretofore, the drainage of the land on the Cathwood place to the depth of five feet at all times."

The exceptions, following the language of the charge and requests to charge, allege error on the part of the judge in these particulars.

It is conceded that the grantees would have taken this land burdened with the duty of so constructing their road as not to interfere with Hammond's drainage, if the deed had been silent upon this subject. 5 Rich. 415. But the duty which this easement imposed was entirely passive. Washb. Easm. *564–9; 12 Mass. 65; 30 Me. 100. It is clear then that neither the grantee nor its assignee are liable except for obstructing the drainage, unless the deed makes them so. But this deed did not create a covenant running with the land. 15 S. C. 33. The condition here is not a covenant, and the grantor's only remedy for condition broken is to enforce the forfeiture. 11 N. Y. 387. It, therefore, follows, that there was here an implied reservation to the grantor of a right to maintain his system of drainage, with a condition which enabled him to enforce a forfeiture if his easement was obstructed; that it was the grantor's duty to maintain his system on his own land and on the railroad land, and the grantees and their assignees must refrain from doing any act which would prevent him.

The nuisance here was not created by defendants, but merely continued as they found it, and, therefore, the plaintiff must *allege and prove notice to the defendants of the existence of the nuisance, the extent of it, and a request to abate or remove it before action could be brought. 5 Rep. 100; Willes 583;

As there were no facts in this case from which a request or demand might be implied "from the circumstances or conduct of the parties," the charge was erroneous and calculated to mislead the jury. Instructions not relevant to the facts of a case constitute error in the charge. Thomp. Char. Jur. 92, 93.

March 14th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. On May 22d, 1872, the plaintiff executed a deed to the Port Royal Railroad Company for a strip of land two hundred feet wide and about one mile and a half in length, running through a tract of land known as the Cathwood plantation. The estate conveyed by this deed was upon certain conditions, the only one with which we are at present concerned being expressed in the following language: "To have and to hold the said strip of land * * * unto the said party of the second part, their successors and assigns, forever: provided always, and this deed is upon the express conditions. * * * *2. That the system of drainage shall remain the same as now, except that such ditches as have been filled up by the party of the second part are to be reopened by them, and ditches to remain of such a depth as to allow, as heretofore, the drainage of the land to the depth of five feet." This deed, though characterized in the recital as an indenture, was signed only by the plaintiff, and must be regarded as a deed-poll.

All the property of the Port Royal Railroad Company was sold and the defendant company became the purchaser and went into possession in October, 1878, the deed being dated the third of that month, though the sale was not confirmed until May 23d, 1879. On June 23d, 1879, this action was commenced, in which the plaintiff alleged two causes of action. Under the first the plaintiff sought to recover possession of the strip of land above mentioned upon the ground that the conditions upon which the land was conveyed had been broken and that thereby the estate of the grantee was forfeited. The second cause of action was alleged in the following words: "That said defendants having wrongfully taken possession of said tract of land aforesaid, have continued the construction and running of a railroad through the same, and because of the negligent construction of said road-bed, the culverts, trestles and mud-sills, so continued negligently and unlawfully, said defendants have damaged and almost completely destroyed the system of drainage which existed on the plantation of Cathwood aforesaid, by closing up and obstructing the ditches and canals which supported said system, thus causing to the plaintiff the loss of his crops and great deterioration in the value of his land, to the damage of the plaintiff eight thousand dollars."

The defendant demurred to so much of the complaint as set out the second cause of action upon the ground that the facts therein stated were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled and the case went to trial before a jury, who rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the land and for a large amount as damages. Upon appeal, this court held (15 S. C. 10) that the above-mentioned deed did create an estate upon condition, but as it was conceded that there had been no such entry or claim by the plaintiff before this action was commenced as would revest the plaintiff with the title, that the *action to recover possession of the land could not be maintained. It was also held, that the demurrer was properly overruled, but a new trial was ordered on the second cause of action because the Circuit judge refused to charge as requested by the defendant—"that the jury could not find damages for anything done prior to the possession of the defendant"—this court holding that the charge as given to the jury was calculated to mislead them as to this point.

When the case came on for a new trial, the defendant, at the close of the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, moved for a nonsuit upon various grounds, which motion being refused, the case went to the jury, the defendant declining to offer any evidence, and a verdict for eight thousand dollars was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant now renews the motion for a nonsuit here, and appeals on the ground that the Circuit judge refused to charge any of the several propositions as submitted by the defendant, and upon exceptions to various propositions of law charged by the judge. Under the view which we take of the case, it will not be necessary to consider the several grounds of appeal seriatim.

The complaint in setting out the second cause of action substantially alleges that the defendant by continuing the construction and running of a railroad through the said strip of land had damaged and almost completely destroyed the system of drainage which previously existed on Cathwood plantation by closing up and obstructing the ditches and canals which constituted a part of such system. If these allegations were true, then the plaintiff had a good cause of action, for they practically amounted to an allegation that the defendant had obstructed the drainage of plaintiff's land by closing up certain ditches necessary to secure that end. Hence, the demurrer to that portion of the complaint which set out the second cause of action was properly overruled, because such demurrer admitted the truth of the facts as alleged in the complaint, and if those allegations were true, then the plaintiff did have a cause of action.

It seems to us that the fundamental inquiry in this case is whether the present defendant was under any obligation to remove the obstructions which had been placed in the ditches *across the said strip of land by the former company, and, if not, whether the present defendant had done any act tending to increase the obstructions placed in said ditches by the former company or to prevent the plaintiff from removing the same.

The defendant bought the strip of land subject to the right of the plaintiff to drain Cathwood plantation through the ditches across said strip, and must hold it subject to that easement. But this would not impose any obligation upon the defendant to remove any obstructions which may have been placed in said ditches by another, unless there was some personal covenant or some covenant running with the land binding the defendant to keep said ditches open and free from obstructions. There is no pretense that there was any such personal covenant on the part of the defendant, and the only inquiry, therefore, is whether the terms of the deed from the plaintiff to the former company created such a covenant running with the land as would bind the defendant to keep the ditches open and free from obstructions, to the depth necessary to maintain the system of drainage originally established by the plaintiff. This court has already decided that said deed created an estate upon condition; and although there are cases in which a deed has been held to contain both a condition and a covenant, yet in those cases it will be found that there are words, either expressly or by necessary implication, creating a covenant and that the deed is in the form of an indenture and not a deed-poll. See the former decision in this case (15 S. C. 19), and also the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, rendered at October Term, 1881, in the case of Hale v. Finch, 104 U. S. 261 [26 L. Ed. 732].

Here, the deed contains no words expressly creating a covenant, and there are none which necessarily imply one. The words relied on are contained in a deed-poll and not in an indenture, and there is nothing to bind the grantee to the performance of any covenant. We do not mean to say that in no case can a covenant binding the grantee be created by a deed-poll, but only mention the form of the deed as one of the circumstances going to negative the idea that the intention was to create a covenant in this case. As was very pertinently said by the Chief Justice in delivering the former opinion in this case: "If Hammond had *intended to rely for his protection upon a covenant by the grantee, would he not have taken a separate instrument properly prepared and executed? The fact that he did not do this affords a strong presumption that he preferred the right to enforce forfeiture as the most effectual means of protection."

It follows from this that the mere failure of the defendant to remove the obstructions which had been placed in the ditches by the former company affords no cause of action against the present company. The plaintiff must go further and show that by some act of the defendant the plaintiff's system of drainage has been obstructed, or that the obstructions caused by the former company have been increased.

We do not think that the plaintiff's only remedy was to enforce a forfeiture of the estate, for even in the absence of any covenant binding the defendant to keep the ditches open through the said strip of land, the defendant might under this action be made liable for any damages resulting from any act of the defendant which tended to injure the plaintiff's system of drainage, or impair its efficiency. The jury should, therefore, have been instructed to inquire whether the defendant had in any way obstructed the drainage or increased the obstructions caused by the acts of the former company, and, if so, to give such damages as resulted from such acts of the defendant. But we think that the Circuit judge was in error in saying to the jury, in effect, that the defendant was liable for any damages caused by the failure to remove the obstructions caused by the acts of the former company and "to restore the system of drainage as it existed on May 22d, 1872." The duty of defendant was simply passive, not active, and its only obligation was not to obstruct the system of drainage originally established by the plaintiff, and to permit the plaintiff to keep up that system.

Under this view of the case the other questions suggested by the grounds of appeal cannot properly arise, and need not, therefore, be considered.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

In action for assault and battery committed on the person of plaintiff while the parties were engaged in a contest over the ownership of a horse, which was found by the plaintiff in a public place and peaceably taken into her actual possession in defendant's view, the Circuit judge did not err in charging the jury that the owner of the property could resist any attempt to take it away, but that he must not commit an assault and battery, or breach of the peace—if he did so, he was liable.

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, October, 1881.

Action by Abigail J. Harris against Samuel Marco, demanding $5,000 damages, for assault and battery and false imprisonment, committed by defendant on the person of plaintiff on December 22d, 1879.

The second exception correctly states the ruling of the Circuit judge and the matters connected therewith. The plaintiff stated in his proposed case the charge of the judge complained of in his first exception. To this defendant proposed an amendment which was submitted to Judge Wallace for settlement. The settlement was as follows: "The difference between counsel in this case relates to the terms of the charge to the jury upon one point. I cannot recall at this distance in time, with absolute certainty, the precise terms of an extemporaneous charge. Of course, whatever was said was intended to have relation to the facts of the particular case. It was not disputed that plaintiff had hold of the bridle reins on the horse when defendant ap*proached her. On this state of facts, together with the other facts that appear in the brief, I charged the jury, among other things, 'that the owner of the property could resist any attempt to take it away, but that he must not commit an assault and battery or breach of the peace. If he did so, he was liable.'"

He further charged, at the request of plaintiff's counsel, that the wealth of the defendant was a proper matter for the jury to consider in making up their verdict, without explanation and without further words in that connection. There was, however, no request on the part of defendant for further explanation.

This is all of the charge that the brief contains.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, for appellant.

Mr. G. W. Dargan, contra.

MARCH 14th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. The plaintiff seeks to recover damages for an alleged assault and battery and false imprisonment committed by the defendant.

The facts are briefly as follows: Holly Harris, the husband of the plaintiff, on the morning of the day of the difficulty carried into Darlington village a bag of cotton. He drove up in front of the store of the defendant, and, unhitching his horse from the cart, left them standing on the public square, while he crossed the square to see some one on business. When he left he called to the defendant to take charge of the horse until he returned. The plaintiff, who was living apart from her husband, finding the horse standing as above described and claiming it as her property, walked up and seized the bridle and was in the act of leading the horse off, when, defendant's attention being attracted, he ran out and resisted. Holly Harris returned in a few minutes, when the defendant retired, leaving the struggle to Harris. This was kept up during the greater part of the day between man and wife, until in the evening these parties were found in an enclosure behind defendant's store, with the contest still undecided, when defendant shut the gate and kept them confined until after *dark, when he unlocked the gate and released them. The plaintiff finally gave up the struggle and yielded possession to her husband.

The above is a skeleton of the case; the filling up on the one side by the plaintiff, of the aggravating circumstances accompanying the injury of which she complained, and the palliations in the defense, were matters of testimony and need not be particularly stated, as the questions of law involved in the appeal do not depend upon these facts. The defendant, in his testimony, at one time stated that Holly Harris had left the horse in his charge when he crossed the square. Afterwards, he corrected himself and said that Harris had delivered the horse to him that morning under a bill of sale. After full testimony, the jury found for the plaintiff one thousand dollars. The defendant moved for a new trial, which was refused. He then appealed, on the following grounds:

"1. Because the presiding judge charged the jury that while the owner of property could resist any attempt to take his property in his view, in making such resistance he must not commit an assault and battery or breach of the peace.

"2. Because when defendant's counsel proposed to question the plaintiff when upon the stand, as to the alleged wrongful taking of a bale of cotton a few days previous to the assault and battery and false imprisonment charged in the complaint, stating that the taking of the said cotton was connected with the alleged assault and battery and false imprisonment, and would show the animus of the parties, plaintiff and defendant, his Honor refused permission to ask the said question on the ground of irrelevancy.

"3. Because his Honor charged the jury, that the wealth of the defendant is a proper matter for the jury to consider in making up their verdict, without giving any explanation as to the contingency under which, and the purposes for which, the wealth of the defendant might properly be considered." In all of which the defendant respectfully submitted that his Honor erred.

While the charge of the judge as to the point embraced in the first exception, if it stood alone and independent of the facts and circumstances of the case, might be too broad and general, yet *when applied to the case then under consideration, we do not think there was error. It would be too wide to say, that under no circumstances could one be held excusable for committing an assault and battery or breach of the peace, in resisting an attempt to take his property, in his view, where property is in one's enclosure, or in his house, but not in his actual manual possession, and in that sense simply in his view only. It would not do to say, that he could not resist the taking of that property, by a robber or other person without claim, even to the extent of all necessary violence. The law is not unreasonable, and in such case it would not impose restriction.

But, where there is a contest over title to property, and one of the claimants gets actual possession peaceably, either by finding it in some public place, or otherwise, the other cannot retake it by violence. He must resort to the law, and, though the delay may be dangerous, yet the public peace is more important than his private interests, and this requires that he should stay his hand. He may interfere, if the property is taken in his view, but he must stop short of a breach of the peace. The law will not allow him to commit an assault and battery on the other party over and above, molliter manus imposuit. Davis v. Whitridge, 2 Strobh. 240; State v. Lazarus, 1 Mill Con. R. 34.

The charge of a judge on appeal should never be considered abstractly. This would be unjust and would frequently put him in error, when in fact there was no error. In this case we do not suppose that Judge Wallace intended to convey the idea that no one could resist, in the broad language found in this exception. But he was charging to the case, and this case was one where the property in dispute was found in the public square of a village, almost in overt market. One claimant, not with a strong hand, but peaceably, had gotten actual manual possession, which was legal, and when in the act of leading the horse off, the other, who was in view, resists, and in resisting commits an assault and battery. Under this state of facts, we think his charge was correct, and is sustained by the cases already referred to. See, also, 2 Greenl. Ev. § 95.

The second exception objects to the exclusion of certain testimony offered by the defendant, on the ground of irrelevancy. *An important rule of evidence is, that the testimony must be confined to the issue; when, therefore, testimony is offered of an independent fact not connected with the issue, it is not error to exclude it on the ground of irrelevancy. This rule, it is true, should be liberally interpreted and enforced. Counsel may see the pertinency of a fact, when this might escape a judge.

But, where the testimony is pertinent, if objected to, its pertinency should be shown. Here, it does not seem to us that the fact attempted to be proved had any connection whatever with the case. It was a matter which occurred days before, and with which the defendant was in no way, as we can see, concerned. Nor do we find anything in the argument showing its relevancy to the question at issue. We find no error, therefore, in its exclusion.

The third exception is in conflict with Rowe v. Moses, 9 Rich. 426 [67 Am. Dec.

560], and the cases there cited, and must be overruled.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Kershaw, September 1879.

Action by Mary A. R. Lupo and others, the children and heirs-at-law of Rebecca Copeland, against James H. True, Henry Moak, Andrew Moak and Jonathan Page. True was the party in possession of the land, Jonathan Page, it was alleged, held a mortgage on the property, and the Moaks were heirs-at-law of Laban W. Moak. The action was commenced in March, 1876. The pleadings are sufficiently stated in the opinion, and the nature of the plaintiff's claim is there set forth. The defendant, True, claimed possession by permission of the owner under a title traced back to Laban W. Moak, who took the deed which the plaintiffs claimed was by operation of law a trust for their mother. This deed was dated November 3d, 1849. Soon afterwards, Moses Copeland (husband of Rebecca), and then Rebecca, died. Laban W. Moak sold the land to Cook, in 1854, for $400. Cook not knowing of the trust, but a tenant then being in possession of the land who was put there by Moak with the statement that it was his sister's land. Cook sold to Dunlap, Dunlap to Kennedy, Kennedy to Hogan, Hogan to Mrs. True, the husband of defendant, Mrs. True to Gerald about the time this action was commenced, but possession not taken until afterwards. Neither Mrs. True nor Gerald were parties. There were alleged defects in defendant's title, not necessary to state, as the court has not considered them.

It was referred to a referee to take testimony, and upon the testimony by him reported, the cause came on for a hearing, when a jury was empaneled as stated in the opinion.

*The Circuit decree made a statement of facts, and continued as follows:

After the whole testimony was read, the counsel moved to dismiss the complaint as to the defendant Page, upon the ground that at the commencement of the action Page had no interest in the suit, he having marked satisfied his mortgage upon the land, and delivered it up to Mrs. True, the mortgagor; and that though he had filed a joint answer, with the defendant, True, setting up title to the land, that, in point of fact, he had instructed his counsel not to answer, defending the action, but to have him dismissed as a party defendant. This answer was not sworn to, neither was the complaint. Notice of this motion having been served on the plaintiffs in ample time, with proof of mistaken action upon the part of counsel in answering the action, and the proof thereof being satisfactory to the court, it was ordered that the complaint be dismissed as to the defendant, Jonathan Page, without costs; nothwithstanding plaintiff's attorney resisted the motion.

The court finds, as matter of law, that the plaintiffs cannot sustain their action. Their failure to bring home notice of the trust to the aliences of Laban W. Moak, the alleged trustee, or of any fact to put the purchasers upon inquiry as to any trust resulting to the ancestress of plaintiffs by reason of the alleged purchase of said land by Laban W. Moak with her money, is fatal to their recovery. It is proper also to add, that to the mind of the court the evidence going to establish the trust was unsatisfactory.

The plaintiffs contended, that if the defendants relied upon their being purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, that they should have alleged the same in their answer. The court, in reply, said that if the complaint had shown that there was a written declaration of the trust, such as was evidenced by a deed, will, or any writing duly recorded setting forth the same; or that the holding of the land by the trustee was attended with circumstances of a public nature that evidenced its character; or that the trust was a matter of public notoriety, so that any person dealing with the property, by the exercise of ordinary caution or prudence in making proper inquiries, could have ascertained *the truth and thus been put on their guard: then the position of plaintiffs would have force. But that the complaint, so far from showing that the land was held in trust, set forth the fact itself that there was an absolute conveyance of the land in fee from Wiley Albert to Laban W. Moak by deed duly recorded; but alleged that Laban W. Moak had purchased the land with his sister's money, and held it in trust for her and her children.

The court ruled that the defendants having denied the alleged trust or title of plaintiffs' ancestress, Rebecca Copeland, and having set up title in those under whom they claimed possession, the plaintiffs were bound to make out their own case; and, therefore, the burden of proof rested upon them to establish the trust, as well as to show notice of it.

It is, therefore, ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the complaint of the plaintiffs be dismissed with costs to the defendants.

There were fourteen exceptions to this decree, but only the following were considered by this court:

1. Because the decree erroneously holds that by the pleadings it devolved upon the plaintiffs to prove a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiffs' ancestress, and notice thereof to the defendants.

2. Because the decree erroneously holds that the defendants denied the trust and claimed to hold under aliences in fee, who were purchasers for valuable consideration from Laban W. Moak; and even if this was so, it could not avail them, unless they denied all notice of the trust prior to this purchase, which they did not do.

9. Because the decree continually holds that the defendants denied the trust and set up the title in those under whom they claimed, which is contrary to what the pleadings show. They did not deny the trust, and founded their claim explicitly on the title deed of Wiley Albert to Laban W. Moak and continuous occupancy under it.

10. Because the decree holds that the averment in the answer, mixed up with the plea of the Statute of Limitations, "that the plaintiffs' ancestress never did have legal seizin of the premises in question or any right to the possession of the same," threw the burden on the plaintiffs of establishing the resulting trust and notice of it to the defendants.

*11. Because the decree permits the defendants to avail themselves of the defense of being purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, when they set up no such defense in their answer.

12. Because the court should have confined the defendants to their plea of the Statute of Limitations, and have also held that as they, in their answer, founded their claim upon the deed of Wiley Albert to Laban W. Moak, they could not occupy any better position thereunder than Moak could himself.

13. Because the decree dismissed the complaint as to the defendant Page, upon his disclaimer of any interest in the land at the commencement of the suit.

14. Because the decree dismissed the complaint, with the costs to the defendants, when one of the defendants had previously been discharged from the action without costs, on his disclaimer of having any interest therein.

Messrs. Chesnut & Workman, for appellants.

Mr. W. D. Trantham, contra.

March 14th, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

SIMPSON, C. J. The plaintiffs, appellants, heirs-at-law of Rebecca Copeland, deceased, instituted this action against the respondents, alleging in their complaint, that some time prior to November 3d, 1849, one Laban W. Moak, a brother of the said Rebecca Copeland, had in his hands a certain sum of money belonging to the said Rebecca; that at her request, and to preserve the same from the marital rights of her husband, the said Moak bought with this money a tract of land, lying in Kershaw county, containing some five hundred acres; that the deed from the grantor, Wiley Albert, was executed to the said Moak in fee and without trust; that she was placed in possession and so remained until her death, confiding in her brother as her friend and adviser to protect her rights; that not long after the death of the said Rebecca, the plaintiffs, her children, who were then minors of tender years, were taken by the said Moak, their *uncle, to Lexington county, where they were brought up in ignorance of their rights as to the land, until within less than four years before the commencement of their action; that at the death of their mother the land was taken possession of by Moak; that defendant is now wrongfully in possession and has been for four years; that defendant Page wrongfully claims an interest therein; that the rents and profits are reasonably worth $100 per annum. Wherefore they prayed judgment, that defendants, Henry Moak and Andrew Moak, execute titles to plaintiffs; that plaintiffs be let into immediate possession, and that defendant True pay to the plaintiffs four hundred dollars for the use and occupation thereof, and for costs.

The Moak defendants, who are the heirs-at-law of Laban W. Moak, made default. But the defendants True and Page, answered, denying that Rebecca Copeland "ever had legal seizin of the premises or any right to the possession thereof;" that defendant True entered under claim of title in fee, founding this claim upon a written instrument, to wit, a deed from one Wiley Albert, executed on November 3d, 1849; that there had been a "continued occupation and possession of said premises under this claim for more than twenty years last before this action, by the defendants, and those under whom they claimed; that they deny the truth of each and every allegation inconsistent with what is herein stated."

At the hearing, the complaint was dismissed as to Page, upon affidavits that he had no interest in the land and that he had answered by mistake. The cause was referred to a referee, and a jury was empaneled to aid the court in reaching a conclusion. It does not appear in the brief what verdict the jury rendered. But the presiding judge found as matter of fact that the evidence going to show the resulting trust under which the plaintiffs claimed was not satisfactory, and even if the trust were established, that the plaintiffs had failed to bring notice thereof home to the defendants, which, he held as a matter of law, devolved upon them. On these grounds he dismissed the complaint. The appeal questions the correctness of this ruling:

First, as to the finding of fact by the judge, that the resulting trust had not been established; and, second, as to the proposition *of law, that it devolved upon the plaintiff to bring home to the defendants notice of such trust, if it existed.

The complaint states fully the facts out of which the plaintiffs claim that the trust originated. If these facts, thus alleged in the complaint, had been denied in the answer, thus raising a direct issue as to their truth, and testimony had been admitted upon such issue, then the finding of fact by the judge would hardly be disturbed, certainly not under the decisions of this State so often cited, unless it was clearly and patently against the evidence. But the allegations in the complaint, which, if true, assuredly raised a trust as between the original parties in favor of Mrs. Copeland, were not denied in the answer. The answer simply claimed title in the defendants, even that not very clearly, and denied as a legal conclusion that Mrs. Copeland ever had legal seizin or any right to possession. This, if true, did not controvert the positive allegations in the complaint of the facts, herein above stated, and which gave rise to the trust.

The defendants, then, not having denied these allegations, either generally or specially, they stood as admitted, (Code § 191,) and being admitted, the trust was established as against the defendants. The error of the judge was not in his finding of fact as to the existence of the trust, upon the testimony before him, but in regarding that as an open question, under the pleadings as they then stood, and requiring further testimony thereto besides the admissions of defendants in their answer. Mr. Pomeroy, section 617, in treating of failure to deny in the answer the allegations of the complaint, says: "Such allegations are admitted to be true, and the plaintiff need not prove any material allegation so conceded to be true. Evidence in contradiction of them cannot be received, and a finding of fact in opposition to such admissions will be disregarded and set aside on appeal."

2. Did the judge err in holding that it devolved upon the plaintiffs to prove that the defendants had notice of the trust?

It is always necessary for a plaintiff to make out his case, and when the facts alleged by him are denied, he must prove them to the satisfaction of the jury, or the court, as the case may be. Here plaintiffs' cause of action consisted in defendants depriving them of the benefit of a certain tract of land, to which they *claimed they were entitled by virtue of a resulting trust in favor of their mother.

The essential facts in this cause of action, at least until the defense appeared, were, first, the existence of the trust, and, second, the deprivation of possession. These facts the plaintiffs proved; what else, before defense, could they be required to prove? They could not be expected to anticipate the defendants' ground of defense and to attempt to destroy it in advance. It was time enough for them to do this when such defense was interposed.

The defense of bona fide purchase without notice is in many cases a good defense, but it is not one which the law raises and presumes to exist, like the presumption of innocence in criminal cases. On the contrary, it must be presented and made out by the party who attempts to shield himself with it. In this case this defense is not set up in the answer, and under the pleadings it is doubtful whether the defendants could have legally introduced evidence to sustain it, even if they had desired to do so, much less that the plaintiffs should have been required to anticipate it and to meet it.

Defenses are of two classes: first, denials of plaintiff's allegations, either general or special, and thereby raising a direct issue as to their truth; and, second, the interposition of what is called "new matter," that is, the averment of facts different from those alleged in the complaint, and not embraced within the judicial inquiry into their truth. This latter class being also divided into two classes, to wit, those which are defensive, and which, if true, bars the plaintiff's right of action, (Pomeroy § 593,) and those which set up an independent cause of action in favor of the defendant, as counterclaim, &c.

Both of the original classes may be set up in the same answer; when so done, however, they should not be mixed together, but should appear in separate and distinct paragraphs. When the defendant relies in his answer upon but one of these defenses, for example, a denial, then, as a general rule, his testimony must be confined to the issue raised by such defense. Pomeroy §§ 690–91.

In fact, the tendency of the decisions in most of the States where the code has been adopted, is to a rigid and universal *application of this rule. How far this principle shall be applied in this State it is not now necessary to determine, but we will say that the rule is logical in its character, and, if closely adhered to, would be highly beneficial.

But where denial is not relied upon, on the contrary the defendant stands upon "new matter," admitting the allegations of the complaint, he must aver his new matter in his answer, otherwise it is not properly in the case, and no testimony in reference to it will be admitted. Pomeroy § 706.

Here the defendants admitted the plaintiffs' cause of action, but failed to set up the new matter upon which the case turned, to wit, "Innocent purchaser without notice," and yet the plaintiffs' action was dismissed because he did not rebut this defense in advance of its being presented, or any prima facie showing made of its truth. The defense of bona fide purchase without notice is an equitable defense, must be set out in the answer, and must be sustained by the party who erects it as a shield. Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 288; 2 Abb. For. 167, note; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (Hare & W.) 119–120; White & T. Lead. Cas. 102.

We think the Circuit judge erred in his rulings, both as to the fact of the existence of the trust, and as to the legal necessity of plaintiff's proving that defendants had notice thereof.

We think that the complaint was properly dismissed as to the defendant Page, upon the showing made. The other exceptions raise no question requiring the opinion of this court.

The judgment of this court is that the order of the Circuit Court dismissing the complaint be reversed, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

[This case is also cited in Brown v. Atlanta & C. A. L. Ry. Co., 19 S. C. 39, as to facts.]

Before Wallace, J., Spartanburg, March, 1880.

This was an action commenced February 5th, 1880, by R. T. Wilson & Co., Gustav Dambman and the Navassa Guano Company against the Atlanta and Charlotte Airline Railway Company. The complaint demanded $2,200 damages for the negligent burning of thirty-three bales of cotton belonging to the plaintiffs at Gaffney City, in Spartanburg county, on November 2d, 1879. The cotton was on a platform belonging to the town, near the railroad track. It had not been delivered to the railway company.

W. J. Duncan, agent for the plaintiffs, testified that plaintiffs jointly owned the cotton; that the burnt bales contained 16,005 pounds of middling, worth at that time ten and a quarter cents per pound, but such cotton had since sold at twelve and three-quarters cents. The fire broke out on top of the cotton within a few minutes after the eastward bound passenger train had left the depot, after a stay of twenty minutes for dinner. The distance of the engine from this platform, whether it emitted sparks or not, and whether parties were at the same time sitting upon these bales smoking cigars, were matters upon which the testimony was conflicting.

*Defendant made certain requests to charge, which are correctly stated in the exceptions. Other matters are given in the opinion.

His Honor charged the jury as follows:

In this case there are three plaintiffs suing jointly, and the jury must be satisfied they were joint owners of the cotton alleged to have been burnt. If they were not joint owners they cannot recover, and the verdict must be for the defendant. If you find that they were joint owners, you must next inquire, first, how was it burned? If you find that the agents of defendant did not burn the cotton, then you must find for the defendant. Defendant is liable only in case of negligence. Defendant had the legal right to run its trains over their road. Defendant must have proper equipments on its trains. If trains are properly equipped and fires occur, and that is proved and no more, it would be no negligence, but accident, and defendant would not be liable. Negligence is absence of due care in performing any act. If any act is done in pursuing a right, and injury occur in the absence of due care, the defendant would be liable. If anything is done in pursuance of a right that common prudence forbids, defendant would be liable, because it would be negligence. To make it negligence the defendant must have been doing an act that, under all the circumstances of the particular case, the plain suggestion of prudence would forbid.

Verdict for plaintiffs for $1,686.73.

A motion on the minutes for a new trial was refused, and defendant appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because of error in that the Circuit judge erred in overruling the objection of defendant's counsel to the statement of W. J. Duncan as to quantity and ownership of the cotton, when such quantity and ownership was, he testified, shown by his books, the books themselves not being produced.

2. Because the Circuit judge erred in not instructing the jury, as requested by defendant's counsel, that, as a matter of law, Gustav Dambman was not a joint owner with the other plaintiffs in the cotton.

3. Because the Circuit judge erred in not instructing the jury, as requested by defendant's counsel, that, as a matter of law, the

*Navassa Guano Company was not a joint owner with the other plaintiffs in the cotton.

4. Because the Circuit judge erred in not instructing the jury, as requested by defendant's counsel, that, as a matter of law, from the proof made by the plaintiffs, none of them were joint owners in the cotton.

5. Because the Circuit judge erred in not instructing the jury, as requested, "that if the jury find from the evidence that the defendant corporation was provided with the most approved machinery for protection against fire, and that said machinery was worked by competent and careful employés, they will find for the defendant."

7. Because of error in that the Circuit judge refused the motion for a new trial when the evidence was uncontradicted that the defendant corporation had provided the most improved machinery for the protection against fire, and said machinery was worked by careful, prudent and competent employés.

Messrs. W. E. Earle, D. R. Duncan, and Wells, Orr & Westmoreland, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, and J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

March 15th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by McIVER, A. J. This was an action to recover damages for the destruction of thirty-three bales of cotton alleged to have been burned by the negligence of the defendant company. The cotton was deposited near the railroad track for shipment, but had not been receipted for by the agent of the company when it was destroyed by fire.

The first question raised by the appeal is as to the competency of certain testimony adduced for the purpose of showing that the plaintiffs were joint owners of the cotton. The witness, Duncan, testified that he was the agent of all the plaintiffs and that the cotton "was owned by the three companies in common." Afterwards, in reply to a question propounded by defendant's counsel, he said, "My books show how the cotton was owned," where*upon the counsel for defendant "objected to the statement as to ownership of the cotton in the absence of the books," which objection was overruled and the defendant excepted.

The exception seemed to be based upon the assumption that the witness spoke of the ownership of the cotton from his books only, but there is no foundation for such an assumption. The witness did not say, either expressly or by implication, that he derived his knowledge as to the ownership of the cotton from his book entries, but, on the contrary, testified positively that the plaintiffs were joint owners; and it was only in reply to a question of defendant's counsel that he stated that this fact, which he had previously testified to as within his own knowledge, likewise appeared upon his books. He nowhere refers to the books as the source of his knowledge, and it cannot be pretended that the ownership could only be proved by the books. There was, therefore, no foundation for this exception.

The second, third and fourth grounds of appeal complain of error on the part of the Circuit judge in not instructing the jury, as matter of law, that the plaintiffs were not joint owners of the cotton. This he could not do without invading the province of the jury. There was testimony tending to show that they were joint owners, and the question whether the testimony was sufficient to establish the fact was solely for the jury. All that the judge could properly do was to leave the question of fact to the jury, instructing them, as he did most explicitly, that unless the testimony satisfied them that the plaintiffs were joint owners of the cotton, they could not recover. These grounds cannot be sustained.

The fifth and seventh grounds of appeal may be considered together, as they raise, substantially, the same question. Did the facts that the company had provided its engines with the most approved appliances for preventing the escape of sparks from the smoke-stacks, and had employed competent and careful persons to run the engines, preclude the further inquiry, whether, upon the particular occasion in question, there had been negligence on the part of any of the employés of the company causing the damage of which the plaintiffs complained? These facts would certainly create a very strong presumption in *favor of the company, but it will not do to say that they would be absolutely conclusive that there was no negligence, and that the judge should, as matter of law, have instructed the jury that proof of these facts would relieve the company from the charge of negligence. This could only be upon the assumption that competent and careful persons always exercise their skill in a careful manner, and are never negligent in the discharge of their duties—an assumption which is contradicted by experience.

Negligence, as is said in the case of Scott v. Crews, 2 S. C. 531, and the authorities there cited, is a mixed question of law and fact. Whether a person has been guilty of negligence in a particular case is to be determined, first, by ascertaining what constitutes negligence; second, whether the evidence in such case shows that he has done or omitted to do any act which would constitute negligence thus defined. The first is a matter for the court, and the second for the jury.

Here, it was the duty of the Circuit judge to define negligence by explaining to the jury what would constitute it, and then leave it for the jury to say whether the defendant, by its employés, had done or omitted to do any act, the doing or omission of which would constitute negligence as thus defined. This duty was fully performed, for the Circuit judge, after explaining to the jury what would constitute negligence, in terms to which no exception has been taken, explicitly instructed them that the defendant could not be made liable unless such negligence was established by the evidence. In fact, he went further and said to the jury that "if trains are properly equipped and fires occur, and that is proved and no more, it would be no negligence but accident, and defendant would not be liable." There was, therefore, no error of law, as charged, in either of these grounds of appeal.

The sixth ground alleges error, because the jury, by their verdict, allowed interest on the value of the cotton. This ground should properly have been presented on a motion addressed to the Circuit judge for a new trial, for it does not appear that there was any request for any instruction to the jury upon this point, or that any instruction was given. It, however, could not be sustained, even if it had been properly presented. The *verdict does not find interest eo nomine, but it is simply for a gross sum, which either may or may not include interest. The action was for damages, and in arriving at the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff, interest could be assessed by the jury as part of the damages. Kyle v. The Laurens Railroad Company, 10 Rich. 387 [70 Am. Dec. 231]. If the jury had undertaken to allow interest eo nomine, it may be that, under the case of Ancrum v. Stone, 2 Speers 594, there might have been ground for the exception, but that is not the case here.

The eighth ground of appeal presents no question of law and need not be considered. Indeed, this, as well as the sixth ground, seem to have been abandoned, as neither of them were alluded to in the argument.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Spartanburg, October, 1880.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellants.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

March 15th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

McIVER, A. J. This was an action on a note under seal, of which the following is a copy:

"By the first of November next, we or either of us, promise to pay . or bearer, the sum of eighty-five dollars, value received in mule, this March 30th, 1879.

"Witness our hands and seals, with interest from date.

(Signed.) "Diana Williams, [L. S.]
"A. J. Williams, [L. S.]
"W. D. O'Shields, [L. S.]
"R. M. Smith." [L. S.]

The circumstances attending the signing of this note were as follows: Mrs. Diana Williams had contracted for the purchase of a mule from a certain drover, whose name she could not recall, and had agreed to give a note, with sureties, for the same. Accordingly, the above-mentioned note was signed by her as principal, with the other defendants as sureties, she, at the time, agreeing to secure her sureties from ultimate loss by a mortgage on the mule. Not remembering the name of the drover with whom the contract had been made, there was a blank left in the note for the name of the payee, and the note was delivered to *the defendant, A. J. Williams, the husband of Diana, for the purpose of being delivered to the drover and obtaining from him the mule.

A. J. Williams, however, in violation of the trust thus reposed in him, did not deliver the note to the drover, and did not obtain said mule, but, on the contrary, without any authority from the other signers of the note, delivered said note to the plaintiff, in part of the purchase-money of a horse, and gave a mortgage on the horse to secure an alleged balance of forty dollars. The defendants knew shortly afterwards that A. J. Williams had bought a horse from the plaintiff but whether they knew that the aforesaid note had been used in settlement for the horse, did not appear.

It also appeared that when the note for forty dollars became payable, the plaintiff seized the horse under his mortgage, and sold him at public auction for fifty-five dollars, at which sale the defendant R. M. Smith was present. The purchaser at this sale having failed to comply with his bid, "sold said horse to L. A. Mills at same price, and Mills still owns the horse," (as is stated in the "case,") and the evidence was that the horse, at the time of the trial, was estimated to be worth from one hundred to one hundred and twenty-five dollars.

The plaintiff testified that when he sold the horse to A. J. Williams he had no notice of the arrangement between the defendants in regard to the purchase of the mule from the drover, and also, that the defendant Smith told him that they had the money to pay off the note, and would have done so if plaintiff had not brought suit. This money, it seems, had been placed in the hands of her sureties by Diana Williams to indemnify them in the suit, and was her own money.

The defendants requested the Circuit judge to charge as follows: "First, if, from the testimony, the jury believe that the defendants, Diana Williams, W. D. O'Shields and R. M. Smith, signed and sealed said note given to be filled out in favor of a certain person not a party to this proceeding, for a certain mule, and never gave consent that the same should be delivered to L. A. Mills or should be used in the purchase of a horse, then the verdict must be in favor of the defendants named. Second, *if the jury believe that the contract in this case was executed on Sunday, they must find a verdict for all of the defendants."

Both of these requests were refused, and the judge charged "that in order for Diana Williams, W. D. O'Shields and R. M. Smith to avoid the note, it was necessary for them to bring home notice to the plaintiff that the note was intended for another person, and that A. J. Williams was not authorized to deliver it to plaintiff. That a sealed note executed under the circumstances under which this was given could have been delivered to any person for any work animal, (though not, perhaps, for an entirely different species of property,) and that such transferee of note could recover thereon from all the signers thereof. That the circumstances under which the note was executed, and the fact that A. J. Williams delivered it for different property and to a different person than intended by the other signers, in no way relieved the defendants, or either of them, from their liability on said note. That the value of the horse at the time of mortgage sale by plaintiff must first go in payment of the mortgage note for forty dollars and interest, given by A. J. Williams to L. A. Mills, and the balance, if any, was applicable as a credit on said note sued on in this action. That the jury will not be authorized to presume from the date of the note that plaintiff sold the horse on Sunday. The presumption would be that he did not, as no person is presumed to do wrong. That the only direct testimony on this point was that of W. D. O'Shields, to the effect that he saw the horse on Tuesday, after Williams had purchased him from plaintiff on Saturday."

Judgment having been rendered for plaintiff, the defendants appeal, and we are called upon to determine whether there was any error on the part of the Circuit judge in refusing to charge as requested, or in any of the propositions of law laid down in the charge, to all of which exceptions were duly taken.

The appeal of the defendant, A. J. Williams, stands upon an entirely different footing from that of the other defendants, and we propose to consider his appeal first. He raises only two questions: First, whether the judge erred in refusing to charge that if the jury believed from the testimony that the contract, evidenced by the note, was made on Sunday, the plaintiff could *not recover. This court has recently decided, in the case of Hellams v. Abercrombie, 15 S. C. 110 [40 Am. Rep. 684], that the mere fact that a contract was made on Sunday will not render it invalid, but that the party seeking to impeach it must go further and show that the contract was made by a person in the exercise of the business of his ordinary calling. Hence, in that case, a mortgage on real estate, executed on Sunday, which was given to indemnify a surety, was held valid. In this case there is no evidence tending to show that either of the parties in making this contract were in the exercise of the business of their ordinary calling, and, therefore, even if the contract had been made on Sunday, it would be a valid one. There was no error in this respect.

The next ground relied upon by A. J. Williams is, that the judge erred in instructing the jury that the value of the horse, at the time it was sold under the mortgage, must be first applied to the payment of the note for forty dollars, and only the balance, if any, was applicable to the note sued on. We are at a loss to conceive how A. J. Williams could object to this, for it was precisely in conformity to his contract with the plaintiff by which the horse stood pledged for the payment of that particular note, and, of course, the proceeds of the sale should first be applied to its payment. Judging from the argument here, however, the real point of this exception, which is not presented very distinctly in the "case" or the exceptions, seems to be that Mills was, in fact, the real purchaser at the sale under the mortgage, and that he could not legally become the purchaser at his own sale as mortgagee.

The case of Black v. Hair & Black, 2 Hill Eq. 622, [30 Am. Dec. 389], is an authority to the contrary. Here, the sale was made at public auction, was attended by at least one of the other defendants, and the property was bid off by a disinterested third person. This, we think, in the absence of any evidence tending to show any fraud in the sale, or that the property brought less than its value at that time, sufficient to bring this case within the rule established by Black v. Hair & Black, supra. We do not see how, otherwise, the plaintiff could show that his purchase was fair, except by showing that the property was sold at public *auction, that third persons attended the sale, one of whom, at least, might be regarded as having an interest to make the property bring its full value, and that the property was bid off by a third person and his bid transferred to the mortgagee, for that is what we understand to be the effect of the statement made in the "case," "that the purchaser failed to comply with his bid, and sold said horse to L. A. Mills at same price." There is no evidence here, as there was in the case above cited, that the property brought an inadequate price, or that it was afterwards sold for a profit, for the fact testified to, that the horse was estimated to be worth more at a subsequent period, about a year afterwards, might be accounted for in various ways, and yet the sale was sustained in Black v. Hair & Black. This ground of appeal cannot be sustained.

The other defendants, in addition to the grounds already disposed of, take the further ground that the judge erred in charging the jury, that, to enable these defendants to escape liability on this note, it was necessary to satisfy the jury that the plaintiff had notice, when he took the note from A. J. Williams, that it was intended for another person, and that A. J. Williams did not have authority to deliver it to the plaintiff, and that, in the absence of such notice, the circumstances under which, and the purposes for which the note was signed and delivered to A. J. Williams, already detailed, would not relieve these defendants from liability on the note. It will, of course, be conceded that the mere signing of the note in question would not, of itself, impose any liability upon those who signed it. Until it was delivered, the contract which it was intended to evidence was inchoate and not complete, and, therefore, the case really turns upon the question, whether these defendants ever delivered the note to the plaintiff. They certainly never intended to do so, and, on the contrary, intended that the note should be delivered to another person for a different piece of property which was mentioned in the note, though the name of the person for whom it was intended was left blank, and was, therefore, uncertain.

The practical inquiry, therefore, is, whether a person who entrusts a sealed note, with the name of the payee left blank, to an agent for the purpose of being delivered to one person, in *exchange for a particular piece of property specified in the note, is bound by the act of the agent who delivers the note to another person for a different piece of property, unless the person to whom the note was actually delivered had notice, at the time, of this departure from his instructions on the part of the agent.

This question, we think, is settled by the decisions of the former Court of Appeals in this State, in the case of Gourdin v. Read, reported first in 6 Rich. 497, and again in 8 Rich. 230. In that case, Read, for the purpose of assisting one Commander, signed with him, as surety, a joint and several bond, leaving the date and the name of the obligee blank, with the understanding that when Commander found some one willing to lend money on that security he was to fill the blanks, and with the money borrowed he was to purchase slaves and give Read a mortgage on them to indemnify him against any loss by reason of his suretyship. Commander borrowed money from Gourdin and delivered to him this bond as collateral security, after first filling in the name of Gourdin as obligee and the date, but, instead of applying the money to the purchase of slaves, he used it for the payment of his debts. The Circuit judge charged the jury that the question in the case was a mere question of fact—"Whether Commander was authorized by Read to fill up the blanks in the bond and to use the same when complete as he had done?"

On appeal, it was held, amongst other things, that the latter part of this charge was calculated to mislead the jury into supposing that the fact that Commander had used the money obtained on the bond in a manner different from that intended by Read, would discharge Read, and that if Read had, by parol or otherwise, authorized Commander to fill the blanks in the bond with the name of any person from whom he could borrow the money, he would be liable, even though Commander had not applied the money to the purpose understood between them at the time the bond was signed.

On the next trial, Read set up a new defense, based upon the allegation that he had revoked the authority originally given to Commander to fill the blanks in the bond and negotiate it before the money was borrowed from Gourdin. At the hearing below, the jury were instructed that, even if

Commander's *authority had been revoked, this would not discharge Read, unless Gourdin had notice of such revocation before he loaned the money to Commander, but, on the second hearing in the Court of Appeals, it was held that no such notice was necessary, and that, if Commander's authority was revoked before the money was loaned, then Read would be discharged, even if Gourdin had no notice of such revocation.

In delivering the opinion of the court, Withers, J., uses this language: "Gourdin's title rests upon the fact of the existing power of Commander at the time he inserted his name as obligee and delivered it, to do that as the act of Read. * * * * The plaintiff judged of the creation and the continued existence of Commander's authority from the circumstances before him. He also took the risk of its revocation from a view of the same circumstances. Whether he had notice of its revocation does not affect the question."

This is much stronger than the case now before the court. There, the surety had originally invested the principal with authority to fill the blank in the bond with the name of any person from whom he could borrow the money, and yet, although the bond was left in the possession of the principal, it was held that if such authority was revoked, the surety would be discharged, even though the person who loaned the money had no notice that such authority had been revoked. Here, however, the person who delivered the note to the plaintiff never had any authority to do so, but, on the contrary, his instructions were to deliver it to another person, for a particular thing specified in the note, and his delivery to the plaintiff was wholly unauthorized, and cannot bind these defendants.

They certainly never in person made any contract with the plaintiff, and, if it is sought to bind them by a contract made through their agent, the plaintiff must show that the act of the agent was within the scope of his authority. The very fact that the note contained in itself the evidence that it was intended to be given for a mule, was sufficient to show that there was not even any apparent authority conferred upon A. J. Williams by the possession of the note, with the name of the payee left blank, to fill the blank with the name of any person to whom *he might choose to deliver it, for that showed that there had been a previous negotiation with some person for the purchase of the particular property specified in the note at the price therein named.

The plaintiff cannot claim that he was induced to take the note by the apparent authority which the possession of the note seemed to give A. J. Williams to fill the blank, for he must have known that he was not the person with whom there had been a previous negotiation for the purchase of a mule for the sum for which the note was given. We think, therefore, that the judge erred in charging the jury that these defendants would be liable on the note, unless notice was brought home to the plaintiff that the note was intended for another person, and that A. J. Williams was not authorized to deliver it to the plaintiff.

It is urged, however, that even if A. J. Williams had no authority originally to deliver the note to the plaintiff, yet that his act in doing so has been subsequently ratified by these defendants, and they are, therefore, bound by it. There is no doubt that subsequent ratification of the unauthorized act of the agent, by the principal, will make such act the act of the principal, so far as to bind him to the same extent as if the agent had been originally invested with authority to do the act. But we are unable to see anything in this case to warrant the application of this principle. It does not appear that the defendants, whose appeal we are now considering, did, by any word or act, ratify the action of A. J. Williams in using the note for the purchase of a horse for his own benefit. The testimony goes to show that they knew that he had purchased the horse, but there is no evidence that they knew that this note had been used for that purpose, until about the time this controversy arose, and even if they had known it we do not see how this could be regarded as any ratification of the act of A. J. Williams. He had a perfect right to buy a horse, and if the person from whom he purchased was careless enough to take a worthless note in exchange for the horse, we do not see how this could affect these defendants. They appear to have denied their liability as soon as they were called upon to pay the note, and we do not see what more they could have been expected to do.

*The fact that Mrs. Diana Williams deposited with her sureties money to the amount of the note, to indemnify them against any loss they might sustain by this suit, was certainly no confirmation of the act of her husband in appropriating the note to a purpose other than that for which it was intended. She had agreed, if they would, by becoming her sureties, enable her to buy a mule, that she would indemnify them by a mortgage on the mule, and having failed to get the mule, and not knowing what might be the result of the threatened suit on the note, she very properly resorted to other means to indemnify them.

So, too, the statement made by R. M. Smith to the plaintiff that "they had the money to pay off the note, and would have done so if plaintiff had not sued," cannot amount to anything, for the form of the expressions show that this remark was made after the suit was commenced.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court, so far as it affects the defendant A. J. Williams, be affirmed, and so far as it affects the other defendants, that it be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Circuit Court for a new trial as to all the defendants except A. J. Williams.

A debtor fraudulently conveyed away his estate, pending action against him. [This case is also cited and overruled in Suber v. Chandler, 18 S. C. 526.]

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, February, 1881.

At the hearing of this appeal, Hon. BENJAMIN C. PRESSLEY, of the First Judicial Circuit, and Hon. THOMAS B. FRASER, of the Third Circuit, sat in the stead of the CHIEF JUSTICE and Associate Justice McGOWAN, who were constitutionally disqualified.

The action was by John J. McGowan as administrator de bonis non of William Hitt, deceased, against Martin Hitt and Mary, his wife, and Aaron Wells.

The Circuit decree (omitting its statement of facts, which are repeated in the opinion,) was as follows:

The issues presented and the questions to be determined in this case are of a very interesting character, and I would be pleased to have more time to elaborate my views upon them, but pressure of business requires that I shall forego this desire and give my opinion briefly.

Antenuptial conveyances sometimes are made to the intended wife voluntarily by the man through overflowing love and affection, and unsolicited by the woman. In this case they are more properly denominated voluntary deeds, than conveyances in consideration of marriage. Others, again, are the result of negotiations between the parties. They are made conditions precedent to the marriage, enter into and form part of the consideration, *and are properly denominated deeds in consideration of marriage, which it is needless to say constitutes the highest and most valuable consideration known to law. In either instance the deed may on its face purport to be in consideration of marriage, but the fact may be, that in the one case it is an unsolicited donation, and in the other the result of deliberate contract, and a sine qua non to the solemnization of the marriage. Evidence, I think, is always admissible to prove the facts of the case, and these facts should be made always to appear, as they may seriously affect consequent litigation.

The first question raised for answer is, Was it lawful for Martin Hitt, being indebted $2,200, and owning property worth but little if any more, voluntarily to give the whole of this property to his intended wife, and thus to entirely defeat, delay and hinder his creditors? The leading case on this subject in South Carolina is that of Simpson & Davidson v. Admiral Richard Graves and others, Riley's Ch. 232. I cannot find that this case has been overruled or even modified by subsequent decisions, but on the contrary has been recognized as sound law by later decisions of our courts.

Judge Staples, of Virginia, in the late case of Herring v. Wickham, 29 Gratt. 628, takes issue with Justice Nott, of South Carolina, in the aforesaid case, and in a very learned opinion combats this doctrine of South Carolina. His opinion lays down the bold doctrine that creditors are utterly helpless as against an antenuptial conveyance of a man's entire property to his intended wife, however much he may be in debt and however fraudulent may be his intention, provided the wife is not cognizant of the fraud. The two opinions are able and learned, and hold the opposite extremes of the law of fraud as applicable to antemptial settlement by insolvent debtors. I regard the views of Justice Nott as the sounder and safer of the two, and certainly more binding on me. I shall not trouble myself to make extracts from either, nor from other judgments upon this subject. I hold that the conveyance by an insolvent man voluntarily of his entire property to an intended wife on the eve of marriage is fraudulent as against his creditors, and will be declared void, on proper and timely application to the courts.

*Secondly. Does the fact that the conveyance of his entire property by an insolvent to his intended wife on the eve of marriage is made at her special instance and request and as a condition precedent to the marriage, she being innocent of fraudulent intent, alter the case? We think not. And for our reasons refer to the aforesaid opinion of Justice Nott. We hold that a man in debt cannot be allowed to make marriage the means and occasion of entirely defeating, delaying and hindering creditors by settling the whole of his property on a woman in consideration of marriage. The case in hand clearly shows that Martin Hitt, being indebted to an amount nearly equal to the value of his entire property, did, on the eve of marriage, convey to his affianced his entire property, with intent thereby to defeat his creditors. Though not cognizant of this intent, his wife cannot retain this property against the demands of the creditors, unless these demands are barred by the Statute of Limitations interposed in her behalf; and to this inquiry we will address ourselves.

The deed in this instance is expressed to be in consideration of marriage and purports to convey certain well-defined real estate and specific articles and items of personal property. The present plaintiff, McGowan, was familiar with the property of Hitt, and still more cognizant of his affairs was Milly Hitt, the first administratrix of William Hitt, and payee of these notes. She knew that Hitt had conveyed his entire property to Mary Henderson, solely in consideration of marriage, whilst her suit for a large amount was pending against him. Not a fact or circumstance alleged now against this deed was not known to her when it was made, and seems also to have been known to McGowan. But, whether positively and actually known, or not, the deed was duly recorded November 30th, 1868, and bears on its face all the facts constituting the fraud, or enough at least to put the parties upon inquiry.

A recorded deed is constructive notice to the world of all that it contains on its face, and if it express on its face all the elements that constitute the fraud, it becomes notice of the fraud itself. If an insolvent man convey away all his property, expressed to be for a valuable consideration, it is not constructive *notice of fraud, because it may speak truth. But it may afterwards be discovered that it speaks falsely in expressing a valuable consideration, when in fact it is voluntary. From this discovery of the fraud alone would the currency of the statute begin; but if the deed on its face announced a gift to be made, it is notice of all the fraud that a gift gives rise to, and the statute would run from the date of the recording against all having no previous actual notice. To his kinswoman, Milly, and neighbor McGowan, the deed when recorded proclaimed its own character, and they had personal knowledge that he was in debt, and that the deed covered his entire visible, tangible property. They were thus affected with notice of the fraud from November 30th, 1868. Nine years elapsed before the institution of this suit, and more than four, perhaps six years, before the death of Milly Hitt.

But the plaintiff contends that he could not ask relief of the Court of Common Pleas sitting in equity, until he had recovered judgment at law and exhausted his remedy there. That this did not occur until June, 1875, from which date alone can the currency of the statute against him begin, and that having come into this court November 1st, 1877, the bar was not complete. But the inflexible rule of law, and also in equity, is that the statute runs from the discovery of the fraud. To all persons sui juris the law allows four years from this date, in which to begin proceedings. Within this time all persons not under disability are supposed to be able to proceed at law, exhaust their remedy there, and, if necessary, come into equity. Certain it is that this is all the time the law as it then stood, allowed them. If their own tardiness or untoward events prevented them from entering suit in due time, it is the plaintiff's loss and the defendant's gain. Vigilantibus non dormientibus leges subveniunt.

The payee of the note, Milly Hitt, was barred in her life-time against this action and claim, and her successor, the plaintiff, is in no better condition. The action is barred by lapse of time, and it is adjudged that the complaint be dismissed with cost.

Plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding that the deed from defendant Hitt to his wife was sufficient knowledge of the fraud *to give currency to the Statute of Limitations, or that the plaintiff was otherwise affected with knowledge of the fraud for more than four years previous to filing his complaint.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the Statute of Limitations began to run before the judgment was obtained in the action at law against the defendant, Martin Hitt, upon which this action was based.

The defendants' attorneys gave notice that they would move before the Supreme Court to review the entire decree and modify the same, because his Honor erred in holding:

1. That Martin Hitt was insolvent at the time of the conveyance to his intended wife, Miss Henderson.

2. That the antenuptial conveyance by Martin Hitt to his intended wife, though marriage was a valuable consideration, was intended to defraud creditors, and void as to them.

3. That his Honor erred in finding that though Mary Henderson was not cognizant of the indebtedness of Martin Hitt, and any intent on his part to defraud creditors, the antenuptial conveyance is still void and cannot hold against and in preference to the creditors of Martin Hitt.

4. Because his Honor erred in holding that the defendant, Aaron Wells, was cognizant of any fraudulent intent on the part of Martin Hitt, in conveying to his intended wife the property named in the antenuptial deed of conveyance.

5. Because his Honor erred in holding that the deed of conveyance from Mary Hitt to Aaron Wells, though an innocent holder and without notice, was void, except the action was barred by the Statute of Limitation.

Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for defendant Wells.

March 29th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

*609

*PRESSLEY, A. A. J. The personal estate of William Hitt was sold by his administratrix in November, 1861, and his son Henry and son-in-law Marion Andrews then bought some of said property and settled for it by sealed notes, to both of which Martin Hitt was one surety, and B. L. Hitt was the other as to the note of Marion Andrews.

Martin Hitt was sued on said notes in March, 1867. At that time Marion Andrews was living in Mississippi. His other surety, B. L. Hitt, had died, leaving an estate of $3,500. His administrator paid all his debts except those due to estate of William Hitt. Why he did not pay the said sealed note, or whether any effort was made to fix devastavit on him for its non-payment, does not appear. Henry Hitt was then alive, but died in 1873. He and Marion Andrews, by virtue of his marital rights in his wife's share, were distributees of William Hitt's estate. It is not proved when, if ever, their shares were paid to them, nor is any reason shown why their shares were not applied to extinguish their said notes. Suits thereon against Martin Hitt were pending until June, 1875, and judgments were recovered against him. The long delay arose from failure to hold the courts and from other causes not stated.

Martin Hitt married his present wife in November, 1868, then settling on her all his visible estate. The marriage was stated as the consideration, but his express purpose was to avoid payment of said notes. She did not know of that purpose and made no inquiry on the subject of his indebtedness. Afterwards, in December, 1873, she and he sold one of the plantations, thus settled, to their co-defendant Aaron Wells, for full consideration secured by mortgage of said plantation. He knew of her title and of the said suits against Martin Hitt, and was cautioned not to buy said land, but nothing appears in the testimony which indicates that said sale was made as a further attempt by Martin Hitt to put his land more certainly out of reach of his creditors, and such intent by him would seem to be rebutted by the fact that said sale was on credit, secured by mortgage.

Mary Hitt, administratrix of William Hitt, died after recovering said judgments, and plaintiff, as administrator de bonis non, filed this complaint in November, 1877. It alleges fraud in *said settlement, seeks to set aside both the settlement and the conveyance to Aaron Wells, and alleges that the fraud was discovered within four years. The Circuit judge holds that said settlement was a fraud and that its contents are such as to affect the wife with the fraud, though she was ignorant of the other facts, but he dismisses the complaint because he sustains defendants' plea of the Statute of Limitations.

Plaintiff appeals on the question of the statute, and defendants appeal from that portion of the decree which holds that the wife is affected by the fraud of the husband.

The case of Davidson v. Graves, Riley Eq. 232, fully sustains the Circuit decree in this case on the fraud question. It is most earnestly argued before us that said case is clearly in conflict with a long series of well-considered cases which conclusively settle that marriage is a sufficient consideration to uphold a settlement by an insolvent person, even though fraud be thereby intended, if the wife be ignorant of that intent. We concede that doctrine to be so settled, and, it seems to us, to be fully recognized in the case of Davidson v. Graves.

In that case, two settlements were before the court—one, ante-nuptial and the other, post-nuptial—the former, being a settlement by the son of Admiral Graves, is that to which the chief portion of said decision relates. It was a settlement without precedent, in that it conveyed, in consideration of marriage, the whole estate of the husband. None of the settlements in any of the previous cases had attempted such wholesale fraud.

In Tunno v. Trezvant, 2 Desaus. 264, the husband was engaged in merchandise as one of a partnership. He settled upon the intended wife all his private estate. But, before that settlement was accepted, the friends of the wife made proper inquiry, and were satisfied that the assets of the partnership were sufficient to pay its debts. Those assets proved insufficient, but the court held that as due diligence had been used by the friends of the wife, her rights in said settlement could not be affected by the subsequent discovery that the partnership, of which the husband was a member, was insolvent at the time of the settlement.

But, in Davidson v. Graves, and also, in this case, the whole *estate of the husband was conveyed away, nothing whatever being reserved for the payment of any debts, however small or few. The very contents of such a settlement are, at least, sufficient notice of fraud to make it the imperative duty of the wife to inquire whether it could be honestly made. There was no such inquiry in Davidson v. Graves, and none in this case. The wife is, therefore, regarded as having the knowledge which proper inquiry would have given her, and she is, therefore, affected by the fraud involved in the settlement. This is the principle which, applied to the special facts in the case of Graves ads. Davidson, places it in complete harmony with the previous cases, and leaves it unassailable.

On the question of the statute, plaintiff contends that it should not begin to run at the time the said settlement was recorded, because, he says, it did not contain matter amounting to notice of the fraud. We regard the rule as well established, that where the facts set forth in a deed furnish a reasonable clue to the discovery of a fraud involved therein, that is notice of the fraud when the deed is recorded. In this case, we have held that the very contents of the settlement were notice of the fraud to the wife, who did not know that Martin Hitt owed any debts; much more, then, were they notice to the plaintiff, who was the chief creditor.

Plaintiff further contends, that, since he could not sue in equity to set aside said settlement until he had recovered judgments at law, therefore the statute should not run against him until the date of his said judgments. It is not certain that equity would not have original jurisdiction of this matter. Martin Hitt being only surety to said notes, and his principals being distributees of said estate, he had rights in equity to have their share applied to said notes. In 1867, when that suit at law commenced, such equitable defense could not be set up in that court. To get advantage thereof required removal of the case into equity, and that right of removal by defendant was recognized in Hinson v. Pickett, 1 Hill Eq. 35, as giving the plaintiff the privilege of commencing his case in equity, in order to avoid circuity of action.

But, if plaintiff could not originally have sued this whole *matter in equity, then he is not yet properly in that court, because the rule which prevents the suing a purely legal debt in equity until after judgment at law, as imperatively requires that the legal remedies be fully exhausted before seeking relief in equity in such case, and that is not proved to have been done in this case, either as to the principals or other surety to the said notes.

However, conceding that plaintiff is rightfully in equity, and that he could not have come there until the recovery of judgment at law, is the running of the statute thereby suspended until the date of said judgment? It is so decided in several of the other States, and some of us have had very grave doubts on that point. But a very careful examination of the cases in this State has convinced us that a long series of uniform decisions conclusively settle that in this State the statute begins to run at the discovery of the fraud. It was so decided in Van Rhyn v. Vincent, 1 McC. Eq. 314. That case was afterwards confirmed in Eichelberger v. Kibler, 1 Hill Eq. 113 [26 Am. Dec. 192], and in Prescott v. Hubbell, 1 Hill Eq. 213.

Nowhere in any of these cases and others on same point is there the slightest recognition that any obstacle which due diligence of the creditor could remove will stay the running of the statute until he shall remove it. That point was expressly raised in McLure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq. 430, and Chancellor Dunkin on Circuit held that the statute in such case would be stayed, but, on appeal, he was overruled, he only dissenting from the rest of the court. Subsequently, in Lott v. De Graffenried, 10 Rich. Eq. 346, the court again affirmed that the statute runs from the discovery of the fraud, and said that is the "well-settled doctrine."

The foregoing view makes it unnecessary for us to inquire whether, if said settlement were set aside, Aaron Wells would, nevertheless, have valid title to the land conveyed to him by Martin Hitt and wife before the lien of said judgment. That question has not been pressed in the argument, and we refer to it only to reserve it.

The Circuit decree is affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

*McIVER, A. J. Being unable to concur in so much of the opinion of the majority of this court as sustains defendant's plea of the Statute of Limitations, I propose to state, very briefly, the reasons for my dissent.

It is quite true, as a general rule, that in actions of the character of the one now under consideration, the statute begins to run from the discovery of the fraud complained of, but I do not think it is universally true, as there may be circumstances which will prevent the statute from commencing to run until after that time; as, for example, where there is no one in existence capable of then commencing the action. The undoubted rule in an action on a promissory note is, that the statute begins to run at the maturity of the note; and yet it is well settled, where the payee of the note is dead at that time, the statute will not begin to run until administration is granted. Geiger v. Brown, 4 McC. 423, and, to same effect, see Harvin v. Riggs, Rich. Eq. Cas. 287. The same doctrine was held in Murray v. East India Co., 5 Barn. & Ald. 204, (7 Eng. Com. L. 66,) where Abbott, C. J., uses this language: "It cannot be said that a cause of action exists unless there be a person in existence capable of suing."

Upon the same principle, it seems to me, the statute could not commence to run until the plaintiff, by exhausting his legal remedies, was in a condition to enable him to bring this action, for it is conceded that until then an action of this character could not be maintained. The cause of action cannot be said to have accrued until there is some one to whom the cause of action has accrued, as is well said by Colcock, J., in Geiger v. Brown, supra. If, however, a plaintiff should be guilty of laches in exhausting his legal remedies, then a court of equity might very well, upon another principle, refuse to grant the relief sought.

But where a plaintiff has, through no fault on his part, but from unavoidable causes, been delayed in exhausting his legal remedies beyond the statutory period, a court of equity should not inexorably apply the bar of the statute; but, upon principle established in the cases above cited, might very well hold that the statute did not commence to run until there was some one in *a condition which enabled him to bring the action—some one to whom a cause of action has accrued.

This seems to be the rule adopted in some of the other States, as appears by the authorities cited in argument of the counsel for the plaintiff, which need not be repeated here; and in the absence of any express adjudication here to the contrary, this rule is recommended to our approval by the manifest equity upon which it rests.

It is worthy of notice, too, that the rule relied upon by the majority of this court is usually stated in a negative rather than an affirmative form—that in equity the statute will not commence to run until the discovery of the fraud—and it would not necessarily follow from the rule so stated, that in all cases the statute would commence to run as soon as the fraud was discovered. It only fixes a period beyond which the statute shall not commence to run, but it does not necessarily fix the period at which it shall commence to run. Hence, if any other circumstance intervenes of such a character as that it ought to prevent the currency of the statute, there is no departure from the rule in allowing such circumstance its legitimate effect.

Of course, these views are advanced upon the theory that the question under consideration has never been distinctly decided in this

State, for if it had, then, of course, I would cheerfully yield my judgment to such authority. I do not, however, think that the point has ever been distinctly decided in this State. The strongest case looking that way, and the one principally relied on, is McLure v. Ashby, 7 Rich. Eq., 430.

In that case Stephen J. Ashby, in March, 1843, confessed a judgment to a number of his creditors, including the plaintiffs and his brother John, and in January, 1852, the plaintiffs filed their bill alleging that the debt to John was pretensive and fraudulent, and seeking to be relieved against such fraud. The property of Stephen was levied on and sold by the sheriff at different times between 1844 and January, 1847, and a portion of the proceeds applied to older executions, leaving in the hands of the sheriff a large amount applicable to the judgment of March, 1843. There was, however, an older judgment in favor of one De Graffenried, which it was alleged was satisfied, and a *litigation was pending as to that fact, which was not determined until 1851, when it was ascertained that there was nothing due on the De Graffenried judgment, thus leaving the whole amount in the hands of the sheriff applicable to the judgment of March, 1843. When this litigation terminated, John Ashby obtained a rule against the sheriff to show cause why he did not pay over to him the amount of his demand. Thereupon the plaintiffs filed their bill alleging that the claim of John Ashby was fraudulent, and asking to be relieved against it. To this bill the Statute of Limitations was pleaded, and the plea was sustained upon the ground that the evidence showed that the plaintiffs had knowledge of the fraud at the time the judgment was confessed, in March, 1843.

From this brief statement of the case it will be seen that there was no legal obstacle in the way to prevent the plaintiffs from filing their bill as soon as the fraud was discovered, for they were then judgment creditors, and it does not appear that there was anything to prevent them from proceeding at once to exhaust their legal remedies against the judgment debtor and then filing their bill to be relieved from the fraud charged. The cause of action had then accrued to them, and hence the statute then commenced to run. Their delay was voluntary, and they, of course, were properly held to the consequences of such delay.

Here, however, the plaintiff could not proceed until he had obtained judgment: a cause of action did not accrue to him until he had exhausted his legal remedies, and if he was delayed in obtaining his judgment by causes beyond his control, and proceeded with reasonable promptness after obtaining his judgment to institute this action, it does seem to me that a court of equity should not apply the bar of the statute.

As is said by Johnson, Ch., in speaking of the Statute of Limitations, in his Circuit decree in McLure v. Ashby: "In matters of an equitable nature—the terms of the statute not extending to them—this court is not imperatively bound to apply it, and only applies it by analogy to the practice at law, and then it does not apply it when sound conscience would be offended by its application." Or, as is said by Dargan, Ch., in delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeals in the same case, where he is *pointing out the distinction between the rules which govern the application of the Statute of Limitations in a court of law, and those which obtain in a court of equity, when called upon to adjudicate a matter of purely equitable cognizance: "They are not obligatory upon this court and do not apply to proceedings in equity, except so far as the court has thought it conducive to the ends of justice to apply them in analogy to the rules which prevail in a court of law. And as the court only acts on this analogy, because of its subserviency to the ends of justice, it withholds such action when it would be obviously subversive of equity."††

For these reasons I am unable to concur in the conclusion that the action of the plaintiff was barred by the Statute of Limitations.

††There is a class of cases to which reference might be appropriately made here, and that is, those cases where the Statute of Limitations is held to be suspended as between debtor and creditor of two countries at war with each other, while the war continues. Such was the decision in our own State, in the case of Robson v. Wall, 2 N. & McC. 498 [10 Am. Dec. 623], where the right of action accrued before the war of 1812, between Great Britain and the United States, but was held to be suspended during that war, the creditor being a citizen of Great Britain and the debtor a citizen of this State. Speaking of the Statute of Limitations, Judge Bay, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "It never could have been intended to prevent a man who had never been guilty of any willful laches or delay, but who had been prevented by inevitable necessity from pursuing his just rights." On a similar state of facts, the same conclusion was reached in Hanger v. Abbott, 6 Wall. 532 [18 L. Ed. 939]. In these cases it is held, that it is against public policy to permit actions between belligerents to be maintained. This principle affects the right of action only, for the non-computation of time under the Statute of Limitations is not a matter of public policy, but is a result of the same rule declared in Moses v. Jones, 2 N. & McC. 259, that the courts will not apply the bar of the statute to a demand while suit is prohibited by law. See other cases cited in 10 Am. Dec. 633. The case of Shand v. Gage, 9 S. C. 187, was decided upon the principle that the military order there relied upon as having prevented the action, was an "interference with the plaintiff's remedy which did not occur through the act of a source of authority competent to enact or modify any State statute." In the principal case, the settled law did not permit an action to set aside the fraudulent conveyance until judgment was obtained on the debt.—Reporter.

*No. 1084. IRBY v. HENRY. April Term, 1881.

Pending suit, a debtor conveyed his land to a kinsman of his wife upon the alleged consideration of $5,000, and, after judgment obtained, it was reconveyed to the debtor's wife upon a like consideration alleged. Action was then instituted by the judgment creditor in the county where the land lay to set aside these deeds for fraud, the defendants residing in another county. The complaint was verified. Unverified answers were tendered and refused. No demand was made to change the place of trial, but the rejected answers asserted as a defense that the defendants could not be sued in the selected county. Order of reference was made by consent. At the reference, the referee refused to permit defendants to put in either answer or testimony, held that the facts stated in the complaint were admitted and confined counsel to the law points involved. The referee filed his report granting the prayer of the complaint, and five months afterwards it was confirmed in open court without exception. Four days before its confirmation, the grantee of the debtor, a defendant to the action, had died. At the second term of court thereafter a motion was made in behalf of the debtor and wife, alleging negligence on the part of their former attorney, and asking that the judgment be set aside, and that they be allowed to come in, answer and defend. The proposed defense was to the effect that by ante-nuptial settlement between this debtor and his wife, land, negroes, bank stock to the amount of $500, cash to the amount of $900, and furniture belonging to the woman, were transferred to a trustee in trust "for the wife for life, and after her death to go to the heirs of her body;" that this property was also turned over to the husband shortly after the marriage, which was thirty *years before the deeds were executed. There was, however, no further trace of this property, except the debtor's statement that the land here involved was bought with the wife's money, and conveyance made to the husband "instead of the trustee through ignorance, and without her knowledge or consent." The Circuit judge (Thomson) dismissed the motion, and petitioners appealed. Held—

These were distinct actions, but they were both cases in chancery involving fraudulent conveyances, in which certain issues of fact were submitted to a jury. Upon the rendition of the verdicts in both cases, motions were made for new trials, and by consent of counsel the hearing of these motions was postponed to be taken up at chambers, but there was no agreement to have any other matter considered at chambers, except the motions for new trial. These motions were accordingly heard at chambers, and being refused, the Circuit judge rendered final judgment in both cases for the plaintiffs, the defendants not consenting. The defendants in both cases appealed to this court, and upon the hearing here the judgments were set aside, the court saying that a judge at chambers can only hear such cases as are provided for by statute, and that *there is no provision for the hearing of such a case at chambers. Notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, the parties had a right to have a hearing by the court upon the merits, and such hearing could not be had at chambers—certainly not without the consent of all the parties.

No. 1097. STOKES v. WALLACE. April Term, 1881.

The object of this action was to obtain the settlement of an intestate's estate, and the defendant, as administrator, was called upon to account. On such accounting a balance was found in favor of the administrator on his transactions from 1862 to 1865, and the referee reported that, in the absence of all proof as to what species of currency was used by the administrator, as matter of law, the debits and credits should be in United States currency. The referee also reported the testimony, in which the bare fact appeared that a distributee had received a negro boy from his father, the intestate, but whether as a gift, remuneration for ser*vices rendered, or otherwise, did not appear. Judge Mackey confirmed the referee's report, and also charged this distributee with the negro boy as an advancement, and referred it back to the referee to ascertain the value. Held—

No. 1107. WRIGHT v. HERLONG. April Term, 1881.

This was a bill in equity, filed in 1866, by an administrator for the settlement of his intestate's estate. It was referred to the commissioner in equity to state the accounts, and he filed his report, showing a balance in the administrator's hands. The case was never transferred to the calendar of the Court of Common Pleas, as, under the law, should have been done after January 1st, 1869. An order was passed, however, in 1870, by the Circuit judge, referring it to a referee to report the condition of the estate and scheme for a settlement. Before reference held under this order, the attorney for the defendants, distributees, died, and it does not appear that notice was given to them of the reference. But a reference was held. Whether a report was made and confirmed is doubtful, but, if made, it was never filed, it would seem, and, if confirmed, it was done at chambers without consent or notice. Defendants moved, in 1880, for leave to transfer the cause from the equity docket to the calendar of the Court of Common Pleas, and for an order referring the case to the master to state the condition of the estate and the accounts of the administrator. This motion was refused by the Circuit judge (Aldrich) upon the ground that the relief sought could not be obtained by motion. Defendants appealed. Held—

This case involved the construction of a power of sale contained in a mortgage of land, in words following, to wit: "And it is expressly understood and agreed that if, in any time within the period aforesaid, the said R. R. Stutts should fail or neglect to send, consign, ship and deliver to the said J. H. Parker & Co., in Charleston, the crude turpentine and resin, and spirits of turpentine, as provided in said bond, and the conditions and recitals thereof, according to the true intent and meaning thereof, then, on such default, said J. H. Parker & Co. shall have the right, if they see fit, to consider this mortgage forfeited, and the said J. H. Parker & Co., their executors, administrators or assigns shall be at liberty (if they see fit), and the said R. R. Stutts does hereby authorize and empower the said J. H. Parker & Co., their heirs, executors, administrators or assigns, to grant, bargain, sell, release and convey the said real estate, with its appurtenances, at public auction," &c.

[Counties ⟸132.]

The fourth section of the act of March 12th, 1878, (16 Stat. 445,) which provided that the county of Barnwell should not be liable in criminal cases for more than one-half the fees and costs allowed by law to constables, was a special provision as to the manner of payment and in relation to the extent of the liability of that county in certain circumstances, and, therefore, was not repealed by the act passed ten days afterwards (16 Stat. 624), fixing the costs and fees of certain officers throughout the State, including constables.

No. 1144. GARY v. WATSON. November Term, 1881.

An attorney-at-law brought his action against an executrix for counsel fees due him by the testator and the defendant. Pending a reference on the issues involved, a compromise was effected and a writing signed and sealed, which provided that the plaintiff should retain $2,500 out of funds then in his hands belonging to defendant as executrix, in full settlement of his claim for fees, and should pay the costs of his attorneys and witnesses, and that defendants should pay the other costs of the case. The referee reported these facts, and that the reference had been adjourned sine die. Meantime, the plaintiff, deducting the $2,500, and also $531.62, nulla bona taxed costs due him in cases in which fees were charged in the account sued on, and deposited the balance in bank to the credit of defendant. Defendant refused to receive this deposit, and thereupon excepted to the referee's report upon an immaterial point, and upon the further ground that the agreement, having been violated by the plaintiff, was not binding on defendant, and, at the same time, she gave notice of *a motion to be made at the next term of the Circuit Court for an order recommitting the report. This motion and the exceptions were heard by Judge Mackey on affidavits submitted by both parties. The Circuit judge held that the plaintiff had violated the terms of the settlement, and that it was not, therefore, binding on defendant, and he signed the order of reference asked for. On appeal by the plaintiff to this court it was held, that (without considering how an inquiry into the facts should have been conducted, inasmuch as the mode of hearing on affidavits was pursued without objection,) the only point here to be determined was whether there had been a settlement; and the affidavits showing that the minds of the litigants never met—that the plaintiff was agreeing only to a settlement of the account sued on, and the defendants only to a settlement of all demands—that there was no settlement. And upon this ground the order of reference was affirmed.

No. 1148. SHAFFER v. SHAFFER. November Term, 1881.

Frederick Shaffer died June 14th, 1859, leaving of force a last will and testament, which was as follows:

"Item. It is my will and desire that all my property, real and personal, be kept together till my youngest child becomes of age (21 years), and the income be appropriated yearly to the payment of my debts and the support and maintenance of my wife and children in their minority.

"Item. After all my just debts are fully paid, and the support and maintenance of my wife and children are provided for, from time to time out the income of my property, I then desire my executrix and executor from time to time, from the surplus, to pay each of my children ($5,000) five thousand dollars.

"Item. My daughter, Elizabeth W. Shaffer, having received from me negroes to the amount of ($5,000) five thousand dollars, I consider her as having already received the amount provided for in the above clause.

"Item. It is my will and desire, so long as my wife, Elizabeth Shaffer, remains my widow, that she and my children shall have the use of the income derived from my property. But should she marry, then she shall no longer exercise the control of executrix over my property, or have any interest or benefit therein, and the property, real and personal, shall be divided, share and share alike, amongst my children, provided the youngest has become of age. I do hereby nominate and appoint my wife, Elizabeth Shaffer, executrix, and my son, Frederick J. Shaffer, my executor of this my last will and testament, dated Charleston, South Carolina, second day August, 1845."

At the date of this will testator had nine children, nearly all of whom were minors, and at the time of his death ten children, two of whom were minors, and the youngest attained her majority in 1867. At his death his estate was worth $162,000. A plantation, of which he died seized, was sold in 1859 for $50,000, under a bill in the Court of Equity, filed by his executrix and executor, and in that proceeding the widow made no *claim of dower, and the case has long since ended. Other real estate was purchased by the executors. After testator's death, the widow resided in Charleston and then in Marion. Some of the children lived with her all the time, some off and on, and some not at all. The daughter Elizabeth, upon her husband's death in 1869, returned to her mother with two daughters, and died in 1871. One of these daughters remained with her grandmother until in 1879, and the other is still there. The children all received moneys from the executors, but none of them to the extent of $5,000. Frederick J. Shaffer died after this action was commenced. The present value of the estate is $84,767.37. The object of the action was to obtain a construction of the will and a settlement of the estate, and the widow demanded dower. It was instituted in January, 1880, by the executrix and executor, against the children of testator, and the children of his deceased children. Held—

[1. Wills ⇐733.]

That there was to be no division while the widow lived and remained unmarried, but the property was to be kept together for the payment of debts and for the maintenance of his wife and children, but upon the widow's marriage was to be divided, if the children were all then of age, and, if not, as soon as the youngest became of age. If the widow did not again marry, then she and the children were to have the use of the income derived from the property for and during the life of the widow. But, if the widow consents to a division now, upon satisfactory provision being made for her, the court may so order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1825; Dec. Dig. ⇐733.]

[2. Wills ⇐782, 794.]

The provisions of this will in favor of the widow were intended by testator to be in lieu and bar of dower. The conduct of the widow in the sale of the plantation, the reinvestment of the proceeds without claim of dower, the occupation of the homestead, and in other respects, sufficiently indicated her determination to take under the will, and she cannot now be permitted to make her election to take against the will. These principles are not affected by the fact that the remainder in these lands are not disposed of by the will.

[3. Wills ⇐730.]

The support and maintenance provided for the children was only to be during their minority, and as they respectively attained to the age of twenty-one, they were to have the "use of the income" in the shape of a legacy of $5,000, to be paid to each out of the surplus income.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1785–1792; Dec. Dig. ⇐730.]

[4. Wills ⇐732.]

*The losses of the estate having made it impossible to pay these legacies of $5,000 to each of the children, they are entitled to receive it out of the corpus before partition is made. In ascertaining balance due on this legacy, amounts received for support and maintenance during minority should not be deducted, but all sums received after majority are proper credits on the legacy.

Decree modified.

No. 1150. SIMRIL v. COLEMAN. November Term, 1881.

Defendant employed plaintiff to do some work for him, which he was to pay for as it progressed, the first payment to be "$138 and four Chester county bonds of the face value of $100 each, taken at the valuation of $308, including accrued interest." This contract was in writing, and dated October 10th, 1879. On November 7th, 1879, the first payment being due, defendant paid to plaintiff $138 in money, and gave to him four Chester county bonds, and took his receipt for $446. Afterwards, plaintiff discovered that the coupons of January 1st, 1879, had been cut off. The work being done, plaintiff sued for a balance due him on his contract, and credited the account with $418, paid November 7th, 1879.

These bonds bore seven per cent. interest, payable annually. No interest was payable on the issue until January 1st, 1879, and could not be collected until the taxes were paid in October, after they fell due, when they could be used in paying taxes. At the trial, the presiding judge (Fraser) refused to permit defendant to prove that when he bought these bonds the coupons of January 1st, 1879, were missing. Held—

[1. Counties ⇐186.]

That in this ruling there was no error—the evidence was irrelevant.

Opinion by McGOWAN, A. J., March 4th, 1882. S. P. Hamilton, for appellants. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

Judgment affirmed.

No. 1151. JONES v. CLARKSON. November Term, 1881.

C. rented land to J. for $37, and agreed to advance $80 under lien to make his crop, which latter lien was signed by J. and his wife, and filed. In the fall, J. owed C. the rent, $94.75 for advances, $45 for guano and $15 on a note. J. paid C. $114.15 in cotton made on the rented land, giving no directions as to its application. C. applied the payment first to the rent, next to the debt due for guano, next to the note, and the balance to the account for advances, and then brought action before trial justice H. to recover the balance due, and procured an attachment which was levied by a constable on a bale of cotton made by J. or his wife on this land. The constable stored it in C.'s ginhouse, where, without C.'s fault, it was burned before the trial. What became of that action does not appear. A few days afterwards, this action was instituted by Mrs. J. against C. and the constable, before trial justice F., to recover the value of this bale of cotton, which was alleged to be her property. F. gave judgment for the defendants, and the Circuit Court affirmed it, and a further appeal to this court was dismissed.

The following points were decided:

[1. Agriculture ⇐15; Clerks of Courts ⇐65.]

A warrant to enforce an agricultural lien can be issued only by the clerk of court, and executed only by the sheriff.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Cavender v. Ward, 28 S. C. 473, 6 S. E. 302.

For other cases, see Agriculture, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. ⇐15; Clerks of Courts, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. ⇐65.]

[2. Justices of the Peace ⇐48, 86.]

But the creditor may sue for his debt by ordinary action, and the trial justice has jurisdiction to issue in such action an attachment, which could not in another action be questioned for irregularity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 177, 284; Dec. Dig. ⇐48, 86.]

[3. Landlord and Tenant ⇐213.]

If the debt was paid before the action was instituted by C., then the process was void. But it was not paid, for although C. had no right to apply the payments realized from the crops covered by the lien to his unsecured claims, he could apply it first to the payment of the rent (which was less than one-third *of the crop made); and the remainder applied to the account for advances, left a small balance still due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. § 858; Dec. Dig. ⇐213.]

4. It cannot be said that cotton made on the leased premises could not be attached, even if made by J.'s wife.

Opinion by McGOWAN, A. J., March 4th, 1882. U. R. Brooks, for appellant. Andrew Crawford, contra.

No. 1152. BENEDICT v. ROSE. November Term, 1881.

This was an action on a promissory note made by Neagle, and endorsed by Carpenter and Rose, and payable at one of the banks in the city of Columbia, where all the parties resided. Rose, the appellant here, denied his signature and notice of protest. The plaintiff proved demand, non-payment, and notice of protest sent through the mails addressed to "W. E. Rose, Columbia, S. C.," with printed notice on the back of the envelope requesting a return of the letter if not delivered in five days, and that it had never been returned. Plaintiff also proved that such service was according to the custom of all the Columbia banks, and he also produced witnesses, including Neagle, who testified that the signature of Rose was genuine. Defendant denied the signature and denied receiving notice of protest, and his son testified that his father had not endorsed the note.

The judge charged that the jury should regard both plaintiff and defendant as interested witnesses, and should, therefore, inquire which of them was corroborated by witnesses not interested in the case. That plaintiff was sustained by Mr. Neagle, and by the witnesses claiming to know the handwriting of defendant. In such case it was usual for defendant to produce other witnesses, either skilled in detecting false signatures or acquainted with defendant's handwriting, to support his allegation of the forgery, and the jury had the right from defendant's failure to do so in this case to conclude that he could not corroborate his testimony on that point. That if the custom relied on by plaintiff, as to the notice to endorsers living in the same city where the note was payable, was proved to the satisfaction of the jury, then the notice sent by T. H. Gibbes, Notary Public, was sufficient to charge the endorsers, and there was no need of proof of its reception. That the sufficiency of the notice to charge the endorsers was in no manner affected by the endorsement on the envelope.

*Verdict was rendered for plaintiff against Rose (judgment having been previously obtained against Neagle and Carpenter), and Rose appealed.

[1. Bills and Notes ⟸421.]

This court held that under the proof made of the custom of the Columbia banks, the notice of protest was properly served, and the validity of the service was not affected by the notice on the back of the envelope.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bills and Notes, Cent. Dig. § 1184; Dec. Dig. ⟸421.]

[2. Trial ⟸194.]

Upon the charge of the judge as to the signature of Rose, this court said: "The fundamental principle of our system of administering justice is that the judge shall decide the law and the jury determine the facts. Const., Art. IV., § 26. This is plain enough in theory, but it is not always easy to carry it out in practice. In most transactions which fall under the cognizance of courts in the administration of justice, law and fact are so intermingled and blended that it is difficult to draw clearly the line that separates them. The judge is required to announce the law, but that cannot be done properly until the facts are established. He cannot be expected in every case to announce all the law, but only so much of it as is applicable to the case made by the facts. It is, therefore, absolutely necessary for him in discharging his part of the duty, not only to understand, but to make reference to the facts, which must constitute the basis of the law he announces. Accordingly the constitution declares that he has the right 'to state the testimony and declare the law.' What is the proper extent and scope of this power? It has been properly held that 'stating the testimony' means more than repeating it. It includes the idea of stating it in its logical relations to the propositions which it is to support or contradict, as well as to the principles of law by which its bearing and force ought to be controlled, or, as it is expressed by the technical phrase, 'summing up.' But while it means more than merely repeating the testimony, the other part of the provision negatives the right to invade the proper province of the jury by expressly declaring that 'judges shall not charge juries in respect to matters of fact.' It may be difficult, or even impossible, to define with precision the exact limits of the distinction indicated, but it is important, for many reasons, that it should be maintained. [After citing and stating the ruling of the court in State v. Bailey, 1 S. C. 1; Redding v. Railroad Company, 5 Id. 67, and State v. White, 15 Id. 392, the opinion continued.] In view of *the provision in the constitution, and in the light of these interpretations, we are of opinion that the judge transcended the prescribed limits when he charged 'that in such cases it was usual for the defendant to produce other witnesses, either skilled in detecting false signatures or acquainted with defendant's handwriting, to support his allegation of the forgery, and the jury had the right, from the defendant's failure to do so, to conclude that he could not corroborate his testimony on that point.' This was not merely arranging the testimony in proper and logical order, with a view to apply the law, but was, in effect, the expression of an opinion to the jury, drawn from the supposed existence of a usage in such cases, and the absence of all testimony of a particular character."

No. 1153. SHAW v. CUNNINGHAM. November Term, 1881.

This was a trial by a jury, in the Circuit Court, of the issue submitted to them under the order of the Supreme Court in Shaw v. Cunningham, 9 S. C. 271, namely: whether a paper purporting to be a deed, conveying the land in question from A. D. Jones, Sr., to J. G. Jones, had been delivered. The jury found that it had not been delivered. Judge Mackey, presiding, thereupon signed a paper stating that the court, without expressing any opinion upon the merits, had rendered judgment in accordance with the verdict found, and from this judgment, appeal was taken. Nearly three months afterwards he filed a decree bearing the date of the trial, in which he gave a statement of the case and his own conclusions upon the facts, and specifically directed judgment for defendants upon the matters at issue. The plaintiff appealed to this court. Held—

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1071.]

That the error assigned in the failure on the part of the Circuit judge to give his own judgment upon the question of fact submitted was cured by the subsequent decree.

No. 1162. GARY v. BURNETT. November Term, 1881.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇐1008.]

The first point decided in this case is thus stated in the opinion: "The testimony was taken by a referee, who was appointed simply for that purpose, and not charged with the duty of hearing or determining any of the issues in the case; and, it is argued, that when the testimony is in writing, the rule is different from that which prevails when the witnesses are examined orally before the judge, and that this court will more readily overrule the findings of fact by a Circuit judge where he hears the case upon written testimony than in those cases where the witnesses are examined orally before him. We think, however, that the rule is substantially the same, and before this court will reverse the findings of fact by a Circuit judge, even *when based upon written testimony, we must be satisfied that the clear result of undisputed testimony points manifestly to a different conclusion from that reached by the Circuit judge. Where the testimony is conflicting and the Circuit judge has, upon weighing it, reached a conclusion which can be supported by the testimony, we will not interfere, although there may be other testimony in the case pointing to a different conclusion. We are not to substitute our judgment for that of the Circuit judge as to the comparative weight of the testimony. It is only where there is no testimony to support his conclusion, or where manifest error is shown, that this court will undertake to overrule a finding of fact by a Circuit judge. * * In this case, there was certainly much conflict of testimony, and we cannot say that there was any such manifest error on the part of the Circuit judge as would warrant our interference. On the contrary, we think his conclusions may very well be supported by a review of all the testimony."

No. 1163. BONHAM v. RAILROAD COMPANY. November Term, 1881.

Upon the return of this case to the Circuit Court after the judgment rendered on the former appeal (13 S. C. 267), it was referred to the master to inquire and report whether cotton packed in bales was classified as a heavy article, or as an article of measurement, according to the custom in practice with railroads and common carriers in South Carolina in December, 1846, (the date of the charter.) The master took testimony and reported that cotton was classified by common carriers in Decem*ber, 1846, as a heavy article. This report was confirmed by Judge Pressley, who gave judgment perpetually enjoining the defendant from transporting cotton in bales otherwise tha as a heavy article, subject to the tolls allowed by its charter for the carriage of heavy articles.

On appeal, this judgment was affirmed, no manifest error being shown in the concurrent finding of fact by master and Circuit judge. There was no evidence to show that cotton packed was ever classified as an article of measurement, most of the witnesses stating that its transportation in 1846 was charged by the bale, but a bale was explained to mean a certain number of pounds of cotton, and not a package of so many cubic feet. "The standard by which the railroad determined its rate was the weight and not the size of the bale." One witness, however, who was a director in 1852, testified that cotton was charged as a heavy article.

[Appeal and Error ⟸966.]

The refusal by the Circuit judge of a motion for continuance seldom afforded any ground for a new trial, even before 1868, but since the constitution of that year limiting this court to a correction of errors at law, such a motion is addressed solely to the discretion of the Circuit judge, and his refusal in a case at law furnishes no ground for the interference of this court. No. 1169. CLEVELAND v. BRYANT. November Term, 1881.

This was an action for breach of a written contract, whereby plaintiffs agreed to erect a building according to plan, and defendants agreed to rent the same at $200 a year, payable quarterly, and to keep the post office in the building so long as the defendant, Bryant, was postmaster. The building was completed in December, 1873, and tendered to defendants, and they declined to receive it. A few days afterwards plaintiffs brought this action, claiming $1,000 damages. The case came up on exceptions to Judge Kershaw's charge and refusals to charge. Held—

[2. Trial ⟸139.]

There was no error in refusing to charge "that the verdict should be for defendants, nothing being due for rent at time of action brought, or, in no event, could it be for more than nominal damages." In this connection the court say: "It is only in cases destitute of facts that the judge is warranted in charging as requested here. A judge may err in acceding to requests of the kind made in this case, but he will seldom err in refusing them; certainly, in such refusals as to matters of fact he should be safe from reversal by this court."

[3. Landlord and Tenant ⟸22.]

There was no error in charging the jury that if plaintiffs built the house according to contract and tendered it, that a cause of action arose immediately on refusal by defendants to take it, for the full amount of damages, present and prospective, which were the necessary and direct result of the violation of the contract; and that the measure of damages would be $600 less the amount the plaintiffs received during the three years that Bryant had continued to be postmaster.

*No. 1171. MILLER v. BOLT. November Term, 1881.

[Trial ⇐139.]

This was an action for enticing away and harboring a hired servant of the plaintiff. Witnesses for plaintiff testified that G. W. Miller, husband of plaintiff, hired one Hix for a year, to work on his wife's farm; that Hix knew he was hired for plaintiff; that there were no conditions in the contract; that it was well known in the neighborhood that the farm belonged to plaintiff, and defendant lived on the adjoining farm and had seen Hix at work on Mrs. Miller's place, and that before the year expired Bolt hired Hix. A motion was made by defendant for a non-suit, because there was no evidence to show that he knew that Hix was hired by plaintiff. The presiding judge (Kershaw) then permitted plaintiff to introduce further testimony, and Hix was sworn. He testified that he contracted only with G. W. Miller; did not know Mrs. Miller in the transaction, and did not know that her husband was her agent, and that, by the contract, he could leave at pleasure. The judge then ordered the non-suit. On appeal, this order was set aside, this court holding that there was some testimony to sustain the case of the plaintiff. Whether it was sufficient should have been left to the jury. A non-suit in invitum should not be granted if there is any prima facie evidence in support of the action.
